More significant was the controversy which Parmenian had to engage in with a member of his own Church, the lay theologian Tyconius,[42] who must be regarded as one of the most important writers of Donatism. His scriptural studies had let him achieve, above all, a universal understanding of the Church, as its own community reveals it. Even the non-African Christian groups were for Tyconius's churches, even if they were in communion with the traditores of North Africa. The biblical parable of the weeds which grew with the wheat induced him to question also the Donatist demand that, as the Church of the Pure, it must hold itself aloof from every staining contact with the wicked. Christianity would, on the contrary, be divided through a much deeper split into two parts, into a Kingdom of God and a Kingdom of Satan: to which of the two kingdoms the individual Christian belongs by virtue of his own voluntary decision will only be made known on Judgment Day.[43] In an open letter Parmenian rejected Tyconius's dangerous theses: a review of the history of Donatism shows how, in fact, the entire non-Donastic Christianity became guilty through its communion with the traditores, so that only the Church of the Donatists, as the one persecuted by the Emperors, is the pure one, unique also in the possession of the true baptism of Christ. More than twenty years later, Augustine, at the urging of his fellow bishops, wrote a refutation of this Epistula Parmeniani, so powerful still was the influence it exercised. Tyconius, however, was not dissuaded from his views by it, and so Parmenian had him excommunicated from the Donatist Church at a synod. The expectation of many a Catholic that he would convert to the Catholic Church, was, however, not realized.[44] With the condemnation of Tyconius, Donatism gave up the possibility of a break-through into a greater theological breadth and became hardened in its sectarian narrowness, the creed of which was the cry: "Great is the Church of the Numidians: we are the Christians, and only we are."[45]

---

[38] Augustine probably means them when, in Ep. 55, 18, 34, he speaks of songs of the Donatists, "which sprang from human art."

[39] The train of thought of the nonextant work can be inferred only from Optatus, De schismate Donatistarum.

[40] Optatus, 2, 6–8.

[41] Optatus, 2, 18, quotes in this context Parmenian's words: aliud sunt milites missi, aliud episcopi ordinati.

[42] On him cf. E. Dinkler, Pauly-Wissowa II, 6, 649–656, Gennadius, Script. eccles. 18 names four works by him: 1) De bello intestino, 2) Expositiones diversarum causarum, 3) Liber regularum, 4) Commentary on the Apocalypse. The third, a work on hermeneutics highly praised by Augustine, is preserved in its entirety (ed. F. C. Burkitt, Cambridge 1894); the fourth can be reconstructed from fragments (now PL, Suppl. 1, 621–652).

Two episodes under Parmenian show how the relationship with the Roman State, necessarily poisoned by the notion of the Donatist "Church of the Persecuted," ultimately led, again and again, to damaging reversals for this Church itself. At the accession of the Emperor Valentinian I in 364, Romanus became comes Africae; with his inclination toward corruption and avarice he did not spare even the predominantly Donatist province of Mauretania.[46] When the Circumcellions resisted him and for their part also committed serious excesses, ten Donatist bishops under the leadership of Rogatus of Cartenna solemnly protested against them and finally separated themselves from the Donatists in order to realize the Donatist ideal as the Church of Nonviolence[47]. More serious were the consequences for the Donatist Church, especially in Mauretania, when it openly sympathized with the revolt against Rome which the tribal chief Firmus[48] had staged in 372. The Donatists also recognized him as King and gave him their support the more readily as Firmus moved firmly against the Rogatists around Cartenna.[49] Rome did not leave unpunished the coresponsibility of the Donatists in this revolt: in 373 Donatist rebaptism had already been prohibited, and after the suppression of the revolt by the General Theodosius, father of the future Emperor, Donatist worship was forbidden in cities and village communities,[50] and some especially compromised Donatist leaders went into exile, among them a Bishop Claudian, who assumed the leadership of the Donatist congregation at Rome. A further imperial edict of 377, which again gave validity to all laws hitherto issued against Donatists,[51] could have been ominous for them, but the Vicar Flavian, successor of Theodosius, now in disfavor, was entrusted with its implementation, and he was himself a Donatist,[52] who enforced the ordinance against his coreligionists only very laxly.

---

[43] Cf. J. Ratzinger, "Beobachtungen zum Kirchenbegriff des Tyconius," RevÉAug 2 (1956), 173–185, and id., "Herkunft und Sinn der Civitaslehre Augustins," Augustinus Magister II, (1954), 965–979.

[44] Augustine, C. ep. Parmen. 1, 1, 1; Doctr. christ. 3, 30; cf. L. J. van der Lof, "Warum wurde Tyconius nicht katholisch?" ZNW 57 (1966), 260–283.

[45] Augustine, C. ep. Parmen. 1, 2, 3; Sermo 46, 16, 40.

[46] Ammianus Marcellinus, 29, 5.

[47] Augustine, Ep. 93, 11, 49, to Vincent, an acquaintance from his youth, who later became bishop of these Rogatists.

Thus the last fifteen years of Parmenian's term of office became the period in which the Donatist Church achieved its fullest blossoming. Both the number of its members and its importance in the public awareness had clearly made it the strongest Christian denomination, to which the Catholic faction seemed ever more like a harmless sect. Also, the contemporary Catholic bishops were vague figures in comparison with Parmenian. Restitutus of Carthage was compromised because he had yielded at Rimini in 359, his successor Genethlius was nervously intent on avoiding any conflict with the Donatists, and his Church gave the impression of an intimidated minority. This harmlessness of the Catholics caused even the animosity of the Donatists to die out and a certain patronizing manner in regard to the now apparently definitively beaten opponents to arise. Contacts between the members of both denominations became normal in day-to-day matters, and occasionally Donatists recruited in an actually peaceable manner for the passage of Catholics to their communion.[53]

A change in this total situation, so advantageous to Donatism, only began in the first years of the last decade of the fourth century. It was occasioned especially by two factors, the one personal, the other political. After the death of Parmenian, the leadership of the Donatist

---

[48] See Pauly-Wissowa 6, 2383.

[49] Augustine, C. ep. Parmen. 1, 10, 16; C. litt. Petil. 2, 83, 184.

[50] Cod. Theod. 16, 6, 1; 16, 5, 4.

[51] Ibid. 16, 6, 2.

[52] Augustine, Ep. 87, 8.

[53] Augustine, Ep. 33, 5; 35, 2; De bapt. 2, 7, 10.

Church was entrusted to Primian,[54] a choice that was to prove to be a serious blunder. Primian was the representative of an extremist group, who was also inclined personally to radicalism, appealed as a demagogue to the instincts of the masses, and had only a rudimentary feeling for what was genuinely religious. His authoritarian rule quickly aroused opposition, of which his own deacon, Maximian, a descendant of the great Donatus, made himself the spokesman. An opposition faction of forty-three bishops accused Primian of serious crimes at a synod and demanded of him an accounting for his administration. Since Primian disregarded such a demand, a new synod in 393 deposed him; around 100 bishops, and hence about one quarter of the Donatist episcopate, were represented.[55] Primian now moved to the counterattack against the Maximianists, in which he unscrupulously employed all means of defamation and force, even the full power of the State, when this was possible, and especially that of the Circumcellions. After such intimidation, he then had Maximian, who had meanwhile been ordained a bishop, excommunicated at the Synod of Bagai (394), removed from his residence by the state authorities, and his cathedral razed to the ground.[56] The adherents of Maximian were also exposed to this sort of pressure, and so one by one they submitted. The harsh rule of Primian left with many Donatists a feeling of depression and facilitated for some their later passage to Catholicism.

A similar negative effect was produced by a second personality of the Donatist episcopate: Optatus, elected Bishop of Thamugadi (Timgad in southern Mauretania),[57] in whom a bellicose religious fanaticism was joined with a strong inclination toward princely display. The anniversary of his episcopal ordination was always for him the occasion to give a splendid reception, at which he accepted the attentions of his colleagues and of the people who were devoted to him.[58] The appropriate setting for this was supplied by the great basilica, built probably by him on a hill in the city, with its spacious atrium and richly decorated baptistery: to the contemporary Donatists it seemed a symbol of their strength, and an inscribed mosaic proclaimed the glory of their founder.[59] Under Optatus the Circumcellions became a paramilitary troop,[60] which was at the bishop's disposal for every need, and for a decade it was the terror of the landowners of southern Numidia and especially of the Catholics.

---

[54] On him P. Monceaux, op. cit. 6, 111–147; Augustine judges him unusually harshly: Enarr. in ps. 36, serm. 2 and 3.

[55] Augustine, Enarr. in ps. 36, sermo 2, 19–21; fifty-five bishops signed the decree of deposition, but cf. Augustine, C. Crescon. 4, 6, 7: "centum vel amplius tunc episcopi." Judgment on Primian, PL 11, 1183–1189.

[56] Decrees of the Synod of Bagai, PL 11, 1189–1191; see Augustine, C. Crescon. 4, 58, 69.

[57] On the still existing Christian monuments see P. Monceaux, Timgad chrêtien (Paris 1911); Chr. Courtois, Timgad, antique Thamugadi (1951).

[58] Augustine, C. litt. Petil. 2, 23, 53; Ep. 105, 5.

Optatus took the fatal step in his career when he made an alliance with the Numidian Gildo,[61] brother of the rebel Firmus. In 386 the Emperor Theodosius had made Gildo comes Africae, apparently because it was believed that his loyalty could be depended on because of his close relations with the court—his sister Salvina had married a member of the imperial family. His position was further strengthened when he was appointed magister utriusque militiae for Africa. But gradually Gildo yielded to the temptation to construct for himself in Africa a power independent of Ravenna. He saw the route to this in a closer connection with Byzantium, from where control over him could be exercised with greater difficulty than from Italy. To what extent Optatus was familiar with these plans can no longer be determined. Nevertheless, he was regarded as the spiritual author of that intimate collaboration between the Primianists and Gildo, which gave him a free hand to bring back, by his own methods, the still reluctant Maximianists into the Donatist Church (397).[62] From then on, he was allied with Gildo for better or for worse, even when in 397 Gildo moved to open rebellion against Ravenna by trying to stop the export of grain to Italy. Rome's commander in chief, Stilicho, immediately understood the magnitude of the danger, but craftily put Gildo's brother, Mascazel, at the head of the contingent of troops bound for Africa, since they had become bitter enemies because of a family feud.[63] Since the deeds of violence against Catholics had again become so numerous that the Emperor had decreed the penalty of death against Numidian plunderers of churches,[64] the military enterprise against Gildo and Optatus obtained also an ecclesiastical and political coloring. The Roman troops succeeded in stopping Gildo in the vicinity of Theveste and there annihilating him in the spring of 398. A few weeks later the two fleeing protagonists of the undertaking fell into Roman hands and were executed as rebels. Nevertheless, the simple Donatist folk saw in the enthusiastically venerated

---

[59] On the mosaic cf. E. Albertini, CRAIBL 1939, 100ff.

[60] Augustine, C. ep. Parmen. 1, 11, 17; 2, 2, 4.

[61] On Gildo's revolt, see H. J. Diesner, Klio 40 (1962), 178–186.

[62] Augustine, C. Crescon. 3, 60, 66; 4, 25, 32.

[63] Orosius, 7, 36; Claudian, De bello Gildonico; see O. Seeck, Geschichte des Untergangs der antiken Welt 5 (reprint ed. Stuttgart 1966), 286ff.

[64] Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 31.

Optatus a martyr, whereas his fellow bishops scrupulously held themselves aloof from him.[65]

This defeat introduced at the same time the ruin of Donatist prestige in North Africa. In the future there were no longer any high officials who could still sympathize with their movement. The way and the aim of erecting a "national" Church with the help of native rebels in a North Africa delivered from the Roman yoke had definitely proved to be an illusion. Likewise, the bishops saw the questionable nature and sterility of a behavior by the Roman State-might in which the power of evil was revealed, and hence no practicable solution for the relationship of Church and State was found. The Catholic community could, it is true, after this compromising of the Donatists, build extensively again on the favor of the imperial government. But it could not be satisfied with that. It could only win over the humiliated Donatists interiorly if it succeeded in making clear to them the theological untenability of their position. Until now they had lacked men who had the qualifications for this. With the ordination of Augustine of Thagaste as Bishop of Hippo, a decisive change occurred here too.

Augustine and Donatism

When in 388, after an absence of five years, Augustine returned to his native city of Thagaste, the split of North African Christianity into two denominations had not directly induced him to become active for a recovery of the lost unity. The ideal of a community of ascetic life with like-minded men stood too solidly in the center of his thoughts and plans. Only after his ordination as a priest for the Church of Hippo Regius, whereby he was given pastoral responsibility for the local Christians, did activity for the solution of the Donatist problem become a personal task for him. For an understanding of Augustine it is crucial to know that the central motive for his personal involvement in this question was the pastoral mission, perceived as a sublime responsibility, to guard those confided to him in the Church and to win back the others for the Church and the truth proclaimed by it. This pastoral duty is the real key to the understanding of the tireless and versatile activity of the Bishop of Hippo, which for almost thirty years claimed his total spiritual and physical strength, at times to exhaustion.

It was first Augustine's conviction that the ideal route for the restoration of religious unity lay in the personal word, spoken and written—a route which was most in accord with his personal talent. A return of the [65] On the death of Optatus, Augustine, C. litt. Petil. 2, 92, 209; Gildo perhaps committed suicide (Chron. min. 1, 298).

---

Donatists compelled by forcible measures would have brought to the Catholic Church only ficti christiani[66] and hence would have had unfavorable effects on the religious level of the community. Augustine's first efforts to make contact with the Donatists of his immediate vicinity were, then, supported by a strong faith in the strength of his enticing word. Wherever he saw the possibility of a personal conversation or of an objective discussion on the question of the schism, he courteously presented himself. When he noticed that a meeting with him was avoided because of his superior education or his oratorial gifts, he agreed to leave to the Donatists the choice of a partner in the conversation.[67] His letters to Donatist personages are marked by a deep religious seriousness: knowing no insult. Without hesitating, he addresses them as brothers, since to a great extent they agree with the Catholics in doctrine and liturgy. In an effort to get beyond the armor plate of the hardened fronts, he proposed to leave aside the useless reproaches over the second-rank questions and to seek new ways.[68] But the frost of disillusionment quickly fell on these exertions, begun with earnestness. They remained without important success especially as regards the bishops of the other side; only a few Donatist laymen were attentive to this new voice from the Catholic camp or even went to Augustine's sermons.[69] The strongest effect of these first steps was verified within the Catholic community, since, as Possidius put it, "in virtue of a gift of God, the Catholic Church in Africa now began again to raise its head, which so long had lain lacerated, oppressed, and crushed in the face of the powerful heretics."[70]

For Augustine this relative failure was only an occasion to seek new possibilities for the fulfillment of his spiritual function without at any time giving up the efforts for dialogue with the other side. He saw it in two courses: he must himself move out of the local confinement of Hippo and its surrounding neighborhood and draw the entire Catholic episcopate of North Africa into the solution of the task, and, second, the discussion of the theologically decisive questions must be pushed into the foreground. For the first element of the problem the ideal coworker was Aurelius,[71] elected c. 391 to the see of Carthage: his gifts of leadership and organization would be proved in a long episcopate—he died c.

---

[66] See Ep. 33 and 93, 17.

[67] Examples: Ep. 33 and 23 to the Donatist Bishops Proculeian and Maximus respectively; cf. also Civ. dei 22, 8, and Ep. 34, 6.

[68] Ep. 33, 1: "me sincero corde agere et cum tremore christianae humilitatis;" Ep. 23, 6: "tollamus de medio inania obiecta quae . . . iactari contra invicem solent."

[69] Possidius, Vita Aug. 9, 2, 10; Ep. 72 and 105.

[70] Possidius, Vita Aug. 7, 2, 8.

[71] On him see A. Audollent, DHGE 5 (1931), 726–738.

430—and in a trouble-free lifelong friendship with Augustine. The theological assignment could at that time be undertaken by only one man in North Africa, the Bishop of Hippo.

The natural place for the consideration of the Donatist problem by the entire Catholic episcopate was the institution of the North African Episcopal Synod. It is to the merit of Bishop Aurelius to have infused new life into the episcopate, when, at the first Synod convoked by him to Hippo in 393, he had a decision taken to the effect that in the future the bishops of all the North African provinces were, so far as possible, to assemble annually for conciliar consultations.[72] There is no doubt that this resolute leadership, after long years of resignation, gave the episcopate a new consciousness of its strength and at the same time enabled Augustine to explain his view of the tasks to his fellow bishops and gain them for it. Already in Hippo people were concerned with the question of the conversion of Donatist bishops and priests to the Catholic Church. Whereas earlier synods had declined to receive them into the Catholic clergy with the rank they then held, now an exception would be made for those who had not performed rebaptism or who wished to convert together with their former congregation.[73] The Synod of Carthage in September 401 went a step farther: it left to the individual bishop the decision on the reception of Donatist clerics, but provided a new criterion for this: "when it seems useful for the pax christiana."[74] It was further decided now to seek direct conversation with the Donatist bishops and congregations on a broader plane, this task being entrusted to selected bishops, who were to proceed leniter et pacifice. They were instructed to take up especially the Maximianist Schism among the Donatists themselves, because here the inconsistency of the Donatist leadership was made visible, since it had recognized as valid the baptism conferred by the separated Maximianists on their reception back into the Donatist community.[75] In all this it is easy to recognize the hand of Augustine, for whom direct dialogue was always a primary aim; also in other respects he stood for the possibility of a decision by the individual bishop and always conceded a special rank to argumentation with the [72] The results of the discussions of this Synod are preserved in the so-called Breviarium Hipponense, PL 56, 418–431 (= Mansi III, 917–924). Cf. Ch. Munier, "Cinq canons inédits du concile d'Hippone du 8 Oct. 393," RDC 18 (1968), 16–29. Under Aurelius some twenty synods were held: Conc. Carth. a. 525, Mansi VIII, 643.

---

[73] Brev. Hippon. II, 37. A motive for this moderation was, of course, also the vast breakdown of the care of souls among the Catholics, of which the synods of the time had to complain again and again; cf. Aurelius at the Synod of Carthage in June 401, Cod. can. eccl. Afr., 55–56.

[74] Cod. can. eccl. Afr., can. 68: "si hoc paci Christianae prodesse visum fuerit."

[75] Ibid., can. 66 and 69.

Maximianist Schism.[76] Apparently encouraged by certain successes—by 402 three former Donatist bishops were heads of Catholic congregations[77]—the Synod of Carthage in August 403 determined to try a religious dialogue on the highest plane. Every Donatist bishop received an invitation, which was delivered to him by state officials, to whom he was also to direct his reply. In the text of the invitation, the Synod asserted the sincerity of its intention and asked the bishops of the opposing side to appoint their representatives for a special synod of their own, with whom then the Catholic delegation wished to discuss cum pace every question connected with the split; a rejection of the invitation would, of course, be equivalent to an avowal that one was not sure of one's cause.[78] But the eagerly raised expectations of the Catholic Synod were not realized. Primian of Carthage curtly declined the invitation with the original Donatist formula that "it is contrary to the dignity of the sons of martyrs to meet with the descendants of traditores," communicated his decision to all Donatist bishops, and thus anticipated the decision of his own Synod, which bluntly rejected the Catholics' invitation.[79] The heightened activity of the Catholics and the partial success released, moreover, a new wave of acts of violence by the Donatists, whose victims were first the especially active Catholic bishops and Donatist clerics who had converted to Catholicism. Augustine's friend Possidius was attacked on a journey and cruelly mistreated, and an attack planned against Augustine himself was not actually carried out only because his guide took the wrong route.[80] The Catholic Bishops Maximian of Bagai and Servus of Thubursicu endured further mistreatment, and the latter's father, an aged priest, died a little later as a result. Former Donatist clerics who suffered persecution were the Priests Restitutus and Marcus and a Subdeacon of the Church of Urgis.[81]

When the Catholic Synod discussed the new situation at Carthage in

---

[76] Augustine, Ep. 245, 2; C. Crescon., 1, 4; Retract, 2, 26, 29, 35. See A. C. de Veer, "L'exploitation du schisme maximianiste par s. Augustin dans la lutte contre le Donatisme," RechAug 3 (Paris 1965), 219–237.

[77] Augustine, Ep. 69; C. Crescon. 2, 12.

[78] The invitation in Cod. can. eccl. Afr., can. 92 (Mansi III, 791–794). The preparatory measures, ibid., can. 91. The decrees of the officials on the invitation procedure, Gesta coll. Carth. 3, 174; Brevic. coll. 3, 6.

[79] Primian's reply in Augustine, C. part. Don. post gesta 1, 1: "indignum est ut in unum conveniant filii martyrum et progenies traditorum." Cf. Augustine, Enarr. in ps. 36 II, 18.

[80] Possidius, Vita Aug., 12; the doubts in the report of Possidius are baseless: H. J. Diesner, Stpatr 6, 4 (Berlin 1962), 350–355.

[81] On Maximian, Servus, and Restitutus, see Augustine, C. Crescon. 3, 47 and 53; on Marcus, Augustine, Ep. 105, 3.

June 404, there was basically a consensus that, in the face of such massive recourse to force, the protection of state officials would have to be requested. While a group of mostly older bishops now regarded the compelling of union by imperial law as necessary and in this regard recalled the favorable results of earlier political measures—perhaps they were thinking of the decrees of the Emperor Constans in 347 and 348—the view held by Augustine prevailed: it disallowed any radical prohibition of Donatism and demanded only the prevention of acts of violence by the officials as well as the punishment of the Donatist bishops and clerics whose responsibility for them could be proved. The legal basis for this seemed to be provided in the heresy laws issued by the Emperor Theodosius in 392: a new edict would not be necessary. The Bishops Theasius and Evodius, as delegates of the Synod, were to inform the Emperor of the events of the last months and ask for the needed measures of protection.[82] But when the delegation arrived in Ravenna, the Emperor Honorius had already made his decision. The Numidian Bishops previously mentioned, Maximian and Servus, had given him so impressive a description of the situation, with reference to their personal fate, that on 12 February 405 he issued an Edict of Union,[83] which far exceeded the desires of the Synod. In this the Donatists were completely equated with heretics because they taught the necessity of rebaptism and also practiced it. To this corresponded strict sanctions: transfer of Donatist churches to the Catholic Church, prohibition of every sort of assembly, and exile for bishops and clerics who refused union. Carelessness in the implementation of the edict by the officials was to be punished by a fine. There was quick action in Carthage: Primian went into exile, and with him Bishop Petilian of Cirta. They went to Ravenna and surprisingly declared themselves ready to take part in a religious disputation with a Catholic bishop: the praefectus praetorio, as judge, should give the verdict on the outcome.[84] But in the provinces there appeared everywhere strong resistance by the Donatists; the officials often withdrew in the face of it, so that in a series of decrees Honorius had to urge the implementation of the Edict of Union.[85] The effects differed widely from place to place, and especially where the conversions were numerous one had to doubt the honesty of some of them.[86] The fall of General Stilicho in 408, to whom the Donatists attributed a substantial role in the imperial policy of suppression, evoked among them the hope of a reversal. The report was spread that the prescriptions of 405 were annulled, and the Donatists sought to gain back by force what had been taken from them by law in property and respect. Aurelius of Carthage again had to ask help from Ravenna, and by word and deed it was made clear to the Donatists that the laws of 405 remained completely in force.[87] The newly appointed Proconsul, Donatus, interpreted these very strictly and intended to impose the death penalty, but Augustine at once protested.[88] Not until Donatus was replaced by the pagan Macrobius was the pressure on the Donatists lessened, and at the beginning of 410 an edict for North Africa surprisingly decreed that everyone could freely decide for one Christian denomination or the other.[89] This declaration of toleration was, however, withdrawn by August of the same year at the petition of a delegation of Catholic bishops, which again explained to the Emperor the ideas and desires of the Catholic episcopate for a comprehensive and definitive religious dialogue of the two confessions.[90] Thereupon, the Emperor on 14 October 410 officially commissioned the Senator Marcellinus to do the preparatory organizational work for this conference and at the same time appointed him as its president and arbiter.[91] This time the Donatists could hardly hold themselves aloof, since two years earlier they had asked for such a conversation. At last Augustine's purpose, conceived years before and unwaveringly expounded, seemed to be fulfilled.

---

[82] Discussions of the Synod, Cod. can. eccl. Afr., canon 93; see the report of Augustine, Ep. 185, 7, 25.

[83] Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 37, 38; 16, 6, 4, 5.

[84] Augustine, Ep. 88, 10; Brevic. coll. 3, 4; Gesta coll. Carth. 3, 141.

[85] Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 39, 41 and 43; cf. Cod. can. eccl. Afr., can. 94.

[86] Augustine, Ep. 185, 30: plurimi simulando communicaverunt.

But had Augustine not long before turned against the idea of a peaceable discussion of a reunion by the fact that he was finally persuaded that a forceful solution was necessary and agreed to recourse by the secular power? A decision on Augustine's attitude in this question has to start with the incontrovertible fact that he himself repeatedly and frankly admitted a change in his views.[92] He expressed himself equally clearly with regard to the motives which occasioned this change. First, it was the realistic insight, gained in the concrete and often cruelly harsh

---

[87] Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 41, 44, 46.

[88] Ep. 100, 2.

[89] The decree is missing in Cod. Theod., but it was certainly issued and is to be explained by the difficult inner political situation of 409–410, which compelled the Emperor to a tolerant attitude, even if it was only temporary. See Cod. can. eccl. Afr., canon 108; Augustine, Ep. 108, 6, 19. On the whole matter, A. C. de Veer, "Une mesure de tolérance de l'empereur Honorius," REB 24 (1966), 187–195.

[90] Cod. can. eccl. Afr., can. 107f.; Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 51; Gesta coll. Carth. 1, 4, 5.

[91] Cod. Theod. 16, 11, 3.

[92] For example, Ep. 93, 5, 16–17: "mea primitus sententia non erat nisi neminem ad unitatem Christi esse cogendum; verbo esse agendum, disputatione pugnandum, ratione vincendum, ne fictos catholicos haberemus." Cf. also Retract. 2, 21; Ep. 185, 25; C. Crescon. 3, 48, 53.

African workday, that both the life of individual Catholics and the free proclamation of the veritas catholica could be assured only thus against the force of the Donatist raids. Many Donatists, he further believed, would only then have the possibility of a free decision, when the pressure was taken from them to which they were exposed by their own leadership. Besides, he let himself be convinced by the examples set before his eyes by his colleagues that state legislation in the past had led many Donatists to reflect and then to become convinced Catholics. And finally, he had acquired the insight that in the concrete African situation there was no more question of a mere schism, but of a heresy, which appeared most clearly in the Donatist doctrine of baptism, which made the effect of this sacrament depend, not on Christ, but on the moral quality of the one baptizing.[93] Hence, against this heresy there must be recourse to the laws which the State, now guided by a Christian Emperor, had issued for such cases, with the restriction, of course, that in their application caritas christiana must always be assured and especially the death penalty must never be decreed.[94] These laws, it is true, were understood as coercion by those whom they affected, but regard must be had for their purpose: they aimed to lead to the good, the holy, just as there was a persecution which led back out of error one who had fallen into the error. It was that persecution, as the workers practiced it in the gospel when they were sent by their master to the highways and hedges with the order "to coerce" the poor "to come in" (Luke 14:23), or as the shepherd is who "persecutes" the lost sheep, brings it back to the flock, even against its will, and thus saves it (Matt. 18:12–14). "Why should not the Church compel its lost sons to return, if the lost sons compel others to their ruin?"[95]

It is understandable that this attitude of Augustine and its motivation is the trait of his activity which encounters the strongest opposition today, and the modern understanding of toleration will always have reservations in regard to it. Of course, whoever rejects the figure of Augustine as a whole will ascribe "dirty hands" to him here also, and those to whom the Catholics of North Africa in the fourth century are now objects of sympathy will see in Augustine's conduct only a probably deliberate deception and in his well-known use of the rules of ancient rhetoric in the literary confrontation a cheap trick, without exerting himself for definite individual proofs for such evaluations.[96] The real question is whether Augustine's justification of the claim to the use of force by the State did not exercise an unwholesome effect on the future and serve religious groups of later times and the most varied tendencies as an alibi for their procedure. One certainly cannot see in him the first theorist of the Inquisition,[97] since Augustine did not by any means aspire to elaborate an abstract desk-solution, valid and practicable for all times for the question of the permissibility of religious compulsion, but he was seeking a way out of an unusually complex, boundlessly tormenting situation, with which he was daily confronted. But it must be said that Augustine did not consider what theoretical consequences could be deduced in another situation from his concrete reflections.[98] Furthermore, he had not seen that a collaboration even with a State under Christian leadership, whose questionable character he had come to know well in another respect, necessarily had to have also a political character in the North Africa of his day—guarantee of the political and economic control of the country against the background of denominational unity—and in the eyes of the Donatists actually did have it. Thus the purely religious concern of Augustine became through this dovetailing of denominational and political interest burdened in his own lifetime with a heavy mortgage and in later centuries continued to operate as political Augustinianism.[99]

---

[93] Augustine repeatedly justified the change in his view, in special detail in letters 93 and 185.

[94] Ep. 110, 1; 133, 1; 134, 2; 153.

[95] Ep. 185, 6, 23: "cur non cogeret ecclesia perditos filios ut redirent, si perditi filii coegerunt alios ut perirent?" On the Augustinian meaning of cogite intrare in contrast to compelle intrare and on persecutio in the sense of the French poursuite cf. the philogical remarks of A. Mandouze, S. Augustin, 348f., with note.

Persons have aimed to explain Augustine's outlook by his inadequate view for the political quality and impact of religious questions also. There is something correct in this, but one is still in the superficial. If Augustine's anti-Donatist works are left to operate by themselves as a whole, if his pertinent correspondence and still more his sermons are examined, one can scarcely fail to hear that here speaks the voice of a man who was so driven and instigated by religious responsibility to bring back again to the Church the brothers who had fallen into error,[100] that, compared with it, all other considerations moved to the background.

---

[96] Cf. a summary of such evaluations in A. Mandouze, op. cit., 337 and 353, with note.

[97] P. Brown, St. Augustine (London 1967), 240; ibid., 235.

[98] See H. Maisonneuve, "Croyance religieuse et contrainte. La doctrine de s. Augustin," MSR 19 (1962), 49–68, on Augustine's influence on the Decretum Gratiani in causes 23 and 24 on the repression of heresy.

[99] Cf. A. Mandouze, "L'Afrique chrétienne, le Donatisme et s. Augustin," Cahiers de la Pierre-qui-Vire, no. 17 (Paris 1967), 279–297.

[100] Especially impressive sermo 46.

The Religious Discussion of Carthage (411) and its Sequel

While the imperial rescript which ordered the holding of the religious discussion was not very conciliatory in what it said of the Donatists, the measures which the notary Marcellinus employed in preparing for it make clear the effort to win as many as possible of the Donatist bishops to participate. In a letter[101] that invited all bishops of both denominations to Carthage on 1 June 411, he assured the Donatists that he would render his verdict in complete impartiality. For their part, they could still appoint a second arbiter, and they received the guarantee that after the conclusion of the conference they might return unmolested to their bishoprics. Until his verdict, all measures of compulsion against the Donatists were suspended; the local officials received appropriate instructions. The response to this letter was everywhere gratifying for Marcellinus. The Donatist Primate Primian not only announced his own personal appearance: he also, through a circular, asked all his fellow bishops to arrive in Carthage as far as possible in full strength.[102] A few days before the beginning of the conference Marcellinus was able to present both sides with a detailed agenda, to ask their approval and their disposal of the introductory procedures suggested in it.[103] Even before the opening of the conference, seven bishops from each group were selected from all the assembled bishops as spokesmen, and an equal number of advisers were to stand at their side. The minutes of the debates, for the recording of which a bureau of stenographers[104] was available, were to be edited by a commission of four representatives of each side and then published by being posted. The Donatists' reply[105] did not commit itself in regard to the agenda but criticized very strongly the fact that only the elected representatives and not all the bishops present were to be admitted to the discussions, despite their having elected the delegates envisaged by Marcellinus. The Catholics not only gave their unconditional assent to the proposed agenda. They obliged themselves beyond it: in the event of a negative outcome of the conference, to relinquish to the Donatist bishops their episcopal sees; if the decision should go in favor of the Catholics, however, the Donatist bishops might retain their rank and office, if they joined the Catholic Church.[106] Their effort to create a climate favorable to negotiations was unmistakable; for example, in some sermons Augustine asked the [101] Gesta coll. Carth. I, 5; I, 4, the imperial rescript.

---

[102] Ibid. II, 50; Augustine mentions the circular in Ad donat. post coll. 24, 41.

[103] Gesta coll. Carth. I, 10.

[104] See E. Tengström, Die Protokollierung der Collatio Carthaginiensis (Göteborg 1962).

[105] Gesta coll. Carth. I, 14.

[106] Ibid. I, 16; Augustine, Ep. 128, 1; Brevic. coll. I, 5. Augustine succeeded in gaining all the Catholic bishops except two for this pledge: Gesta cum Emer. 6.

Catholics of Carthage to abstain from any demonstration and to promote the purpose of the union dialogue through their prayers.[107] In contrast to the Donatists, the Catholics also published their mandatum, the text with the names of their delegates together with the instructions imparted to these,[108] in which was clearly staked out the line they were to adhere to in the discussions. The essential question must be and remain that of the true Church: questions of detail, such as "the case of Caecilian," must be sharply separated from it. A list of scriptural texts, probably assembled by Augustine, was appended for the theological argumentation. The accusations to be expected from the Donatists on the recognition of heretical baptism by the Catholics, on the employing of State power in the fight against the Donatists should always be rejected with reference to the entirely identical conduct of the Donatists on the occasion of the Maximianist Schism and under the Emperor Julian. For questions of historical facts, such as, for example, the one mentioned above, about whether Caecilian or his consecrator Felix had been a traditor, the documents of the official archives were to be referred to; Augustine had likewise carefully collected these. Every attempt of the Donatists to proceed to the discussion of individual questions of secondary importance was to be resisted from the start with the firmly stated demand to speak on the central problem of the conference—the true Church.

When on 1 June Marcellinus opened the conference in the Baths of Gargilius, there appeared for the Catholic side only their eighteen delegates, but for the Donatists the entire episcopate present at Carthage.[109] From the first moment on it was their tactic, by raising ever more new questions of procedure, into which Marcellinus at first entered with great forbearance, to postpone or put aside the discussion of the basic theological questions. The first two days of sessions thus passed, whereupon the conference was interrupted in order to give the Donatists time for a study of the Catholic mandatum, to which they composed a systematic refutation.[110] When, after the resumption of the debate on 8 June, they demanded that this refutation be read and at once discussed, Augustine immediately recognized his opportunity and supported their motion because thereby the possibility was given to him to proceed exactly according to the outline sketched by him and in a complete presentation to expound the Catholic standpoint in all important points.[111] His supreme command of the subject, his certainty in the interpretation of the Bible, his exact knowledge of the acts, his quickness of repartee in regard to the Donatists' objections made him the dominant figure of this day. Late in the evening Marcellinus ended the debate and announced his verdict, according to which the Donatists had been refuted by the Catholics omnium documentorum manifestatione.[112] A few days later he once again made known the result of the conference in the form of an edict, which was finally ratified by a rescript of the Emperor Honorius of 30 January 412.[113]

---

[107] Serm. 357 and 358.

[108] Gesta coll. Carth. I, 55.

[109] Ibid. I, 2.

[110] Ibid. II, 12; III, 258.

[111] Ibid. III, 260–261. Brevic. coll. 3, 15, gives Augustine's intervention.

Before long, the Donatist bishops filed with the Emperor an appeal against the verdict, which they based especially on the claim that Marcellinus had not only committed several mistakes in regard to form but had also made himself guilty of partisanship, even of corruptibility.[114] But the state officials did not accept this and coldly and inexorably drew the consequences of the verdict. Marcellinus, in addition, ordered that all Donatist clerics who now still refused the union must at once surrender their churches to the Catholics, that the alliance with the Circumcellions was to be dissolved, and that all meetings of Donatists were thereafter forbidden.[115] The imperial rescript of January 412 put all earlier prohibitions again in force, inflicted severe fines on the recalcitrant, if necessary the confiscation of a person's entire property, and threatened with exile from African soil the clergy who rejected the union.[116] Some Catholics were in complete agreement that the laws should be applied in all strictness: now mildness would be negligence or weakness. Again Augustine made himself the spokesman for mansuetudo catholica, which above all forbade the employment of the death penalty. He also definitely asked in other cases for a mild procedure, so that he had to defend himself against the reproach that he clearly favored the Donatists, since he demanded freedom from punishment for them.[117]

Although Augustine could claim for himself the decisive role in the issue of the religious debates in favor of the Catholics, he had no feeling of personal triumph. It is true that he once spoke of evidentissima victoria nostra, but by that he meant the victory of catholica veritas. When the mass conversions then got under way and he was praised as the author of such successes, he cooly parried this with non sunt haec opera nostra, sed

---

[112] According to Augustine, Brevic. coll. 3, 43; the text of the sentence of Marcellinus is not extant.

[113] The edict at the end of the Gesta coll. Carth., PL 11, 1418–1420; the imperial rescript, Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 52.

[114] Augustine, Ad donat. post coll. 1; 16; 57; 58; Gesta cum Emer. 2; 3.

[115] Text = the so-called sententia cognitoris, PL 11, 1418–1420.

[116] Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 52.

[117] Ep. 139, 2; 153.

dei.[118] Besides, he was under no illusions in regard to the quality of some conversions and hence urgently emphasized the duty of the bishops through their pastoral exertions to procure the interior turning of the former Donatists to Catholic unity, as he tried this in an exemplary manner in his sermons.[119] But a minority long refused to have anything to do with union. To it probably belonged most of the bishops, according to Augustine the real victi of the religious debate, whom he frequently took to task from now on and whom he likewise distinguished from the great crowd of Donatist faithful, as well as the unfortunately obdurate remnant of the Circumcellions, who c. 420 threatened suicide if anyone aimed to bring them by force to union with the Catholic Church.[120] As late as 418 more than thirty Donatist bishops could meet in Numidia and even ordain new bishops.[121] The persistence of a stubborn Donatist remnant is also attested to by a whole series of imperial decrees which followed the Edict of 412 and extended to the Vandal invasion: in them the proper officials were repeatedly asked strictly to implement the measures decreed; otherwise they would themselves be held to account.[122] In 420 Augustine published his last anti-Donatist work; thereafter, the subject of Donatism is treated only occasionally in his correspondence and in general not at all in his sermons; and for decades from 418 it disappeared from the minutes of the North African Episcopal Synods.[123] The greatest personal duty and the most oppressive responsibility which Augustine's episcopal office had laid on him had been taken from him.

Beside the solution of the practical pastoral task of restoring the unity of the Christianity of North Africa, there proceeded with equal poise the theological outcome of the intellectual confrontation with Donatism, which found its expression in Augustine's anti-Donatist writings.[124] It is given, first, in the definitive explanation of the relationship of sacrament and minister, and, second, in a deepened grasp of the nature and mission of the Church. The Donatist practice of rebaptism originated in a concept of the sacrament that made its effect dependent on the "purity" of its minister. To Augustine this implied "placing one's hope in a man" and not in Christ, the author of the sacraments, whose merits alone give them their efficacy. Hence it is not Peter or John, it is also not Judas, who baptizes: it is always Christ who baptizes.[125] The inner purity and sanctity of the sacrament is, therefore, attainable neither from the holiness nor from the impurity of the minister; it is neither enhanced nor decreased by such.[126] Since Augustine again distinguishes between the sacramental act, which the minister performs, and the saving grace of the sacrament, which only the Holy Spirit, operating in the Church of Christ, grants, he is able also to recognize the existence and validity of the sacraments administered by schismatics and heretics, but they remain without salvific effect, since this is bound up with the presence of the Holy Spirit which, for its part, is found only in the communion with the true Church. As soon as a person who has been externally baptized has been incorporated into the one Church by the imposition of hands, he shares in the unity produced by the Holy Spirit and hence also in the sacramental grace bound up with it.[127] It is true that Augustine elaborated these distinctions and principles chiefly in connection with the sacrament of baptism, but he extended them also to the other sacraments, especially to orders and the Eucharist. In this way Cyprian's understanding of sacrament in theology was definitively overcome.

---

[118] Ep. 141, 1 and 3; 142. The mass conversions in Ep. 185, 3: "liberantur per illas leges . . . fundi, pagi, vici, castella, municipia, civitates." 185, 7: "multi . . . correcti sunt et cotidie corriguntur." Cf. also Sermo 359, 7; Possidius, Vita Aug. 13.

[119] Ep. 185, 8; Sermo 112; 137–138; 197; 296; 359; see also a series in the Enarr. in ps.

[120] His work Contra partem Donati post gesta is a relentless settlement with the Donatist episcopate, which he seeks to isolate from the people. The Circumcellions: Ep. 204.

[121] C. Gaudent. I, 37, 47–48.

[122] Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 54–56; 63–65.

[123] The last work was Contra Gaudentium; the last letters were Ep. 108 and 109 c. 423. The Synod of 1 May 418 concerned itself definitely with the now necessary new organization of the North African sees: Cod. can. eccl. Afr. canons 117–124.

[124] See the summary of Y. Congar, BiblAug 28 (1963), 86–124.

Augustine enriched the doctrine of the Church through new, deep insights, which became possible to him through the distinction of the ecclesia as it now is and the ecclesia qualis futura est.[128] Whereas the Donatists understood themselves as the Church of the Pure, which is without spot or wrinkle, Augustine perceived that in the "Church as it now is" good and evil live together until the judgment, which will produce the definitive separation. A person can belong to it corpore or also corde: in the first case, he indeed possesses the communio sacramentorum but does not belong to the societas sanctorum or Spiritus, and hence he also does not possess the pax, unitas, and caritas which are precisely gifts of this Spirit. The Church, it is true, is the community of those who hear the call of God in Christ or will still hear it, but the inner unity of this Church only becomes complete reality through the pax which the Holy Spirit operates in it. Thus, as this Spirit is the bond between Father and Son and hence perfects the community of the three in unity, so he is also the bond which enables the Church to become the "communion of saints."[129] With this view of the Church, Augustine again left behind him Cyprian, who saw the foundation of unity in the communion of the bishops, and he corrected the ecclesiological exaggeration of the importance of the episcopal office among the Donatists, in so far as they saw in its bearers as ministers of the sacraments also the ministers of the corresponding gift of grace and hence called them spiritual fathers in the real sense. For Augustine, on the contrary, the Church is the spiritual mother of the faithful and, as such, holder of the power of the keys and of infallibility.[130] Further to elucidate the reality of this mater ecclesia, Augustine with predilection grasped the image of the columba,[131] whose symbolic power to express ideas the Bible so often uses when it speaks of peace, purity, loyalty, and the Holy Spirit. He deepened and enriched the symbolic content of the Word when he called the Church itself columba and saw in this Dove the unique and faithful Bride of Christ; which, innocent and pure, groans for its sinful members and, groaning, calls to those who are separated from it, which received the Holy Spirit in order through him to give pax to all its members. Only one who possesses this pax columbae works out his salvation, and so Augustine holds in the deepest understanding to Cyprian's expression: extra ecclesiam nulla salus. Augustine thereby introduces the valid propositions in Cyprian's grasp of the Church into his own deepened ecclesiology,[132] but there was in his days no theologian on the Donatist side who could have recognized this, taken it up, and so cooperated to restore the pax ecclesiae in contemporary North African Christianity in a less painful manner.

---

[125] Repeated in various forms: C. ep. Parmen. II, 15, 34; C. litt. Petil. I, 9, 10; In ev. Joh. tract. 5, 18; 6, 8; 15, 3.

[126] De bapt. III, 10, 15; IV, 21, 28.

[127] De bapt. V, 23, 33; C. ep. Parmen. II, 13, 18; Sermo 269, 2.

[128] Brevic. coll. III, 10, 20; Retract. II, 44, 2.

---

[129] See Y. Congar, op. cit., pp. 100–103, and HDG III (1971), 3–6.

[130] Cf. P. Rinetti, "Sant'Agostino e l'Ecclesia mater," Augustinus Magister II, 827–835.

[131] Evidence for columba = ecclesia, BiblAug 28 (1963), 104–109, with note.

[132] See F. Hamer, "Le baptême et l'église," Irenikon 25 (1952), 263–275.

CHAPTER 12

Pelagius and the Aftermath

The Ideal of Morality of the Pelagian Circle

The sources do not tell us when and why the Romano-Briton Pelagius[1] left his homeland and went to Rome, where he lived from c. 390 as a

---

[1] Most sources name Britain as his homeland: Augustine, Ep. 186, 1; Orosius, Apol. c. Pel. 12, 3: M. Mercator, Common 1; only Jerome, In Hierem., prol. and 3, 1, indicates Ireland.

Christian ascetic, without, however, joining a monastic community in the strict sense. In the same circles of the Roman community in which Jerome in the days of Pope Damasus had recruited for the ascetical manner of life, successfully and against opposition, Pelagius gained the highest esteem and could gather about him a flock of the like-minded, among them a former lawyer named Caelestius,[2] who was soon to become a zealous and versatile propagandist of the specifically moral principles of his master. As the decisive basis for the high esteem of Pelagius in certain circles of the now Christian upper class at Rome must be mentioned the uncompromising seriousness with which he proposed his moral demands, to which was joined a remarkable gift for recruiting impressively for his ideal by word and writing.[3] Of his numerous works, only three are extant as to whose authenticity there is no doubt: a brief commentary on the thirteen Pauline Epistles, a formally very appealing ascetical treatise to the Roman lady Demetrias of the gens Anicia, and his profession of faith for Pope Innocent I. On the basis of recent research, however, four other brief works can be assigned to him today with great probability. A series of other texts, mostly in the style of letters, comes, if not directly from his immediate circle of pupils, at least from the Pelagian world of ideas.[4] For a knowledge of them, of course, anti-Pelagian writings are not unproductive, especially those of Augustine, notably his report De gestis Pelagii to 417 and some of his letters, and the contributions of Jerome, Orosius, and Marius Marcator—but they must be read with a very critical eye. From these works emerges pretty much the following picture:

The basic concern of Pelagius and his followers is suggested in concise form in the letter of a man who had joined the movement in his youth: he now knows quomodo veras Christianus esse possim.[5] The Pelagians understood this genuine complete Christianity as the opposite of that attitude which was characteristic of the life of many average and half-Christians toward the end of the fourth century in the large Christian congregations, especially that of Rome. Many of these were all too gullible in regard to the view that the mere reception of baptism was a guarantee of salvation. Others excused their moral minimalism with the argument that it was in practice impossible to avoid sins in the allurements of each day; still others believed that the demand of a sinless and perfect Christian life was valid only for an elite.[6] To this lethargy of resignation, Pelagius and his circle opposed a moral ideal which was characterized by a strong optimism in the evaluation of human nature and its capabilities and in a consequent appeal, corresponding to it, to the human desire to achieve.[7] Only that Christian will assure his salvation who, by the exertion of all his powers, fulfills the mandata of God. God gave the capability for this when he endowed human nature with free will and the gift of distinguishing good from evil, gifts which, so to speak, represent a naturalis sanctitas, which qualified some pagan philosophers for moral capacity of a high level. In addition, God specially grants to Christians in the exemplary lives of the great biblical figures, but chiefly in the edifying life of Christ, a help based on grace, which stimulates them to the "perfect justice."[8] Besides the exemplum Christi there is, furthermore, the constant reference to the heavenly reward which awaits the Christian after a perfect life, a distinguishing mark of the Pelagian preaching, which tirelessly called upon it to harness the capabilities proper to human nature for the supreme goal of perfection and which in this connection often appealed to feelings of pride and fame, which were accorded the goal achieved.[9] The verus Christianus fulfills, however, not only each praeceptum Dei uncompromisingly—a distinction between greater and lesser importance is to him just as unsympathetic as that between venial and mortal sins—but he proves himself to be such precisely in the firm acceptance of definite attitudes, which the gospel praises as signs of perfection. Continentia, castitas, and paupertas are for Pelagius ideals which he would like to see lived not only by an elite but eventually by all Christians: in other words, he championed basically a moral Puritanism, which should realize itself in a Church without spot or wrinkle.[10] Thus the Pelagian movement moved in a certain sense close to the moral rigorism of a Novatian, but in contrast to the latter Pelagius intentionally gave his following no organizational structure of its own. Thus, just as he neither entered the clergy nor attached himself as a monk to a religious community, so everyone should work and recruit for the program of an authentic Christianity by his life within the Church.[11]

---

[2] See G. Bardy, "Célestius," DHGE 12 (1953), 104–107.

[3] The literary talent is recognized by both Jerome, Dial. c. Pel. 3, 16, and Augustine, De pecc. orig. 24.

[4] Probably genuine: 1) De vita christiana, PL 40, 1031–1046; 2) De divina lege, PL 30, 105–116; 3) Ep. de virginitate, CSEL 1, 224–250; 4) Ep. ad Celantiam, CSEL 56, 329–356 (=Jerome, Ep. 148). Catalogue of other "Pelagian" works in A. Hamman, PL, Suppl. 1, 1104–1109, 1679–1683, and S. Prete, Pelagio, 192f.

[5] Ep. Honorificentiae tuae 2 (PL, Suppl. 1, 1691).

---

[6] The criticism of the failure of many Christians in daily life runs through all Pelagian literature; cf., for example, Ep. ad Demetr. and De vita christiane.

[7] Especially clearly expressed by Pelagius himself: Ep. ad Demetr. 2; cf. R. Pirenne, La morale de Pélage (Rome 1961).

[8] Ep. ad Demetr. 3–7; 8: "illius (=Christi) exemplo ad perfectam iustitiam incitati meliores illis esse, debemus qui ante legem fuerunt."

[9] Magnitudo praemii: Ep. ad Demetr. 9–11; the gloria, ibid. 22.

[10] The ecclesia sine vitio et macula: De div. lege 1. The obligation of all Christians to this life, ibid. 7; the equality of all the commandments, ibid. 16.

And so at first Pelagianism presented itself as a reform movement, which understood Christianity as a totality of the highest moral demands, which the individual Christian is called upon to realize in constant ascetical activity. The totality of these moral commands, the law of God, he finds in Scripture, which he must know and constantly reflect on.[12] If, accordingly, Pelagianism does not offer primarily a theological system of doctrines, still it presupposes some theological notions and theses, which grew ever sharper in the course of later discussion. To these belongs a completely distinct evaluation of Adam's sin, which was only his personal guilt and could only operate negatively on the human race as an example of disobedience to God's command. The free will of man remained intact, and every man can, even after the fall of Adam, avoid sin by the strength of a free decision for good or evil.[13] Similarly, grace, which God gives through Christ, is understood chiefly as the positive example of a Christian life, which strongly stimulates the disciples of Christ to follow him in the fulfilling of the mandata dei. Baptism blots out only personal guilt, and hence infant baptism must not be justified by absolute necessity for salvation. Even the efficacy of the sacraments and the necessity of prayer for a Christian lifestyle are undervalued by the Pelagian movement in favor of a moral accomplishment due to one's own powers.

The reform movement of Pelagius and his circle found a remarkable echo from the start. At first it was certainly the total impression of his strong personality, which assured great success for his program, especially in Rome, despite some resistance. It is significant for his reputation that the noble gens Anicia counted Pelagius among the three men of contemporary Latin Christianity—the other two are Jerome and Augustine—from whom an ascetical treatise was requested when one of its members, Demetrias, took the veil.[14] Even among many bishops of the day, the first impression was positive, and Augustine spoke constantly with appreciation of the ascetical reputation which Pelagius enjoyed. Caelestius especially displayed a busy propaganda for the spread of the Pelagian reform ideas, and soon there appeared a whole network of Pelagian groups, which kept contact with one another by a brisk correspondence, which, so far as it has been preserved, shows a striking inclination to remain anonymous. The propaganda had special success in Sicily, where Caelestius was active longer, but soon adherents cropped up in North Africa; there was also a favorable response in South Italian Campania and in northern Aquileia, and more remotely in Spain, Gaul, and Ireland. In the East an early basis was established on the island of Rhodes, and before long Palestine and the cities of Ephesus and Constantinople were touched by the movement.[15]

---

[11] De div. lege 9: "ego te christianum volo esse, non monachum dici et virtutem propriae laudis possidere magis quam nomen alienum."

[12] Ep. ad Demetr. 23.

[13] See the anonymous Ep. de possibilitate non peccandi, PL, Suppl. 1, 1457–1462.

[14] The already mentioned Ep. ad Demetr. of Pelagius, the answers of Jerome and Augustine are Epp. 130 and 150 respectively.

The Discussion of Pelagianism within the Church

Hesitations about the demanding reform ideas of Pelagius were at first expressed more in the form of a diffuse uneasiness and, it seems, more in lay circles than in those of the official hierarchy. At Rome Pelagius had to defend his program in occasionally stormy discussion; unfortunately, those who debated him are unknown. In Sicily the radical demands of the Pelagian ideal of poverty, with its social consequences, especially evoked anxiety among the wealthy Christians of the island. In North Africa it was Caelestius's theses regarding infant baptism that called forth the resistance of many Christians. The first official decision by bishops was brought out only by the intervention of the Milanese deacon Paulinus, who filed an accusation against Caelestius with Bishop Aurelius of Carthage in 411. Caelestius, questioned in detail before a synod[16] as to what he thought of a guilt inherited from Adam even by children and of the necessity, then, of baptism for them, refused to give a direct answer and was condemned. Hence he had to abandon his plan of being admitted to the clergy of Carthage and go to Ephesus, where he received the priesthood.[17] But the discussions continued, so that Augustine, who had not taken part in the Synod, as late as 413 delivered in Carthage two sermons on the meaning of infant baptism, in which he expressly asked that the other side not be branded as heretical.[18]

The previous year, 412, Augustine, at the request of his friend, Count Marcellinus, had expressed his view of infant baptism in a special work, De peccatorum meritis et remissione et de baptismo parvulorum, and in it he made known that the Pelagian moral teaching threatened to compromise for him central truths of faith on the gratia Christi, the understanding of which he had gained in an unceasing exertion, strongly influenced by his personal religious route. He refrained from any personal polemic against Pelagius, whose commentary on the Pauline Epistles he had meanwhile read and whose entirely inadequate exegesis of the Epistle to the Romans he had at once ascertained with a sure look. His anxiety grew, the more Pelagian literature came into his hands. A Christian of Syracuse in Sicily had informed him of the activity of the Pelagians on the island and presented to him five of their theses on the question,[19] three of which he discussed in a detailed reply: the alleged capability of man to achieve "justice" by his own power; the denial of an original sin in children, which moved him to a careful exegesis of Romans 5:12, and the obligation in principle on all Christians to renounce all riches.[20] Two bishops, whose precise homeland is unknown, had sent him a treatise which bore the inscription Definitiones Caelestii and also came from Sicily. For Augustine the authorship of Caelestius was not absolutely sure, even if the manner of argumentation seemed to speak powerfully for it. Tersely and precisely, Augustine refuted the theses of the treatise in turn and then gave his exegesis of the biblical texts (testimonia), with which the author sought to support the Pelagian moral doctrine—De perfectione iustitiae hominis. He then elaborated with special care one of Pelagius's own works, the fundamental aim of which was to point out the high natural and moral dignity of human nature: in day-to-day life it is, he claims, of course, at times subjected to some rather fortuitous mistakes, but in principle it is capable of impeccantia, if one fulfills two conditions: 1) if he becomes aware that God has granted him the immortal gift of a rational will endowed with freedom of decision, and 2) if he makes firm use of this gift deriving from grace. Two pupils of Pelagius, Timasius and Jacobus, had sent Augustine this work of their master's, De natura, in the hope that he could perhaps make possible, with a clarifying and deepening judgment, a rapprochement or a reconciliation of the opposing positions. In his reply De natura et gratia (415), Augustine tactfully did not name the author, although it was just this work that, by his own admission, had opened his eyes to the great danger which clearly threatened the salvation of Christians by its doctrine.[21] All the more relentless was he in the case and he frankly exposed the basic error of the Pelagian system: it so highly commends the work of the creator—human nature, which was in no sense weakened by Adam's sin—that a redeemer is superfluous.[22] To it he contrasted his thesis of natura vulnerata, sauciata, perdita, which makes a saving and redeeming grace, the gratia Christi, indispensable, and for it the Christian must pray unceasingly. Christ's redemptive act is intrinsically undermined by Pelagius, who also actually denies the necessity of prayer when he claims it belongs to the natural capabilities of man to achieve his salvation.[23] With De natura et gratia Augustine offered what was up to then the most consistent refutation of the Pelagian understanding of human nature and at the same time the long authentic explanation of the relationship of nature and grace. Augustine also found a threat to the necessity of grace for salvation in the Epistula ad Demetriadem by Pelagius, against tendencies of which he strongly warned.[24]

---

[15] On the spread of the movement see S. Prete, Pelagio, 20–27.

[16] On the Synod of 411 Augustine reports after an examination of the acts: De gratia Christi 2, 2–4; cf. De gest. Pel. 11, 23, and Ep. 157, 22. The exact date of the Synod, whether before or after the Donatist conference of 411, has not been established; see J. H. Koopmans, VigChr 8 (1954), 149–153, and F. R. Refoulé, RevÉAug 9 (1963), 41–49.

[17] M. Mercator, Common. s. nom. Cael. 2; see S. Prete, Mario Mercatore polemista antipelagiano (Turin 1958).

[18] Augustine, De gest. Pel. 11, 25; they are Sermones 293 and 294.

---

[19] Ep. 156 among Augustine's letters.

[20] Ep. 157, to Hilary.

[21] De gest. Pel 23, 47.

In 415 the discussion of Pelagian doctrine within the Church shifted to Palestine, where Pelagius had gone in 412–413 and had entered into close relations with Bishop John of Jerusalem. Toward the turn of the years 414 to 415 Jerome had tackled Pelagius in an unfortunate manner and claimed to bring his moral doctrine into relationship with various suspected ideas of Origen, Evagrius Ponticus, Jovinian, and others.[25] Then in the summer of 415 the Spanish priest Orosius, who had spent some time with Augustine on his journey to Palestine, eagerly announced in Jerusalem the hesitations with which westerners regarded certain theses of Pelagius and his adherents, and thereby stirred such unrest that Bishop John arranged consultation for 20 July 415. But since Pelagius denied that he held the propositions attributed to him by Orosius in this form, John decided that the matter should be left to the Latin Church: here in the East the quarrel should end.[26] But two former Gallic bishops, Heros of Arles and Lazarus of Aix, who had been deposed because of scarcely commendable ecclesiastical and political intrigues and had been exiled to the East, in a Libellus again made accusations against Pelagius and Caelestius, and this time a synod of fourteen bishops under the presidency of the Metropolitan Eulogius of Caesarea in Diospolis (Lydda) was supposed to try to clarify the question.[27] However, the two accusers did not appear in person at the Synod (December 415). The Libellus probably contained some extracts from the Testimonia of Pelagius, quotations from his letters to Livania, and some of the theses of Caelestius which had earlier been condemned at Carthage. Since Pelagius here too explained the propositions alleged against him in a sense which seemed orthodox to the fourteen bishops and since he clearly held himself aloof from the theses of Caelestius that had been submitted, the Synod decided that Pelagius "belongs to the ecclesiastical and Christian community."[28] Pelagius saw in the verdict of the Synod not only a personal triumph over his calumniators, to whom he immediately made it known in the West also, but also a positive approval of his thesis that one can be without sin and easily fulfill the commandments of God.[29] Doubts, such as those raised by Augustine especially, seemed after the Synod of Diospolis no longer apt.

---

[22] De natura et gratia 34, 39: "non debemus sic laudare creatorem, ut congamur, immo convincamur dicere superfluum salvatorem."

[23] Ibid. 23, 47; 52, 60; 53, 62.

[24] Ep. 188 ad Iulianum.

[25] In his Ep. 133 ad Clesiphontem; in his later (415) Dial. c. Pel. he repeats the charges. On Pelagius and the resurgence of the Origenist quarrels see R. F. Evans, Pelagius (London 1968), 6–25.

[26] Orosius, Liber apol. c. Pol. 3–7; the presentation by Orosius is influenced by his disillusionment over the failure to condemn Pelagius; cf. G. de Plinval, Pélage, 275–278; as tactless as Jerome, his ridicule touched even Pelagius's external appearance.

In Africa the news that the episcopal Synod of Diospolis had rehabilitated Pelagius understandably evoked consternation. Augustine at once asked Bishop John of Jerusalem for a copy of the synodal acts, sent him at the same time a copy of Pelagius's work De natura with his own refutation, and implored him not to let himself be deceived by Pelagius.[30] As a matter of fact, Augustine could no longer get rid of the suspicion that in certain situations Pelagius glossed over his real conviction, and his suspicion was further nourished when he ascertained some serious contradictions between a report coming from Pelagius and the text of the acts.[31] Even today no clear reply can be given to the question whether Pelagius disavowed his pupil Caelestius out of conviction or still supported him in secret and whether under pressure he interpreted his own expressions differently from the way he basically understood them. He himself helped to create this problem through his conduct.[32]

For Augustine it was first important to establish that the fourteen bishops at Diospolis could give an orthodox interpretation to the explanations supplied by Pelagius and, at least indirectly, also reject the theses of Caelestius that had been condemned at Carthage, when he at once saw that Pelagius would have inflexibly to give an exact definition of the ideas employed by him, as, for example, that of gratia. Thus he could henceforth deal only with what could be gathered from the works of Pelagius and Caelestius as their doctrine, and, now as before, this was in his eyes in contradiction to Scripture and the Church's conviction of faith. The two Synods of the African episcopate of the fall of 416, one at Carthage, the other at Mileve, were also based on this idea, when they renewed the verdict which had been issued against Caelestius five years earlier. In letters to Pope Innocent I, they asked him for his part to reject the Pelagian errors on free will and the fate of unbaptized infants.[33] In addition, Augustine and some of his friends presented to the Pope their anxieties in regard to the growing spread of Pelagian ideas, to which a stop was possible only if Rome itself with its apostolic authority forced Pelagius to recant his De natura and the doctrine contained in it.[34] Again Augustine attached a copy of this work and of his refutation, which he apparently regarded as an especially clear analysis of the Pelagian ideas.

---

[27] The acts of the Synod are not extant, but Augustine knew them and in De gestis Pelagii (probably as late as 416) he evaluated them in detail.

[28] De gest. Pel. 20, 44.

[29] Ibid. 30, 54; Augustine quotes from a letter of Pelagius to the Synod: "quattuor decim episcoporum sententia definitio nostra comprobata est, qua diximus posse hominem sine peccato esse et dei mandata facile custodire, si velit."

[30] Ep. 179.

[31] De gest. Pel. 31, 56; 35, 60.

[32] S. Prete, Pelagio, 192f.

Innocent acknowledged the three African writings in January 417. He approved the doctrine of grace expounded by the Synod of Carthage: Pelagius and Caelestius are inventores vocum novarum and should be excluded from the ecclesiastical community if they clung to their errors. He was, it is true, in possession of the synodal acts of Diospolis but could form no judgment as to what in them was true or false. He saw no possibility of summoning Pelagius to Rome for trial; he must come on his own to obtain absolution; the doctrines expounded in De natura are without doubt erroneous.[35] The Pope's cautious decision did not perhaps correspond to all the expectations of the African episcopate, but nevertheless he condemned the Pelagian doctrines, so that Augustine in his sermon of 23 September 417 could say, with regard to the discussion that had hitherto taken place that, now an answer had arrived from Rome, the case was finished, and, please God, the error would also be ended soon![36]

When Augustine spoke these words, a complete reversal had taken place at Rome. Pope Zosimus (417–18), successor of Innocent I, who had died in March 417, received still another letter addressed to Innocent by Pelagius with an appended creed; both were supposed to justify his previous conduct and teaching. Slightly later came a letter from the new Bishop of Jerusalem, Praylos, who very warmly took Pelagius's part.[37] Soon after the death of Innocent I, Caelestius appeared in Rome and presented the new Pope with a Libellus containing a presentation of his doctrine; he demanded a review of the African judgment issued against him. In two letters to the African episcopate Zosimus reported on the events in Rome and the decisions reached by him:[38] Caelestius should be regarded as rehabilitated if his earlier accusers could not demonstrate within two months in his presence that his confession was dissimulated. Letter and creed of Pelagius, the Pope said, had completely justified him in the eyes of the Roman clergy; it was incredible that a man of such genuine faith could be so calumniated. In Africa persons had acted imprudently and precipitately in the Pelagian question. Despite other attempts at interpretation,[39] it is very difficult in the case of Zosimus not to admit an all too great gullibility vis-à-vis the constantly held protestations of Caelestius and Pelagius. In Africa people thereafter remained convinced of the danger of the Pelagian doctrine and probably sought also to gain the court of Ravenna for this view. Caelestius contributed his own efforts to it. Restless as ever and all too certain of his victory, he provoked new discussions in Rome, which led to disturbances in the city. Thereupon the Emperor Honorius on 30 April 418 published an edict which banished Caelestius and Pelagius from Rome and forbade the further spread of their teachings. In addition, the Prefect of the City decreed that no one might provide shelter for the fugitive Caelestius.[40] At the same time a synod at Carthage renewed the verdicts previously issued against the Pelagians and rejected their chief errors in eight canons.[41] Finally, Pope Zosimus, who had already dissociated himself from Caelestius, expressed in an encyclical, the so-called Epistula tractoria, with the unambiguous approval of the attitude maintained in Africa, the definitive condemnation, which was to be signed by all bishops, and published in the entire Empire as an imperial Edict.[42] Pelagius, soon driven from Palestine also and again condemned by a Synod of Antioch, perhaps ended his days in an Egyptian monastery, whereas Caelestius, now here, now there, preached further resistance or demanded his readmittance to the ecclesiastical community.[43] [33] Epp. 175 and 176 among Augustine's letters.

---

[34] Augustine, Ep. 177.

[35] The three letters of Innocent I in Augustine, Epp. 181–183.

[36] Sermo 131, 10: "iam enim de hac causa duo concilia missa sunt ad sedem apostolicam, inde etiam rescripta venerunt. Causa finita est; utinam aliquando finiatur error." See K. Adam, "Causa finita est," Festgabe A. Ehrhard (Düsseldorf 1922), 1–23.

---

[37] The creed, PL 45, 1716–1718. Fragments of Praylos's letter in Augustine, De grat. Christi et de pecc. orig. II, 19–22.

[38] In the Coll. Avell. no. 45, 46 (=CSEL 35, 99–108).

[39] For example, F. Floëri, "Le pape Zosime et la doctrine augustinenne du péché originel," Augustinus Magister II (Paris 1954), 755–761; hesitations, on the other hand, in G. de Plinval, ibid. III, 262.

[40] On the disturbances at Rome: Prosper, Chron. ad. a. 418; edict of Honorius, PL 48, 379–386; decree of the Prefect of the City Volusianus, ibid. 408f.

[41] D nos. 101–108 (1 May 418).

[42] Letter of Zosimus to the African bishops of March 418, Coll. Avell., no. 50; Fragments of the Tractoria in Augustine, Ep. 190, 23, Prosper; Sed. apost. auctor. 7, M. Mercator, ACO I, 5, 66–68.

Julian of Aeclanum

A group of eighteen Italian bishops who declined to sign the Tractoria of Pope Zosimus[44] included the young Bishop Julian of Aeclanum in Apulia, who now quickly became the spiritual head of the Pelagians. Son of Bishop Memor, [45] a member of the circle of friends of Paulinus of Nola, and married to the daughter of the Bishop Aemilius of Benevento, Julian was a representative of the South Italian landed aristocracy, which, after the acceptance of Christianity, looked upon the episcopal office as worth seeking for its sons, retained certain externals of the life and society of this class, and continued to esteem pagan literature. For the gifted son the father arranged a good education, which included a knowledge of the Greek language as well as the study of Greek philosophy, in which Stoic doctrines and Aristotelian logic especially appealed to him.[46] Quite early Julian let himself be converted to the Pelagian ideas, even though he substantially modified their ascetical harshness. His idea of Adam's life in Paradise is determined equally by the lifestyle of his circle and by Virgil's Georgics, which he loved to quote.[47] His wit, his ease at sarcastic formulation, and his quickness of repartee in discussion had made him an esteemed figure in the South Italian upper class; they predestined him after the disappearance of the current leaders of the Pelagian movement to become the literary champion of their ideals. But to defend these meant not only to clash with Augustine but to make the latter's theology ineffective. Julian set up means and methods for this goal; they often left a painful impression, but here the contrast of the generations may have played its role. The young Julian sought irreverently to depreciate the achievement of the elders, while aiming to expose them to ridicule. He characterized Jerome's exegetical work summarily as childish and lacking in all originality; only with effort can one suppress laughter over it.[48] His invectives against Augustine knew no limits, either of justice or of nobility. Like the Donatists, he did not refrain from pointing with raised finger to Augustine's earlier manner of life, to represent him as an unconverted Manichaean, to point out his origin from a questionable family, to call his following a mob, and, accordingly, to brand him as patronus asinorum.[49] For his struggle against him, he even made claim to Roman national emotions, when he wanted it to be regarded as a new Punic War against a dangerous group of Africans, which aimed to force strange dogmas on the Church of Italy; it is a question of freeing this Church from assault on the part of African bandits.[50] Could a decent Italian subscribe to a theology which came from so doubtful a milieu?

---

[43] Synod of Antioch, Mansi, IV, 296; reference to Egypt: Isidor, Pel., Ep. 314, and Euseb., Ep. ad Cyrill. Alex., CSEL 35, 114. Celestius: Prosper, C. collat. 21, 2.

[44] Some bishops of Gaul also sympathized with Pelagianism, and it had followers in Britain and the Balkans: decree of Emperor Valentinian III of July 425 (PL 48, 409); Prosper, Chron. ad a. 429, PL 54, 594 and 707.

[45] Augustine, Ep. 101, was directed to him; he had asked for Augustine's De musica for his son Julian, then a deacon.

[46] Gennadius, De vir. ill. 45; on Julian's philosophical formation see F. R. Refoulé, op. cit., with the qualifications of F. J. Thonnard, RevÉAug 11 (1965), 296–304.

[47] Cf., for example, Augustine, Opus imperf. c. Jul. 3, 129; 4, 38; 5, 11.

[48] Reference of G. Morin, RBén 30 (1916), 4.

Augustine was deeply affected by the vehemence of these personal attacks and made a sharp polemical reaction such as appears in none of his works against other opponents; in this there apparently played a role of personal disappointment over the development of a man who had had his sympathy for a long time because of the relations of friendship with his father.[51] If his remark that Julian was the architect who first put the ideas of Pelagius into a system was surely meant to be ironical, so also the long-drawn-out effort to refute this "young man" proves that he regarded his work as noteworthy, at least as dangerous.[52] That Augustine admitted the sharpest calumnies by Julian word for word into his rejoinders intimates that he saw in their mere publication a judgment on their author.

After the issuance of the Tractoria, Julian at once protested that here a signing by the bishops was extorted, where as a council was needed to discuss the question.[53] In a sort of manifesto the Pelagian opposition group developed its program: it would defend the freedom of the will as well as the essential goodness of human nature, which is free from any inherited strain; it would oppose the theses of the other side about a peccatum naturae as an attack on the sanctity of marriage, behind which stands ultimately a Manichaean heresy. In another place they formulated their theses in "Five Praises," which they wanted to proclaim: praise of the creature, praise of marriage, praise of the law, praise of free will, and praise of the saints.[54] But at first the Pelagians had no possibility of realizing their program in the West: they suffered removal from office and banishment. Julian went to the East and found refuge with Theodore of Mopsuestia, where he busied himself with his literary works. These were especially his refutation of Augustine's De nuptiis et concupiscentia, to which he devoted two voluminous works, the Libri quattuor ad Turbantium (c. 419), and the Libri octo ad Florum (c. 421–22), which for their part are contained to a great extent in Augustine's Opus imperfectum contra Julianum.[55] The essential issue of their confrontation is the question of peccatum originale and of the intimately related concupiscence. Augustine had proceeded from all men's need of redemption as this was expressed in Scripture. And since infants are not excepted from this need of redemption, despite their personal sinlessness,[56] the explanation for this can be found only in the fact of an original sin, the sin of Adam, which was transmitted by him, as representative of the human race, to all his descendents. Augustine finds the fact of this original sin and its consequences for all mankind stated everywhere in Scripture, especially in Romans 5:12, which he explained according to the Latin text. He understands the nature of Adam's sin as the alienation of the soul from God to the visible world, as amor sui, which most powerfully manifests itself in concupiscentia, which in turn becomes most clearly tangible in sexual desire. The fact that since Adam the human race has been a massa peccati in need of redemption discloses to him further a glance at the concrete situation of mankind with its need, its distressing misery, even that of innocent children—a picture which the optimistic anthropology of Julian of Aeclanum treated with downright disdain. For his part he severely criticized Augustine's doctrine of original guilt and concupiscence in fiery words as Manichaeanism, without recognizing that Augustine's understanding of sin could in no sense be reconciled with the Manichaeans' material idea of sin and that it was exactly the Manichaean dualism as a whole that was for Augustine the decisive ground for abandoning the sect, even though he may unconsciously have retained from it individual but not especially striking modes of thought.[57] In comparison to the naturalist and rationalist grasp of human nature and its possibilities, Augustine's theological anthropology is of incomparable religious depth, though also at times of a gloomy seriousness, especially in individual formulations. But this pessimistic basic trait never turns in him into a despairing fatalism, because the Christian Augustine was totally penetrated by a living faith in Christ's redemptive act, as it was expressed in prayer and the sacramental life of the Church, and to it he remained most intimately bound; Augustine the pastor, so filled with hope, proclaimed it, year in and year out, in his sermons to his congregation of Hippo.

---

[49] Individual examples in G. de Plinval, Pélage, 355–360; patronus asinorum: Augustine, Opus imperf. 4, 46.

[50] Ibid. 1, 42; 1, 72; 3, 16; 6, 18; Contra duas ep. Pel., 3, 31.

[51] Contra Jul. 1, 4, 12; Opus imperf. 4, 50: in disputatione loquacissimus, in contentione calumniosissimus, in professione fallacissimus.

[52] Contra Jul. 6, 36; Opus imperf. 3, 169. On Julian's exegetical works see, besides G. Bouwman (Literature), G. de Plinval, "Julian d'Eclane devant la Bible," RSR 47 (1959), 345–366.

[53] Augustine, Contra duas ep. Pel. 2, 5; 4, 34; ACO I, 2, 100.

---

[54] The so-called Manifesto of Aquileia, PL 48, 509–526; the five laudes: Contra duas ep. Pel. 4, 1.

[55] The quotations from them are brought together by A. Bruckner, Julian von Eclanum (Leipzig 1897); id., Die vier Bücher Julians von Eclanum an Turbantius (Berlin 1910).

[56] Sermo 293, 11.

[57] Cf. A. Adam, "Das Fortwirken des Manichäismus bei Augustin," ZKG, 69 (1958), 1–25; see the restrictions of W. Geerlings, ZKTh 93 (1971), 45–60.

The collapse of the Pelagian movement between 420 and 430 was obvious. In the West the court of Ravenna persisted in its rejection, despite the protests of those affected. A group of deposed bishops, among them Turbantius, finally signed the Epistula Tractoria.[58] In 429–430 Caelestius and Julian tried to get from the Emperor Theodosius II and the Patriarch Nestorius a new investigation of their case and reception back into the Church, but they foundered on the opposition of Pope Celestine.[59] For him the question of Pelagianism had already been so unambiguously decided by his predecessors Innocent and Zosimus that he saw no reason to have it again treated at the Council of Ephesus. Hence apparently there the Roman acts on the condemnation of Pelagius and Caelestius were only read aloud, and the Council accepted them without further discussion.[60] Julian thereafter led an unending wandering life; in 439 he exerted himself to no avail with Pope Sixtus III (432–440) for restoration to his former see of Aeclanum; he was again condemned under Pope Leo I (440–461) and died in Sicily c. 450.[61] From now on Pelagian ideas persisted below the surface in various places.[62]

Theological Augustinianism to the Mid-Fifth Century

In the last years of his life Augustine's doctrine of grace, which in its substantive form had long been fixed, obtained its final formation and at the same time its crudest formulation in his statements on predestination and God's salvific will. The occasion for renewed preoccupation with certain aspects of his teaching on grace was supplied by a letter from Augustine to the Roman priest Sixtus,[63] the future Pope, in which he had sketched his idea of the total dependence of all justification on grace. Years later this letter caused a lively discussion in the monastery of Hadrumetum in the diocese of Uzala, since some monks were of the opinion that Augustine's doctrine of grace, not owed to us and not merited by us, took away free will and contradicted the doctrine of the Church that the good works of a person receive their reward on the day of the Last Judgment.[64] The new position on this problem, requested of Augustine, was at hand in his De gratia et libero arbitrio, whose essence was the proof of the absolute necessity of grace and in which it was immediately explained in what sense the free will still endures under the operation of this grace. Since a monk of the monastery deduced from this work that no one, then, is to be corrected who does not carry out the commandments of God, but one could only pray that he would fulfill them, Augustine in a second work, De correptione et gratia, directed the monks of Hadrumetum to the essential problem of the grace of perseverance: it causes with certainty the salvation of the one who receives it, but one to whom it is denied remains liable to a relapse. However, since it is at the same time an impenetrable secret, whoever belongs to the children of promise, every Christian, can and should be reprimanded and admonished to keep the commandments.

---

[58] Possidius, Vita s. Aug. 18; Augustine, Opus imperf. 1, 1.

[59] In two letters (ACO I, 2, 12–15), Nestorius asks Pope Celestine for clarification of the matter.

[60] See J. Speigl, "Der Pelagianismus auf dem Konzil von Ephesus," AHC 1 (1969), 1–14; on the question of an eventual favoring of Pelagianism by Nestorius see, among others, M. T. Disdier, "Le pélagianisme au concile d'Éphèse," EO 34 (1931), 314–333.

[61] Prosper, Chron. ad a. 439; Quodvultdeus, Dimidium temporis 12, 3. Condemnation of the Pelagians by Leo I, Epp. 2 and 18.

[62] Pope Gelasius (492–96) to the Bishops of Picenum: CSEL 35, 357–368; Britain: Constantius, Vita Germani 4, 25; cf. also M. Abel, "Le Praedestinatus et le Pélagianisme," RThAM 35 (1968) 5–25).

This very work brought about Augustine's final expression on the problem of grace. Letters of his adherents Prosper and Hilary from Gaul,[65] both laymen, reported to him that in the local clergy and especially among the monks of Marseille opposition had developed to his doctrine of the separation of human beings into the chosen and the rejected at the creation, a doctrine which was contrary to the Church's tradition, in its consequences deprived every personal exertion for virtue and penance of its meaning, and placed the proclamation in sermon and catechesis in the presence of enormous difficulties. Moreover, these circles referred to the fact that Augustine was now proposing a new idea, since he earlier taught that election was based on God's foreknowledge, that man could of himself come to faith, and that an eternal punishment for infants dying without baptism was uncertain. Hence they held that a correction of his most recently proposed doctrine was necessary in the sense that the beginning of faith and perseverance in grace are attributed to the natural will of man, that predestination depends on the foreknowledge of God, and hence the number of the elect cannot be irrevocably determined. The determination of the calling must be so understood that God calls all men to the sacrament of rebirth, but that he intends to accept only the baptized into his kingdom.[66]

---

[63] Ep. 194 (end of 418 or beginning of 419).

[64] The details must be taken from Augustine's Letters 214 and 215 and the letter of Abbot Valentine of Hadrumetum to Augustine.

[65] In Augustine, Epp. 225 and 226.

Although Augustine felt that "he had done enough in this matter," he was at once ready with an answer to the difficulties of the Marseille monks, which he gave in the two treatises De praedestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiae; they constitute a unity and were seen as such by him and by Prosper.[67] The first was concerned chiefly with the problem of the beginning of faith, while the second placed predestination in the center. Free of any polemic against those who thought otherwise, but still very decisive in expression, Augustine here too insisted that grace is only grace when it is not bound to any ever so slight human preachievement; hence it is also necessary for the initium fidei, for the initial turning of man to faith, and then, as the grace of perseverance, leads to the perfection of sanctification. Far from taking away the free will of man, grace first gives him that quality by which he freely chooses and does the good. This radical lack of a need to merit grace and its universal effectiveness is, however, seen by Augustine exclusively against the background of a divine compassion for lost humanity, which, of course, can be understood, in connection with Romans 8:29f., only as predestining election for salvation. That this predestination embraces only a small number of souls, fixed from the start, was brought home to Augustine through the experience that only a minority live a real Christianity, but it seemed to him strictly demanded by Matthew 22:14: multi enim sunt vocati, pauci vero electi. Why the predestining call of grace goes out to these and not to other souls remains wrapped in the mysterium of the divine decree. Perdition strikes the rejected not through a positive act of predestination to sin, but as a consequence of their nonelection. God's righteousness is revealed in their fate, since they have no legal claim to his mercy. Since no Christian has any certainty whatever of his election, everyone can and should hope, pray, and love in humility.

This so consistently operating system confronted Augustine inexorably with the universal salvific will of God, clearly proclaimed by Scripture—1 Timothy 2:4—but he did not succeed in solving this basic opposition despite his various attempts at exegesis. Furthermore, he was unable convincingly to justify his thesis—and thereby he exposed another weakness of his doctrine of predestination—that the small and fixed number of the elect was conditioned by the total number of the angels, which, after the fall of the angels, had to be filled up again by those predestined to salvation.

---

[66] It is not to be excluded that Prosper and Hilary in their letters had already presented their own deductions from the doctrine of the Semipelagians, who had not as yet drawn them; cf. K. Rahner, "Augustin und der Semipelagianismus," ZKTh 62 (1938), 171–196.

[67] Prosper quotes them as the two books De praedestinatione sanctorum: Pro Augustino responsiones, PL 51, 187.

Extreme Augustinianism, as expressed in his late writings, had its opponents, who came closer together after Augustine's death. John Cassian and Vincent of Lérins[68] turned definitely against his doctrine and now for their part represented ideas which overstressed the accomplishments of the human will in the first turning to grace. They thereby again called forth a defense of the Augustinian doctrine of grace, of which Prosper of Aquitaine, already mentioned, especially made himself the leading spokesman.[69] It was his aim, on the one hand to explain Augustine's theology of grace through extracts from his pertinent works—Liber sententiarum ex operibus s. Augustini or Liber epigrammatum ex sententiis s. Augustini—and on the other hand to demonstrate the weaknesses of the "Semipelagian" teaching of Cassian and Vincent of Lérins on grace—Liber contra collatorem and Pro Augustino responsiones ad capitula obiectionum Vincentianarum. In the question whether Prosper himself, in the course of the debates, separated himself from strict Augustinianism, opinion remains divided,[70] especially since the question is mixed with that of the author of the work De vocatione omnium gentium.[71] Those who ascribe it to Prosper—and the stronger reasons favor this—will have to say that, with all his defense in principle of Augustine's basic position, he has attempted to achieve a reconciliation of the opposing standpoints, while he avoided not only certain terms of Augustine, such as that of praedestinatio, but consciously pushed Augustine's milder formulations on the relations of grace and free will and God's salvific will into the foreground; in his works these are found alongside quite crude statements and at times lent to his teaching on grace a dialectical character. Soon after Augustine's death, Prosper had personally intervened in his favor with Pope Celestine and sought to obtain a condemnation of his opponents: the Pope was indeed prepared for a summary praise of Augustine but refrained from any determination of individual questions of the Augustine doctrine of grace.[72] There was never any ecclesiastical approbation of strict Augustinianism, but it still had enormous long-range effects, since it ever more tempted individuals to follow the "doctor of grace" to those heights in whose thinner air only a few could breathe without anxiety.

---

[68] John Cassian in his Conference 13, CSEL 13, 361–396; the Obiectiones of Vincent of Lérins, attacked by Prosper, are not extant. On the anti-Augustinian tendency of his Commonitorium see E. Griffe, BLE 62 (1961), 81–104, and W. O'Connor, Doctor communis 16 (1963), 123–157.

[69] Prosper's works: PL 51; a commentary with English translation of the works written in defense of Augustine: ACW 32 (London 1963) by P. de Letter.

[70] Literature on this question in R. Lorenz, "Der Augustinismus Prospers von Aquitanien," ZKG 73 (1962), 217–252, 217, footnote 1.

[71] PL 51, 647–722: good commentary by P. de Letter, ACW 14 (London 1952).

[72] Celestine I, Ep. 21, ad episc. Gall. (PL 50, 528–530).

PART THREE

Inner Life of the Church between Nicaea and Chalcedon

CHAPTER 13

Missionary Activity of the Church

The religious and political turning point of the years 311–324 meant also for the Church's missionary task hitherto unknown possibilities. It is true that the number of Christians, especially in the far more urbanized eastern part of the Empire and in Roman North Africa increased considerably in the third century, but still, in comparison with the totality of the Empire's population, they represented a minority, noteworthy though it was. The now favorable point of departure for gaining the pagan majority, however, concealed certain dangers in an appraisal of the credibility of the Christian confession. One was that of conversions because of opportunism, which appeared almost automatically with the acceptance and encouragement of Christianity by the Emperors and could not but encumber the Church with many a purely external Christian. Another, more pernicious in its possible consequences, was the temptation in evangelizing to employ, with the toleration or even the aid of the State, means and methods that aspired to effect the conversion to Christianity by pressure and force rather than conviction. It will be shown that the Christian mission of this period did not always escape such a danger. Nevertheless, the outcome of the Church's missionary exertions lasting for more than a century was clear: around the middle of the fifth century the people of the Roman Empire professed and felt themselves to be Christians, except for a few pagan remnants, the closed group of the Jews, and some German tribes. Unfortunately no contemporary wrote down the course and character of this process of christianization in a special treatise: hence it can be put together only out of many individual reports and remains and always only incompletely.

1. Christianization of the Population of the Empire*

The mission of the Egyptian Church[1] was c. 325 in an especially favorable starting-place, since, with its approximately ninety episcopal sees at that time, it had already found its definitive organizational basis, from which the christianization of peasants, still mostly pagan, could be undertaken.[2] In Athanasius it already had the supreme head of a territorial church, and he, aware of his goal, guided the evangelization from his center at Alexandria. In a letter to the Monk-Bishop Dracontius of Hermopolis Parva (c. 354–55) he designated the evangelization of pagans as the eminently episcopal duty and expected that the erecting of this see would bring with it a larger number of conversions, especially since pagans themselves had held out the prospect of their conversion if a bishop was given to them.[3] He firmly urged the christianization of southern Egypt and kept himself personally informed on the spot; perhaps he founded the see of Syene in such a "visitation journey." Certainly the still young congregation on the Nile island of Philai owed its first bishop to his initiative. When the army inspector for Upper Egypt, the Christian Macedonius, reported that the Christians in this pagan pilgrimage center, with its celebrated temple of Isis, had not even a church and were attended to only sporadically by clergy from Syene, Athanasius appointed this very officer as Bishop of Philai: he worked there long and successfully and was even able to win for the Christian faith Mark, the son of the pagan high priest.[4] The success of his missionary efforts motivated the still pagan circles of Alexandria, which from 360 to 390 had as their spiritual head the Neoplatonist Antoninus and participated actively in the worship of Sarapis and of Isis in Menuthis, to the resolute defense of their faith. In 391 occurred a bloody clash between Christians and pagans of Alexandria, in which the authoritarian Bishop Theophilus was not guiltless, in connection with a ridiculing procession which Christians arranged with pagan cult objects. The Emperor then had the great temple of Sarapis closed and transferred to the Christians, who remodeled it into a Christian church; the same fate later befell the temple of Isis at Menuthis.[5] The most shocking incident in the confrontation between pagans and Christians in Egypt was the death of the pagan philosopher Hypatia in 415: after severe maltreatment, she was cruelly murdered by a fanatical mob under the leadership of a lector.[6] Beside the bishop there appeared also the monk as missionary in Egypt; he devoted himself especially to the conversion of pagan priests, since this usually implied further conversions. A distasteful example of monastic missionary zeal is offered in the first half of the fifth century by the powerful Abbot Schenute, superior of the White Monastery of Atripe at Akhmîm (Sohag) in Upper Egypt. Against the still relatively strong pagan minority he instigated the Christians by inflammatory words, took part personally with groups of his monks in the destruction of their temples and the plundering of their villages, and thereby very seriously compromised the Christian mission.[7] Casual missionaries were the two priests Protogenes and Eulogius of Edessa, who had been banished under the Emperor Valens because of their fidelity to Nicaea to the Upper Egyptian village of Antinoë, where they at once gathered around them the children of the still overwhelmingly pagan inhabitants, taught them to read and write in a sort of anticipated mission-school, and after some time baptized them.[8]

---

* References will be made in the proper place to the mission beyond the imperial frontier.

[1] H. Leclercq, "Égypte," DACL IV, 2430–71; E. Hardy, Christian Egypt (New York 1952); H. Idris Bell, Cults and Creeds in Greco-Roman Egypt (Liverpool 1954).

---

[2] The number of about 100 bishops from the year 319 remains consistent, e.g., in Athanasius, Apol. contra Arianos 50, who gives the names of ninety-one bishops.

[3] Ep. ad Dracontium 1 and 7 (PG 25, 523–534).

[4] On Syene, G. Bardy, DHGE IV, 1319. On Philai, see the Vita of the monk Apa Aaron, ed. E. W. Budge, Miscellaneous Coptic Texts (London 1915), CXLIV–CLVI and 432–525 respectively. A Bishop Mark of Philai took part in the Synod of 362 at Alexandria: PG 26, 808. Cf. P. Nautin, "La conversion du temple de Philae en église chrétienne," CahArch 17 (1967), 1–43.

[5] R. Herzog, "Der Kamf um den Kult der Menuthis," = "Pisciculi," Festschr. F. J. Dölger (Münster 1932), 117–124; P. Rémondon, "L'Égypte et la suprême résistance au christianisme," BullInstFrArchOr 51 (1952), 116–128. On the end of the Sarapeum see J. Schwartz, AmerStudPapyrol 1 (1966), 97–111.

For the external success of the missionary work of the Egyptian Church the assertions relating to the city of Oxyrrhynchus may be taken as typical. Circa 300, there were here, besides a synagogue and a dozen pagan temples, two Christian churches; a century later it shows twelve Christian churches, whose number increased still more into the sixth century.[9] Soon after 400 A.D., only a minority professed paganism, and after fifty more years the christianization of the country was completed. However, many of the new Christians broke only with difficulty from the influences of their former religion. As late as 420 Bishop Cyril in his Easter letters repeatedly had to speak against superstitious practices. Especially among the peasants magic and sorcery held on tenaciously, and many a specifically Egyptian cult, such as the veneration of the Nile, could be overcome only in a painful process of "christianization."[10]

Athanasius's missionary interest extended beyond the frontiers of Egypt, since c. 350 he ordained Frumentius, a native of Tyre, for an area which has been universally identified with Ethiopia and its contemporary capital, Axum.[11] The brothers Frumentius and Aedesius, on their return from a journey to India, had gone to land in a port on the African coast of the Red Sea and from there were taken to the court of Axum, where they soon obtained positions of trust. Later, on his return journey to his Syrian homeland, Frumentius pointed out to Athanasius at Alexandria the possibilities of a Christian mission in the Kingdom of Axum, whereupon Athanasius ordained him a bishop and sent him back to Ethiopia. Athanasius confirmed this procedure himself in his Apologia to Constantius II, in which he reproduced a letter of the Emperor to the Ethiopian King Ezana, in which Constantius demanded the expulsion of Frumentius to Egypt so that the Arian Bishop George of Alexandria could examine the legality of his ordination and his faith. The activity of Frumentius found expression also in Ethiopian tradition, which gave him the name of Abba Salama (Father of Peace) and commemorates him in the liturgy on 26 Hamlé (20 July). In addition, it is reported by the Byzantine historians Theodoret, Socrates, and Theophanes; only the Arian Philostorgius attributes the first mission among the Ethiopians to his fellow Arian Theophilus, who had earlier worked in Yemen at the command of the Emperor Constantius II.[12] The prevailing interpretation of the sources shows that preference should be given to it rather than to the one recently proposed, according to which Frumentius was ordained by Athanasius as Bishop for Hither India and was never in Axum, and that Christianity came to Ethiopia only in the second third of the fifth century in its Monophysite form.[13] It can never satisfactorily explain either the letter of the Emperor Constantius to the then ruler of Axum or especially the Ethiopian tradition regarding Frumentius.

---

[6] Socrates, HE 7, 15: see K. Prächter, Pauly-Wissowa IX, 1, 242–249.

[7] Apophthegm. Patrum, no. 492 (Abbot Macarius); no. 1087 lat.: J. Leipoldt, "Schenute von Atripe" (TU 25, 1, Leipzig 1903), 175–182.

[8] Theodoret, HE 4, 18, 7–12.

[9] H. Rink, Strassen und Viertelsnamen in Oxyrrhynchos (Giessen 1924), 44ff.

[10] E. Drioton, "Cyrille et l'ancienne religion égyptienne," Kyrilliana (Cairo 1944), 231–246; R. Rémondon, "Un papyrus magique copte," BullInstFrArchOr 52 (1953), 157–161; A. Hermann, "Der Nil und die Christen," JbAC 2 (1959), 30–69.

[11] G. Lanczkowski, JbAC 1 (1958), 143–145; E. Hammerschmidt, "Die Anfänge des Christentums in Äthiopien," ZMR 38 (1954), 281–294; A. Dihle, JbAC 6 (1963), 67–69.

Important stimuli for the Christian mission in Palestine[14] went out from Constantine, who through his initiative for the erecting and adorning of Christian churches on the sites of Judaeo-Christian history, with their wealth of tradition, pushed the land of origin of Christianity powerfully into the consciousness of contemporary Christianity. Jerusalem especially, with its immediate neighborhood, obtained in the course of the fourth century—after a brief interruption due to the reaction under the Emperor Julian—even in externals the character of a fully Christian city, with the steadily growing number of its churches, monasteries, oratories, and hospices, which attracted ever larger crowds of pilgrims, some of whom settled for long periods in Palestine and contributed greatly to the strengthening of the native Christianity. Even in

---

[12] Thus Rufinus, HE 10, 9, who refers to the oral report of Aedesius; Athanasius, Apol. ad Constant. 29–31; Theodoret, HE 1, 23; Socrates, HE 1, 19; Theophanes, Chron. 5, 13; Philostorgius, HE 3, 6.

[13] Thus F. Altheim–R. Stiehl, Christentum am Roten Meer I (Berlin 1971), 393–483.

[14] H. Leclercq, "Palestine," DACL XIII, 755–767; F. M. Abel, Histoire de Palestine II (Paris 1952).

Caesarea, the seat of the civil administration, there existed relatively early a rather strong gentile Christian community, and in the port city of Maiuma the majority were Christian under Constantine.[15] But in the countryside Christianity had as yet only a few adherents, since Judaism to a great extent refused to have anything to do with the Christian mission. The eighteen congregations of Palestine represented at Nicaea constituted only a minority of the total population of these sees.[16] Bishop Asclepas, who had to care for the Christians of Gaza and its vicinity, could have a residence in the city only as a result of Constantine's intervention, and toward the end of the fourth century the number of Christians here and in the coastal towns of Anthedon and Raphia were still insignificant.[17] In Tiberias, Capharnaum, Nazareth, and Diocaesarea a Christian of Jewish birth, Joseph, had Christian churches built because here there were only a few Christians. The powerful anti-Christian wave under the Emperor Julian revealed in the Palestinian provinces the stubborn resistance of Jews and pagans which the mission here encountered.[18] In the territory of ancient Edom, Aila (Aqaba), on the north shore of the gulf of that name, was mentioned as the first episcopal see at the time of Nicaea, and at the same time there was an episcopal congregation in the old Nabataean city of Petra. Two more episcopal sees on the south shore of the Dead Sea are known through the list of participants in the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, and at Chalcedon there was present also a bishop from the island of Jotabe (Tirana) in the Gulf of Aqaba. To the Patriarchate of Jerusalem belonged two communities in the territory of Moab, Areopolis, whose Bishop Anastasius was at Ephesus in 449, and Characucoba, which is attested by the mosaic map of Madaba.[19] Also in Palestine monks appeared as missionaries, such as Hilarion, who was active in the vicinity of Gaza and in the Negev, and Euthymius, to whom the see of Parembolai owes its origin and for which Juvenal of Jerusalem, at his request, c. 425 ordained as bishop a sheik of a Saracen tribe.[20] The Christian mission in the three Palestinian provinces probably did not achieve its strongest impact until the fifth century. The lists of participants in the two Synods of Jerusalem of 518 and 536 name some fifty bishops for them, who were spread out preponderantly in places with the rank of cities.[21]

---

[15] F. M. Abel, "Jérusalem," DACL VII, 2311–2334; Jerome, Ep. 46, 11; Cl. Kopp, "Pèlerinages aux lieux saints," DB, Suppl. 7, 589–605; A. Negev, "Césarée maritime," Bible et Terre Sainte 41 (1961), 6–15; Maiuma: Sozomen, HE 2, 5, 7–8; 5, 3, 6–7.

[16] E. Honigmann, "La liste originale des Pères de Nicée," Byz 14 (1939), 17–76.

[17] Eusebius, Vita Constantini 4, 38; Mark the Deacon, Vita Porphyrii 19; Sozomen, HE 5, 8, 7.

[18] Eusebius, Onomast. 26, 108; Epiphanius, Haer. 73, 26; Panar. 1, 30, 4–12; reaction under Julian: Sozomen, HE 7, 15, 11; Julianus Imperator, Epp. 53, 56, 91; see J. Vogt, Kaiser Julian und das Judentum (Leipzig 1939).

[19] F. M. Abel, Histoire de Palestine II, 345–349; N. Edelby, PrOrChr, 6 (1956), 110. Mosaic of Madaba: DB, Suppl. 5, 627–704.

[20] Sozomen, HE 15, 15; Jerome, Vita Hil. 25; Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita s. Euthymii 15; 27.

In the Roman province of Arabia, with its eastern frontier never determined and in the south too often shifting, a greater missionary activity was inaugurated when Constantine assumed sole rule. It proceeded from the provincial capital, Bostra, which was the seat of a bishop as early as the third century. The Metropolitan of the city was the object of a severe attack by the Emperor Julian, who called upon the population to expel him.[22] Between Nicaea and Chalcedon the number of bishoprics here rose from five to eighteen, two of which, Madaba and Gerasa, testify by the completeness and quality of the extant Christian monuments that in the fifth and sixth centuries Christianity must have been the predominant religion of their inhabitants.[23] Again monks shared in the mission work. The tribal Princess Mawia asked for the hermit Moses as bishop, and the conversion of the Saracen Sheik Zocomos likewise went back to the influence of a monk.[24]

Christian missionary activity in non-Roman South Arabia got under way through the Emperor Constantius II, when he, probably also out of political considerations, sent an embassy under the leadership of the Arian Theophilus "the Indian," from the island of Socotra, to the Himyarites (Neğran). Despite the competition from Judaism, it had a certain success, since the tribal Prince allowed the building of three churches, for which he even placed the means at the disposal of the Christians; one arose in the capital, Zafar, the second in the port city of Aden, the temporary quarters of the Roman merchant fleet, and the third on the Persian Gulf.[25] Monophysite missionaries from Egypt and Nestorians from the North also strove in the fifth century to gain the Himyarites, for whom a bishop is demonstrable in Neğran c. 500. But the Christian church in Neğran was destroyed in an attack by the Jewish

---

[21] A. Alt, "Die Bistümer der alten Kirche Palästinas," PJ 29 (1933), 67–88; R. Devreesse, "Les anciens évêchés de Palestine," Mémorial Lagrange (Paris 1940), 217–227; on Eleutherepolis see E. Bagatti, Stud. bibl. Francisc. lib. ann. 22 (1972), 109–129.

[22] R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche (Paris 1945), 208–240; N. Edelby, "La Transjordanie chrétienne des origines aux croisades," PrOrChr 6 (1956), 97–117, with map; M. Höfner, "Arabien," RAC I, 579–585. On Bostra, Julianus Imperator, Ep. 114.

[23] ACO II, I, 350; A. Alt, "Bischofskirche und Mönchskirche im nördlichen Ostjordanland," PJ 33 (1937), 89–111. On Madaba, B. Bagatti, RivAC 33 (1957), 139–160; C. H. Kraeling, Gerasa (New Haven 1938); S. Saller–B. Bagatti, The Town of Nebo (Jerusalem 1949).

[24] Sozomen, HE 6, 38, 1–9, 14–16; A. Alt, PJ 34 (1938), 93–104.

[25] Philostorgius, HE 3, 4–5.

Sabaean King Masruq in 523, and some Christians met death, including Arethas, later venerated as a martyr. Thereafter the South Arabian Christians remained a weak minority, which, after the appearance of Muhammad, partly migrated to Kufra on the Euphrates.[26]

The Christian community of the Syrian capital, Antioch, recovered rapidly from the reverses of the persecutions of Diocletian and Licinius, especially since it was able to enjoy the emphatic benevolence of Constantine.[27] Up to the reign of the Emperor Julian, probably the majority of the city's population belonged to it, since the Christians could even dare public counter-demonstrations against the Emperor's measures of repression. Even the literary polemic of Julian and of the rhetor Libanius could not stop the progress of the mission, with which the atrophying of the pagan temple service ran parallel. When Chrysostom said c. 390 that in the event that each of the "approximately hundred thousand" Christians would donate a loaf, the misery of the poor of Antioch would be decidedly alleviated, it was thereby declared that at the end of the fourth century the city was regarded as Christian. Theodoret of Cyrrhus confirms this for 415, since he knew at that time of still only an "entirely small remnant of pagans" in the city, to which, however, must be added a considerable Jewish community.[28] Finally, this situation was also reflected in the number of the churches constructed at Antioch in the fourth century: to the church of the Old City, destroyed under Diocletian but soon rebuilt, were added the Constantinian basilica and three memorial churches of the martyrs Babylas, Romanus, and Drosis.[29] Three factors conditioned this favorable missionary development of the Syrian metropolis: the greater power of radiation of the Christian message in comparison with the here especially questionable pagan system of worship; the intensive recruiting of man to man, to which the pastor Chrysostom tirelessly exhorted the congregation;[30] and finally the attraction emanating from monasticism, highly esteemed in Syria, and from leaders of communities, such as Eustathius, Meletius, Flavian, and of preachers and theologians, such as Chrysostom, Diodorus, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret of Cyrrhus.

---

[26] J. Ryckmans, "Le christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique," L'Oriente cristiano nella storia della civiltà (Rome 1964), 413–453; C. D. G. Müller, Kirche und Mission unter den Arabern in vorislamischer Zeit (Tübingen 1967), 11–14; I. Shahid, The Martyrs of Najrân, New Documents (Brussels 1971).

[27] On Antioch in addition to R. Devreesse in footnote 22 supra, see Chr. Papadopoulos, Ἱστορία τῆς ἐκκλησίας Ἀντιοχείας (Alexandria 1951). Constantine's splendid basilica for Antioch: Eusebius, Vita Constantini 3, 50.

[28] Theodoret, HE 3, 10–12; Sozomen, HE 5, 19, 4–20, 7; Ammianus Marcellinus, 22, 13; Libanius, Or. 2, 10, 60, 30 (only four temples left undamaged); Chrysostom, In Matth. hom. 85, 4; Theodoret, HE 5, 35, 5.

[29] W. Eltester, "Die Kirchen Antiochiens im 4. Jh.," ZNW 36 (1937), 251–286; J. Lassus, Antioch on the Orontes 2 (Princeton 1938), 5–44; G. Downey, A History of Antioch in Syria (Princeton 1962).

[30] P. Andres, Der Missionsgedanke in den Schriften des Joh. Chrysostomus (Hünfeld 1935), 158–162.

Outside Antioch also the Syrian people accepted Christianity relatively quickly, since as early as the mid-fourth century there were churches in numerous cities and villages of the Syrian and Phoenician provinces, as appears from the reports of the Church historians on the pagan reaction under Julian. At that time, for example, two churches in Damascus were burned, the church at Beirut was destroyed, and the cult of Dionysus was introduced into the Christian churches of Epiphania and Emesa. For the fourth and fifth centuries the existence of a notable ecclesiastical architecture can be shown in the entire Syrian area; moreover, the numerous Christian inscriptions permit the conclusion that at the beginning of the fifth century the majority of the Syrian peasants also professed the Christian religion.[31] An informative piece of evidence for the situation in a single bishopric is provided by the famous letter of Theodoret of Cyrrhus to Pope Leo, whom he tells that his see embraces 800 paroikiai, by which can only be understood overwhelmingly rural pastoral districts.[32] This complete evidence is corroborated by the status of the ecclesiastical organization in the territory of the Patriarchate of Antioch at the time of the Council of Chalcedon, which then exhibited some 130 episcopal sees.[33] Once more a special rank belongs to monasticism, above all in the rural sections of the Syrian provinces. The early Stylites had already established their reputation among the people in the service of evangelization. The monks Thalelaus (in the vicinity of Gabala) and Abraam were mentioned as zealous missionaries; the latter gained "a large village" in the Lebanon especially by means of his social solicitude for the faith. He later continued his activity in Osrhoene, where, as Bishop of Karai south of Edessa, he found a still pagan majority.[34] Edessa itself needed in the fourth century only to give to the external picture of the city a Christian character by the erecting of new churches and martyrs' shrines within and without the walls, but the emphasis on the missionary duty of all Christians by Ephrem the Syrian still indicates the continued existence of paganism in the wider neighborhood.[35] Missionaries from Edessa had made Christianity known in the Roman frontier province of Mesopotamia before Constantine, and bishops from the communities of Macedonopolis, Resaina, and perhaps even Amida were among the participants of the Council of Nicaea. The sources for the fourth century provide no more detailed information on the progress of the mission in the sparsely settled rural districts.[36]

---

[31] F. M. Abel, Histoire de Palestine II, 280; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie (Paris 1947); id., "Syrie" DACL XV, 1855–1942; G. Tschalenko, Villages antiques de la Syrie du Nord (Paris 1953–58); L. Jalabert–R. Mouterde–J. P. Roquais, Inscriptions grecques et latines de Syrie I–VII (Paris 1929–1970); see C. Mondésert, Stpatr 1 (Berlin 1957), 649–658.

[32] Theodoret, Ep. 113.

[33] R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche, 136–140.

[34] Theodoret, Hist. rel. 17, 26, 28; HE 4, 18, 14; 5, 4, 6; Sozomen, HE 6, 1, 1; It. Eger. 20, 8; see B. Kötting, "Das Wirken der ersten Styliten Missions- und Erbauungspredigt," ZMR 37 (1953), 187–197; O. Hendricks, "L'activité apostolique des premiers moines syriens," PrOrChr 8 (1958), 3–25.

Even in the fourth century the Antiochene mission embraced also the Arab nomads in the East Syrian frontier district, since "a Bishop of the Arabs," Timothy, was present at the Synod of Antioch in 363. Chrysostom probably had the same area in mind when in a letter to the priest Constantius he spoke of Phoenicia and "Arabia" as his mission-field. Christian Arab nomads lived here until the days of Islam.[37] The Arab tribes living still farther to the east in the territory of Hira under the Lakhmid Dynasty, however, owed their first acquaintance with Christianity to Christian prisoners who were settled here by the Sassanids. Later, the Nestorians, very eager to engage in evangelization, likewise worked here and asserted their influence even as far as the South Arabian Neğran and achieved remarkable successes among the Arabs on the western coast of the Persian Gulf.[38] East Syrian Christians from the Sassanid Kingdom continued in the fourth to sixth centuries the missions begun earlier in North India and perhaps also took under their care the Christian communities of South India that had been founded from Egypt, as an exact analysis of the Thomas Tradition makes probable.[39] The Nestorian mission achieved its greatest expansion when it pushed into Central Asia, to Tibet, China, and even to Manchuria, and could establish here the provinces "of the Outside."[40]

---

[35] P. Krüger, "Missionsgedanken bei Ephrem dem Syrer," MRW 4 (1941), 8–15. If the anonymous Vita of Bishop Rabbula (412–436) were reliable, he would have labored zealously as missionary to the pagans and Jews; cf. on the Vita P. Peeters, RSR 18 (1928), 187–203. On the ecclesiastical building at Edessa, E. Kirsten, RAC IV, 578, and JbAC 6 (1963), 144–172.

[36] C. Karalevsky, "Amida," DHGE II, 1238 f.; E. Honigmann, Byz(B) 14 (1939), 46.

[37] Socrates, HE 3, 25; Chrysostom, Ep. 221; see C. D. G. Müller, op. cit., 6–8.

[38] C. D. G. Müller, op. cit., 9–11.

[39] L. W. Brown, The Indian Christians of St. Thomas (Cambridge 1956), 43–91; A. Dihle, "Neues zur Thomas-Tradition," JbAC 6 (1963), 54–70.

[40] E. Tisserant, "Nestorienne (L'Église)," DThC XI, 157–323; L. Dauvillier, "Les provinces chaldéennes 'de L'Exterieur' au moyen-âge," Mélanges F. Cavallera (Toulouse 1948), 261–313; J. M. Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne I–III (Beirut 1965–69).

To the fourth century (c. 325–361) belongs also the conversion of the Georgians,[41] on the southern slopes of the central Caucasus; it was begun by a Christian female prisoner, later called Nino; and King Mirian, whom she converted, permitted Greek missionaries, probably from Antioch, to come to his country. At the beginning of the fifth century the Georgian Church had already gained a degree of autonomy, which was completed by the appointment of a Catholicus under King Wachtang I (446–499).[42] The fact that the head of the Georgian Church had to be ordained at Antioch into the eighth century may probably indicate an earlier missionary tie.

The relatively high state of christianization achieved at the beginning of the fourth century in the still undivided province of Cilicia—nine bishops and one chorepiscopus represented it at Nicaea—probably obtained a new impetus from the destruction of the temple of Asclepius at Aegae by Constantine.[43] At the time of the Council of Chalcedon, in fact, it must have come to an end, for the two provinces into which Cilicia had been divided toward the end of the fourth century now comprised seventeen sees. A similar growth in the number of bishoprics between Nicaea and Chalcedon—from ten to twenty-two—occurred in the provinces of Isauria,[44] likewise oriented toward Antioch; Seleucia, the metropolitan see of Isauria, attracted many pilgrims through the sanctuary of Thecla that stood before its walls. But the inhabitants of the Isaurian mountains, long feared because of their raids, remained inaccessible to the gospel much longer, since as late as the fifth century they attacked Christian monasteries and communities and carried off their bishops into captivity.[45]

The completion of the evangelization of the island of Cyprus[46] may have coincided with the recognition of its ecclesiastical independence in regard to Antioch at the Council of Ephesus of 431. Here too the progress of the mission can be ascertained only externally in the growing number of bishops. At Nicaea the island was represented by three bishops—a larger number of sees is, however, not to be excluded—and at the Synod of Serdica (c. 342) twelve took part, while in his circular to the bishops of the island c. 400 Theophilus of Alexandria mentioned fifteen of those addressed by name, among whom are to be counted some chorepiscopi. Around the turn of the fifth century Bishop Tychon of Amathus still had to confront followers of the cults of Aphrodite and Artemis. But a mosaic epigram of the fifth century reflects the final situation: Christ is victor over Apollo.[47]

---

[41] R. Janin, DThC VI, 1239ff.; K. Kekelidse, Die Bekehrung Georgiens zum Christentum (Leipzig 1928); P. Peeters, AnBoll 50 (1932), 5–58; M. Toumanoff, Studies in Christian Caucasian History (Washington 1963); F. Thalamon, "Histoire et structure mythique: la conversion des Ibères," RH 247 (1972), 5–28.

[42] M. Tarnisvili, "Die Entstehung und Entwicklung der kirchlichen Autokephalie Georgiens," Kyrios 5 (1940–41), 177–193.

[43] Eusebius, Vita Constantini 3, 57; Sozomen, HE 2, 5, 5.

[44] The corresponding episcopal lists in Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche, 126 and 137f.

[45] Itin. Eger. 23, 1–6; Theodoret, Hist. rel. 10. On Thecla's city see E. Herzfeld–S. Guyer, Monumenta Asiae Minoris Antiqua II (Manchester 1930), 1–89; for Cilicia and Isauria, ibid. III (1931), Anatolian Studies 2 (1952), 85–150, 4 (1954), 49–64.

[46] E. Kirsten, "Cyprus," RAC III, 493–498; R. Janin, "Chypre," DHGE XII, 791–802; G. Hill, A History of Cyprus I (Cambridge 1948, reprinted 1972).

In Asia Minor[48] as a whole the end of the age of persecution made public that the majority of the Greek and Hellenized population of the cities and of the larger rural centers of settlement had already been won for the Christian religion. A wide-meshed net of episcopal congregations covered the provinces at the time of Nicaea, and from the day-to-day life of these communities proceeded the missionary attraction which in the next decades disposed the greater part of those who were still pagans to the acceptance of Christianity. Specifically missionary questions strikingly disappeared in the decrees of Asia Minor synods of the first half of the fourth century.[49] The growing christianization of the peasantry in particular is noticeable in the remarkably large number of chorepiscopi in some Asia Minor provinces: for example, in the days of Basil there were some fifty of them for the see of Caesarea.[50] The efforts of the Emperor Julian to restore paganism found only the slightest echo in Asia Minor. All the eagerness of his vicar for Asia, Justus, who had sacrificial altars again constructed at Sardes, sought to rebuild decayed or destroyed temples, and himself offered public sacrifices, remained as much without effect as did his displeasure that in Galatia the wives, children, and domestic servants of many pagan priests were Christians.[51] When, c. 450, an inhabitant of Ephesus put in an inscription that he had replaced the statue of Artemis with a cross, the change that was under way was expressed powerfully in symbol.[52] Naturally, from now on, especially in the cities and among the upper class, some individuals still professed paganism or secretly adhered to it. Also smaller ethnic groups, such as the tribe of the Magusaeans, who had moved from Babylonia to Cappadocia and whose religious world is described in detail by Basil, clung to their ancestral religion. In the early fifth century the monk Hypatius did missionary work in Bithynia, which had very long had a majority of Christians, and considerable groups of adherents of pagan cults still existed in the time of the Emperor Justinian I in the mountains of the provinces of Asia, Caria, Lydia, and Phrygia, since John of Ephesus claims at that time to have converted "tens of thousands" of them from Constantinople in accordance with a well prepared mission plan and the aid of new monastic foundations.[53]

---

[47] Serdica: Mansi 3, 69, and Athanasius, Contra Ar. 50; Theophilus of Alexandria: Jerome, Ep. 92. Chorepiscopi: Sozomen, HE 7, 19, 2. For the Vita of Tycho see H. Delehaye, AnBoll 26 (1907) 229–232, 240–245. On the mosaic epigram: T. B. Mitford, Byz(B) 20 (1950), 105–175.

[48] H. Grégoire, Recueil des inscriptions grecques chrétiennes d'Asie Mineure (Paris 1922); V. Schultze, Altchristliche Städte und Landschaften II, 1 and 2 (Gütersloh 1922–26); H. M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Provinces (Oxford 1937); J. Keil, "Asia," Rac I, 740–749.

[49] The Council of Ancyra in canon 24 warned against pagan soothsayers, the Council of Laodicea in canon 30 forbade clerics and ascetics to visit specified baths in order not to scandalize the pagans, and its canon 39 forbade participation in pagan festivals.

[50] E. Kirsten, "Chorbischof," RAC II, 1108; five chorepiscopi from Cappadocia were present at Nicaea.

[51] Eunapius, Vitae sophist., 503; Sozomen, HE 5, 16, 1–8.

A special role in the process of the evangelization of Asia Minor may be attributed for the fourth century to Cappadocia.[54] The bishops of the metropolis, Caesarea, from where the christianization of Armenia by Gregory the Illuminator started, maintained lively contact with their daughter churches; until 374 they ordained the Armenian chief bishop and claimed a sort of right of visitation in the communities of Asia Minor.[55] The see of Caesarea became, with its organization of ecclesiastical community life—social care, liturgy, organization of monasticism, elimination of pagan cult shrines—and the type of public life allied with it in relation to Christian life, the missionary model for the congregations of the neighboring provinces.[56] And the very openness of the Cappadocians among the bishops of Asia Minor toward a profane education became a missionary factor of the first order, since it essentially facilitated conversion to Christianity on the part of the upper class, which stood close to these bishops socially.[57] The receptiveness of Cappadocia to the missionary task is finally discernible in the series of important missionaries whom it produced, as, for example, the Bishop of the Goths Ulfilas, Eutyches, who labored among the Goths of the Crimea, and Vetranio, who became Bishop of Tomi in Scythia.[58]

---

[52] H. Gregoire, Recueil des inscriptions . . . , 104.

[53] Basil, Ep. 258, 4; Callinic., Vital Hyp. 30, 1–2; 43, 16; John of Ephesus, Church History 3, 36–37; see L. Duchesne, L'Église au VIme siècle (Paris 1925), 276–280, and E. Honigmann, CSCO 127 (Louvain 1951), 207–215.

[54] E. Kirsten, "Cappadocia," RAC II, 861–891.

[55] Basil, Epp. 97, 99, 100, 195, 228f.; F. Tournebize, "Arménie," DHGE IV, 294–301.

[56] U. W. Knorr, Basilius d. Grosse. Sein Beitrag zur christlichen Durchdringung Kleinasiens (dissertation, Tübingen 1968); R. Janin, "Césarée de Cappadoce," DHGE XII, 199–203. Julianus Imperator, Ep. 78; Sozomen, HE 5, 4, 1.

[57] Eusebius, Vita Constantini 4, 43, had already praised the scholarship of the Cappadocian bishops.

[58] G. Bardy, "La patrie des évêques," RHE 35 (1939), 237f.

In the other provinces of the Diocese of Pontus the missionary task of the communities in city and countryside in the fourth century consisted chiefly in the deepening and elaborating of the religious life, as is clear from the discussions of the Synods of Ancyra (314), Neocaesarea (between 314 and 325), and Gangra (340–41).[59] Only occasionally were missionary enterprises or procedures mentioned in the sources for the fourth century in the heavily urbanized provinces of the west coast of Asia Minor. In the Hellespont Bishop Parthenius of Lampsacus in the middle of the century had to ask the Emperor's permission to do away with the still open pagan temple; to John Chrysostom is attributed the combating of the cult of Cybele in Phrygia and the definitive elimination of the worship of Artemis at Ephesus.[60]

In regard to the further development of the Christian religion on the islands of the Aegean Sea the sources permit no detailed statements. It may have proceeded to the larger islands, such as Rhodes, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and Lemnos, just as to the nearby coastal cities. Here and there an archeological discovery indicates the building of a church in the pre-Byzantine period.[61]

In the southern provinces of the Diocese of Thrace—Europa and Rhodope—for the period c. 300 one can pretty much assume the state of christianization which had been achieved in the Asia Minor provinces of Hellespont and Bithynia, which lay opposite. Indeed, in the Thracian interior there were also pre-Nicene communities, as at Philippopolis, Adrianople, Deultum, Anchialus, and Durosturum, from which probably came "the Moesians and Thracians" among the bishops whom Eusebius mentions as participants in the Dedication Synod of Jerusalem in 331.[62] The central and northern Thracian provinces were only touched by the Christian mission to a greater degree in the fourth century. Their special interest was of importance to the Gothic tribes which had settled on the lower Danube. The most successful missionary was the already mentioned Ulfilas, who, after his episcopal ordination in 341, worked to the north of the Danube until persecution compelled the Christian Goths to flee c. 350: they were then settled by the Emperor Constantius in Lower Moesia.[63] Later missionaries were active among the nomadic Gothic tribes on the lower Danube, sent there by Chrysostom, who in Constantinople itself had exerted himself to win the Goths and even in his exile was concerned that Bishop Unilas, whom he had ordained, should receive a worthy successor.[64] In the last decades of the fourth century occurred the missionary work of Bishop Nicetas of Remesiana from the province of Dacia, who succeeded, after a full year's exertions, in gaining the tribes of Thracian Bessae in the mountains around Philippopolis; they became especially zealous adherents of the new faith.[65] Likewise under the Emperor Arcadius the Abbot Jonas of the monastery of Halmyrissus in the Thracian mountain range with his monks evangelized the inhabitants in the vicinity: his fight against pagan idols reminds one of the procedures employed earlier in Gaul by Martin of Tours.[66]

---

[59] W. M. Ramsay, "The Church of Lycaonia in the 4th Century," Luke the Physician (reprint ed. Grand Rapids 1956); also the text in H. Leclercq, "Lycaonie," DACL IX, 2787–2897. For Phrygia see V. Schultze, II, 397–477, and H. Leclercq, DACL XIV, 758–806.

[60] Thus the late Vita Parthenii (PG 114, 1348); on Chrysostom, see C. Kukula, Forschungen in Ephesos 1 (Vienna 1909), 269; F. Miltner, Ephesus, Stadt der Artemis und des Johannes (Vienna 1958).

[61] E. Euangelides, Ὁ χριστιανισμὸς ἐν ταῖς Κυκλάσι (Syros 1908); H. Balducci, Basiliche protocristiane e bizantine a Coo (Pavia 1936); A. M. Schneider, "Samos in frühchristlicher und byzantinischer Zeit," AM 54 (29), 97–141; "Chios," DHGE XII, 743–746; "Lesbos," DHGE XII, 573–575.

[62] Eusebius, Vita Constantini 4, 43; H. Leclercq, "Dobrogea," DACL IV, 1231–1260, and "Mésie," ibid. XI, 500–508.

For the Diocese of Macedonia as a whole, a clear missionary lag is established by a glance at the provinces of Asia Minor, despite the great tradition of the congregations founded there by Paul. To them, it is true, up to the Council of Nicaea had been added other communities in Larissa, Thebes, on Euboea, at Sparta, on Crete, in Nicopolis, in Epirus, as well as at Stobi and Skupi in Macedonia proper, but paganism was long able to maintain itself here, not only in the country, but also in cult centers such as Delphi and Eleusis and especially at Athens itself.[67] When Basil and Gregory Nazianzen studied at the Athenian school of higher learning around the mid-century, the city was still overwhelmingly pagan, the Panathenaea and the festivals in honor of Dionysus were still publicly celebrated, and Christian students were in the minority.[68] In an edict which forbade nocturnal sacrifices, Valentinian I exempted the mystery cults of Greece; as late as 375 people attributed to the sacrifices in honor of Achilles and Athena the fact that Athens and Attica were spared the earthquake that then hit southern Greece.[69] At Athens the esteem and influence of paganism were kept alive especially through the teachings of the later Platonic Academy, whose staunch rejection of Christianity was permitted up to the time of Justinian I.[70] Only Alaric's invasion of Greece in 395 and the gradual execution of the decrees of Theodosius I and his sons on the closing of the temples caused the decline and disappearance of the pagan cults. The transformation of many cult centers, including the complex of the Acropolis, into Christian churches in the first half of the fifth century seems to have succeeded without resistance.[71] The increase in the number of episcopal sees between the beginning of the fourth and the middle of the fifth century from between ten and fifteen to almost fifty makes equally clear that the break-through in the evangelization of Greece only occurred after 400.[72]

---

[63] K. Klein, "Gotenbischof Wulfilas als Bischof und Missionar," Festschr. F. Müller Stuttgart 1967), 84–107. On the ancient Christian inscriptions of Scythia, J. Barnea, Studi teologici 6 (1954), 65–112.

[64] Theodoret, HE 5, 30–312; Chrysostom, Ep. ad Olymp. 9, 5.

[65] Attested by Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 17 and 29, and Jerome, Ep. 60, 4; see D. M. Pippidi, "Niceta di Remesiana e le origini del cristianesimo dacoromano," RHistStudEst-Eur 33 (Bucharest 1946), 99–117.

[66] Callinic., Vita Hyp. 3, 1–12; 30–2.

[67] H. Leclercq, "Achaïe," DACL I, 323–340; Crete: DHGE XIII, 1033–1037; Delphi: E. Dyggve, CahArch 3 (1948), 9–28; Stobi: E. Kitzinger, DOP 3 (1946), 81–162; Saloniki: DACL XV, 648–673. Other literature in C. Andresen, Einführung in die christliche Archäologie (Göttingen 1971), pp. 37f.

For the Danubian provinces[73] of the Dioceses of Dacia and Illyricum, as well as for Dalmatia, a rather similar course of missionary work must be assumed. To the pre-Nicene congregations, such as Sirmium, Siscia, and Salona, whose existence is attested by the martyrdoms under Diocletian and Licinius, there were added in the course of the fourth century about a dozen more, among them Serdica, Naissus, Remesiana, Viminacium, Singidunum, Mursa, and Sabaria, from which the rural areas were gradually evangelized from the end of the century. The unstable political situation of the frontier areas and also the Arian controversy, which was spirited precisely in the central Balkans, often obstructed a continuous mission. And the remarkably tenacious persistence of pagan cults restricted the progress of christianization.[74] Nicetas of Remesiana, just mentioned, must be again singled out as a missionary in Dacia in the years before and after 400. The rich archeological finds in the Dalmatian coastal city of Salona[75] make possible today an instructive glimpse into the sometimes stormy progress of Christianity in a rather large urban settlement. Here, for example, the missionary work was begun c. 300 by merchants who, according to their grave inscriptions, probably came from Syria; according to the evidence of the first two bishops in the persecution of Diocletian, this young nucleus grew quickly into a flourishing community, as the basilicas, baptisteries, and burial grounds prove and the honorable treatment of the Bishop of Salona by Pope Zosimus in 418 confirms; it continued as a metropolitan see until the invasion of the Slavs at the beginning of the seventh century. From there were then evangelized the Dalmation interior and Albania just to the south.[76]

---

[68] Himerius, Or. 3, 53; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 35 and 43; see P. Gallay, La vie de s. Grégoire de Naziance (Lyon 1943), 36ff.

[69] Zosimus, Hist. nova 4, 3; 4, 18.

[70] E. Zeller, Philosophie der Griechen III, 2 (reprint ed. Hildesheim 1963), 687–931. Universal prohibition of all instruction by pagan teachers in 529: Cod. Just. 1, 11, 10; especially for Athens in Malalas, Chron., 18; see A. Cameron, "The Last Days of the Academy of Athens," ProcCambrPhilolSoc 195 (1969), 7–29.

[71] A. Frantz, "From Paganism to Christianity in Athens," DOP 19 (1965), 187–205.

[72] The bishoprics in 458: Mansi 8, 611f.

[73] J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'empire romain (Paris 1918); H. Leclercq, "Illyricum," DACL VII, 89–180; A. Lippold–E. Kirsten, "Donauprovinzen," RAC IV, 169–189, with map; ibid., 150.

[74] On Arianism in the Balkans, M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident (Paris 1967), 59–99. Pagan cults: RAC IV, 169f.

In Pannonia,[77] Sirmium, quite early important in ecclesiastical politics, was the base from which in the last quarter of the fourth century proceeded an intensive missionary work among the peasants; it had largely achieved its goal by the time of the Avar invasion. This applies also to the area of Vienna, which belonged to Pannonia Superior, as archeological discoveries in Klosterneuburg, Petronell (Carnuntum), Donnerskirchen, Au am Leithaberg, and statements of the Vita Severini show.[78] For the two provinces of Noricum[79] one must reckon with missionary undertakings which came from Aquileia to the south. Here too the pre-Constantinian starting-points, Lorch and Pettau, were further developed, and from the end of the fourth century the rural areas were included in the mission; in them destructions of pagan temples and the building of Christian churches, especially numerous in the interior of Noricum, can be demonstrated for this period.[80] Athanasius also mentions bishops from Noricum who approved the decrees issued in his favor by the Synod of Serdica, but he does not specify their sees.[81] But episcopal communities certainly arose in Roman times at Virunum (Maria Saal), Teurnia (St. Peter i. Holz), Aguntum (near Lienz), and Celeia (Cilli), while one may assume rather than exclude those for Juvavum (Salzburg) and Ovilava (Wels).[82] The efficacy of Saint Severinus in Noricum Ripense from 453 or 454 was no longer primarily missionary: it especially served charitable concerns, the organization of monasticism, and the peaceful association of Catholics and Arian Germans.[83]

---

[75] J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans la province romaine de Dalmatie (Paris 1908); Salona: E. Dyggve, History of Salonitan Christianity (Oslo 1951); E. Ceci, I monumenti cristiani di-Salona (Milan 1963).

[76] G. Stadtmüller, "Altheidnischer Volksglaube und Christianisierung in Albanien," OrChrP 20 (1954), 211–246.

[77] T. Nagy, Geschichte des Christentums in Pannonien, Diss. Pannon. 2, 12 (Budapest 1939); G. László, ZKG 59 (1940), 125–146. Episcopal list for Pannonia: DACL XIII, 1055–1057.

[78] E. K. Winter, "Wiener Frühchristentum," Jb Verein Gesch Wiens 12 (1955–56), 7–83; E. Swoboda, Carnuntum (Vienna, 3rd ed. 1958); A. A. Barb, Burgenl Heimatbl 15 (1953), 97–118; R. Noll, Das Leben des kl. Severin (Berlin, 3rd. ed. 1963).

[79] R. Noll, Frühes Christentum in Österreich (Vienna 1954); I. Zibermayr, Noricum, Bayern und Österreich (Horn, 2nd ed. 1956).

[80] R. Egger, Frühchristliche Kirchenbauten im südlichen Noricum (Vienna 1916); id., Teurnia (Klagenfurt, 5th ed. 1958); F. Miltner, Aguntum und Lavant (Baden 1957).

The christianization of Upper Italy and of the Raetian provinces (Italia Annonaria)[84] first began on a broad scale likewise only in the fourth century. To the three episcopal churches of Milan, Aquileia, and Ravenna, which certainly belong to the period before 300, were added around the turn of the century Padua, Verona, Brescia, and Bologna, while the other bishoprics north of the Apennines originated only in the later fourth and the fifth centuries. The missionary importance of Milan, the sole metropolis of the fourth century, is brought into clear relief by the other sees. It was determined by the city's commercial situation as the starting-point of important routes, especially to the Alpine passages, through its character as the Late Roman administrative center and imperial residence, but also through the great esteem which the bishops of the fourth century had won for the community, starting with Mirocles, who took part in the Synods of Rome (313) and Arles (314), to Eustorgius and Dionysius, firm anti-Arians, down to Ambrose.[85] Under the sure guidance of Ambrose, the Early Christian Church of Milan gained its strongest missionary efficacy. It was accomplished first by the preaching of the bishop, who over and over reminded the members of his congregation of their personal duty through a pure life to make the Christian faith attractive to pagans of their neighborhood; in addition, he appealed directly to the pagans and Jews among his audience and sought to clear up their reservations in regard to Christianity.[86] The impact of the Metropolitan Ambrose was determined just as strongly in relation to missionary activity. Personal relations between him and the Bishops of Como, whom he ordained, of Pavia (Ticinum) and Lodi (Laus Pompeia) make his collaboration in the erecting of these sees likely,[87] and his correspondence with the Bishops Constantius and Vigilius treated the missionary task of preaching or the problem of marriage between Christians and pagans.[88] Milan's missionary radiation is also made known by the fact that a series of Upper Italian bishops of the day came from the metropolis, such as Felix of Bologna, Theodore of Modena, and perhaps also Sabinus of Piacenza. In two important cases Ambrose finally assumed missionary tasks which extended far beyond his metropolitan province. When the Princess of the Marcomanni, Fritigil, asked him for more detailed information on the Christian faith, he wrote for her a catechism in the style of a letter.[89] In the great confrontation with the group that was trying to restore paganism at Rome, he was the preeminent speaker on the Catholic side. Similar missionary initiatives are not known in connection with any of the contemporary Roman bishops.

---

[81] Athanasius, Apol. 1, 36f.; Hist. ad mon. 28.

[82] M. Hell, "Spätantike Basilika in Juvavum," Mitteil Ges Salzb Landesk 107 (1967), 71–113.

[83] R. Noll, footnote 78 supra; E. K. Winter–Kl. Kramert, St. Severin, 2 vols. (Klosterneuburg 1958–59); A. Aign, Ostbair. Grenzmarken 3 (1959), 168–200; Kl. Gamber, RQ 65 (1970), 145–157.

[84] ECatt VII, 386ff., DACL VII, 1632–1747; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, 2 vols. (Faenza, 2nd ed., 1927); P. Kehr, Italia Pontificia (Berlin 1906ff.).

[85] Storia di Milano I–II (Milan 1953ff.); list of bishops: DACL VIII, 983–1002; Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate (Ravenna 1961), 47–139.

[86] J. Mesot, Die Heidenbekehrung bei Ambrosius von Mailand (Schöneck 1958), especially 55–66.

Christianity had still not penetrated c. 400 into the valleys of the southern Alpine strips, as, for example, in the Val di Non near Trent, where at that time three clerics, probably on instructions from Bishop Vigilus, first built a little church, from which they started their mission. They were killed by the pagan population when they refused, for themselves and their few converts, to take part in a pagan procession through the fields. But the death of the missionaries became the occasion for the quick conversion of the inhabitants of the valley.[90] Bishops Zeno of Verona (c. 362–372) Gaudentius of Brescia (d. before 406), and Maximus of Trier (c. 397–415) found themselves in a genuinely missionary situation. They saw the members of their communities not only threatened by still continuing pagan customs; there still existed all around them a considerable pagan minority, especially among the peasants, who were often carelessly left alone in their veneration of idols and their sacrificial rites.[91] Some came occasionally to hear the bishop's preaching; Maximus addressed them at the beginning of Lent and asked them to decide to accept Christianity.[92] Almost no information exists regarding the evangelization of Emilia and Romagna, which in the late fifth century belonged to the metropolitan province of Ravenna. Most of the bishops of the sees in this area are not known until the late fourth century. Their bishops tended in part toward Milan, especially so long as Ambrose was alive.[93] Christianity reached Ravenna by way of its port of Classis, which, however, was never the seat of a bishop.[94] In the rural parts of the bishoprics subject to Ravenna the mission hardly got under way to any great extent before the sixth century.[95]

---

[87] ECatt VI, 19–26; XII, 1234–1237; I, 655ff.

[88] Epp. 4, 2, 19.

[89] Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii, 36.

[90] Report of Vigilius of Trent: PL 13, 549–558, substantially confirmed by Gaudentius of Brescia, Tract. 17, and Maximus of Turin, Sermones 105–108. See I. Rogger, I martiri Anauniesi (Trent, 2nd ed. 1966), and C. E. Chaffin, Stpatr 10 (TU 107, Berlin 1970), 263–269.

[91] F. J. Dölger, "Christliche Grundbesitzer und heidnische Landarbeiter," AuC 6 (1950), 297–320, especially 305–309.

The way into the Val d'Aosta, to the Valais, and to the Raetian provinces was shown to the Christian mission by the Roman roads, which proceeded all together from Milan. While a bishop is not attested for Aosta (Augusta Praetoria) until the year 451, Bishop Theodore of Octodurum in the Valais took part in the Synods of Aquileia and Milan in 381 and 392–93 respectively; with his name is connected the start of the veneration of Saint Maurice and his companions at Agaunum.[96] After Geneva, which became a see at about the same time as Octodurum—its first bishop was Isaac—it is Gallic missionaries, from Lyon, who brought Christianity both into the Jura and to the civitas Helvetiorum, where Christians are demonstrable for the fourth and fifth centuries at Solothurn (cult of Ursus and Victor), Zürich (Felix and Regula), Zurzach (Verena), and Augst—places which belonged to the bishopric of Avenches (Aventicum), which was founded after 400.[97]

The name of a Bishop of Chur, capital of Raetia Prima, first appears in the acts of the Synod of Milan of 451, but c. 370 the missionary Gaudentius had worked in Bergell, south of the Septimer Pass,[98] where, however, the "Raetiarum episcopus" Valentine, who lived around the mid-fifth century and was buried at Mais near Meran, had his seat. Valentine's burial place presupposes the existence of Christians in the

---

[92] Maximus of Turin, Sermo 91, 2; Zeno of Verona, Tract. II, 1, 1.

[93] Thus Bologna, Piacenza, Modena, Imola, and others; see J. P. Palanque, S. Ambroise et l'empire romain (Paris 1933).

[94] W. F. Deichmann, "Zur ältesten Geschichte des Christentums in Ravenna," RivAC 42 (1966), 167–175.

[95] M. Mazzotti, "Le pievi del territorio ravennate (sec. VI–X)," Corsi di cultural sull'arte rav. 1 (1958), 63–83.

[96] P. Kehr, Italia Pontificia VI, 2, 157f. (Aosta); H. Büttner, Frühmittelalterliches Christentum und fränkischer Staat (Darmstadt 1961), 155–182 (see of Octodurum); P. Aebischer, "La christianisation du Valais," Valesia 17 (1962), 171–206.

[97] M. Besson, Nos origines chrétiennes (Geneva 1940); H. Büttner, op. cit., 162–167; O. Perler, ZSKG 51 (1957), 81–100 (baptistries); R. Laur-Belart, Die frühchristliche Kirche in Kaiseraugst (Basel 1967).

[98] H. Büttner, "Die Entstehung der Churer Bistumsgrenzen," op. cit., 109–154.

Vintschgau in the fifth century.[99] It is natural to assume it also for the Eisack Valley, even if the local bishopric of Säben (Sabiona) is first attested for the late sixth century.[100] By way of the Via Claudia (the Reschen-Scheideck Pass) the Christian message could arrive at the upper Inn Valley, where now excavations have brought to light church buildings of the fifth and sixth centuries in Pfaffenhofen near Telfs and in Imst.[101]

The pre-Constantinian community of Augsburg (Augusta Vindelicorum) grew so rapidly in the fourth and fifth centuries that here too one must reckon with an episcopal see in Roman times, whose existence is, moreover, made clear for the capital of Raetia Secunda. A great complex of former church buildings under the present Sankt Gallus Chapel with a basilica of three aisles and frescoes of a continuous illustration of the gospels point clearly to the previous existence of a cathedral.[102] The conjecture that Passau and Regensburg were also episcopal sees at that time is, however, not supported by favorable finds of that extent, even if the Vita Severini presupposes church buildings—basilica and baptistery—at Passau and an Early Christian cemeterial basilica could be proved in Regensburg.[103] That even in the Roman period Christianity penetrated into the rural parts of Raetia Secunda is shown by the remains of a church that was constructed in the last third of the fourth century on the Lorenzberg near Epfach (Abodiacum, rural district Schongau) and a note in the Vita Severini, according to which the saint came upon a wooden church in Quintanis (Künzing).[104]

In comparison with Milan, the missionary activity of Aquileia,[105] which was a metropolis as early as the fifth century, left little trace in the sources, but the evangelization of the immediate vicinity, hence of the Istrian Peninsula with the later sees of Trieste, Parenzo, Pola, and

---

[99] Eugippius, Vita Severini 40, 1. All suggestions—Augsburg, Chur, Passau—remain hypothetical.

[100] A. Sparber, Das Bistum Sabiona (Brixen 1942); id. Kirchengeschichte Tirols (Bozen 1957): Bishop Inguin c. 590.

[101] On Pfaffenhofen: G. Kaltenhauser, Veröffentl Museum Ferdinandeum Innsbruck 44 (1964), 75–98; on Imst: A. Wotschitzky, Öst Zf Kunst Denkmalpfl, 15 (1961), 97–104.

[102] F. Zoepfl, Das Bistum Augsburg . . . (Augsburg 1955), 1–20; P. Stockmeier, JbaltfairKG 23 (1963), 40–76, especially 60–64.

[103] Vita Severini, 22; M. Heuwieser, Geschichte des Bistums Passau I (Passau 1939); J. Sydow, RivAC 31 (Regensburg 1955), 75–96.

[104] On Epfach: J. Werner, Neue Ausgrabungen in Deutschland (Berlin 1958), 409–424; on Künzing (Quintanis): Vita Severini 15, 1.

[105] Episcopal list of Aquileia: DHGE III, 1114–1118; literature on the rich early Christian monuments in C. Andresen, Einführung in die christl. Archäologie (Göttingen 1971), 81f. On the rights of metropolitans: A. Villotta Rossi, Memorie storiche foroguiliesi 43 (1958–59), 61–143.

Pedena, and then of the district of Friuli, with Concordia Sagittaria, Altinum, Treviso, Feltre, and others, probably proceeded from Aguileia.[106] The same influence may be assumed also for Emona (Laibach), farther to the east, since the bishop of this city, Maximus, took part in the Synod of Aquileia of 381. However, paganism was still so self-assured here that as late as 388 its priests dared to greet the Emperor Theodosius in full official robes on the occasion of his passage to Italy.[107] Finally, the fact that the sees of southern Noricum still belonged to the ecclesiastical province of Aquileia indicates early missionary relations with Aquileia; in the sixth century it was decisively upheld by the Metropolitan of that province.[108]

The course of the evangelization of central and southern Italy is far less easily elucidated than that of Upper Italy because of the scanty sources. It is true that at the beginning of the fourth century there were at hand favorable starting-points for the Christian mission in Rome itself and in the communities of some commercial centers, such as Ostia, Terracina, Naples, Syracuse, and Cagliari, but precisely here it made a surprisingly slow advance. In the old imperial capital itself the number of Christians grew steadily throughout the entire fourth century, as the building of new titular churches under Popes Silvester I, Mark, Julius I, Liberius, and Damasus I makes clear,[109] but on the whole Rome long presented the image of a predominantly pagan city, whose highest official, the Praefectus Urbi, did not usually belong to the Christian Church. The sarcastic description of life in the city of Rome c. 350 by Ammianus Marcellinus, according to whom interest in the theater and games of chance stood in the foreground and megalomania and ostentation had caused the ancient Roman virtues to be forgotten, did not regard Christianity as worthy of mention in this context.[110] The pagan religious calendar continued in use, pagan temples were still constructed or restored—the temple of Apollo and that of Liber, of Silvanus, and the Porticus of the di consentes—the cults of Cybele and Mithras lasted into the 390s, the cult of Isis probably into the fifth century, and only toward the end of the fourth century did the problems of recruiting for the pagan priesthoods begin.[111] The Christian mission encountered a powerful obstacle in the stubborn and often bellicose rejection of the new religion by the majority of the aristocratic upper class, which was unwilling to sacrifice all that the ancient Roman tradition meant for it, carried out a varied propaganda for it, intervened at the court in Milan, and finally, in cooperation with the usurper Eugene, even tried a decision by battle.[112] Even the defeat thereby suffered did not mean the end of paganism in the city, since the government as late as the fifth century still took into consideration the susceptibilities of the reduced pagan senatorial aristocracy. However, a noteworthy missionary recruitment must be attributed to some ladies of this circle, who from 380 followed the ascetical movement in Christianity and through their activity assisted the upper class to a new understanding of their "Romanness," which now had a Christian basis.[113] Outside Rome also the long persistence of paganism is occasionally noticed, for example, in Ostia, where in 359 the Praefectus Urbi sacrificed to the Gemini, and in Capua, where as late as 387 cult processions were held according to the pagan calendar.[114] As in the North, here too the peasantry could be induced only with difficulty to abandon their ancestral religion. In 409 Honorius took steps against officials because they tolerated pagan cults; Benedict found on Montecassino a shrine of Apollo that was frequented by the people and holy groves in which they sacrificed to demons; and the Bishop of Fundi converted a temple of Apollo into a church as late as the mid-sixth century.[115]

---

[106] P. Paschini, Storia del Friuli I (Udine 3rd ed. 1953); G. Brusin, Archivio Veneto 76 (1965), 5–13; G. C. Menis, La basilica paleocristiana nelle settentrionali della metropoli d'Aquileia (Vatican City 1958).

[107] Acts of the Council of Aquileia, 76 (PL 16, 939); Paneg. lat. XII, 37, 4 (Emona).

[108] R. Noll, Frühes Christentum in Österreich (Vienna 1954), 69f.

[109] L. Duchesne, Histoire de l'Église II, 448ff.

[110] Ammianus Marcellinus, 14, 6, 2–26.

[111] J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'empire romain (Paris 1959), 635–652 (Lit.)

Of the approximately 200 sees which c. 600 are demonstrable for the territory of Italia Suburbicaria, hence also for Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, about half may have existed at the end of the fourth century, since a synod for this area under Pope Siricius in 381 counted some eighty participants; seventy-eight more bishoprics were founded in the fifth century, and the remainder only in the sixth century.[116] Latium and Campania displayed the greatest density of bishoprics, and then came Etruria and Umbria. It decreased to the east and southeast with the distance from Rome; of course, for this the demographic relationship must also be reckoned. A special importance for the evangelization of Campania may be assigned to the community of Naples.[117] A few bishoprics from the first half of the fourth century indicate a relatively early christianization of southern Etruria as far as Orvieto and Perugia, but Florence, Lucca, and Pisa also had episcopal congregations early.[118] Except for Spoleto, known from 353–54, the episcopal sees in northwestern Umbria are demonstrable with certainty only in the fifth and sixth centuries, and also for the sees of neighboring Picenum a sure tradition goes no further back.[119] In the case of the relatively early founding of Benevento at the beginning of the fourth century, Naples would seem to be the starting-point of the mission; however, as late as 375 the Roman Symmachus praises the pagan faction of the city for its receptiveness to the public interests.[120] Just as Syracuse was the entrance-gate for the gospel into Sicily, so it became also the point of departure for the evangelization of the interior, which proceeded rapidly after Constantine.[121] The shepherds of several episcopal communities stood on Athanasius's side in the confrontation concerning him at the mid-fourth century.[122] Letters from Leo I and Gelasius I were addressed to the entire episcopate of Sicily. In the correspondence of Gregory I the island seems to be entirely Christian, although there was still no episcopal see in the interior.[123] In the course of the fifth century the Christians on Malta received a bishop, as did those of the Liparaean Islands northeast of Messina around 500.[124] In Sardinia[125] the community of the port city of Cagliari was the bearer of the mission to the interior, which at first was concerned with the Roman colonies at Sulci, Forum Trajani, and Turris on the northwest coast. And "bishops of Sardinia" were also mentioned among the supporters of Athanasius,[126] but without precision of number and place-names. However, the northeast of the island still showed numerous pagans to the end of the sixth century, and Pope Gregory worked for their conversion.[127] A somewhat slower development must, finally, be assumed for Corsica,[128] whose bishops Athanasius also mentioned and who, according to Gennadius of Marseille, unanimously approved the Expositio catholicae fidei which Eugene of Carthage had composed in 483.[129] But in the time of Pope Gregory the mission experienced a setback, since some of the converts in the see of Aleria—there were in all five sees—reverted to paganism. The bishop was admonished by the Pope in regard to his missionary duty and received from him material help for his task.[130]

---

[112] H. Bloch, "The Pagan Revival in the West at the End of the Fourth Century," A. Momigliano, The Conflict between Paganism and Christianity (Oxford 1963), 193–218.

[113] P. Brown, Religion and Society in the Age of Augustine (London 1972), 161–185.

[114] Ammianus Marcellinus, 19, 10, 4. On Ostia see R. Meiggs, Ostia (1960). On Capua, H. Dessau, Inscriptiones sel., no. 4918.

[115] Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 46; Gregory I, Dialogues 2, 8; 3, 7.

[116] Synod of 386; Mansi 3, 678; D. Gordini, "Lo sviluppo cristiana (in Italia) dopo il IV secolo," J. Daniélou–H. Marrou, Nuova storia della Chiesa I (Turin 1970), 535ff.

[117] D. Mallardo, Storia antica della Chiesa di Napoli (Naples 1943); D. Ambrosi, Storia di Napoli I (1967), 625–759.

---

[118] A. Falcini, Le origini cristiane del cristianesimo nell'Etruria romana (Florence 1952); F. Baroni, "Le origini cristiane di Lucca," Atti RAc Lucchese Scienze Lett Arti, no. S.5 (1952), 47–89.

[119] A. Reggiani, Ricerche sulle origini del cristianesimo nell'alta valle del Tevere (Città di Castello 1960); L. Alleri, Piceno religioso nell'antichità (Ascoli Pic. 1940); S. Prete, AnGr 70 (1954), 73–77 (on Ancona and Fermo).

[120] Symmachus, Ep. 1, 3.

[121] G. Agnello, "Sicilia paleocristiana," Oikumene (Catania 1964), 579–591.

[122] Athanasius, Apol. contra Arianos, 36; Synod of Sicilian bishops c. 366: Mansi 3, 371.

[123] Leo I, Epp. 16 and 17; Gelasius I, Epp. 14 and 17.

[124] ECatt 7, 1925ff. (Malta); 7, 1404 (Lipari).

[125] F. Lanzoni, Archivio storico sardo, 1915.

[126] Mansi 3, 41; 3, 51.

[127] Gregory I, Ep. 4, 23–26.

[128] J. B. Casanova, Histoire de l'Église de Corse I (Zicavo 1931).

At the beginning of the fourth century a double missionary task was presented to the Church in the North African[131] part of the Roman Empire. One had to do with gaining the adherents of paganism, on the defensive, it is true, in most cities, but nevertheless still influential. Second, the evangelization of the population on the latifundia, especially of the western provinces, and of the tribes in the southern frontier district, had to be tackled systematically, if one wished the achievement thus far to continue. The implementation of this task was no doubt aggravated for decades and partly impeded by the long confrontation between the Donatist and the Catholic Churches, which on both sides tied down the best forces, even if both denominations constantly received adherents from paganism. The Catholics had a strong support in parts of the upper class, who enjoyed a great influence in intellectual life, in the administration, or through their economic position. The city of Timgad alone c. 360 still counted forty-seven pagan priests, and in the cities of Calama and Musti they were functioning even later. A pagan temple was erected at Lambaesis under Valentinian I, and the most important pagan cult center of the North African provinces, the magnificent temple of the Dea Caelestis at Carthage, remained opened until the last years of the fourth century.[132] The preaching and correspondence of Augustine afford a glimpse into the missionary understanding and the day-to-day missionary activity of a North African bishop in the first decades of the fifth century.[133] His preaching goes again and again into the objections of pagans of all classes, who indicated them as the reason for their rejection of Christianity; they were taken very seriously by him when they deserved to be, and he exposed their emptiness when they were accepted clichés.[134] He candidly admitted that the life of many a Christian meant a no less serious hindrance for the Christian mission than the split of the North African Church into two bitterly warring denominations.[135] Hence he called attention to the missionary duty of every individual Christian to lead his pagan acquaintances to Christ, as formerly the Samaritan woman had done with regard to her fellow townspeople.[136] Augustine also used his contacts by letter with pagans in order to present to the correspondent, whose influence on the peasantry he by no means underestimated,[137] in a manner mostly very courteous but in fact resolute, the inner emptiness of the pagan religion and the hopelessness of its current situation.[138]

---

[129] De script. eccl., PL 58, 1116f.

[130] Gregory I, Ep. 6, 62; i, 1.

[131] On the mission, A. Audollent, "Afrique," DHGE I, 810–861; A. M. Schneider, RAC I, 173–179; J. Mesnage, Le christianisme en Afrique I (Algiers–Paris 1914); G. Gagé, "Nouveaux aspects de l'Afrique chrétienne," Annales École Hautes Études Gand 1 (1937), 181–230. On paganism, G. Charles-Picard, Les religions de l'Afrique antique (Paris 1954); id. La Carthage de s. Augustin (Paris 1965); M. Leglay, Les religions orientales dans l'Afrique ancienne (Algiers 1956).

[132] J. Geffcken, Der Ausgang des griechisch-römischen Heidentums (Heidelberg, 2nd ed. 1929), 102f., 144.

[133] G. Walter, Die Heidenmission nach der Lehre des hl. Augustinus (Münster 1921); G. Metzger, Kirche und Mission in den Briefen Augustins (Gütersloh 1936).

The further collapse of North African paganism was hastened by the legislation introduced by Theodosius and continued by Honorius, which here too decreed the closing of the temples, forbade public worship, had cult images and statues removed from the temples, and had temple property seized, but did not aim to trouble personally pagans who lived peaceably.[139] The often careless execution of these laws induced the episcopal Synod of Carthage of 401 twice to ask the state officials for a stricter intervention and to destroy the pagan shrines still existing in the countryside, even in remote districts, especially since they were lacking in artistic value. But not until 407 did General Stilicho issue an edict which corresponded to some extent with such desires.[140] In consequence of the now increasing State pressure there were bloody encounters between pagans and Christians, as at Sufetula and Calama, where both sides broke the law.[141] In 407 the Christians were permitted to make use of the temple of the Dea Caelestis at Carthage, which had been closed earlier, and Bishop Aurelius pointedly had his cathedra located on the place occupied by the statue of the pagan goddess. Some pagans even now still clung to prophecies which promised the imminent collapse of the Christian world in North Africa;

---

[134] P. Courcelle, "Propos antichrétiens rapportés par s. Augustin," RechAug 1 (Paris 1958), 149–186.

[135] Serm. 5, 8; 47, 28. The alibi for the pagans: "ecce quales sunt Christiani": Enarr. in ps. 70, hom. 1, 17, 10.

[136] In Jo. ev. tr. 15, 33; sermo 25, 8 Denis.

[137] In Enarr. in ps. 54, 13, he mentions the often heard expression: "If that man were also a Christian, no one would remain a pagan."

[138] Epp. 16–17; 233–234; 132; 135–137; 90–91; 232; see V. Capánaga, "Intelectuales paganos del siglo V frente al misterio di Cristo," Oikumene II (Catania 1964), 439–454.

[139] Cod. Theod. 16, 10, 13, 15–20.

[140] Cod. can. Eccl. Afr., canons 58 and 84; Constit. Sirm. 12.

[141] Augustine, Epp. 50; 91, 8; Ep. 62, 17f., disapproves of an unauthorized procedure by Christian groups; see also Ep. 47, 3.

eventually all they could do was to hide the images of the gods in caves and ravines and practice their worship underground.[142]

All too meager are the reports on the Christian mission among the non-Roman population of the frontier zone of North Africa. Augustine knew that even c. 400 there "were numerous tribes in Africa to whom the gospel has not yet been preached;" although he had also heard of conversions of individual members of a tribe. Here, however, he did not intervene personally, but expected their full conversion in the future.[143] But there is evidence that evangelization was begun here even before the invasion of the Vandals. The tribe of the Arzuges is repeatedly mentioned; its area of settlement is thought to have been on the southern frontier area of Byzacena and Numidia.[144] For example, a Catholic and a Donatist bishop from the "country of the Arzuges" took part in the religious discussion at Carthage in 411, and in 419 Bishop Aurelius addressed a circular to the bishops in the South, among whom he counted those residing in the mountain ranges of Byzacena and of Arzugitania.[145] Archeological discoveries, whose dating, it is true, remains uncertain, show that the mission had established even rural settlements in the western provinces of Mauretania Caesariensis and Tingitana.[146] A vivid example of a spontaneous mission beyond the frontier of Roman territory is handed down by Victor of Vita.[147] Four Christian slaves whom the Vandal King Gaiseric had given to a pagan tribal chieftain in the desert of Caprapicti immediately undertook missionary work there and later, through envoys, requested from a bishop in Roman territory a priest who would baptize the newly converted and build a church. Such missionary activity, of course, was not possible during the century of Vandal domination in the area controlled by them. Systematic missionary work was resumed only after the conquest of North Africa by the Byzantines in 533. There then occurred the conversion of the Gadabitani in the vicinity of Leptis Magna, of the Garamantes in the Fezzan and perhaps of the Maccurites in Mauretania, of which Procopius and John of Biclar report.[148]

The idea seems problematic that the North African Church failed to translate the Bible and the liturgy into the Berber and/or the Phoenician language and by making use of elements of the native culture to create a North African national Church, which would then have survived the domination of Islam. Apart from the still open linguistic questions about the state of development of Phoenician at this time, it is noteworthy that even the Donatists and the equally active evangelizing Manichaeans for their part made no such attempt. It seems rather that at the climax of the Christian mission the Latin provincial culture[149] was eagerly accepted by the inhabitants together with Christianity. For the development of an indigenous Christianity a greater time-span would probably have been required than was at the disposal of the Christian mission up to the Vandal invasion.[150]

---

[142] Augustine, Enarr in ps. 40, 1, 57; in ps. 70, II, 4, 30; Quodvultdeus, De promiss. 3, 44–45 (eyewitness report on the temple of the Dea Caelestis).

[143] Epp. 199, 46; 93, 24.

[144] A. Audollent, CRAIBL (1942), 202–215.

[145] Gesta Coll. I, 207 (SChr 195, 894f.); letter of Aurelius: Mansi 4, 447.

[146] A. Berthier (ed.), Les vestiges du christianisme antique dans la Numidie centrale (Algiers 1943); R. Thouvenot, "Les origines chrétiennes en Mauretanie Tingitane," Rea 71 (1969), 354–378.

[147] Hist. pers. Afr. prov. I, 35–37.

[148] Procopius, De. aedif. 6, 4, 12; John of Biclar, Chron. min. II, 212 and 512; see Ch. Diehl, L'Afrique byzantine (Paris 1898), 327f.

In the history of the evangelization of Gaul[151] the fourth century presents especially the phase in which Christianity established itself, in a virtually uninterrupted growth, in most cities of the Gallic provinces. At the first council on Gallic soil, the Synod of Arles in 314, sixteen Gallic sees were represented, and the existence at this period of ten others can be accepted with some certainty. The larger number of these bishoprics was in southern Gaul,[152] where from the pre-Constantinian center, Lyon, a mission route upward through the Rhone Valley to the Rhine and into Belgica was marked off. Scarcely thirty years later Athanasius counted thirty-four Gallic bishops as his adherents,[153] from the mid-century the bishoprics increased rapidly in the West and Northwest, and about a hundred years after the Synod of Arles there were episcopal congregations in almost all the more than 100 civitates of Gaul, mostly in the principal localities. This means that in all these cities a considerable part of the inhabitants professed the Christian faith. Since the metropolitan organization also established itself in the first decades of the fifth century, the basic ecclesiastical constitution of Gaul was complete soon after 390.[154] By whom and with what methods this urban evangelization occurred in each case escapes us to a great extent.

---

[149] G. Charles-Picard, Nordafrika und die Römer (Stuttgart 1962).

[150] See P. Brown, Religion and Society in the Age of Augustine (London 1972), 279–300.

[151] E. Demougeot, Gallia I: RAC VIII, 822–927. Basic is L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule I–III (Paris, 1899–1915). Also E. Mâle, La fin du paganisme en Gaule et les plus anciennes basiliques chrétiennes (Paris 1950); E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine I (2nd ed.), II (2nd ed.), III (Paris 1964–66).

[152] J. R. Palanque, Annales Univ Montpellier 1943, 177–183; Provence historique (1951), 105–143 (early sees in Narbonensis and Provence).

[153] Contra Arian. 50. The details of the list of participants of an alleged Synod of Cologne of 346 agree in part with this.

[154] E. Griffe, I (2nd ed.), 332–336; M. Moreau, Rome et le christianisme dans la région rhénane (Paris 1963); W. Neuss, Geschichte des Erzbistums Köln I (Cologne 1964), 21–108; E. de Moreau, L'Église en Belgique I (2nd ed. Brussels 1947), 23–48.

The christianization of the peasantry of Gaul, on the other hand, began for the most part only in the last decades of the fourth century and reached its climax only in the fifth century. Since it was, first of all, the duty of the bishop in the territory of a civitas, for a time it remained dependent on the rise of the individual see, and practically and in its efficacy on the initiative of its leader, so that in a glance at the whole of Gaul one must reckon with a very much differentiated process. Except for a few allusions to a rural mission in the early period,[155] the sources mention Martin of Tours (d. 397) and Victricius of Rouen (d. c. 407) as the first bishops who devoted themselves systematically to the mission in the countryside, pushing on, each in his own bishopric and occasionally beyond its boundaries. According to the report of Sulpicius Severus on Martin's work for the conversio paganorum, certainly literary and hagiographical in composition, the peasants of the middle Loire at that time lived totally in the ancestral world of their Celtic and slightly Romanized customs of field-processions, and of the cult of trees and springs, with the unpretentious shrines which at first they staunchly defended when the bishop of the Christians wanted to prove by word and deed the powerlessness of their gods.[156] After the often forcible destruction of their shrines, at times a rather large part of the population was converted to the mightier God of the Christians, and then Martin erected in their vicus a chapel or small monastery in place of the previous small pagan temple in the field; he also appointed clerics for the further care of the new converts and hence called into being the first cells of Christian worship in the countryside.[157] When Paulinus of Nola compared the somewhat younger Victricius to the Bishop of Tours, he was including in this high praise also his missionary work, which extended beyond his see of Rouen northward into the territory of the Nervii and Morini to the channel coast, which had still scarcely been touched by Christianity. He also established churches and monasteries in larger places (oppida), on islands, and in remote forest districts.[158] What [155] The diaconi urbici mentioned by the Synod of Arles in canon 18 probably presuppose rural deacons also.

---

[156] Sulpicius Severus, Vita s. Martini, 12–15; see the commentary by J. Fontaine, SChr. 134 (1968), 713–807. Number of Christians in the country, Vita 13, 9: "pauci admodum, immo paene nulli."

[157] Clerics in rural churches: Sulpicius Severus, Dial. 3, 8, 5, and Ep. 3, 6. Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. 10, 13, 3, names six vici in which Martin had churches built. A striking decline in the use of pagan shrines or their destruction can be demonstrated for this time; see E. Mâle, op. cit., 37–40, and M. Moreau, Rome et le christianisme dans la région rhénane, 117–120.

[158] Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 18, 4–5; Victricius, De laude sanctorum 1; see D. A. Stracke, Bijdragen tot de geschiedenis . . . van Brabant 13 (1961), 5–30; R. Herval, Origines chrétiennes. La II^e^ Lyonnaise gallo-romaine (Paris 1966).

Gregory of Tours reported of his contemporary, Bishop Simplicius of Autun, recalls Martin's missionary method. Simplicius too intervened to stop a procession of farmers in the land of the Aedui, who were carrying a statue of Cybele Berecynthia through their fields and vineyards. He too gained some for Christianity.[159] At times churches arose outside the cities also, in Roman camps, for example, at Carcassonne and Uzès in Narbonnensis and in Arlon in Belgica Prima, which then became ecclesiastical meeting-places for the people of the vicinity. The mission in the countryside experienced a powerful advance also from Christian landowners, for example, from Paulinus of Nola and Sulpicius Severus, who had chapels and oratories erected on their land and, often encouraged in this by the bishops, also exerted themselves for the conversion of their peasants. Such churches on a villa are demonstrable as especially numerous in southern Gaul for the fifth and sixth centuries, since the Arian Burgundians and Visigoths for the most part respected the Catholics' freedom of worship. Synodal legislation concerned itself to an ever greater extent with this development, reserved to the bishops the supervision of the clergy in these at first private churches, but conceded the population of the vicinity attendance at Mass in them, except on the solemnities of the Church year. From such starts grew many of the later parishes.[160] And for the Gallic rural mission the saying of Augustine was pertinent: that it was an especially difficult task to vanquish paganism in the hearts of new converts.[161] Christian preaching and synods had the opportunity, even far into the sixth century, to wrestle with a tenacious holding on to pagan custom.[162]

The course of the evangelization of the Iberian Peninsula[163] in the fourth and fifth centuries can be determined only in the barest outlines. The lists of participants in the Synods of Elvira (between 306 and 314) and Arles (314) and some further indications make clear that at the beginning of Constantine's sole rule Christianity had its center of gravity in Baetica and southern Tarraconensis, since the majority of the Spanish members of the synods came from some forty places situated in these provinces.[164] The decrees of Elvira, moreover, give acquaintance with a Christianity which still needed various forms of missionary work for its deepening; apparently there was a definite desire to take up this task.[165] With the flowering of a noteworthy Christian literature, the spread of monasticism, the struggle over Priscillianism, and the interest which Rome showed in the Spanish Church, it becomes understandable that in the course of the century this Church gained in expansion and in inner quality. At the Synods of Zaragoza and Toledo, in 380 and 400 respectively, as well as in the letters of Popes Siricius and Innocent I to Spanish bishops, paganism in fact scarcely plays any role. That the mission took the route from the cities on the Spanish east coast into the interior can be determined to a degree from the churches and cemeteries with their sarcophagi, which archeological research could demonstrate above all in the present provinces of Barcelona, Gerona, Tarragona, Valencia, Alicante, and Murcía.[166] Occasionally, inscriptions of the fourth and fifth centuries supply a glimpse of the gradual expansion of Christianity in the countryside.[167] As in Gaul, so also on the Iberian Peninsula Christian churches on the villae of owners of latifundia became of importance for the origin of Christian congregations in the country. The Balearic Islands were affected very early by missionary work, and the majority of their inhabitants professed Christianity before the Vandal invasion.[168] However, one must reckon with a very different compactness of evangelization in the individual districts of Spain, especially with a sharp decline from east to west and northwest respectively. That the invasion of the Alans, Vandals, and Sueves at the beginning of the fifth century became a hindrance for an intensive missionary preaching in the affected parts cannot be doubted. Only the almost total lack of synodal activity throughout the fifth century speaks clearly here. Especially in the land of the Basques and in Cantabria can the mission be found first in an initial stage c. 400, since here no bishoprics are demonstrable even for the period of Visigothic rule.[169] Relatively slight also was the density of sees in the area of the source of the Tajo, west from Toledo, south of the middle Júcar (the present province of Albacete), and in the direction of Lusitania. Hence mission work among the peasants was by no means everywhere completed even in the Visigothic period: Bishops Martin of Braga and Polemius of Astorga were powerfully claimed by it even in the late sixth century,[170] and the majority of the parishes arose only from this time on.[171]

---

[159] Gregory of Tours, In gloria confessorum 76.

[160] E. Griffe, III, 260–298; Visitation by bishops: Sulpicius Severus, Ep. 1, 10; Sidonius Apollinaris, Ep. 9, 16.

[161] Augustine, Enarr. in ps. 80, 14: magnum opus est intus haec idola frangere.

[162] Cf., for example, Caesarius of Arles, Serm. 13, 14, 53–55. Canon 2 of the so-called Council of Arles II (c. 442–508) threatened sanctions against a bishop who did not energetically intervene against such abuses.

[163] J. F. Alonso, "Espagne," DHGE XV, 892–908 (Lit.); Z. García Villada, Historia eclesiástica de España I, 2 (Madrid 1929); M. Torres–R. Menéndez Pidal, Historia de España II (Madrid, 3rd ed. 1962), 447–486.

[164] See Atlas Zur Kirchengeschichte (Freiburg 1970), Map 4.

---

[165] On the Synod of Elvira: A. C. Vega, España Sagrada, 53–54 (Madrid 1961), 331–367; J. Gaudemet, DHGE XV (1963), 317–348.

[166] P. de Palol, Arqueologia cristiana de España Romana (Madrid 1967, with the literature); D. Iturgaiz, "Baptisteros de Hispania," AST 40 (1967), 209–295.

[167] J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda (Barcelona, 2nd ed. 1969), nos. 1–3, 56, 87–88, 114–115, 120, 139–141, 148, 268, 363, 367, 525–527, 539, 546, 557. Galicia in the northwest knew inscriptions only from the sixth century.

[168] P. de Paloe, op. cit., 3–38; C. Veny, "Early Christianity in the Balearic Islands," Classica folia 21 (1967), 210–233.

[169] J. González Echegaray, Orígines del cristianesimo en Cantabria (Santander 1969).

In the political Diocese of Britannia[172] also there existed at the beginning of the fourth century a certain ecclesiastical organization, as the participation of the Bishops of York, London, Lincoln or Colchester, and perhaps also the representative of a fourth see—possibly Cirencester—at the Synod of Arles proves.[173] The number of sees continued to grow up to the Synod of Rimini (359),[174] but the Christians in Roman Britain long stood in the shadow of paganism, whose shrines in the larger places were still visited till the end of the century, and in the rural areas into the fifth century. Excavations at villae in Lullingstone (Kent) and Hilton St. Mary (Dorset) with their private churches reveal that the Christian religion also found entry into the families of well-to-do landowners.[175] But to what extent the peasants as a whole accepted it cannot be determined. For a consolidation of the Church c. 400 and later, especially in the upper class, we have the witness of lively theological discussions in Britain, which motivated the visit of the Gallic Bishops Victricius of Rouen (c. 395) and Germain of Auxerre (429 and perhaps again c. 445); on this occasion Germain also preached to the Christian peasants.[176] That Christian communities also existed in the western and northern frontier zones of Roman Britain is certain: from them came the two missionaries, Patrick and Ninian, for whom the conversion of the Irish and the Picts became their lifework. In these areas Christianity of a Roman stamp could continue without a break,[177] whereas in the southeast and center of the island it was subjected to serious impediments when c. 450 the still pagan tribes of Jutes, Angles, and Saxons invaded in several waves and made themselves rulers of these territories. From the almost complete silence of the sources for this time, however, one may not infer a total extinction of Christian life in the Anglo-Saxon part of the island.

---

[170] Martin of Braga wrote De correctione rusticorum for Polemius. See S. McKenna, Paganism and Pagan Survivals in Spain up to the Fall of the Visigothic Kingdom (Washington 1938).

[171] J. F. Alonso, La cura pastoral en la España romanovisigoda (Rome 1955), 201–209.

[172] E. Kirsten, "Britannia," RAC II, 603–611; W. C. H. Frend, "The Christianization of Roman Britain," M. W. Barley–R. P. C. Hanson, Christianity in Britain 300–700 (Leicester 1968), 37–49, with the literature.

[173] J. G. Mann, Antiquity 35 (1961), 316–320.

[174] Sulpicius Severus, Chron. 2, 41.

[175] On the persistence of paganism: W. C. H. Frend, JournBritArchAssoc 18 (1955), 1–19; M. J. T. Lewis, Temples in Roman Britain (Cambridge 1966). On the early Christian monuments: J. M. C. Toynbee, JournBritArchAssoc 16 (1953), 1–24; Ch. Thomas, Britain and Ireland in Early Christian Times (London 1971).

[176] Victricius, De laude sanct. 1, 2; Prosper, Chron. ad an. 429; Constantius, Vita s. Germani 3, 12–20, 5, 25–28; see J. Evans, "St. Germanus in Britain," Archeologia Cantiana 80 (1965), 175–185.

[177] A. C. Thomas, "The Evidence from North Britain," and W. H. Davies, "The Church in Wales," Barley–Hanson, op. cit., 93–121, 131–150.

The presentation thus far makes clear that the evangelization of the peoples of the Empire in the fourth and fifth centuries was by no means a uniformly developing process in all parts of the Empire; hence the usual wholesale judgment that immediately after Constantine's turning to Christianity the pagan masses poured into the Church requires a substantial differentiation. It must first be established that in the missionary progress of this epoch several waves are apparent. The freedom of worship granted by Constantine first revealed the real situation: the number of Christians had grown so strongly, especially in the second half of the third century, that in some urban congregations larger church buildings were necessary in order to hold the believers who were now able openly to profess their Christianity. After that, especially in the East, an active missionary work had begun, which brought to the Church a steady, though not spectacular, growth.[178] Then, after the defeat of the anti-Emperor Magnentius (351–53), Christianity gained ground considerably in the cities of the western provinces. The failure of the Emperor Julian's effort at restoration introduced the concluding phase in the East, but also promoted the mission in the West, as Hilary of Poitiers emphasizes.[179] Whereas for Chrysostom the end of paganism in the eastern part of the Empire, apart from a few frontier places, was a generally acknowledged fact, Jerome, Gaudentius of Brescia, Maximus of Turin, and others saw the period of the influx of the masses in the West only in the Theodosian age.[180] The striking temporary and occasionally even qualitative lag in the peasantry of the Balkans, Italy, Gaul, and Spain in comparison to the East must have had an essential cause in the decline of civilization which existed precisely here between East and West, and which, for its part, was again conditioned by the different demographic situation. The greater population density of the eastern provinces with their many cities and their higher cultural level offered the Christian mission in the East the incomparably more favorable presuppositions also for the rural mission.

---

[178] The Expositio totius mundi et gentium (ed. J. Rougé, SChr 124, Paris 1966), which did not exist before 359, permits one to assume a still quite strong paganism.

[179] Hilary of Poitiers, Tract. in ps 67, 20.

[180] Jerome, Epp. 69, 3; 107, 2; Gaudentius of Brixen, Sermo 8, 25; Sulpicius Severus, Chron. 2, 33; Maximus of Turin, Sermo 99, 2; Chrysostom, In Mt. hom. 1, 5.

Christianity was able at this period to get a foothold also on the other side of the Empire's frontiers, especially among the peoples along its eastern boundary. Jerome was even of the opinion that the moment had already come when the gospel had been proclaimed to all peoples, and Augustine regarded a conversion of the as yet still pagan peoples as possible in the next generation. More important than the all too optimistic estimation of the missionary present and future was the fact that the "Church of the Empire," following the completion of evangelization in the interior, now became more keenly aware than earlier of the duty of evangelizing the "barbarians" also.[181]

2. Questions of Missionary Method

THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE MISSIONARY IDEA AND MISSIONARY WORK. More sharply than in the pre-Constantinian epoch the local episcopal church now appeared in focus as the real bearer of the missionary idea and of the day-to-day mission work. The community was and remained the foundation without which the direct goal of the mission could not be realized: to win for the Christian faith the non-Christians living in the district and to confirm them in the new faith after their reception into the ecclesiastical community. In this regard, clergy and laity were under the same obligation, even if they fulfilled it with a differing importance and in distinct roles. On the bishop, as the responsible head of the community, devolved the full direction of mission work, its coordination and supervision, and on his initiative or his failure depended to a great extent the quality of the missionary exertions of a community. He and the clergy delegated by him were above all responsible for the organizing and implementation of the catechumenate, and hence the examination and admission of candidates for baptism, the instruction of the catechumens, the solemn baptismal catechesis, and the continued pastoral care of the neophytes.[182] In the contemporary situation the total religious life of the congregation had a missionary orientation—liturgy, piety, charitable activity, and monasticism had their missionary function within the community. This is true also of the normal preaching of the faith, which again and again addressed also the non-Christians directly or indirectly and sought their admission to the community of Christians.[183] The great importance which belonged to the missionary task of the laity is clear in the extant sermons of the day. Many preachers enjoined not only the general missionary obligation of the laity: they especially stressed the eminent role of an exemplary conduct for the recruiting impact of the Christian message on the pagans; Chrysostom was especially insistent and precise in this regard. It distressed him that now, since the great majority had converted to Christianity—he is speaking of Antioch—scarcely any conversions of the pagan minority are to be recorded. But for him it meant that "there would be no more pagans, if we were true Christians."[184] In the East, as in the West, people deplored the lack of missionary zeal among the owners of latifundia, who did not take the pains to get teachers and priests for their workers or want to erect chapels for them, but instead had expensive baths constructed for themselves.[185] Nevertheless, many lay persons must have taken their missionary obligation seriously, for without their help within the community, without that of the unknown merchants, travelers, officials, soldiers, and sailors who did spontaneous missionary work everywhere in the Empire when an opportunity offered itself, the total effect of the mission would not have been achieved; hence the local episcopal churches essentially supported the missionary work of the "Church of the Empire."

---

[181] Jerome, Ep. 107, 2; In Mt 24, 14. Augustine, Epp. 197, 4; 199, 46. Cf. J. Vogt, Kulturwelt und Barbaren (Mainz 1967), 49ff.

[182] On the catechesis of the catechumenate see chap. 18.

[183] Especially Chrysostom, Basil, Ambrose, Zeno of Verona, Maximus of Turin, and Augustine. Sermons for an exclusively pagan audience are not extant.

Examples such as that of Martin of Tours and of Victricius of Rouen show that bishops also felt responsible for the mission beyond the bounds of their congregations. More and more the metropolitans and synods and at times the heads of the developing patriarchates attended to missionary duties in the sphere of their competence.[186] Attention has already been directed to the impact of Basil in the East and of Ambrose in the West, likewise to the interest of Juvenal of Jerusalem for the mission among the Arab nomads and the superregional mission activity of Athanasius, who just because of his missionary successes among the pagans was sent into exile by the Emperor Julian.[187] In a unique manner Chrysostom, as Bishop of Constantinople, looked after the mission among the Goths and in Phoenicia: his correspondence with the missionaries working there—the priests John, Basil, Nicholas, and the monks Gerontius, Simeon, and Mari—sought to keep their missionary zeal alive. Gifts, which were intended for him in his exile were sent on to them by him. When some missionaries were killed by the local pagans and others were mistreated, he at once sent the priest Rufinus to the mission area and had every possible assistance promised, including new coworkers, if this should be necessary.[188] The missionary initiatives of the Bishop of Rome for his metropolitan area of Italia Suburbicaria may also be assumed, even if they appear in the written sources relatively late. The first mention of the evangelizing work of a Roman Bishop extending to an area remote from his immediate territory occurs under Pope Celestine I, who in 431 sent the former deacon Palladius as missionary bishop to Ireland. But Gregory I was probably the first missionary Pope in the full sense.[189]

---

[184] In ep. I ad Tim., hom. 10, 3: οὐδεις ἀν ἦν "Ελλην, εἰ ἡμεῖς ἤμεν Χριστιανοὶ ὡς ἔδει; also In ep. I ad Cor., hom. 3, 5; In illud "Salutate Priscillam" hom. 2, 1. For Ambrose and Augustine see supra, footnotes 88 and 135; Augustine, Sermo 25, 8 Denis: invitation to the laity: "adducite ad lavacrum baptismatis quos potestis."

[185] Chrysostom, In Act. hom. 18, 4–5; Zeno of Verona, Tract. I, 15, 6; Gaudentius of Brixen, Tract. 1, 3, 28; Maximus of Turin, Tract. 91, 106–108.

[186] See supra, footnote 162.

[187] Sozomen, HE 5, 15, 1.

Beside the evangelization conducted by the local congregation and the agents of the ecclesiastical provinces there appeared, in increasing measure, the more spontaneous and individual work of monasticism, which became a first-rate mission factor, especially in the eastern part of the Empire and its border areas.[190] In all countries and provinces in which cenobites and hermits had centers, monks appeared as missionaries, some in the vicinity of monastery and hermit's cell, others as itinerant preachers. They followed neither a fixed missionary program nor a uniform method, but adapted themselves to the situation of the moment. Sometimes the confidential conversation was preferred, then the mere reading of Scripture with a brief explanation, then again preaching to a village community, and even at times discussion with an educated pagan. That many a one overestimated his abilities in this regard appears from the warnings of Ammonas and Evagrius Ponticus that at first one should prepare in solitude for missionary preaching.[191] Others gained access to the pagans when they defended them against the encroachments of tax collectors or brought them aid in their material needs. Among some monastic missionaries there persisted the inclination to show themselves as fighters against demons by forcible destruction of pagan shrines, and for this they were not unwilling to ask the aid of state officials. Often the building of a church or the founding of a monastery was intended to help assure the first missionary success. The missionary activity established by the early monasticism of the East was continued with great zeal and notable success by its Nestorian and Monophysite successors.[192]

---

[188] Chrysostom, Epp. 21, 28, 21, 53–55, 69, 123, 126, 175, 221.

[189] Prosper, Chron. ad an. 431. A. Seumois, La papauté et les missions au cours des six premières siècles (Louvain 1953) exaggerates the role of the papacy in this period. R. A. Markus, "Gregory the Great and a Papal Missionary Strategy," StChH 6 (1970), 29–38.

[190] I. Auf der Maur, "Das alte Mönchtum und die Glaubensverkündigung," NZM 18 (1962), 275–288; A. Yannoulatos, "Monks and Mission in the Eastern Church during the fourth Century," IRM 58 (1969), 208–226.

[191] Ammonas, Ep. 1; Evagrius Ponticus, Ep. 58; Antirrh. 7, 1.

In contrast to the pre-Constantinian mission, the period treated here knew in increasing measure, therefore, the "full-time missionary"; hence, all lay persons, clerics, and monks who left their home community or monastery to devote years and decades of their life to the conversion chiefly of the peasantry of the imperial provinces or of individual tribes beyond the imperial frontiers.[193] They usually selected their own mission field, since no central ecclesiastical mission in the modern sense existed as yet, to train missionaries and set up a well-developed mission plan.

The mission of the fourth and fifth centuries also did not yet make use of a special mission school, although the freedom of preaching offered the possibility for this. The Christianity of the period did not even know any specifically Christian school, but utilized further the educational possibilities at hand.[194] The notion of bringing to the peasantry, for example, also profane knowledge together with the faith did not come within the contemporary missionary's line of vision.

One must not esteem too highly the missionary propaganda effect which proceeded from the Christian contribution to the contemporary literary confrontation between Christian and pagan, since at times only a small minority took part in it. Many a pagan who read a Christian apologist may have been influenced by the argument from the victory of the Christian God over the pagan idols, but the often immoderately triumphalist tone of this literature, as in Lactantius, De mortibus persecutorum, its insulting aggressiveness against the worship of the gods, and the intolerance in regard to its adherents, as in the case of Firmicus Maternus, De errore profanarum religionum, must rather have repelled than gained adherents.[195] The later publications on this theme—one thinks of Theodoret of Cyrrhus, of the Dialogue between Zachaeus and Apollonius, and especially of Augustine's Civitas Dei—are quite removed from such a tone, but they did not appear until critical actuality no longer pertained to their view of the contemporary missionary situation.[196]

---

[192] O. Hendriks, "L'activité apostolique du monachisme monophysite et nestorien," PrOrChr 10 (1960), 3–25, 97–113.

[193] K. Holl, "Die Missionsmethode der alten und der mittelalterlichen Kirche," Ges. Aufs. III (Tubingen 1928), 117–129, limits his thesis that the ancient Church did not know the professional missionary practically to the pre-Constantinian period.

[194] Only in Armenia in some monasteries do there appear to have been schools in the service of the mission; cf. I. Auf der Maur, op. cit., 284, footnote 97. Footnote 8 supra mentions a case that remains unique.

[195] Cf. J. R. Laurin, Orientations maîtresses des apologistes chrétiens de 270–361 (Rome 1954), 307–445; J. Vogt, "Toleranz und Intoleranz im constantinischen Zeitalter: der Weg der lateinischen Apologetik," Saeculum 19 (1968), 344–361, especially 350ff.

STATE AND MISSION. The attitude of the Emperor Constantine[197] in this question was still basically determined by the conviction that State compulsion through legal sanctions was to be rejected vis-à-vis non-Christians. Hence he held that only a propaganda for the Christian faith was defensible which respected freedom of conscience and expected the religious unity of the Empire from the power of conviction inherent in the Christian message. Individual measures, such as the prohibition, conditioned by political considerations, of private auspices in 319 or the attack on the cult of Aphrodite at Hierapolis and the closing of the temple of Asclepius at Aegae, let him positively maintain personal toleration in regard to the conviction of individual pagans. His emphatic favoring of the Church in many areas, of course, makes clear that the Christian mission could be sure of his benevolence.

This relative toleration was abandoned by Constantine's sons, when at the end of 341 by imperial law they forbade pagan sacrifices and when Constantius II, after a temporary mildness, sharpened the pressure on the pagans by two laws of 356, which ordered the closing of the temples, forbade all sacrifices, and aimed to punish violations with the death penalty and confiscation of property.[198] Here appeared the determination to force paganism out of public life and to promote the christianization of the Empire with the State's means of powers. The laws may have motivated also the illegal and tumultuous proceedings of individual Christian groups, which in several places of Asia Minor and Syria sacked or destroyed pagan shrines.[199] Of course, the inculcating of the edicts, which soon followed, and a special threat of punishment against individual provincial governors who saw to their execution too laxly showed that their impact did not correspond to expectations. After his visit to Rome in 357, even the Emperor saw himself compelled not to insist any further on their application.[200] To what extent the pressure of conscience, produced by it, had actually led to conversions, is not of course ascertainable in the individual, but in the partly serious outrages which under the Emperor Julian again befell the Christians may be recognized a pagan reaction to this pressure. Such experiences with harsh intolerance could only induce the Emperors Jovian and Valentinian I to renounce it, thereby gaining much praise from the pagan side;[201] it also accorded to the Christian mission a phase of peaceful work, more conformable to its nature and hence also more successful.

---

[196] On Theodoret see P. Canivet, Histoire d'une entreprise apologétique au V^e siècle (Paris 1957). Also the "Consultationes Zacchaei et Apollonii," ed. G. Morin, FlorPatr 39 (Bonn 1935), must be mentioned here.

[197] H. Dörries, "Konstantinische Wende und Glaubensfreibeit," Wort und Stunde I (Göttingen 1966), 1–117, especially 25–45, 65–72.

[198] Cod. Theod. 16, 2–3; 5–6.

[199] Theodoret, HE 3, 7, 3, and 6; Sozomen, HE 5, 4, 1–5.

[200] Cod. Theod. 16, 10, 4; Symmachus, Rel. III, 7; see J. Moreau, JbAC 2 (1959), 169.

For the last important period of antipagan religious policy the Emperor Theodosius I was mainly responsible,[202] since, after the liquidation of the Arian confusion, he aimed to bring about the complete religious unity of the Empire by a definitive deprivation of the pagans' rights. The abandonment of the title of Pontifex Maximus, the discontinuance of State support for specific pagan priesthoods, the rejection of the drive by the still pagan part of the Roman senatorial aristocracy in the struggle over the Ara Victoriae were followed by a series of laws,[203] which consistently and at the same time flexibly pursued the aim of eradicating from the public consciousness the notion that paganism was still a somehow important phenomenon. When the Prefect Cynegius, who was supposed, as the Emperor's agent in the East, to supervise personally the execution of the law on the closing of the temples, went beyond his instructions and allowed some of the shrines to be destroyed, Theodosius gave him a pagan, Tatian, as successor, to appease the wrath of pagan circles—described by Libanius in Pro templis—as he usually appointed members of the pagan upper class to the highest offices of state. But he behaved just as firmly, if a moment or an event seemed especially favorable for antipagan measures. The decrees of 391–92,[204] which represent the climax of the antipagan legislation, since they now also forbade every sort of private pagan worship, must be attributed rather to the Emperor's wish to do penance than to the influence of Ambrose, since Theodosius also took care to act consistently independently also in ecclesiastical political questions. The victory over the usurper Eugene,[205] whom, to their own misfortune, the pagan group at Rome had joined, gave him the welcome possibility of finally accomplishing the deprivation of all of paganism's power. Its fate was now sealed in the awareness of the public: it was clearly felt that paganism no longer presented the State with an internal political problem, its few adherents could still serve it only in isolated esoteric circles or remain left to their popular faith in the country; the still preserved greater pagan monuments had only an artistic character. The antipagan laws of the succeeding Emperors were then mostly only corroborations of those of Theodosius I.[206] If Christian fanatics in locally limited cases still appealed for the aid of the State against stirrings of pagan belief, this was justified with reference to the pertinent laws of Theodosius.

---

[201] Themist., Or. 5, 67b–c; Or. 7; Ammianus Marcellinus, 30, 9, 5; see A. Nagl, Pauly-Wissowa VII, A, 2, 2198ff.

[202] W. Ensslin, Die Religionspolitik des Kaisers Theodosius (Munich 1953); N. Q. King, The Emperor Theodosius and the Establishment of Christianity (London 1961), 71–92; A. Lippold, Theodosius der Gr. und seine Zeit (Stuttgart 1968), 38–43, with footnotes.

[203] Cod. Theod. 16, 10, 7–9; R. Klein, Der Streit um den Victoriaaltar (Darmstadt 1972); Symmachus, Rel. III; Ambrose, Epp. 17, 18, 57, with commentary.

[204] Cod. Theod. 16, 10, 10–12.

[205] On Eugene: J. Ziegler, Zur religiösen Haltung der Gegenkaiser im 4. Jh. n. Chr. (Kallmünz 1970), 85–104.

If it remains so difficult to appraise the impact of this antipagan legislation on the missionary success of the Church in details, so little too can it be doubted that, as a whole, it greatly promoted it. Such aid seemed admissible by it, despite the occasional appearance of scruples, since it came from Christian Emperors. It was noted that, in contrast to the attitude of the pagan political leadership with regard to Christians before Constantine, there was no bloody persecution of pagans in which the positive conversion to Christianity by means of a court judgment or torture had been extorted, and it was stressed again and again that conversions without free decision of the will were worthless.[207]

The pagan reaction[208] to the Christian mission of this period and the consequent repressive measures taken by the State offer a complicated picture. It is above all expressed in the literary repudiation of Christianity and in the defense of its own religious tradition; it was the resistance of the intellectuals, whose professional and journalistic activity was hardly curtailed, because it apparently seemed less dangerous to the State than that of an augur, who at his nocturnal consultation about the future might prophesy the imminent overthrow of an Emperor. The most important representative of this circle in the East was the Antiochene rhetor Libanius (314–393), who spiritedly deplored the threat to the previous cultural and religious advance, greeted the Emperor Julian as their majestic restorer—but he interceded for the Christians persecuted by the latter—and demanded of Theodosius I an energetic intervention against those who destroyed temples.[209] Himerius and Themistius took a less firm stand for their pagan convictions, and Themistius could even become Prefect of Constantinople and tutor of [206] Cod. Theod. 16, 10, 13, 19, 23, 25; Cod. Just. 1, 11, 7. Exceptions: Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 42; 16, 10, 21; Zosimus, Hist. nova 5, 46, 3–5.

---

[207] Cf. Chrysostom, (?) De s. Babyla, 3; Augustine, Sermo 62, 17f.; Gregory I, Ep. I, 35.

[208] J. Geffcker, Der Ausgang des griechisch-römischen Heidentums (Heidelberg, 2nd ed. 1929); P. de Labriolle, La réaction païenne (Paris 1934); A. Momigliano (ed.), The Conflict between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century (Oxford 1963).

[209] Libanius, Or. 2, 12, 16, 18, 37, 62; Ep. 763, 819. On Or. 30 (Pro templis): R. van Loy, Byz(B) 8 (1933), 7–39; 389–404 (with commentary); on the dating (386): L. Petit, ibid. 21 (1951), 285–309.

Theodosius's son Arcadius. A deep contempt of Christianity again filled Eunapius of Sardes (c. 345–420), who in a collection of Lives of the Sophists drew a picture of those men whose hope was the Emperor Julian, but who after his death could no longer rouse the courage to act, but withdrew into their world of theurgy and mysticism.[210] As late as the fifth century pagan philosophers could still teach and write at Alexandria (Hypatia, Asclepiodotus, and Ammonius) and Athens (Proclus and his successors in the Neoplatonist school, Marinus, Isidore, and Simplicius) without, however, being able to exercise an influence threatening to Christianity.[211]

In the West too, persons took up the pen for the preservation of the pagan religious tradition, but especially in Rome they combined this fight with political activity and with a moderate glance at the remaining possibilities. In the pagan senatorial faction at Rome[212] the direct massive polemic against Christianity was for the most part avoided: instead, persons were recruited for paganism through the fostering of ancient Roman literature, through translations such as those of the biography of Apollonius of Tyana and of the pseudo-Apuleius Asclepius, in which the antipagan laws of Theodosius were deplored.[213] The ancient Roman priesthoods were zealously fostered, and in them important offices were personally assumed. In the struggle over the Ara Victoriae this group was politically active and through Symmachus demanded full freedom of religion for the adherents of paganism.[214] After the victory of Theodosius over the usurper Eugene on the Frigidus in 394, of course, the opposition of the pagan remnant was forced to extreme caution. The author of the Historia Augusta could now recruit for toleration only anonymously and in obscure form. Before him the poet Claudian concealed from Ausonius his sympathies for pagan literature by a half-hearted conversion to Christianity, and Rutilius Namatianus limited himself to a bitter criticism of monasticism.[215] Finally there remained only external behavior and resignation, which in any case dared to express itself only in private circles.

---

[210] Eunapius, Vitae sophist., ed. W. C. Wright (London 1968): L. J. Daley, "Themistius' Plea for religious Tolerance," Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies 12 (1971), 65–79.

[211] See Geffcken, op. cit., 197–214; W. E. Kaegi, "The Fifth Century Twilight of Byzantine Paganism," Classica et Medievalia 27 (1966, publ. 1969), 243–275.

[212] B. Kötting, Christentum und heidnische Opposition in Rom am Ende des 4. Jh. (Münster 1961); H. Block in A. Momigliano, op. cit., 193–218.

[213] Macrobius's Saturnalia gives a picture of this circle, in which at first Praetextatus played the leading role. Asclepius, c. 24–25: Corpus Hermet. II (Paris 1945), 327, 329.

[214] Cf. F. Paschoud, Roma aeterna (Rome–Berne 1967); R. Klein, Symmachus (Darmstadt 1971, with the literature).

[215] On the Historia Augusta, J. Straub, Heidnische Geschichtsapologetik in der christlichen Spätantike (Bonn 1963); P. Langlois, "Les poèmes chrétiens et le christianisme d'Ausone," RPh 43 (1969), 39–58; A. Cameron, Claudian. Poetry and Propaganda at the Court of Honorius (London 1970).

At times the Christian mission encountered a longer lasting negative reaction among the peasantry of individual provinces, such as in Upper Egypt and in parts of Syria and North Africa. Here the tenacious clinging of this stratum of the population to its legacy was occasionally seen in local tumults against Christians, but it was not in a position to organize a systematic, widespread resistance.[216]

If one asks about the quality of the total result of Christian evangelization in the Late Roman Empire, important deficiencies must not go unnoticed, despite the outstanding accomplishments. Among the successes must be reckoned the gladly given assent and tirelessly accepted missionary duty of the communities, of monasticism, of the professional missionaries, as well as the profound spiritual change in many new Christians, manifested impressively in the intensive participation in the life of a richly developing liturgy, in the surrender to the monastic ideal, in the consolidation of charitable works, and in the brilliant rise of an independent Christian literature. However, the complementary missionary work after baptism was not everywhere carried out with the necessary care and intensity, so that a continued growth of pagan custom quite often debased Christian piety in content and form and at times even produced a relapse into paganism. Some conversions were not based on inner conviction but proceeded from a regard for a professional career or under the pressure of State power. The agitated complaints of many pastors and writers on the semichristiani in the communities here speak a clear language. The quantitatively great and rapid success of the mission had only too often to be paid for with a painful lack of interior quality in the new Christians.[217]

CHRISTIAN MISSION AND JUDAISM. It is a striking characteristic of the mission history of the fourth and fifth centuries that the bustling activity of the Christian communities for the gaining of pagans did not display an equally balanced parallel in regard to contemporary Judaism. Constantine, it is true, in an edict of 315 to the leadership of the Jewish communities, threatened with severe penalties such Jews as harassed their former coreligionists in any way: this assumed a certain stream of Jewish converts at this time. Also at Constantinople the example of Constantine is said to have induced "many Jews" to embrace Christianity.[218]

---

[216] W. H. C. Frend, "The Winning of the Countryside," JEH 18 (1967), 1–14.

[217] W. Daut, "Die 'Halben Christen' unter den Konvertiten und Gebildeten des 4. und 5. Jh.," ZMR 55 (1971), 171–188. To this pertains also the sharp criticism of Christian behavior in Salvian, De gubernatione mundi (c. 440). Relapses into paganism: Chromatius of Aquileia, Tract. 4, 4, 1–2; for Gregory I, see footnote 130, supra.

[218] Cod. Theod. 16, 8, 1; Sozomen, HE 2, 3, 7.

But this can refer only to locally limited occurrences, since an Empire-wide movement of conversion among the Jews would have been reported with gratification by Christians such as Eusebius. Those conversions too must not have been very numerous which allegedly followed the appearance of the Cross in Jerusalem under Bishop Cyril or the extraordinary occurrences at the failure of the attempted rebuilding of the temple by the Emperor Julian.[219] To be sure, into the fifth century in East and West individual Jews always converted to Christianity, and Ambrose even speaks once of plurimi ex Judaeis in this context, but in another place he himself gives the correct proportion when he says that there were all too few of the many.[220] Also Chromatius of Aquileia once remarked that one daily witnessed many Jewish conversions, and yet he preached repeatedly in a polemical manner on the judaica infidelitas.[221] The report of a Bishop Severus, according to whom at the beginning of the fifth century the entire Jewry of the island of Minorca—several hundred—had let themselves be persuaded by miracles worked by the relics of Stephen to embrace Christianity scarcely appeared before the seventh century.[222] More deserving of credence is the account, spread in East and West, that a group of Jews on the island of Crete under the Emperor Theodosius II asked for baptism because they had been deceived by a juggler who appeared as a new Moses.[223] Hence in most cases it was a question of individual conversions, which came about in the normal missionary way—through contact of individual Christians with Jews. On the Christian side people did not always seem convinced of the sincerity of such a conversion, since hardly ever is it reported that a Jewish Christian was admitted to the clergy.[224] That purely external conversions occasionally happened appears from an edict of the Emperor Honorius, who in 416 granted to baptized Jews a return with impunity to their former faith, whereas as a rule the passage of a Christian to Judaism was strictly punished.[225]

---

[219] Sozomen, HE 4, 5, 5; Socrates, HE 2, 28, 22; Theodoret, HE 3, 20, 8; Sozomen, HE 2, 22, 13.

[220] Basil, Ep. 45, 2; Chrysostom, Quod Christus sit deus, 2; Augustine, Ep. 82, 17 (to Jerome); 196, 11; C. Faust., 12–13; Ambrose, Expos. Luc. 7, 172; 6, 64.

[221] Chromatius of Aquileia, Tract. 35; tract. in Mt. 10, 2, 5; 10, 3, 3; Sermo 43, 31–32; see SChr 154 (Paris 1969), 56, footnote 1.

[222] PL 41, 821–832; ed. crit. G. Segui-Vidal (Rome–Mallorca 1937); on the dating: B. Blumenkranz, Les auteurs chrétiens latins du moyen âge sur les Juifs et le Judaisme (Paris 1963), 106–110.

[223] Socrates, HE 7, 38; Cassiodorus, Hist. trip. 12, 9. On the alleged missonary successes of Rabbula of Edessa among the Jews, see footnote 35, supra.

[224] Socrates, HE 5, 21.

[225] Cod. Theod. 16, 8, 23; Socrates, HE 7, 17.

It is in accord with the facts just described that in the not inconsiderable Christian literature of the period which deals with the relationship of Christianity and Judaism,[226] only rarely can a special interest in an intensive mission to the Jews be established. It is found, for example, with Ambrose, who despite his anti-Jewish theological polemic and his unyielding attitude in the matter of the rebuilding of the synagogue of Callinicum, insisted that the Church send its missionaries also to the Jews and that Jewish converts be given material support, who personally exerted himself for the conversion of a learned Jew, in his sermons addressed the Jews directly, urged them to accept Christianity, and gave directions for their instruction in the catechumenate.[227] A similar attitude is found in Sidonius Apollinaris and especially in Gregory I, who, it is true, was very solicitous for the conversion of the Jews but decidedly condemned every form of compulsion in their regard.[228]

But in the Christianity of the fourth and fifth centuries, more and more the idea imposed itself that a mission to the Jews was ultimately purposeless, because they did not want to convert, in fact, in accord with God's plan of salvation, they could not convert for the time being, since their "hardness of heart," lasting until the end of time, was to attest that through their unbelief in the Messiah the call of the Chosen People to God was lost by them and now the Church of Christ has become the true Israel.[229] It would be too superficial a judgment if one wanted to see in this notion only a theological alibi for the lack of success of a Christian mission to the Jews, since it already belonged in its beginnings to the New Testament and distinguished itself in a longer development until Augustine justified it by the mystery of predestination.[230] This theological explanation of the unconvertibility of Israel was expounded by some Christian writers about a defamation of Judaism, as, for example, by Gregory of Elvira, Augustine, Leo I, and Caesarius of Arles. But in general it was accompanied by a strong animosity, which at times, as in Chrysostom, lost all moderation in tone and in Cyril of Alexandria led to anti-Semitic excesses.[231] The acidity of this polemic had one of its causes in the peculiar power of attraction of the Jewish religion, which again and again induced Christians in East and West to take part in Jewish festival customs, in the observance of the Sabbath, and so forth, and very keenly upset some bishops.[232] A further cause was inherent in the rivalry in which Jewish recruiting of proselytes and Christian mission confronted each other in their quest for pagans.[233] Finally, the emotions were again and again charged in daily life by the fiery manner of discussion, in which both sides spared themselves nothing in unspeakable charges.[234]

---

[226] See A. L. Williams, Adversus Judaeos (Cambridge 1935); B. Blumenkranz, Die Judenpredigt Augustins (Basel 1946); id., Les auteurs chrétiens; D. Judant, Judaïsme et Christianisme. Dossier patristique (Paris 1969), 325–350: Index patristique.

[227] J. Mesot, Die Heidenbekehrung bei Ambrosius von Mailand (Schöneck 1958), 69–73: preaching to the Jews.

[228] Sidonius Apollinaris, Epp. 8, 13; 6, 11; 3, 4; on Gregory I: B. Blumenkranz, Les auteurs, 73ff.

[229] M. Simon, Verus Israel (Paris, 2nd ed. 1964), 162–165; Y. Bodin, S. Jerôme et l'église (Paris 1966), 162–165.

[230] K. H. Rengstorf, Kirche und Synagoge, Handbuch zur Geschichte von Christen und Juden I (Stuttgart 1968), 23–83; on Augustine: B. Blumenkranz, RechAug 1 (1958), 225–241. K. Hruby, Juden und Judentum bei den Kirchenvätern (Zurich 1971).

State legislation[235] followed only with hesitations the general estimation of contemporary Judaism by the majority of Christians and until the last years of the reign of Theodosius I maintained that the Jewish religion was not forbidden and also repeatedly condemned the destruction of Jewish synagogues by Christian fanatics. Some laws, which at first aimed to emphasize and assure only the preeminence of Christianity over Judaism—prohibition of conversion to Jewish belief, of the possession of Christian slaves, of mixed marriages—were then followed from the end of the fourth century in growing measure by decrees which also restricted most painfully the freedom of worship and of profession, as well as the standing of the Jews in civil law. They made ready that atmosphere in which Merovingian and Visigothic kings regarded the compulsory baptism of Jews as a permissible means of gaining religious unity within their spheres of authority.

---

[231] Greg. Illib., Tract. 3–6, 11, 13. Augustine, Adv. Judaeos, Pl 42, 51–64; on Leo I: B. Blumenkranz, Kirche und Synagoge I, 97–101; on Caesarius: J. Courreau, BLE 71 (1970), 92–112. On anti-Jewish propaganda in general, M. Simon, Versus Israel, 116–274, and B. Blumenkranz, Juifs et Chrétiens, 213–278; on Chrysostom: M. Simon, Recherches d'Histoire Judeo-chrétienne (Paris 1962), 140–153; on Cyril: H. I. Bell, "Anti-Semitism in Alexandria," JRS 31 (1941), 1–18; cf. also Cyril's Easter letters, 1; 4–6 (PG 77, 513–533). Syrian Fathers (Aphraates, Ephrem) also took part in this polemic, just as the Arians did; see W. Cramer, Kirche und Synagoge I, 176–186. From the Arian Bishop Maximinus came a Tractatus contra Judaeos, ed. C. H. Turner, JThS 20 (1919), 293–310; see B. Capelle, RBén 34 (1922), 81–108.

[232] Synods also warned against "Judaizing"; cf. Syn. Illib. canons 16, 16; 49–50, 78; Laodic. canons 38–39; Stat. eccl. ant., 84, 89.

[233] B. Blumenkranz, "Die jüdish-christliche Missionskonkurrenz (3.–6. Jh.)," Klio 39 (1961), 227–233.

[234] M. Simon, Verus Israel, 214–238, rightly refers to the often overlooked sharp polemics on the Jewish side. An instructive example in Augustine, Enarr. in ps. 43, 17, 7.

[235] Survey in J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'empire romain (Paris 1959), 623–633, with the literature. The laws are collected in the Cod. Theod. 16, 8; see J. E. Seaver, Persecution of Jews in the Roman Empire 410–438 (University of Kansas 1952); B. Kötting, Kirche und Synagoge I, 145–149.

3. The First Contacts of Christianity with the Germans and the Conversion of the Goths

"The Churches established in the [two] Germanies have believed nothing other and transmitted nothing other than those in the Spanish provinces or among the Celts, than those in the east or in Egypt, than those in Libya or in the middle of the world."[236] This much quoted sentence from Adversus haereses, composed c. 180–182 by Bishop Irenaeus of Lyon, is the first testimony for the presence of Christianity in the Roman Rhinelands, the provinces of Mainz and Cologne. Even the archeological testimonies reach no farther up. In the third century Christianity must have gained strength on the Rhine and the Danube, as the reports of the martyrdoms in these provinces indicate. In the second half of the third century the beginnings of an episcopal organization on the wide frontier of the Empire facing the Germans became visible. With this is included a terminus a quo for the first contact of the Germans with the Church.

Christianity appeared to the Germans as an element of late ancient civilization with which they had to come into conflict, and, indeed, in the West at first as one form of religion alongside others. Preeminent in power and fame among the Alemanni kings who in 357 fought the Romans near Strasbourg were Chnodomar and his nephew Serapio. Serapio was originally named Agenarich, but in Gaul he had assumed the cult name Serapio after his initiation into the mysteries of Isis.[237] The Frank Silvanus, in the Roman service, became around the same time a Christian,[238] and in fact a Catholic, since in the West orthodoxy was the dominant form of Christianity. Conversions of German officers to the Christian religion still remained the rare exceptions during the fourth century. Not until the fifth century were the Germans who had risen in the imperial service or their successors converted to Christianity in growing numbers. The successors of Germanic lords who had risen in the imperial senatorial aristocracy also assimilated themselves interiorly to the new faith; for example, the Patricius Merobaudes, who c. 440 founded a monastery in the see of Troyes,[239] or the Comes Arbogast of Trier, whom Auspicius of Toul characterized c. 470 as praefiguratum sacerdotio.[240]

The line between the Germans who had risen in the senatorial aristocracy and the princes of the foederati, who with their people had bound themselves to the Emperor by a foedus, was fluid. But the decision for Christ could not remain a private matter among the federate princes in view of the close fusion of religion with the total life of the people. It also automatically affected the group of people whom the prince governed and hence led more or less inevitably to a collective conversion. The earliest testimonies for a mass conversion on the Rhine refer to the Burgundians, who, according to Orosius and Socrates, accepted the Catholic Christianity of the Gallo-Romans after they had settled c. 407 on the left bank of the Rhine.[241] A similar decision may have been made also by groups of Frankish foederati even before the end of the fifth century.[242] The Sueves in Spain became Catholic under Rechiar (448–451).[243] The confession of Christ probably implied at times also an acknowledgment of Imperium and Emperor: it was a question of a formal act rather than of a real conversion. Thus is explained how the Burgundians and the Sueves without difficulty exchanged Catholic for Arian Christianity when they fell under the influence of the Arian Goths.

---

[236] Irenaeus, Adversus haereses I, X, 2; BG 7, 552.

[237] Ammianus Marcellinus, XVI, 12, 1 and 25.

[238] M. Waas, Germanen im römischen Dienst im 4. Jh. (dissertation, Bonn 1965), 123ff.

[239] F. Lot, "Un diplôme de Clovis confirmatif d'une donation de patrice romain," Revue Belge de Phil. et d'Hist. 17 (1938), 906–911.

[240] E. Ewig, Trier im Merowingerreich (Trier 1957), 57, footnote 226.

Earlier and more enduringly than the Germans on the Rhine did the Goths on the lower Danube and the Black Sea coast come into contact with Christianity. Cappadocian war prisoners, perhaps also anonymous missionaries, were the first agents of the gospel, which at first probably found followers in the lower classes. A Bishop Theophilus of Gothia, who perhaps functioned in the Crimea, signed the acts of the Council of Nicaea in 325. Among the Visigoths the treaty concluded with Constantine in 332 may have favored contacts with the Christian religion. Very soon heterodox teachers also appeared. The Mesopotamian sectarian Audaeus worked among the Visigoths during his exile in Scythia (Dobrudsha). Alongside Audians and Catholics were the Arians, whose denomination was destined to become the Gothic form of Christianity, not least because of the considerable personality of the Gothic Bishop Ulfilas.

---

[241] Paul Orosius, Hist. adv. Pag. 41, sect. 8, CSEL V, 554; Socrates, HE 30, PG 67, 805; O. Fiebiger–L. Schmidt, Inschriftensammlung zur Gesch. der Ostgermanen (Denkschriften Ak. Wiss. Wien, phil. hist. Kl., 60, 3, 1918), no. 72: Christian grave inscription of the Protector Domesticus Hariulf of the royal family of the Burgundians. I hold, with Hauck and L. Schmidt (Die Ostgermanen, 2nd ed. 1941, 138), against K. D. Schmidt (Bekehrung I, 407ff.) to the authenticity of the testimonies of Orosius and Socrates. Perhaps one may also see Burgundians in the Germans who appear on the Christian grave slabs of Wiesbaden and Worms (see H. Büttner, "Frühes fränkisches Christentum am Mittelrhein," AMrhKG 3 [1951], 18, 32).

[242] The Frankish kinglet Chararich, whom Clovis deprived of his authority, was a Christian, since Clovis let him and his son enter the clergy (Gregory, Hist. Fr. II, 41). If, with Lot, one dates the elimination of the Frankish kinglets in the years after the victory over Syagrius, Chararich had become a Christian before Clovis. It is possible that the Frankish Kings of Cologne were already Christian; cf. K. Corsten, "Die fränkischen Königsgräber in Köln, RhVjBl 10 [1940], 168–171.

[243] K. D. Schmidt, Bekehrung, 374–376.

Ulfilas was born c. 311. Through his mother he was a descendant of Cappadocian war prisoners, but his father was probably a Goth. As a cleric-lector he began to translate the Bible into Gothic. He went with a Gothic embassy to the court of Constantine I or of Constantius II. Eusebius of Nicomedia, Bishop of Constantinople from 338, ordained him Bishop of the Goths, perhaps in 341 at the Synod of Antioch. Ulfilas professed the moderate Homoian Arianism of Acacius and as bishop completed his translation of the Scripture. He escaped a first persecution of Christians in 347–348, and the Emperor settled him with his faithful near Nicopolis (Trnovo). Ulfilas died at Constantinople in 381 or 383. The Gothic group that had followed him remained permanently separated from the main body of their nation and survived in the Balkans as a peaceful tribe of herdsmen.

The persecution of 347–48, like the next one of 369–372, struck at all Gothic Christians, regardless of denomination. The second persecution was related to a new Visigothic-Roman conflict and probably also to a power struggle between the Visigothic Princes Athanarich and Fritigern.[244] At that time both rivals were still pagans, but Fritigern, as the representative of a pro-Roman policy, may already have been leaning to Christianity. Athanarich at first held his ground in the leadership of his people. The persecution inaugurated by him was at the same time an anti-Roman reaction. The Audians were routed, and their remnant joined the Catholics. A group of Catholic Goths withdrew from the main body and migrated to Thrace.

Athanarich's position was shaken when in 376 the Huns attacked the Visigoths after they had overrun the Ostrogothic Kingdom. Under Fritigern's leadership bands of Visigoths trespassed on the soil of the Empire. At that time Fritigern seems to have embraced the Arian confession of his patron, the Emperor Valens; his passage was followed by the historically decisive mass conversion of his people to Arianism.[245] The conflict with the imperial administration, in the course of which Fritigern finally led his Visigoths in 378 to victory over the Emperor Valens at Adrianople, made no change in the religious decision. If there were still destined to be anti-Christian excesses even after the treaty with Theodosius in 382, Visigothic paganism thereafter was without significance for the future of the people. Catholic Christianity also now moved to the background. It maintained itself as the popular religion only among the separated groups, such as the "Crimea Goths."

---

[244] The historicity of the conflict between Fritigern and Athanarich is denied by Thompson with arguments that are unconvincing.

[245] Thus the traditional view. Thompson dates the mass conversion only in the years 382–395.

The origin and course of the Gothic mission can be understood only against the background of the Church history of the Greco-Roman East. The power of radiation of Greek Christianity, whose nucleus was Asia Minor, explains the early start of the work of conversion. The various denominations of the East met in missionary territory. The Goths accepted the diluted Homoian Arianism, which in the decisive moment of history was the denomination of the Eastern Emperor and of the court of Constantinople. Ulfilas's creed corresponded to the formula of Rimini (359), which for its part was based on the formulas of Sirmium (359) and Antioch (341). The Gothic Church also borrowed from the Church of the Empire the episcopal organization. The national liturgical language grew out of the needs of the mission: an important achievement of Ulfilas,[246] but against the background of the relations of the East, where, in addition to Greek and Latin, there were also a Syriac and a Coptic liturgical language, it was nothing revolutionary. Ulfilas's translation of the Bible obtained the full recognition of the Church Fathers Jerome and John Chrysostom.

A deeper understanding of the controversies which occupied the theologians of the East in the fourth century may be presumed in any event in Ulfilas, but not in the new converts. It is extremely doubtful whether the Homoian Arianism better corresponded to definite Germanic ideas than did Catholic orthodoxy.[247] The Goths did not choose the appealing Christian profession after a critical examination; they accepted the form of Christianity which Constantinople offered them. That, just the same, a Gothic national Church arose is explained by a rare coincidence: the death of the Emperor Valens on the battlefield of Adrianople sealed the fate of Arianism within the Empire. The Gothic Homoians were thereafter separated from the Church of the Empire by a deep ditch.

The isolated Gothic Church preserved the Homoian body of religious beliefs essentially unchanged. The Gothic theologians of the fifth and sixth centuries lacked originality. They fell to a certain degree under the influence of Romania when in the fifth century the Goths moved from the eastern to the western half of the Empire. Ulfilas's

---

[246] Excessively stressed by Scardigli, Conversione, 67ff. Scardigli wrongly sees in Ulfilas's translation work a conscious achievement of the spiritual confrontation with the Empire.

[247] According to K. D. Schmidt (Bekehrung I, 275), Ulfilas saw the relationship of God the Father to Christ in the perspective of the Germanic Father-Son relationship and of the tribal idea.

Bible was sporadically revised with a view to the Latin Bible, and there seem also to have been bilingual Gothic-Latin Bibles.[248]

Except for the translation of the Bible and the liturgical language, it is possible to speak of a germanization at the earliest in the area of the ecclesiastical organization. The ecclesiastical classifications which could not be modeled on the urban districts had to conform to the organization of the people or of the army—hundreds, five-hundreds, thousands. Gothic Arianism early gave a place to the proprietary church system, perhaps under the influence of a Germanic proprietary temple system. Monasticism was not admitted or in any case played no substantial role. Certain modifications of the ecclesiastical constitution in the sense of an assimilation to the Roman civitas organization and the organization of the Church of the Empire occurred after the settlement of the East Germans in the western half of the Empire but cannot be understood exactly. Annual synods of the Arian clergy at Geneva are attested for the Burgundians.[249] Only the Vandals, as imitatores imperii, established an Arian patriarchate.

At first the Gothic Church clung purposely to the universalism of the old Church and, like it, claimed alone to represent the true doctrine. But when the East Germans founded their kingdoms in the western provinces of the Empire it appeared that a missionary Arianism could only imperil the inner peace of the kingdoms. While the Vandals did not shrink from establishing Arianism as the religion of their kingdom,[250] the Goths and the other Arian peoples accustomed themselves to regard their Church as a national institution while renouncing missionary exertions in regard to the Romans. Hence the "tolerance" relating to Catholic Romania was conditioned by a special political situation and finally led to stagnation.

The renunciation of missionary work, of course, was limited to Catholic Romania and did not extend to the Germanic and Iranian peoples. For the "Gothic religion" were won the Ostrogoths, Gepids, Vandals, Alans, Rugii, Heruli, and Sciri, and temporarily the Burgundians, Spanish Suevi, and Lombards. Further particulars of this Arian mission are unknown. Its chief representatives in the first phase must have been the Little Goths of the Balkans. The Asdingian Vandals had certainly been won c. 400, since they transmitted Arianism to the Silingian Vandals on the Main and the Alans, who with them crossed the Rhine at the end of 406. The Ostrogoths probably accepted Ulfilas's

---

[248] E. A. Thompson, The Visigoths, 144ff.

[249] K. D. Schmidt, Bekehrung, 371.

[250] They apparently went from Homoian to radical Arianism (K. D. Schmidt, Bekehrung, 371).

Christianity even before their migration to Pannonia in 455. At the same time the Gepids, another Gothic clan, must have become Arians. The Gepids certainly passed on their Christianity to the Rugii, the Sciri, and the Heruli, with whom they were politically united under Attila's rule, then through their common struggle for freedom against the Huns in 454 and their common opposition to the Ostrogoths. The Arianism of Ulfilas seems to have reached even the Thuringians and Bavarians.[251] Latecomers were the Heruli and especially the Lombards, who after long hesitation probably only made their decision shortly before their invasion of Italy in 568, perhaps with a view to the Ostrogoths remaining in Italy.

Gradually Arianism established itself among all the Germans of the Danube: its area of expansion corresponded to a culture province defined by the Goths. It remained foreign to the Germans on the Rhine; however, the Goths finally carried it also to the peoples who migrated to Gaul and Spain, among whom now the Arian Gothic influence came into conflict with the Roman Catholic environment. The Burgundians, for example, who in a close alliance with the Visigoths (c. 451–471) obtained a new royal dynasty of Gothic blood, converted to Arianism. And the Sueves of Spain became Arians under the influence of their partners after they had concluded an alliance with the Visigoths c. 464. Ostrogothic emissaries were active at the Frankish court in an effort to introduce Arianism, and not without success until Clovis's decision cut the ground from under them. Among the Burgundians and the Spanish Sueves Arianism never sank roots so deeply as among the Goths, Vandals, and Danube Germans.

---

[251] On this controverted question: E. Klebel, "Zur Gesch. des Christentums in Bayern vor Bonifatius," Gedenkgabe zum 1200. Todestag (Fulda 1954), 388–411; also, F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich (Munich–Vienna 1965), 337, footnote 48, pp. 345ff., 358, footnote 100. On the basis of purely linguistic arguments Scardigli accepts a Gothic mediation to the other Germans (Conversione, 84–86).

CHAPTER 14

The Building of the Organization of the Church of the Empire

The Local Episcopal Church

The rapid progress of evangelization of the population of the Empire after the Church obtained freedom led to a strong increase in the number of Christian congregations, which, as previously, continued to be local churches governed by a single bishop. The ordination of a successor even in the lifetime of the present bishop was, therefore, as in the case of Augustine, regarded as an illicit deviation from the norm.[1] Whereas in the East the word paroichia established itself for the local church, the terminology in the West long remained unsettled: here, in addition to paroecia, ecclesia, territorium, fines episcopatus, and dioecesis were also used.[2] The decision as to the necessity or opportunity for establishing new local churches lay usually with the bishops of an ecclesiastical province. The weightiest prerequisite for the new foundation was a sufficient number of faithful: the Council of Chalcedon expressly related it to the rise of new cities; the faithful in hamlets and on farms were to be cared for by itinerant pastors who belonged to the clergy of the urban community.[3] And so areas with many cities had correspondingly high numbers of bishoprics of no great extent in size, while in areas of few cities their territorium was substantially larger. Hence in the Latin West the first type was especially characteristic of North Africa and of central and southern Italy, the second of Upper Italy, large parts of Gaul, of Spain and the Danubian and Balkan provinces.[4] Ordinarily the episcopal boundaries coincided with the civil administrative boundaries of the cities, but numerous deviations and quarrels over jurisdiction between neighboring bishops show that no strictly obligatory law existed on this matter. Hence there were also episcopal congregations in settlements which had no city rights, in addition to bishoprics within whose territory lay two or more cities.[5] Great exertions were required to establish the principle which restricted the bishop in the exercise of his functions to the territory of his own local church. Again and again synodal decrees had to enjoin that no bishop could ordain in another bishopric without the consent of the head of the ecclesiastical province or ordain a candidate who was subject to another bishop.[6] In the West the Bishop of Rome did not regularly intervene in the erecting of new local churches, but restricted himself to the warning to observe the relevant synodal decisions. The African episcopate decided in complete independence the various problems which occurred at the incorporation of Donatist local churches into the Catholic Church. In the East, on the other hand, the State power was quite often appealed to in cases of conflict or acted on its own.

---

[1] Cf. Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 7, 2; Augustine, Ep. 213, 4, besides Eusebius, HE 6, 11, 1–3, and Theodoret, HE 2, 17, 4–7.

[2] Examples of paroichia; Patristic Greek Lexikon s.v. II D; the Latin terms indicated in A. Scheuermann, op. cit., 1059ff. Dioecesis as the term for the local church is not found until the beginning of the fifth century.

[3] Council of Serdica, can. 6; Council of Chalcedon, can. 17.

[4] J. Gaudemet, op. cit., 324f.

[5] For Italy see S. Mochi Onory, Vescovi e città (Bologna 1933); for Gaul, E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne II (Paris 2nd ed. 1966), 125–133.

[6] J. Gaudemet, op. cit., 328

The connection of a bishop with a local church bound him to permanent residence in his community, from which he was to be absent only for serious reasons and ordinarily no longer than three weeks. This duty of residence was often disregarded, especially in the fourth century, because of the inclination of some bishops to be present personally at the imperial court in order to request material aid for their community and also at times personal privileges. Hence synods forbade these journeys or made them dependent on a written permission from the metropolitan.[7] The unlimited duty of caring for his community also justified the prohibition to transfer a bishop to another see, which was motivated by patristic theology with the idea of a mystical marriage between bishop and local church, to be terminated only by death. In the course of the fourth century this prohibition, despite strict sanctions such as deposition and excommunication, was again and again disregarded and especially in the East often led to serious conflicts. From the beginning of the fifth century there appeared an easing of the prohibition, since reasons for exceptions were recognized—rejection of a new bishop by the community, prohibition of entering upon the office by the secular power, pastoral necessity.[8] The provincial synod had to consider whether deposition was to be decreed because of serious lapses, but against its verdict the one concerned had the right of appeal to Rome, which inquired whether the case was to be taken up at another synod. In the East, on the other hand, at times the Emperor, on his own initiative, decreed the deposition of a bishop.[9]

The growing number of faithful in the city congregations and the success of the mission among the peasantry introduced, from the fourth century on, certain new features into the structure of the episcopal local church. In larger cities, such as Alexandria, Antioch, Rome, Carthage, and Milan, in addition to the cathedral, other churches became necessary in thickly populated urban areas. In Rome this led to the constructing of the so-called titular churches, to which members of the clergy of the city of Rome were assigned for the care of souls in these areas. However, these tituli remained parts of the one Roman local church; their clerics belonged, furthermore, to the presbyterium of the Roman community, whose unity was stressed by the liturgy celebrated by the

---

[7] Council of Nicaea, can. 16; Council of Antioch, can. 3; Council of Serdica, can. 7–8, 11–12; Council of Carthage (390), can. 7, (397) can. 56.

[8] J. Gaudemet, op. cit., 328; J. Trummer, "Mystisches im alten Kirchenrecht. Die geistliche Ehe zwischen Bischof und Diözese," OAKR 2 (1951), 62–75.

[9] Council of Serdica, can. 7.

Roman Bishop in the titular churches by turns.[10] In the Greek East there developed for the care of the peasants belonging to a local church the institute of the chorepiscopus, with which the first synods of the fourth century, such as those of Ancyra, Neocaesarea, and Nicaea, concerned themselves. Their regulations consistently emphasize the full dependence of the chorepiscopus on the real head of the community, who alone defined the sphere of his functions. The so-called Synod of Laodicea (collection of canons c. 343–381) forbade any further ordination of chorepiscopi and intended to replace them with itinerant pastors, while the Synod of Seleucia–Ctesiphon permitted only one chorepiscopus for a community. As yet the West had not received the institute of the chorepiscopus.[11] In the often quite extensive bishoprics of Gaul and North Italy special pastoral stations were erected in the rural settlements far removed from the cathedral, and these for their part represented a liturgical center for the inhabitants of the smaller villages and farms of the vicinity. Such subordinate places were, it is true, not parishes in the full sense of the word, since they did not yet administer their own church property, and the clergy working there had no real jurisdiction for an exactly defined territory, but the development toward the later parish was foreshadowed.[12]

The Metropolitan Union

As early as the late second century initial movements toward a spatial organization within the Universal Church were clear: these would go beyond the episcopal local church. Various rules of the Council of Nicaea now show that out of these starts there developed a clearly organized structure of differing sizes. One of these consisted of the gathering of all local churches of one civil province into a union, which in the lands of Greek speech was called eparchia, in those of Latin speech provincia. But this development by no means proceeded uniformly in the entire range of the distribution of Christianity, as regards either time or the causes which determined it.

The Council of Nicaea took for granted the fully developed ecclesiastical province or metropolitan union in the East when it ruled that the ordination of a bishop should be performed, so far as possible, by all the bishops of a province, and the confirmation of his election should come from the "metropolitan."[13] The very title metropolitan indicates that this chief of an ecclesiastical province had his seat in the metropolis, the capital of the civil province. Here too the boundaries of the ecclesiastical and of the corresponding civil sphere of administration generally coincided. The synods of the fourth and fifth centuries determined rights of the metropolitan in more detail: He led the episcopal synod of the province, which should meet twice a year, in discussing and deciding questions of more than local importance. Thus there belonged to the metropolitan a certain function of control over the religious and ecclesiastical life within the province and over the performance of their duties by the bishops, who had to obtain from him written permission, the so-called litterae-formatae, for an absence of any length from their see.[14] The Synod of Antioch in 341 stressed on the one hand that the local bishop was independent in his administration of his see, but on the other hand it called attention to the fact that the metropolitan was responsible for the care of the ecclesiastical province and without his consent and that of the other bishops he could not undertake anything that went beyond this.[15] Here it became clear that an adjustment between the claims of the local bishop and the measures to be decided collegially by the provincial synod was not always easy to achieve.

---

[10] G. Matthiae, Le chiese di Roma dal IV al IX secolo (Bologna 1963), 54–77.

[11] E. Kirsten, "Chorbischof," RAC II, 1105–14.

[12] For North Italy, G. Forchielli, La pieve rurale (Rome 1931); for Gaul, E. Griffe, op. cit. III (Paris 1965) 260–291.

[13] Council of Nicaea, can. 4.

The metropolitan organization established itself first and extensively in the Greek East, except for Egypt, which quite early showed a large area in which all bishops of the country as well as of Libya and the Pentapolis were apparently directly subject to the Bishop of Alexandria without the intermediate stage of the metropolitan. In the Latin West the development was still less uniform. In North Africa[16] it exhibited certain differences quite early, in so far as the rank of metropolitan, who was here called primate, sometimes belonged to the senior bishop of the province according to the date of his ordination, thus he did not have to have his seat in the provincial capital. Besides, a special position pertained to the Bishop of Carthage, who was always Primate of the Provincia Proconsularis, and, in addition, as Primas totius Africae summoned and directed the African plenary councils, which possessed special authority. On the other hand, the metropolitan organization did not exist at all in the area of the civil Diocese of Italia Suburbicaria with ten provinces and the islands of Sicily and Corsica, whose relatively numerous local bishops were directly subject to the Bishop of Rome and so always appeared at the Roman synods. In Upper Italy the Bishop of Milan[17] first appeared as metropolitan of an ecclesiastical province which comprised several civil provinces. This was first connected with the importance of Milan in the civil sphere, which it had gained as imperial residence since Diocletian and as seat of the vicar for the administration of Italia Annonaria, and then with the demographic situation of Upper Italy, which had far fewer cities than the South and the district around Rome. Likewise, the small number of cities in the provinces of Venetia, Istria, Raetia, and Noricum enabled the Bishop of Aquileia from c. 425 to become the sole metropolitan of this extensive territory.[18] In neighboring Pannonia a de facto preeminence belonged to the Bishop of Sirmium, which from time to time was the imperial residence and seat of a Praefectus Praetorio. But the development to a full metropolitan constitution here was at first impeded by the wandering of the peoples. In the other political dioceses of the Balkans it could be fully established—in Thrace from the start, because here the practice of the Eastern Church always prevailed, and in Dacia since it belonged to the eastern part of the Empire (395).[19] In Gaul, on the other hand, the assimilation of the ecclesiastical organization to the civil administrative spheres is clear. With some divergences, from the late fourth century the provincial capitals of Gaul became also the seats of the metropolitan. Thus the Metropolitan of Narbonensis Prima resided in the provincial capital, Narbonne, but when the city of Arles was designated after 392 as seat of the Prefecture of Gaul, the Bishop of Arles at once claimed the metropolitan dignity.[20] For Spain in the fourth century there are no clear statements in the sources on the organizational development of the Church there. The Council of Elvira at the beginning of the century, at which met nineteen bishops, mostly from the south of the country, knew, it is true, a prima cathedra episcopatus, by which, however, the see of the senior bishop is to be understood at first, but metropolitan authority was not attributed to him. Only after the middle of the fifth century was the metropolitan organization found in Spain in particular features. The special situation of the Spanish Church under Visigothic rule induced its episcopate to lean more powerfully on Rome and to receive its canonical rules from there. It was not until the sixth century that the great age of the Spanish provincial synods began.[21]

---

[14] J. Gaudemet, op. cit., 381.

[15] Council of Antioch, can. 9.

[16] G. Bardy, "Afrique," DDC I, 293–307.

[17] P. Batiffol, Cathedra Petri (Paris 1938), 41–54.

Also in the case of the ecclesiastical provinces did the boundaries in most cases coincide with those of the corresponding unit of civil administration, but Innocent I expressly insisted that a new arrangement of the civil provinces in Syria must not include a revision of the ecclesiastical organization.[22] When, on his own initiative, the Emperor Theodosius II made Beirut an ecclesiastical metropolis and assigned to it six local churches of the province of Tyre as it then existed, this led to a protracted struggle with which even the Council of Chalcedon had to deal. It rejected the imperial measure and thereby claimed for itself competence for such decisions.[23]

---

[18] H. Leclercq, "Aquilée," DACL I, 2655.

[19] J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes (Paris 1918), 364–376.

[20] E. Griffe, op. cit., II, 137–146.

[21] D. Mansilla, "Orígines de la organización metropolitana en la Iglesia española," HS 12 (1959), 1–36; on Elvira, J. Gaudemet, DHGE 15, 317–348, with the literature.

Superior Organization of the Greater Churches

Finally, the Council of Nicaea also knew a form of classification of churches on a still larger scale, in which all the local churches of a quite extensive geographical area or unit of administration larger than the civil province were combined under the bishop of the most important city of this area. Canon 6 of the Council specified three of these structures: To the Bishop of Alexandria was acknowledged the ancient "customary right" which gave him the supremacy over all the local churches of Egypt, Libya, and the Pentapolis; the same "custom" held for the Bishop of Rome; and the privileges of Antioch were to be similarly maintained. In the last two cases, it is true, there was no delimitation of the geographical area within which the full authority of the Bishop of Rome or of Antioch was valid, just as the vague formulation in regard to the "privileges" of Antioch is noteworthy. But the context of the canon makes clear that in both cases there was question of a form of organization which extended far beyond the framework of a metropolitan union, but for which as yet no special designation had been found. In the discussion of the content of canon 6, the position of the Bishop of Jerusalem also played a role. Out of consideration for the ecclesiastical past of his city a "position of honor" was awarded to him, but his subordination to the Metropolitan of Caesarea in Palestine was expressly stressed. By its canon 6 the Council of Nicaea basically recognized the classifications of the greater churches that were later termed "patriarchates."[24]

Their development was completed in a rather lengthy process, whose course was determined by several factors. In the first place, both chronologically and in accord with their internal importance, the geopolitical and economic importance of the three cities, Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome, must be named: their local bishops became the leaders of these great ecclesiastical classifications. This factor had already to a certain degree determined the route of the early Christian mission, when the first missionaries sought to gain a foothold precisely in the great political centers of the Mediterranean world and in the congregations founded there gained the bases for mission work in the territory dependent on these cities.[25] The consciousness, spontaneously springing from missionary relationships, of the solidarity of the congregations of Syria, Egypt, and central and southern Italy further promoted their organizational merger into greater unions. This assimilation of the ecclesiastical organization to the existing administrative division of the Empire, which presented itself virtually without alternative, was even the sole and unrestricted justification for the erecting of the fourth patriarchate, that of Constantinople, when the Synod of 381 conferred on the bishop of the eastern imperial capital his new rank, "because his city is the New Rome."[26] Later alterations in the organization of the political spheres did not, of course, automatically involve corresponding changes of the ecclesiastical structure. When, through Diocletian's reform of the Empire, the previous administrative independence of Egypt was annulled and the country was incorporated into the political Diocese of Oriens, subject to the vicar at Antioch, no one at Nicaea attacked the established ecclesiastical organization of Egypt.[27]

---

[22] Innocent, Ep. 24, 2.

[23] Council of Chalcedon, can. 12.

[24] H. Chadwick, "Faith and Order at the Council of Nicaea. A Note on the Ground of the 6th Canon," HTR 53 (1960), 171–195.

The development of the patriarchates was influenced by still another factor, which pertained to the popular and hence to the linguistic and cultural individuality of the inhabitants of those territories in which the greater Church classifications arose. This factor not only contributed to the origin of one patriarchate each in the Egyptian and Syrian cultural areas: it was likewise one of the causes why both in the properly Greek-speaking sphere and in the Latin area only one great patriarchate each was established, even though here several political dioceses existed as extensive units of administration. Initiatives toward several supra-metropolitan groupings were, it is true, also present here, as the Council of 381 testifies in addressing the respective episcopates of the Dioceses of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace as a unit.[28] But the further development to independent ecclesiastical organizational spheres with the centers at Ephesus, Caesarea, and Heraclea was thwarted at Chalcedon, which in canon 28 subordinated these territories to the see of Constantinople. When the Council called the bishops of the cities mentioned "exarchs" and recognized them as appeal courts for conflicts between the local bishop and the metropolitan, a remnant of this aborted development could have been reflected.[29] In the territory of the single Latin patriarchate an effort in the direction of a larger member Church of a certain autonomy is known only for Africa, where the Bishop of Carthage, as Primas totius Africae and president of the North African plenary council, functioned in a certain sense as the suprametropolitan. For this development both the political and cultural importance of Carthage and its position as mission basis for the evangelization of the North African provinces must be taken into account. The Vandal invasion prepared the end of this relative autonomy of the North African Church and occasioned its close union with Rome. The Latin vicariates of Thessalonica and Arles disappeared here just as did the "Patriarchate" of Aquileia, since their heads exercised their authority, often only for a brief period, by direct commission from Rome, or, like the Bishop of Aquileia as well as those of Milan and Ravenna, were ultimately only metropolitans of an extensive ecclesiastical province.[30]

---

[25] See vol. I, 100–105, 207–209, and F. Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity, 4f.

[26] Council of Constantinople I, can. 3.

[27] F. Dvornik, op. cit., 9f. Between 380 and 382 Egypt became again an independent administrative area.

[28] Council of Constantinople I, can. 2.

The special political circumstances under which Christians lived in Armenia and Persia caused, also outside the frontiers of the Empire, the rise of two large ecclesiastical structures, which in their organization must be equated de facto with the eastern patriarchates. The Armenian Church in the first decades of its existence maintained close relations with Caesarea in Cappadocia, where Gregory the Illuminator accepted Christianity and then preached it to the nation. The common conversion of King Trdat and of the majority of the nation early favored the development of a national Church under a chief bishop of its own, who from the fifth century was called the Catholicus. The heavy pressure exerted on the Armenian kings by their powerful Persian neighbors motivated them to relax the ties of their Church with the "West" more and more, and the irresistibly progressing subjugation of Armenia by the Persians almost completely curtailed the contacts with Western Christianity just at the time of the great councils of the fifth century. Hence the definitive separation and independence of the Armenian Church was not the result of its own exertions but the consequences of political events to which the Armenian people were subjected.[31] In Persia the beginnings of a leading role of the Bishop of Seleucia–Ctesiphon probably go back to the fourth century. The Synod of 410 under Bishop Isaac awarded him jurisdiction over the Persian episcopate: the Synod of 424 confirmed and further defined his position as independent of every other ecclesiastical authority.[32]

---

[29] Council of Chalcedon, can. 9, 17.

[30] For Thessalonica and Arles see the next chapter on Siricius, Innocent, Zosimus, Boniface, and Leo I. For Aquileia, see H. Schmidinger, MIOG 60 (1952), 335–354, and H. Fuhrmann, ZSavRGkan 40 (1954), 43–61.

[31] F. Tournebize, "Arménie," DHGE IV, 298–303; G. Amadouni, "L'Autocéphalie du Katholicat Arménien," I patriarcati orientali (Rome 1968), 141–165.

For the development and rights of the patriarchates of the East there was adduced relatively late a further factor, which was destined to gain considerable importance eventually: the apostolic origin of the leading episcopal sees or the Petrine principle of the founding of churches. At the Council of Nicaea its significance was still so slight that it gained for the Bishop of Jerusalem, as already mentioned, only a "position of honor." Bishop Cyril (c. 348–386) had struggled to no purpose for an elevation in rank, with appeal to the apostolic character of his throne, and with just as little success was his successor, John (386–417), able to separate himself from the metropolitan union of Caesarea.[33] Only the tenacity and adaptability of Bishop Juvenal (422–458) succeeded, after a first ineffectual attempt at Ephesus in 431, in obtaining at the Council of Chalcedon in 451 the recognition of Jerusalem as a patriarchal see and jurisdiction over all Palestine; in this the essence of his argumentation was precisely the apostolic foundation of the Jerusalem community, which, was, moreover, distinguished as the site of the resurrection of Christ.[34] Whereas Pope Leo I at first sharply censured Juvenal's procedure at Ephesus—he must at that time have made use of unauthentic documents—in his later correspondence with Juvenal he passed over the opportunity in silence.[35]

The principle of apostolic origin also played a role in the protracted conflict between the patriarchate of Antioch and the episcopate of the island of Cyprus in regard to its ecclesiastical independence.[36] The bishops of Antioch apparently concluded from the privileges confirmed at Nicaea and from the political membership of the island in the Diocese of Oriens its subordination to Antioch. Thus Bishop Alexander, who induced Pope Innocent I (402–417) to write to the Cypriots to admonish them to observe the canons, and also John of Antioch (420–441) urged the right of their see to ordain the metropolitan of the island, but the Council of Ephesus decided to maintain the previous custom whereby the bishops of the island ordained their newly elected metropolitan.[37] When c. 488 the Patriarch Peter repeatedly demanded the subordination of Cyprus, referring to the fact that the island received the faith from Antioch, an apostolic foundation, the Cypriot bishops could outdo this argument. The discovery of the alleged tomb of the Apostle Barnabas in 488 proved unambiguously the apostolic origin and hence the equality of rank of the Cypriot Church with the Antiochene. The Emperor Zeno thereupon assured for the island, with a series of distinctions for the archbishop, the definitive independence later called autocephaly.[38]

---

[32] Cf. besides W. de Vries, Mél Tisserant, and W. F. Macomber, "The Authority of the Catholicos Patriarch of Seleucia-Ctesiphon," I patriarcati orientali, 179–200, also J. M. Fiey, "Les étapes de la prise de conscience de son identité patriarcale par l'Église syrienne orientale," OrSyr 12 (1967), 3–22. The so-called Chronicle of Arbela can no longer be quoted as source for this development; see J. Assfalg, OrChr 50 (1966), 19–36, and J. M. Fiey, OrSyr 12 (1967), 265–302.

[33] For Cyril, Sozomen, HE 4, 25, 2; for John, Jerome, C. Joann. Hieros., c. 37.

[34] Cf. especially E. Honigmann, "Juvenal of Jerusalem," DOP 5 (1950), 209–279.

[35] Leo I's rebuke to Juvenal: Ep. 119, 4; the later correspondence: Ep. 139 and 159.

[36] See R. Janin, "Chypre," DHGE XII, 791–810.

Rome most effectively represented the principle of the apostolic origin of the patriarchal see as the basis of the higher organization of the greater churches. Even if in the pre-Constantinian period the political importance of Rome may also have had a certain influence on its ecclesiastical ascent, in the corresponding expressions of its bishops this played as little a role as in other writers before Chalcedon.[39] When the political rank of Constantinople was urged as the motive for the establishing of a higher rank for its bishop, again and again recourse was had against this "political" argumentation, first by Pope Damasus, who would admit only the really "Petrine" sees of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch,[40] through Boniface I, who protested against an edict of Theodosius II in 421 which granted to Constantinople the privileges of Old Rome,[41] down to Leo I and especially Gelasius I, who found in the Petrine Principle of the founding of churches not only the strongest weapon against the claims of Constantinople, but because of the unique relation of the Apostle Peter to the Roman community regarded themselves as justified in understanding Rome in an entirely specific sense as the Sedes Apostolica and themselves as the heirs of Peter's privileges.[42] It speaks in favor of the strength of the notion of apostolicity that it even exerted its impact on Byzantium. From the seventh century on, the see of Constantinople was increasingly called "apostolic," in the beginning perhaps as a consequence of the discussion of the title of "Ecumenical Patriarch," and then it was reinforced in the course of the Iconoclast quarrel. In the ninth century the apostolic character of the see of Constantinople was further supported by the thesis that it was the heir of [37] Innocent I, Ep. 24; Council of Ephesus, can. 8: Mansi 4, 1465–1470.

---

[38] Report on the discovery of Barnabas's relics: Theod. Lector, HE 2, 2; see H. Delehaye, "Saints de Chypre," AnBoll 26 (1907), 235ff.

[39] The claim of canon 28 of Chalcedon, that "the Fathers had conferred on the see of Old Rome its privileges, because this city was the imperial city," cannot be attested by any text.

[40] Preserved in the so-called Decretum Gelasianum, PL 13, 374.

[41] Boniface I, Ep. 14, 15.

[42] See the following chapter on Leo I.

Ephesus and hence of the Apostle John, and then by the connection with the legend of the Apostle Andrew, who through his disciple Stachys brought about the christianization of Byzantium and whose relics were venerated from the fourth century in the Church of the Apostles. Thus was the route opened for the theory of the Pentarchy, according to which five patriarchs were instituted by the Holy Spirit to govern the Church as successors of the Apostles and supreme Shepherds of equal rank.[43]

The patriarchates of the East represent, without doubt, a pluralist element in the organizational structure of the Early Church. This pluralism grew spontaneously from different presuppositions and factors. Rome recognized it in principle, where it could be supported on apostolic origin. But together with this pluralism there went the possibility of manifold tensions and conflicts, especially when a patriarch, as in the case of Rome, felt he must understand his eminently apostolic origin as the mission of leadership within the Universal Church. The ups and downs of these tensions and conflicts belong from then on to the exciting themes of Church history.

Ecclesiastical Assemblies

The institution of the ecclesiastical assembly, familiar from the pre-Constantinian period and called concilium or synodus,[44] was further elaborated in the fourth century and completed by new forms. At Nicaea the dates for the holding of the provincial synod were established: twice a year, at the beginning of Lent and in the fall, all the bishops of an ecclesiastical province were to meet in order to discuss questions of Church discipline. The observance of this rule had to be repeatedly inculcated later, with constant appeal to the decision of Nicaea.[45] It was the business of the metropolitan to invite the bishops to the synod, at which he also presided. The duty of all bishops to take part was enjoined, and unjustified absence was punished.[46] The subject of the discussions was especially the disciplinary and liturgical regulation of the communities of the province, the examination of the legality of episcopal elections that had taken place, and the erection or division of bishoprics. The provincial council was functioning in the fourth and fifth centuries wherever the metropolitan organization had been introduced. Apparently it was in greater use in the East than in the West, where it was known in North Africa, Gaul, and, except in the fifth century, also in Spain. But it was not in use in Italy, where interprovincial forms of ecclesiastical assembly did not permit it to appear. As the lowest degree of all synods it knew no collaboration of the State officials, either in the summoning or in the execution of its decrees. Even if the provincial synod had certain characteristics common to the State provincial assemblies, nevertheless the cause of the ecclesiastical institution cannot be seen in these: their existence as early as the age of the persecutions, but especially the foregone conclusion of the process, make such a borrowing improbable and unnecessary. But probably the analogous profane institution may have been of influence in the development of an "order of business" for the synod in the fourth and fifth centuries, and hence for the course of the sessions, the role of the presidents, the manner of voting. Because of their eminent ability in function, which lay in the limited number of participants, the homogeneity of the geographical area, the limited nature of the questions to be treated, and the frequency and regularity of the meetings, the provincial synods of the Early Church had a great significance for the regulation of the day-to-day life of the ecclesiastical communities.

---

[43] F. Dvornik, op. cit., chaps. 4, 6, 7.

[44] Cf. A Lumpe, "Zur Geschichte der Wörter concilium und synodus in der antiken Latinität," AHP 2 (1970), 1–21.

[45] Council of Nicaea, can. 5; Council of Antioch, can. 20; Council of Chalcedon, can. 19; Council of Riez (439), can. 8; Council of Orange (441), can. 28 (29); Leo I, Ep. 14, 7.

[46] Council of Laodicea, can. 40; Council of Chalcedon, can. 19; Council of Carthage. (401), can. 10; Council of Arles II, can. 19.

The plenary council of the North African Church represents the organizationally most mature form of a synod comprising several ecclesiastical provinces. It was supposed to take place annually and thereby adopted the principle of the periodicity of the provincial synod.[47] All the ecclesiastical provinces of North Africa had to send at least three representatives to this plenary council: they were elected from the members of the provincial synod.[48] Under the presidency of the Bishop of Carthage, it concerned itself chiefly with questions which directly affected the entire North African Church, but it could also take a position on problems of the Universal Church and for weighty cause be convoked for an extraordinary session.[49] The African plenary council distinguished itself in the confrontation with the Donatist Church, in the condemnation of Pelagianism, and in the discussion with Rome over the rights of the African Church, by a high degree of firmness and independence.

The synods which the Bishop of Alexandria convoked were councils of the entire Church of Egypt, which knew no division into metropolitan provinces. Hence all the bishops of that country and of Libya and the Pentapolis took part. They were not held at periodic intervals but only when it seemed advisable to the Bishop of Alexandria. Antioch also knew interprovincial synods, in which, however, neither the group of participants seems exactly fixed nor can a regularly recurring time for their convocation be discerned.

---

[47] Breviar. Hippon., can. 5 (Carthage 397); Cod. eccl. afr., can. 73 (Carthage 401).

[48] Cod. eccl. afr., 14 and 127 (Carthage 418, 419). For the province of Tripolis there was only one representative because of the small number of bishoprics.

[49] Cod. eccl. afr., 94 and 95.

Among all the interprovincial councils a clearly unique position belongs to the Roman Synod,[50] which represented the ecclesiastical assembly of all bishoprics which were subordinate to the Bishop of Rome as the single Metropolitan of Italia Suburbicaria. It not only dealt with questions which applied to the bishoprics of this territory but also intentionally made decisions on events and problems that primarily concerned other ecclesiastical spheres of jurisdiction, as, for example, the Donatist question, the case of Athanasius at the Synods of 340 and 353, the Antiochene Schism at several synods under Pope Damasus in 368, 377, and 382, the affair of Chrysostom under Pope Innocent I, and finally the question of Nestorius under Celestine I in 430 and the Synod of Ephesus of 449 under Leo I. Here the powerful role of the Roman Bishop is clear: as president, he used the Roman Synod as framework and forum for decisions that he intended to have regarded as binding on ecclesiastical territories outside his own metropolitan sphere.

In Upper Italy too there appeared interprovincial councils under the direction of the Metropolitans of Milan (Ambrose), Aquileia, and later also of Ravenna, as the normal form of the ecclesiastical meeting. Although in Gaul, despite several attempts, no ecclesiastical center could achieve the position of, let us say, Carthage, here too from the end of the fourth century the synod embracing several ecclesiastical provinces grew in importance, as the gatherings at Valence in 375, Bordeaux in 384, Turin in 398–400, Riez in 439, Orange in 441, and Vaison in 442 prove.[51]

Both the regularly recurring as well as the extraordinary interprovincial councils were, with few exceptions, summoned by the bishop of the current ecclesiastical center. The convocation of the great ecclesiastical assemblies, whether the episcopate of a part of the Empire or that of the entire Empire was invited to them, came directly from the Emperor, mostly at his initiative, at times at the request of the Roman Bishop.[52] The first example of an imperial summons was present at the Synod of Arles in 314, to which Constantine I invited all bishops of his sphere of rule.[53] That the Emperors understood the convocation as the proper act of the ruler's will is especially clear from this, that eventually they intended to punish any bishop who did not attend; hence they expected not only gratitude for a support given to the Church but obedience to a command. They not only created the technical presuppositions for the meeting of the council, which would, moreover, have overburdened the Church: they also determined the date and decided the exact group of participants and to a degree also the subject of the conciliar discussions. Although no secular or ecclesiastical law defined the imperial right of convocation, at this time it was not denied by any council or by the Roman Pope, but was expressly recognized, as, for example, by Leo I, who, after the disappointment of the Synod of Ephesus of 449, asked the emperor Theodosius II "to arrange" a new council.[54] The imperial interest in the council convoked by him extended also to the course of the discussions, from which concrete results were expected. Hence, the Emperor was usually represented at the council by high officials, who, it is true, did not exercise the presidency, but saw to the orderly course of the debates and again set in motion business that had come to a standstill.[55] The bishops' freedom of speech and of decision was in principle substantially respected, apart from the authoritarian interference of the Emperor Constantius II, who at the Synods of Arles in 353 and Milan in 355 sought to extort a condemnation of Athanasius by threat and physical strength.[56] That the Emperors confirmed the decrees of the great councils and gave them the force of law in the secular sphere was, after all, only normal.[57]

---

[50] See, besides G. Roethe (literature), also H. Marot, "Les conciles romains des IV^e^ et V^e^ siècles," L'Église et les églises 1054–1954, Mélanges L. Beauduin I (Chevetogne 1954), 209–240.

[51] E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne I (2nd ed.), 340–348: Les conciles interprovinciaux; J. Gaudemet, "La législation des conciles gaulois du IV^e^ siècle," Proceedings of the Third International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, Strasbourg, September 1968 (Vatican City 1971), 1–13.

Of course, the conciliar decrees received their validity within the Church, not from the imperial confirmation, but from the council itself. It is true that the Pope did not take part personally in any council outside Rome, but he was represented by his legates. If the participants made known to him the outcome of their deliberations, this did not happen at first in order to procure for them their force in law.[58] A new development is not apparent until the fifth century and thereafter. After the Synods of Carthage (416) and Mileve (417), the African bishops asked from Rome the confirmation of their decrees in order to obtain greater esteem for them; Rome more and more claimed the right to examine conciliar decisions and, if necessary, to reject them if they contradicted the Church's understanding of tradition and the faith. Leo I clearly regarded himself as the court which was set over the council and from which it received its authority.[59]

---

[52] F. Dvornik, "Emperors, Popes and General Councils," DOP 6 (1951), 3–23; A. Mozzillo, "Dei rapporti tra gli imperatori ed i concili ecumenici da Costantino a Giustiniano," Archivo Giuridico 147 (1954), 105–128.

[53] See examples of invitations from the Emperor to Arles in H. v. Soden, Urkunden, nos. 14 and 15.

[54] Ep. 43.

[55] Especially apparent at Chalcedon; see supra, chap. 7.

[56] See supra, chap. 3.

[57] For Nicaea, Rufinus, HE I, 5; imposed by the Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 38; 16, 11, 2; Constantinople of 381: Cod. Theod. 16, 1, 3; Ephesus: Mansi VII, 495; Chalcedon: Cod. Just. 1, 3, 23.

A new type of synod developed from the second half of the fourth century in Constantinople, where the bishops who were just then staying in the imperial capital met with the local bishop, probably mostly at the suggestion of the Emperor, to discuss important ecclesiastical happenings or problems. Since the presidency devolved upon the bishop of the capital, this gathering of bishops, called Synodus Endemousa, became an important factor in the constructing of the authority of the see of Constantinople and, in a further development, an important administrative organ of the Byzantine Church.[60]

---

[58] The canons of Nicaea were not presented to him at all; the decrees of the Synods of Arles and Serdica were made known to him so that he might publish them.

[59] Epp. 44–45; 47–48; 50–51; 103; 105; 120; 146–149.

[60] Cf., besides J. Hajjar, also R. Potz, Patriarch und Synode in Konstantinopel (Vienna 1971), 17–31.

CHAPTER 15

The Further Development of the Roman Primacy from Melchiades to Leo I

Even in the pre-Constantinian period of Church history a position of preeminence of the Roman community and its head within the Universal Church had developed; it became especially obvious under Victor I and Stephen I.[1] For the further growth of such a claim to leadership it had to be of decisive significance how the Empire, once it had become Christian, would react to this, since to it likewise was conceded a special position, based on religion, in the developing Church of the Empire. When in 313 Constantine I denied the proposal of the Donatists to have their quarrel with Bishop Caecilian of Carthage settled by a secular court and referred this task to an episcopal court under the direction of the Roman Bishop Melchiades (311–314), [2] this was neither an unjustified interference of the Emperor into inner-Church matters nor, on the other hand, the recognition of a Roman claim to primacy, but simply regard for an already acknowledged preeminence of the Roman See in the Latin Church of the West, to which corresponded also the special treatment of the Roman community, as manifested in the gift of the Lateran Palace as the episcopal residence and in the encouragement of church construction, especially in the erecting of St. Peter's basilica by the Emperor. Since, however, the verdict of the episcopal court was not accepted by the Donatists, the Emperor regarded himself as justified, in the interest of peace, on his own initiative but without any objections on the part of the Church, in convoking a synod of the bishops of his area of rule to Arles in 314; at it Pope Silvester I (314–335) was represented by two priests and two deacons. The absence of the Roman Bishop was explained without difficulty by the pressing tasks which his office, just assumed, placed on him in Rome. But the members of the Synod themselves knew of a preeminence of the Roman See, since they first made known to Silvester the results of their discussions with the purpose that the Universal Church should be informed of them from Rome; hence they saw in Rome a sort of central office of information for the other churches. Their address, Gloriosissime Papa, for Silvester does not, of course, entitle one to see here an official title given to the Pope by the Emperor whereby the Emperor had included the Bishop of Rome in the rank of the secular gloriossimi: rather, it was an allusion and evidence of the Pope's position as a confessor in the Diocletian persecution.[3] In the early phase of the Arian controversy Pope Silvester was surprisingly of little prominence, partly perhaps because the discussion occurred chiefly in the East and because another western bishop, Hosius of Córdoba, was the Emperor's adviser. At the Council of Nicaea Rome was again represented by two priests; however, it is not clear whether they played a special role in the discussions, especially in the formulation of the Nicene Creed. The later important religious political measures of Constantine do not allow one to see any special contacts with the occupant of the Roman See, just as in general the two decades of Silvester's pontificate found no noteworthy place in contemporary literature. Later legend abundantly filled up this vacuum when it supplied the relations of the first Christian Emperor to the contemporary Roman [1] See vol. I, chap. 26.

---

---

[2] Letter of Constantine to Melchiades: Eusebius, HE 10, 5, 18–20; on the legal side of the process, cf. H. U. Instinsky, "Kaiser Konstantin und das Gericht des Bischofs Miltiades in Rom," Bischofsstuhl und Kaiserthron (Munich 1955), 59–82.

[3] The letters of Constantine to the Synod of Arles and the letter of the members of the Synod to Silvester in H. v. Soden, Urkunden zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Donatismus (Bonn 1913), nos. 14–18. On the address gloriosissime, see Instinsky, op. cit., 83–101.

Bishop with fanciful details, which first appeared in the Actus Sancti Silvestri that originated in Rome in the fifth century and tendentiously attributed the conversion, baptism, and miraculous healing of the Emperor to Silvester, who in return was recompensed in imperial style with privileges and gifts. To the later forger of the so-called Donation of Constantine, the Constitutum Constantini, these "acts" offered welcome material.[4]

Bishop Mark (336), who held office only a brief nine months, was succeeded by Pope Julius I (337–352), during whose pontificate the preeminence of Rome could develop in relatively greater freedom of movement, since the sons of Constantine were at first much less active in ecclesiastical political matters than was their father. Above all, in the confrontation over the person and affair of Athanasius the papal authority could strengthen itself considerably in East and West. It is significant that both the opponents and the adherents of Athanasius turned to the Roman Pope to obtain from him approval of their attitude. First it was the Eusebians who sought at Rome the recognition of Pistus, designated by them as Bishop of Alexandria, and even proposed a synod which should confirm the deposition of Athanasius. Athanasius and the Alexandrian Church also sought justice at Rome, the former in person when he was expelled by Constantius from his episcopal city. And Bishop Marcellus of Ancyra, deprived of his office by the Eusebians, went to Julius I, since he expected to be rehabilitated by him. A Roman Synod in the autumn of 340 or at the beginning of 341 under the leadership of the Pope decided that Athanasius and Marcellus were to continue as the legitimate occupants of their sees; Julius I justified the decrees of the Synod in a comprehensive, well-balanced letter[5] to the Eusebians, who had remained away from it, and stressed unambiguously that, according to ancient prescriptive law, it had been their duty to turn first to Rome in the matter of Athanasius "so that from here it could be decided what was right." The Pope regarded himself also as qualified to dispense justice that was binding in the ecclesiastical affairs of the East and referred in this connection to a tradition descending from the Apostle Peter.

The awareness of being obliged to act for the Universal Church was expressed in Julius I's initiative with which he asked the Emperor Constans to convoke an imperial synod which should definitively settle the conflict. Since the Eusebian bishops refused their collaboration from the start, the Synod of Serdica (342 or 343) did not take place as a general council and even later it was not evaluated as such, even if the western bishops, together with a few Greeks, discussed questions and issued decrees which applied also to the Eastern Churches, such as the vindication of Athanasius and Marcellus and the punishment of the leading Eusebians. They communicated the results of their deliberations to the Universal Church, even the canons which stated the right of appeal of bishops to the Pope and awarded to the Pope the supreme judicial right of decision.[6] However, the East did not accept the decrees of Serdica and so they could affect the position of the Roman Bishop only in the Latin Church. But there is no doubt that through the shrewd and decisive intervention of Julius I on behalf of Athanasius the moral reputation of the Pope was notably strengthened.

---

[4] Basic for the origin of the Silvester Legend is W. Levison, Aus rheinischer und fränkischer Frühzeit (Düsseldorf 1948), 390–465; on its effect, E. Ewig, HJ 75 (1956), 10–37. New edition of the Constitutum Constantini by H. Fuhrmann, Fontes Iuris Germanici Antiqui, fasc. X (Hanover 1968).

[5] Preserved in Athanasius, Apol. contra Arianos 21–35, loc. cit., can. 35; see P. P. Joannou, op. cit., 66–70.

With the acquiring of sole rule by Constantius in 353 there also began for the Latin Church a decade in which the Church's freedom was not only curtailed but forcibly suppressed by the despotic imperial caprice. No bishop had to taste it so bitterly as did Julius's successor, the former Roman deacon Liberius (352–366), in whom the papacy of the fourth century experienced its deepest humiliation and hence strong damage to its authority. In the first three years of his pontificate[7] he appeared throughout as the firm defender of the Nicene faith and its champion Athanasius and aimed to promote this twofold concern to victory at a synod in Aquileia, which he requested from the Emperor. When, instead of this, Constantius at Arles in 353 extorted the condemnation of Athanasius by the Gallic bishops and the Pope's representatives, Liberius bitterly deplored the collapse of his legates and of the Gallic episcopate and stated that he would prefer to die rather than to consent to decrees which contradicted the gospel.[8] Two years later he had to experience again that the majority of the bishops at Milan (355) succumbed to the pressure of the imperial threats and assented to the condemnation of the Bishop of Alexandria. In the letter to the three bishops who had been exiled then—this time his legates also stood firm, despite abuse—he courageously declared his solidarity with them and asked their prayers that he might withstand the attacks falling upon him and maintain faith and Church intact.[9] Then after the Synod of Milan the [6] For the documents of the Synod see W. Schneemelcher, "Serdika 342," EvTh (special issue 1952), 83–104, especially 94. The canons in C. Turner, Ecclesiae Occid. Monumenta Iuris Antiquissima I, II, 3 (Oxford 1930), 452–544; see H. Hess, The Canons of the Council of Serdica A.D. 343 (Oxford 1958).

---

[7] For the context of the events see supra, p. 45.

[8] Letter to Hosius of Córdoba in Hilary, Fragm. hist. 6, 3.

[9] Ibid. 6, 1–2.

Emperor exerted an enormous physical and psychological pressure on Liberius in order to extort from him his assent to the verdict of condemnation on Athanasius—testimony of the high moral authority of the Roman Bishop, which even the pagan Ammianus Marcellinus recognized as the motive of Constantius's procedure.[10] But neither threats nor presents, which an envoy of the Emperor alternately offered the Pope, nor the Emperor's violent fits of anger at a conference in Milan, where Liberius had been brought from Rome by night, could move the Pope to yield. Only a two-years' exile to Beroea in Thrace, thereupon decreed, combined with the persuasive tactics of the local bishops, adherents of the Emperor, and an agonizing homesickness, brought about the emotional breakdown, which caused the Pope to write those letters that were so seriously damaging to him, in which he broke off the Church's communion with Athanasius and with no sense of honor begged for only one thing—to be allowed to return to Rome.[11] A fall of Liberius into heresy, such as Jerome claimed some years later, cannot be maintained, since, while the Pope did indeed sign the first and the third creeds of Sirmium, which excluded the homoousios, they otherwise permitted a quite orthodox interpretation. For the Pope's personal esteem, the disloyalty toward Athanasius weighed heavily enough; he was so compromised that Constantius could coolly disregard him in the following years. Rome was neither invited to the Synod of Rimini in 359 nor was any effort made this time to obtain its assent to the decrees: its voice now carried no weight in the Emperor's ears. Even if the sympathies of a majority of the Roman community were with the returning exile and forced Felix, who had been made Bishop of Rome by Constantius in Liberius's absence, to leave the city, Liberius knew that at first he had to be silent. He seems not to have tried to make a personal vindication of his conduct, but his eager exertions for a rapprochement and reconciliation of the strictly Nicene with the Homoiousian faction after the death of Constantius and his clear repudiation of the creed of Rimini–Nice may have been regarded by him as a sort of making amends.[12] However, later Roman tradition harshly judged his failure and put, not him, but his temporary opponent Felix (II) in the list of legitimate Popes.[13]

---

[10] Ammianus Marcellinus, 15, 7, 10: "auctoritate potiore aeternae urbis episcopi firmari desiderio nitebatur ardenti."

[11] The letters must be regarded as authentic, since even Athanasius, Hilary, the Luciferians of Rome, and Jerome clearly speak of a collapse by Liberius; see the evidence in J. Zeiller, "La question du pape Libère," BullAncLitArchCrét 3 (1913), 20–51, especially 22f.; P. P. Joannou, 125f., speaks unconvincingly against it, again of forgeries.

[12] Letter to the bishops of Italy in Hilary, Fragm. hist., and to the eastern bishops in Socrates, HE 4, 12.

[13] See Duchesne, LP, Introduction, CXXff. A verbose, laudatory epitaph (Diehl, ILCV, no. 967) can hardly refer to Liberius.

Popes Damasus I and Siricius

A consequence of the case of Liberius was, finally, the serious disturbances within the Roman community which broke out at the election of his successor. A minority, which rejected any reconciliation with the former adherents of Felix (II), quickly decided for the deacon Ursinus, whereas the majority chose the deacon Damasus (366–384) as bishop; while he may perhaps have been a partisan of Felix for a time, after the return of Liberius from exile he firmly adhered to him. Several bloody clashes of the two competing factions claimed more than 100 dead, for which, according to the version of Ursinus's adherents, Damasus alone was said to be responsible, whereas the pagan Ammianus Marcellinus saw the cause of the chaos in the unchecked striving of both candidates for the Roman episcopal dignity, which assured its bearer a life in easy circumstances and external honors that of course was in sharp contrast to the simple life of self-denial, but deserving of respect, of some bishops abroad in the provinces. Even when order was gradually restored in Rome externally by the State authorities, the conflict smoldered for a year still, since the schismatic congregation of Ursinus persisted. It obtained new support when a Jew, Isaac, who had temporarily converted to Christianity, complained to the Prefect of the City against Damasus because of offenses not named in detail, and Roman clerics were tortured in the course of the trial.[14] The imperial court acquitted Damasus, but he later used the case as the occasion to propose to the Emperor a comprehensive new organization of spiritual jurisdiction. A Synod convoked by him in 378, which again rejected as calumnies the complaints lodged against him by Isaac, submitted two proposals to the Emperors. In the event that clerics from Italy did not recognize a verdict pronounced against them by a spiritual court, the case should, with the aid of the State power, be sent to the court of the Bishop of Rome, but in the rest of the Empire to that of the metropolitan, while for trials of metropolitans the Bishop of Rome was exclusively competent. But he should be answerable only to the imperial council in the event of an accusation, in case the matter could not be settled by the sentence of the Roman Synod.[15] With these proposals Damasus was certainly trying to expand and guarantee a special spiritual jurisdiction recognized by the State and to obtain for the Roman Bishop in particular a privilege that would clearly have underlined his preeminent position in the West. The reaction of the Emperors to these proposals was curious: in regard to the first they granted more than was asked, since they extended the cooperation of the State in the execution of episcopal judgments to the entire western part of the Empire, but they indirectly rejected the second, the specially requested judicial competence of the Roman Bishop, with the vague explanation that the well-known sense of justice of the Emperors made it impossible that frivolously slanderous charges would be brought against the Bishop of Rome. From whatever motives, it seemed inadvisable to the political leadership of the Roman world to grant so exceptional a position to the ranking bishop of the West: Damasus had to be content with a half-success.

---

[14] The certainly one-sided report of the faction of Ursinus: Coll. Avell., no. 1; Ammianus Marcellinus, 27, 3, 12–15; the imperial rescripts against Ursinus: Coll. Avell., nos. 5–12. The situation of the sources permits no complete reconstruction of the events, neither chronologically nor topographically; see P. Kunzle, RQ 56 (1961), 1–61, 129–166, and A. Lippold, Historia 14 (1965), 105–128.

[15] The letter of the Synod of 378: Mansi 3, 624, and PL 13, 575–584; the imperial rescript: Coll. Avell., no. 13.

In the final phase of the Arian disorders also the Pope displayed initiatives which indicate clearly his exertions to promote the importance and rank of Rome within the Universal Church. The first Synod convoked by Damasus (368 or 369–370), which dealt with the elimination of the still present Arian influence in the Latin West, stressed in a letter to the Illyrian episcopate that the Nicene Creed, which came into existence with the collaboration of Rome, was valid in the entire Roman Empire, while, on the other hand, the decrees of the Synod of Rimini (359) were without effect, because the Roman Bishop, "whose judgment must be obtained in preference to all others," had never assented to them.[16] Hence the criterion of the orthodoxy of a creed must be its approval by Rome, and this claim found expression a decade later in the well-known law of Theodosius I of 27 February 380, whereby the Christian faith was declared the State religion in that form which the Romans once received from the Apostle Peter and which was now professed by Bishop Damasus of Rome and Peter of Alexandria. Both here and in the question of jurisdiction Damasus had apparently not recognized how doubtful it was to claim state aid for establishing his preeminent position or even to permit it to grant it. Too easily could the privilege become an oppressing shackle.

In the East also Damasus sought energetically to have Rome's authority recognized, not always successfully of course, especially in the question of the Schism of Antioch, in which Rome, informed solely and inadequately by Alexandria, clung stubbornly to the person of the Old Nicene Paulinus and by which it evoked the strong displeasure of Basil of Caesarea because of the arrogant tone of several Roman documents, even though Basil assigned to Rome a deciding function in questions of faith.[17] Damasus resolutely made use of this when at a Roman Synod in 378 or 382 he solemnly rejected the errors of Sabellius, Arius, Eunomius, the Macedonians, and others and transmitted these anathemas as the authoritative decision of Rome to Paulinus of Antioch,[18] to whom he had had sent a creed earlier, which was to serve as a standard to decide with whom communion was possible according to the Roman view and with whom it was not possible.[19] Damasus tried to influence the appointment to the See of Constantinople when he rejected the elevation of Maximus the Cynic, urged by Alexandria, and commissioned Bishop Acholius of Thessalonica to work at the approaching Council of 381 for the election of a worthy man who could assure the peace of the Church.[20] It was, of course, precisely two canons of this Synod which gravely impeded any binding intervention by Rome into the inner ecclesiastical affairs of the East. While canon 2 defined the jurisdictional spheres of the eastern patriarchates, without even mentioning Rome, canon 3 gave to the Bishop of Constantinople "the primacy of honor after the Bishop of Rome, because that city is the New Rome."[21] Hence it could not but be welcome to Damasus when persons from the East applied directly to Rome and in individual cases asked its help, as, for example, did Paulinus of Antioch and Epiphanius of Salamis, to whom was accorded participation in a Roman Synod, or when Christians from Beirut asked of Rome a condemnation of their former Bishop Timothy. He aptly esteemed such "appeals" as an expression of the reverence which belonged to "the Apostolic See," because Peter had once taught in this Church.[22] With this formula, which merely completed the identification of the Roman episcopal see with "the Apostolic See"—it is first met under Pope Liberius and was used by Damasus with unambiguous frequency—the Pope claimed a rank which was based not on Rome's political importance but on the quite special relation of the Apostle Peter to this community. But since it also appears in letters to the Greek East, which likewise exhibited apostolic churches, Rome intended to have preeminence in their regard also. This is confirmed by the fact that this formula, quickly accepted in the West, encountered a clear reserve in the East and here Rome was regarded only as one Apostolic See among several.[23] Among these ideas of Damasus on a Roman preeminence within the Universal Church is to be included a text which is found in the so-called Decretum Gelasianum and was probably formulated at a Roman Synod under Damasus, perhaps in 382. Here the "Petrine" sees are presented in the order of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, but at the same time it is stressed that the Roman See owes its primacy not to synodal decrees but to the Lord's words in Matthew 16:18, and that this rank was further reinforced by the double martyrdom of Peter and Paul in Rome.[24] If the document actually goes back to the Synod of 382, it is easily understood as Rome's stand with reference to canons 2 and 3 of the Council of Constantinople of the previous year and it again shows Damasus as a resolute champion of a steadily growing claim to a Roman Primacy, which through him found hitherto unknown formulations. Noteworthy grounds also give reason to see Damasus as the author of a comprehensive letter to the Gallic bishops. Here he asks those to whom he is writing, who have applied to the authority of the Apostolic See, to pay attention to what he has to say, and he warns them not to tolerate certain abuses in the Gallic clergy. He states impersonally that this or that is forbidden, that a person is excluded from the communion of the Apostolic See if he does not hold to what Scripture, apostolic discipline and tradition, the things handed down by the Fathers, and the regula ecclesiastica have established. Fundamentally new decisions or laws are not issued. Hence in this letter there is a sort of preliminary stage of the papal decretals, the content and form of which was perfected only under the next Pope.[25]

---

[16] Damasus, Ep. 1, which was later sent also to all bishops of the East.

---

[17] See supra, p. 66; see also Basil, Ep. 263.

[18] It is the so-called Tomus Damasi (PL 13, 358ff.), which P. Galtier, RSR 26 (1936), 385, ascribes to the Synod of 382 and whose author he regards as Ambrose.

[19] Damasus, Ep. 3.

[20] Damasus, Ep. 5 and 6 to Acholius.

[21] Text of the canons: COD, 27f., see also supra, p. 75.

[22] Paulinus and Epiphanius in Rome: Jerome, Ep. 108, 6; 127, 7; on Timothy of Beirut: Damasus, Ep. 7.

Another aspect of the many-sided activity of Pope Damasus is disclosed by his correspondence with Jerome, whom he took for a while into the service of the papal chancery: his interest in the Bible, in individual points of exegesis as well as, especially, in a revision of the Latin translations of the Bible that were often different from one another and faulty. That he entrusted Jerome with this task marks him as a far-sighted initiator of a work which was destined in the future to exercise a wide-reaching impact as the Vulgata.[26] In Rome itself the name of Damasus lived on in the numerous—fifty-nine—metrical inscriptions, which, not without an overestimation of his poetical abilities, he composed for many occasions and had carved in noble characters on marble by the master Furius Dionysius Philocalus. They were intended chiefly for the glory of the most distinguished Roman martyrs, for the church buildings constructed or restored by him, and for the remembrance of the deceased of his family. The inscription for his own tomb simply professes his faith in the resurrection through Christ.[27]

---

[23] Evidence in P. Batiffol, Cathedra Petri (Rome 1938), 151–168; up to the Council of Ephesus of 431 Sedes Apostolica does not usually occur in the exclusive Roman understanding in eastern texts, and later only sporadically.

[24] Edition of E. Dobschütz, Das Decretum Gelasianum (TU 38, 3, Leipzig 1912); on the discussion of the decree see the literature in E. Caspar, I, 598f., in addition to G. Bardy, DBS III, 579–590, and E. Schwartz, ZNW 29 (1930), 161–168. On the emphatic appeal to Paul and Peter, cf. H. Chadwick, "Neotestam. et Patristica," Festschr. O. Cullmann (Leiden 1962), 313–38.

[25] As Ep. 10 among the letters of Siricius (PL 13, 1181–94), critical edition by E. Babut, La plus ancienne décrétale (Paris 1904), 69–87; literature in Haller, I, 2nd ed., 510, in addition to E. Dekkers, Clavis, no. 1632, and A. Hamman, PL 1, 309 and 568, both of whom regard Damasus as the author.

Into the concept of the leadership role of the Roman Bishop as developed by Damasus his successor Siricius (384–399) introduced no decisively new characteristics. The former deacon of the Roman community was, probably with an eye to possible intrigues by the still living Ursinus, elected without delay and emphatically recognized by the court.[28] Surely the sarcastic remark of Jerome on the simplicitas of the new bishop, who judged all others in accord with his own caliber, is full of resentment, since Jerome himself, as he states,[29] was regarded according to an almost unanimous judgment as a worthy successor of Damasus. But it reveals a grain of truth when Siricius was gauged against the figure of the contemporary Bishop Ambrose of Milan. In the latter's hands, not in Rome, met the great threads of Church politics: Ambrose corresponded with the bishops of the East, guided important superregional synods, and was the decisive conversationalist of the Emperors and of the imperial administration, whereas the activity of Siricius remained confined to the inner sphere of the Latin Church, and here he followed the guidelines developed under Damasus. His importance lies in the fact that he further developed, both in content and in form, into a serviceable instrument, the initial steps achieved by his predecessor for an independent papal legislation that embraced the entire Church of the West. This becomes evident in the voluminous document which is present in the letter of the Pope to Bishop Himerius of Tarragona in Spain,[30] a reply of the Apostolic See to questions on a rebaptism of former Arians, on the dates of baptism and problems of penance, on monastic and clerical discipline. Just as the Emperor gave a responsum provided with the force of law to the relatio of a provincial governor, so here the Pope took a position in regard to the report of the Spanish bishop and issued legally binding rules for the questions raised, and he no longer recommended their observance: he commanded it—jubemus; inhibemus; mandamus; decernimus; tenenda sunt decretalia constituta; quae a nobis sunt constituta, intemerata permaneant—and threatened sanctions for disregard. Siricius justified his full authority by reference to his office, which laid on him the care for all, whose burden he has to bear, which rather the Apostle Peter bears in him, who guards him as the heir of his full authority in all his measures (Ep. 1, 1). Anyone who does not adhere to the order given by him separates himself from the safe apostolic Rock on which Christ built his Church. The addressee is ordered to bring these statuta apostolica to the knowledge of the bishops of the provinces of Cartagena, Baetica, Lusitania, and Galicia. Here for the first time are found all the material and formal elements which constitute the essence of the papal decretals, which in the future were only refined in details and achieved the highest importance.[31] Similarly Siricius declared in a letter to the bishops of North Africa, in which he made his own the decrees of a Roman Synod, that everyone is excluded from communion with Rome who does not comply with the directions given here.[32] A decree to the bishops of Central and South Italy on the conditions for admission to the episcopal office was again based on the cura omnium ecclesiarum, laid on the Pope, and stressed that unity in faith demands also unity in tradition.[33] A letter to the Bishop Anysius of Thessalonica made known Rome's special interest in the ecclesiastical affairs of the Balkan Peninsula. To the bishop was entrusted control of all episcopal ordinations in Illyricum and there was an allusion that for such an office a cleric of the Roman Church might be considered, if necessary. Here a stage of that development became clearly discernible which had already begun under Damasus and was completed with the formal erection of the Papal Vicariate of Thessalonica under Innocent I.[34] Siricius intervened in the emotional discussion which was kindled by the former ascetic Jovinian, who denied the value of fasting and declared marriage and virginity equal in rank, and, according to Ambrose, denied the virginitas Mariae in partu. At the Synod of 390 Siricius had Jovinian and his followers cut off from the [26] Correspondence in Jerome, Epp. 19–21, 35–36; see the praefatio in quattuor evangelia ad Damasum (PL 29, 557–562). The translation of Didymus, De spiritu sancto, by Jerome was suggested by Damasus; here too see the corresponding praefatio.

---

[27] Edition by A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasi (Rome 1942); on Damasus's veneration of the martyrs cf. J. Vives, S. Dámaso, papa español y los mártires (Barcelona 1943). Damasus's own tomb inscription, no. 12, Ferrua. On the literary quality of the epigrams see S. Pricoco, Miscell. studi letteratura crist. antica (Catania 1954), 19–40.

[28] Letters of Siricius: PL 13, 1131–1196. Recognition by the Emperor: Coll. Avell., no. 4.

[29] Jerome, Ep. 127, 9; 45, 3.

[30] Siricius, Ep. 1.

---

[31] H. Getzeny, Stil und Form der ältesten Papstbriefe (dissertation, Tübingen 1922), and J. Gaudemet, L'église dans l'empire romain (Paris 1959), 220–226.

[32] Siricius, Ep. 5.

[33] Siricius, Ep. 6.

[34] Siricius, Ep. 4.

Church, while he left the verdict on Bishop Bonosus of Naïssus, who did not recognize the perpetual virginity of Mary, to the Synod of Capua directed by Ambrose in 391 and to the bishops of Illyricum.[35]

Pope Innocent I (402–417)

At the start of the fifth century stood the forceful personality of Innocent I (402–417)—his predecessor, Anastasius I, whose intervention in the Origenist controversy has already been treated,[36] was in office only three years—who sought to realize his own high notion of the primacy of the Roman Bishop with methodical determination.[37] The broad field of ecclesiastical discipline presented itself as an especially favorable area for the realization of his leadership task, perceived as a duty, since it gave occasion to manifold inquiries in Rome and made it possible for Innocent to use the now fully developed instrument of the decretals, controlled by him in a masterful way. Of course, it is found especially frequently in Rome's own metropolitan sphere, hence in the bishoprics of Central and South Italy. The inquiries made known some abuses in these churches: encroachments of one bishop on the jurisdictional area of his neighbor, laxity in regard to heretics, admission of the unworthy to spiritual office, and frequent ignorance of the liturgical and canonical prescriptions. With the bishops concerned, Innocent spoke unambiguously in the language of the superior: he preferred to give his rebukes in the ironical form of reprimand of miramur, and there was praise only when a person turned in doubt to him, ad caput atque apicem episcopatus.[38] Although from time immemorial a certain plurality prevailed, especially in the field of the liturgy, Innocent wanted to make the consuetudo Romana the sole binding norm in the entire area of Church order and, indeed, on the untenable ground that all the churches of Italy, Gaul, Spain, Sicily, and the Mediterranean islands received their bishops from Peter or his successors.[39] The same goal was pursued in the letters, written in a still more peremptory tone, to the Gallic Bishops Exsuperius of Toulouse and Victricius of Rouen,[40] at times a responsum to appropriate inquiries, which gave the Pope the gladly taken opportunity to secure outside the Roman metropolitan area legislative recognition of the Roman Church order, especially since, as he stressed, it was based on apostolic tradition and ultimately on Peter, "through whom the apostolic and episcopal office took its beginning in Christ."[41] The position of Rome as the highest court of appeals was ably underlined and in regard to content was extended by his demand that all the more important cases (causae maiores) be submitted to the Apostolic See. Since it was not decided what at a given time was to be regarded as causa maior, the Pope assured himself the possibility of intervention as he saw fit, while on the other hand the reference contained in the formula causae maiores to the supreme judicial position of Moses (Exod. 18:22) gave a biblical consecration to the Roman claim.[42]

---

[35] Condemnation of Jovinian: Siricius, Ep. 7. In addition, Jerome, Adv. Jovinianum and Augustine, De bono conjugali and De sancta virginitate, also took issue with Jovinian. On Bonosus: Siricius, Ep. 9, probably composed by Ambrose; cf. his work De instit. virginis and the appendix to his Ep. 56 (=Siricius, Ep. 9).

[36] See supra, p. 126. His extant letters: PL 20, 68–80, and PL, Suppl. 1, 790–792.

[37] The letters (35): PL 20, 463–611; 84, 657.

[38] Innocent, Epp. 37–41; quotation supra, Ep. 37, 1.

[39] Ep. 25, 2, to Decentius of Gubbio.

[40] Ep. 2 and 6. Innocent also sent a decretal to the Synod of Toledo (c. 400): Ep. 3.

The intention of Innocent I to guarantee the competence of Rome in Eastern Illyricum underlay the first extant writing from his hand, a letter to Anysius of Thessalonica, which announced the change in the Roman See and in a general formula confirmed to him the right of supervision "in that area" allegedly granted to him by his three predecessors.[43] But the Pope only took the decisive step in 415, when he commissioned Rufus, successor of Anysius, again with appeal to biblical models, to undertake "in our stead" (nostra vice) the care of all bishoprics in the Illyrian Prefecture and thereby created the Apostolic Vicariate of Thessalonica, which was supposed to guarantee the claim of Roman supremacy against Constantinople.[44]

Innocent I came into a direct confrontation with the eastern patriarchates in the course of the serious conflict centering on John Chrysostom. The latter, bishop of the capital since 398, had lost the favor of the court through his candid preaching, had become unpopular also with a part of the clergy because of his demand for an ascetic lifestyle, and finally had become the victim of the intriguing Bishop of Alexandria, Theophilus, who could never reconcile himself to the exalted rank given to Constantinople by the Synod of 381.[45] When in 404, at the Emperor's command, Chrysostom was deprived of his office and exiled to Armenia, he turned to the Bishops of Aquileia, Milan, and Rome for help.[46] Innocent I thereupon demanded the convocation of a general synod of the eastern and western episcopates at Thessalonica, adhered to this demand despite Theophilus of Alexandria,[47] and sent to the Emperor Honorius the acts pertaining to the case, with the petition to protest in this sense to his brother at Constantinople. But the treatment of the delegation dispatched by Pope and Emperor to Constantinople—it was treated en route without respect by the eastern officials, not admitted to the Emperor's presence, and forcibly sent back to Italy[48]—clearly showed the limits which were set down for a Bishop of Rome in the Eastern Empire. The effort of the Pope to display an independent initiative in a conflict within the Eastern Church miscarried; he encountered serious difficulties from the leading bishops of the East—Alexandria and Antioch—and he foundered on the attitude of the Eastern Emperor, who claimed for himself the ultimate power of decision. Thus there remained to Innocent only the formal protest and the honorable and immovable maintaining of ecclesiastical communion with Chrysostom, whose restoration to the diptychs he stubbornly demanded of the Bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople even after Chrysostom's death in 407. He utilized the correspondence with Alexander of Antioch to expound to him his idea that the supremacy of Antioch over the episcopate of the political Diocese of Oriens was based, not on imperial marks of esteem but on the decrees of Nicaea;[49] the sarcasm toward the higher valuation of the See of Constantinople by the Emperor was obvious.

---

[41] Ep. 2, 2.

[42] Ep. 2, 5.

[43] Ep. 1.

[44] Ep. 13; for the date (17 June 415) see E. Schwartz, Festschr. R. Reitzenstein (1931), 145ff., and J. Macdonald, Stpatr. 4 (TU 79), 478–482.

[45] Cf. Chr. Baur, John Chrysostom and His Time I (London 1960), 155ff.

[46] Preserved in Palladius, Vita s. J. Chrys. 2.

A highly significant possibility of realizing Innocent I's grasp of his teaching authority in the strict sense was, finally, offered by his attitude in regard to the Pelagian controversy. In 416 three letters reached him from Africa[50]—one each from episcopal synods in Carthage and Mileve, the third from Augustine and four of his fellow bishops—in which the fear was expressed that the suspected doctrines of Pelagius would continue dangerously in consequence of his rehabilitation by the Synod of Diospolis (415), unless their condemnation should follow from Rome. All three letters extolled the authority of the Apostolic See, which derived from the authority of Scripture and should confirm the verdict of the African episcopate on the heresy and thereby give it a special effect. In his reply of January 417 Innocent praised the bishops for following tradition founded, not on human, but on divine decree and for turning to the Apostolic See because they knew that all matters, even those of the most remote provinces, could not be definitively settled until they had been brought to Rome's attention.[51] This was above all true in questions of faith, in which all bishops had to turn to Peter in order to obtain from this apostolic source an answer to their questions.[52] Here Innocent expressed the conviction, the first to do so with such unambiguity, that the Sedes Apostolica possesses the highest teaching authority. It has been doubted that this conviction was shared by the African episcopate, especially since Innocent deepened and extended the notion of the authority of the Roman See. But it will have to be granted that the praise and the biblical justification of this authority, which the bishops bestowed on it, showed it on a route that would lead to its full recognition.

---

[47] Ep. 7 to the clergy and people of Constantinople, from Sozomen, HE 8, 26, 7–19. Ep. to Theophilus in Palladius, Vita s. J. Chrys. 3.

[48] Letter of Honorius to Arcadius in Innoc., Ep. 8 and 9; report on the fate of the embassy in Palladius, Vita s. J. Chrys. 4.

[49] Innoc., Ep. 12 to Chrysostom; correspondence with Alexander of Antioch and other bishops: Ep. 5; 19–21; 23–24.

[50] In Augustine, Ep. 175–177 (=Innoc., Ep. 26–28); the Pope's replies: Ep. 29–31; see W. Marschall, op. cit., 127–160.

The satisfaction of the African bishops over the decision of Pope Innocent I turned quickly into dismay when in rapid succession there arrived two letters from the Greek Zosimus (417–418), who had been elected Pope; they made known that Caelestius had exculpated himself in person and Pelagius through a profession of faith presented in writing, and that in Africa these men had been condemned frivolously and precipitately on the basis of statements of extremely doubtful witnesses; they would be regarded by Rome as rehabilitated if no one could demonstrate their alleged errors within two months.[53] But the African episcopate remained firm and forced Zosimus first to a revision, even though limited, of his verdict on Caelestius.[54] When then an African general council in May 418 again rejected the Pelagian doctrines and stated concisely that the verdict of Pope Innocent on Pelagius and Caelestius was still in effect, and when at the same time the Emperor Honorius agreed with this view and banished the adherents of the heresy, Zosimus, in accord with a Roman Synod, published an anathema on the Pelagian doctrines.[55] Although the Pope apparently had no appreciation of the theological achievement of Augustine in the Pelagian question, Augustine tried to explain in a conciliatory manner the Pope's fluctuating attitude from a pastoral care for those in error.[56]

The crude way in which Zosimus sought to correct, in accord with the

---

[51] Innoc. Ep. 29, 1.

[52] Ep. 30, 2.

[53] Letters of Zosimus: PL 20, 639–704; here Ep. 2 and 3 =Coll. Avell., nos. 45 and 46.

[54] Ep. 12 =Coll. Avell., no. 50.

[55] Verdict of the African Synod: Cod. eccl. Afr. can. 108–127; see Prosper of Aquitaine, C. collat. 5, 3. Rescript of Honorius: PL 48, 379–386. Fragments of the Epistula Tractoria of Zosimus: PL 20, 690–697; see supra, chap. 12, footnote 42.

[56] Augustine, C. duas. ep. Pel. II, 3, 5; De grat. et pecc. orig. II, 6, 7.

Roman view, the right of appeal hitherto prevailing in the African Church, had a similarly negative effect. A priest of the bishopric of Sicca, Apiarius, was stripped of his office by his bishop and had appealed against this judgment directly to Rome, contrary to African disciplinary law, which for such cases provided for, first, appeal to a neighboring bishop, then to the African general council, and directly forbade any further appeals.[57] Opposing the demand made by a papal delegation in Africa that Apiarius should be reinstated in his earlier rights, Aurelius of Carthage insisted that the matter first be treated at the coming synod.[58] This synod received the repentant Apiarius back into the communion of the Church, but ordered his removal from the see of Sicca and so informed Pope Boniface I (418–422), not without indicating how very much people in Africa were affected by Zosimus's arrogant manner.[59] When the case was exactly reenacted under Pope Celestine I in 424—Apiarius relapsed, was again excommunicated, again appealed to Rome, from where the same legate as before was sent with concrete instructions—the African episcopate reacted very decisively: for the future the Pope was not to accept any appeal from a priest condemned in Africa, not to believe complaints frivolously, and not to accept into communion persons excommunicated in Africa, since to do so was contrary to the decrees of Nicaea.[60] The last reference shows precisely that the African bishops were really concerned about the maintaining of their own rights.

It has been surmised, probably wrongly, that in his unfortunate procedure Zosimus was under the influence of a man who, without doubt, supplied the impetus for a further serious blunder by the Pope. In the latter's first letter after his election, to the Gallic episcopate,[61] Bishop Patroclus of Arles was given a series of striking privileges, which were to lead to a first serious conflict. No Gallic cleric might thereafter apply to Rome without a letter of recommendation from the Bishop of Arles; and all controverted matters within the Gallic Church were to be submitted to him, provided that, not being causae maiores, they did not have to be sent on to Rome; finally, the Bishop of Arles was elevated to metropolitan over the territory of the three provinces of Viennensis and Narbonensis I and II and the full right to ordain was given him for them. This special position was first justified by the personal merits of Patroclus, then by the false claim that Arles had received its first Bishop Trophimus from Rome and thereby had become the mother Church of all Gaul. When the directly affected Bishops of Narbonne, Vienne, and Marseille complained in Rome over the curtailment of their previous rights, they were sharply repulsed, and Proculus of Marseille was even deposed.[62] The ensuing disturbances within the Gallic Church compelled the successor of Zosimus to annul his measures and restore the ancient metropolitan order.[63] In the two years of his pontificate Zosimus had, through his ill-advised decisions, wasted much of the capital in papal authority which Innocent I had prudently and systematically collected.

---

[57] Documents on the case of Apiarius in C. H. Turner, 561–624; see E. Caspar, I, 358–360, 366–371, and W. Marschall, op. cit., 161–197.

[58] Instruction for the legates: Ep. 15. Zosimus appealed mistakenly to the canons of Nicaea instead of to those of Serdica, which were, however, unknown in Africa.

[59] Cod. eccl. Afr., can, 134.

[60] Ibid., can, 138.

[61] Zosimus, Ep. 1. On the whole matter, G. Langgärtner, Die Gallienpolitik der Päpste im 5. und 6. Jh. (Bonn 1964).

The dubious administration of Zosimus, which in his last months had even evoked opposition in his own clergy,[64] had an impact in the confusion over the selecting of his successor. There occurred a double election, since one faction proclaimed the deacon Eulalius, probably favored by Zosimus, while the majority of the priests expressed themselves for the Roman Boniface I (418–422). In accord with the report of Symmachus, Prefect of the City, the Emperor decided for Eulalius, but, when further exertions for peace were fruitless, he directed a great synod to settle the schism. However, since the adherents of Eulalius, against the imperial command, kept Rome in unrest through further demonstrations, Honorius finally decided that Boniface should assume the office.[65] Under the impression of the recent chaos, Boniface sent a petition to the Emperor, in which in a general form he requested his protection for the Church, whereupon Honorius issued a rescript prescribing that in a future double election in Rome a new election by the entire community should decide the Roman Bishop.[66] This first papal election arrangement in history, decreed by the State, had, it is true, no influence in the later period, but the esteem and independence of the Roman See at first suffered because of it.

In addition to the already treated tasks of clarifying the right of appeal of the African Church in the case of Apiarius and to the restoration of the metropolitan rights in Gaul, Boniface also faced the critical question of ecclesiastical supremacy in the Balkans. This was seriously threatened when the bishops of Thessaly, unhappy with an appointment arranged by Rome to the episcopal see of Corinth, applied to Constantinople and obtained from the Emperor Theodosius II an edict whereby all controverted cases of the Churches of Illyricum were to be submitted to the bishops of the capital of the Eastern Empire, since this city possessed the rights of Old Rome.[67] In letters to Bishop Rufus of Thessalonica, whose vicariate was confirmed, and to the bishops of Thessaly, Boniface repeated in the language of Innocent I that the care for the Universal Church was laid on the Bishop of Rome as a duty and hence included also the Churches of the East, who accordingly had consulted Rome in serious questions in the past.[68] Furthermore, the Pope induced the Emperor Honorius to write to Theodosius II, who thereupon instructed the Praefectus Praetorio for Illyricum to observe the previous order of ecclesiastical circumstances in his sphere of authority.[69] The view of Rome was clearly formulated by Boniface: that, despite all recognition of the rank of the Churches of Alexandria and Antioch, Rome alone was the head, the others were the members (Ep. 14, 1).

---

[62] Zosimus, Ep. 4–7, 10–11.

[63] Boniface (his letters: PL 20, 749–792), Ep. 3 and 13; see also Celestine, Ep. 2.

[64] Zosimus, Ep. 14.

[65] The pertinent documents in the Coll. Avell., nos. 14–37.

[66] Petition to the Emperor Honorius: Boniface I, Ep. 7; rescript on the papal election: Coll. Avell., no. 37.

The understanding of the primacy by Pope Celestine I (422–432)[70] found expression above all in the decisions which resulted from the controversy over the teaching of Nestorius. When the latter and Cyril presented to him in the summer of 430 their view of the Christological question and of the previous course of the discussion, he saw in this an appeal from the East to Rome, at once had a position adopted in regard to it at a synod, and made known its decrees to those directly concerned and to the clergy of Constantinople.[71] Cyril was commissioned,[72] "in his place," to see to the implementation of the Roman synodal verdict, which called upon Nestorius to recant and, in case of his refusal, excluded him from the ecclesiastical community. In the letter to Constantinople Celestine stressed that the Christians there were also his flock, for whom, in according with 2 Corinthians 11:28, his paternal care was intended. Here a repeated claim of the Pope became clear: the eastern Churches were also confided to his care, hence he could and must intervene in their affairs also, especially if, as here, there was a question of faith; he could make binding decisions and appoint a deputy. But the further development showed that, as previously, people were of a different opinion in the East in regard to such a claim. The decision of the [67] Edict of Theodosius: Cod. Theod., 16, 2, 45.

---

[68] Boniface I, Ep. 13–15; see Ep. 6 of the Coll. Thessal., which likewise comes from Boniface.

[69] Letter of Honorius and reply of Arcadius: Coll. Thessal., nos. 15 and 16 (in Boniface I, Ep. 10 and 11).

[70] His letters: PL 50, 417–558, and PL, Suppl. 3, 20f. In a new edition: ACO I, 1, 7, 125–137, and I, 2, 5–101. On Celestine in general: DHGE 12, 2794–2802.

[71] They are letters 11–14.

[72] Ep. 11.

Emperor to have the controversy over Nestorius settled at an imperial Synod, to which Rome too was invited, had put Celestine into a precarious position, since Rome had already taken a position and could not revise its verdict. And so the legates appointed for Ephesus received orders to consult there with Cyril, not to intervene directly in the discussion but only to express their view of the verdict rendered, and for the rest to be mindful of the authority of the Roman See. Of course, the letter to the Synod stated clearly that the legates had to carry out what had already been decided at Rome and that the Pope did not doubt that the Council would assent to these decrees.[73] But since Cyril, appealing, it is true, to his function as Celestine's deputy, without awaiting the arrival of the papal delegation, had already accomplished the condemnation and deposition of Nestorius, the verdict of Rome could only be made known subsequently to the participants in the Council. But the Roman Legate Philip ably explained their acclamations as recognition of the head by the members and declared before the assembled Synod that "Peter, head of the Apostles, pillar of the faith and foundation-stone of the Church, up to this day and for ever lives and governs in his successors" and that Celestine is his successor and representative; this Synod took note of these explanations without objection.[74] The Pope soon claimed for himself, in an assessment of the Council's work, the chief role in the outcome and stressed in regard to the clergy of Constantinople that Peter had not abandoned them in their need.[75] Thus far no Pope had emphasized to the Eastern Churches as clearly as Celestine the rank of the Roman Bishop as head of the Universal Church, but an express acceptance of his claim did not follow at Ephesus.[76]

Relations with the Eastern Churches also played a considerable role in the pontificate of Sixtus III (432–440).[77] The Union between Alexandria and Antioch of 433,[78] brought about after much exertion and not without Rome's collaboration, filled the Pope with great satisfaction; in a letter to John of Antioch he stressed how important it was to be of one mind with Rome, since in the successors of Peter was found the tradition which the latter had received.[79] The cordial relations now existing between the Eastern Churches and Rome were temporarily overshadowed by an effort by the Bishop of Constantinople, Proclus, in 434 to recover influence in Eastern Illyricum, in which he had the support of some of the bishops of the area. Sixtus discreetly repulsed this attack, on the one hand calling attention to the position and rights of the Bishop of Thessalonica as vicarius sedis apostolicae and defining them precisely, and on the other hand making known to Proclus his expectation that he would not listen to the Illyrian priests or bishops who would apply to him contrary to the law.[80] Finally Sixtus maintained the remembrance of the two important theological decisions of his time in impressive buildings. He had the Liberian basilica on the Esquiline rebuilt and in its magnificent mosaics and in its dedication inscription had the dogmatic statements of Ephesus in honor of the Theotokos published. And the transformation and decoration of the Lateran baptistery, with the distiches on the efficacy of the grace of baptism in man, recalled the defense against the Pelagian assault on the nature of Christian grace.[81]

---

[73] Ep. 17 and 18.

[74] Report on the session of 10–11 July 431: SchAC I, 1, 3, 53ff.

[75] Ep. 25.

[76] On Celestine's interest in the Irish mission, see chap. 13, p. 215.

[77] Nine letters preserved: PL 50, 583–618; PL, Suppl. 3, 22f. and ACO I, 1, 7, 143–145; I, 2, 107–110.

[78] See supra, pp. 108–111.

[79] Ep. 6.

Pope Leo the Great

In Leo I (440–461),[82] who even before his official elevation as deacon of the Roman congregation had exercised a strong influence on his two predecessors, the consciousness of the primacy in the Early Church achieved its first definitive climax.[83] This Pope was deeply convinced that only Christ is the true and eternal Bishop of his Church; he can bear the burden of his office only in reliance on him who works in him and accomplishes the right that he does.[84] But since Christ as the eternal Bishop granted to Peter an imperishable participation in his episcopal power, Peter always presides over his Roman See, and it is Peter who likewise works and acts through his heirs.[85] Leo I deepened this notion of the Roman Bishop as Peter's heir already employed by Siricius, and saw in it the real justification of the primacy: just as the heir enters into all rights and duties of the one whose heir he is, so the current Bishop of Rome, as Peter's heir, assumes his function, full authority, and privileges. Not Peter's having worked in Rome, not the possession of Peter's tomb, but the legally understood succession of the heir permits the Roman Bishop to function as Peter's vicar.[86] And furthermore, as, according to Matthew 16:18, more power was entrusted to Peter than to the other Apostles, so the same is true for the relation of his heir to the other bishops.[87] On such a basis Leo understood himself as called to an office whose burden and dignity he likewise felt. It placed on him the duty of supervising in the Universal Church the purity of doctrine and standing up for a manner of life within this community which corresponded to the gospel and the tradition of the Fathers. As no Pope before him Leo I sought to do justice to this duty, in a seriously accepted responsibility and in the awareness of a high dignity, and at the same time with a watchful eye for the possible in the concrete individual case and with diplomatic skill.

---

[80] Ep. 7, 8, and 10 =nos. 11, 12, and 14 of the Coll. Thessal. Letter to Proclus: Ep. 9 and 13 of the Coll. Thessal.

[81] On the building activity of Sixtus III see R. Krautheimer, Festschrift E. Panofsky (New York 1961), 291–302.

[82] His letters and sermons: PL 54, Suppl. 3, 329–350. New edition of the Sermones (previously 1–64) by J. Leclercq–R. Dolle: SChr 22 bis, 49, 74 (Paris 1949–61); letters: Schwartz, ACO II, 1–4. Literature on Leo I: P. Batiffol, DThC 9, 218–301; H. Lietzmann, PWK 12, 1962–1943; Altaner–Stuiber, 7th ed., 357–360.

[83] Especially important Sermones 2–5 and 82–84.

[84] Serm. 2, 1; 5, 3f.; 83, 3.

[85] Serm. 5, 4; 3, 4; 2, 2; Siricius, Ep. 1, 1. Consortium potentiae: Serm. 4, 4, 2; see M. Maccarrone, San Pietro in rapporto a Cristo (Rome 1968), 63–67.

In the territory of the Latin Church Leo's claim to leadership encountered no fundamental opposition: it was recognized, of course, without reserve by a relatively weak Western Empire. When the Pope learned of the existence in Rome of a not inconsiderable Manichaean community, he proceeded against it energetically and secured without hesitation an imperial edict which intensified the punishments already prescribed against it and for years he warned in word and writing against the Manichaean danger.[88] When various congregations of the province of Venetia enlisted the services of former Pelagian clerics without adequate supervision, he admonished the Bishop of Aquileia to greater vigilance. Learning that Priscillianism was again flourishing in Spain, he supplied in a decretal concrete instructions for the action of the bishops. Abuses in episcopal elections in North Africa, which came about in consequence of the Vandal invasion, induced the Pope to write to the episcopate of Mauretania, to demand a comprehensive report on the measures adopted.[89] Leo's jurisdictional power seems to have been questioned, and only temporarily, by a single Latin bishop, Hilary of Arles, a former monk of Lérins, in whom purely personal ascetism was joined to a strong inclination to a not always discreet supervision of ecclesiastical discipline in the whole Gallic Church. He derived the right to this from alleged privileges of the see of Arles, which he also personally defended before a Roman Synod, to which two Gallic bishops had turned with their grievances—one because he had been uncanonically deposed by Hilary, the other because he had decided on a successor in his own lifetime. Leo quashed both measures of Hilary; he left him in office, but only as Bishop of Arles, whose metropolitan rights passed to the senior bishop of the province. In a masterfully formulated and measured letter to the bishops of the province of Vienne the Pope made known his decisions and emphasized expressly that he made them in his character as successor of Peter. He aptly utilized the case to have an edict, requested from the Emperor Valentinian III for the Count Aëtius in Gaul, confirmed, to the effect that the primatial claim of the Roman Bishop was independent of any consent by the State.[90] Since Hilary submitted to the Roman judgment, the case remained only an episode without that importance which is at times ascribed to it. Leo I had to call his vicar at Thessalonica to order when the latter exceeded his authority in regard to the metropolitans of his territory. In a formula become famous, which was later to enjoy great vogue at the papal chancery, the Pope made clear to him that the Roman Bishop had summoned him, in transmitting the vicariate, only to a share in his care as shepherd, not to the fullness of his power. Leo found an equally clarifying expression for the meaning and range of episcopal collegiality: all bishops are equal in dignity, but not in rank, as was already the case in the Apostolic College, since preeminence was given to one. From this pattern (forma) was deduced its measure in the pastoral care, which was different according to the importance of the individual see, but the care of all of them flowed together into the comprehensive care of Peter's see for the Universal Church: only a concordia sacerdotum thus understood guaranteed the unity of the Church.[91]

---

[86] Serm. 3, 4: "cuius [scl. Petri] vice fungimur." On the justification of the primacy from the hereditas sedis, cf. W. Ullmann, "Leo I and the Theme of Papal Primacy," JThS n. s. 11 (1960), 25–51.

[87] Sermo 4.

[88] Leo, Ep. 7; 8 (Edict of Valentinian III); Serm. 16, 22; 24; 34; 42; 76; cf. also Prosper of Aquitaine, Chron. ad ann. 443.

[89] Against the Pelagians: Epp. 1 and 2; Priscillianists: Ep. 15 to Turribius of Astorga; see B. de Gaiffier, AnBoll 59 (1941), 34–64, and J. Campos, Helmántica 13 (1962), 269–308. Decretal for Africa: Ep. 12.

However, the real and decisive testing area for the possibility of realization of Leo's understanding of the primacy was and remained the Churches of the East. Already in his letter of congratulations to Dioscorus of Alexandria, who had announced his election, the Pope in a cautious formulation mentioned that unity must prevail between Rome and Alexandria, since in the Roman Church the traditions of Peter, honored by the Lord with the primacy, were held in respect and in Alexandria those of his disciple Mark, and between teacher and pupil no opposition should exist.[92] A direct reply from Dioscorus to Leo's letter is not extant, but what he really thought of Rome's position in the Universal Church was expressed clearly in the treatment which he accorded to Leo's legates at the imperial Synod of Ephesus in 449.[93] He imperiously pushed aside their demand that the Synod at least let the papal verdict on the teaching of Eutyches, as contained in Leo's letter to Flavian of Constantinople, be read, and just as coolly he disregarded the Roman protest against the deposition of Flavian. This unambiguous nonrecognition of any special position of Rome by the Church of Alexandria was accompanied by the negative attitude of the Emperor Theodosius II, who bluntly rejected the combined petitions of the Pope, the Emperor Valentinian III, and the latter's mother Galla Placidia for the convoking of a new council in Italy. In his reply to Valentinian he consciously spoke only of the "Patriarch" Leo, whereas the letters of the Western imperial family clearly referred to Rome's universal rank.[94] It is true, the Pope had often extolled in lyric terms the importance of the imperial office for maintaining the purity of the faith and had characterized its representatives as inspired by the Holy Spirit, but the real value of such formulations becomes discernible when it is established that Leo I by no means now abandoned the Eastern Church to the leadership of the Emperor. On the contrary, he was obliged to remind it continually of its duty to protect and be vigilant, did not hold back with pronounced criticism of the failure of Ephesus in 449 for which the Emperor was largely responsible, and demanded that a new council must correct "quae contra fidem facta sunt," and he even expressed his concern that the Emperor could in regard to a truth of faith become the victim of deception.[95] Certainly, the bishops deposed at Ephesus in 449—Flavian, Eusebius of Dorylaeum, and Theodoret of Cyrrhus—turned to Rome for help and to some extent expected or asked of the papal authority direct reinstatement in their former offices, but such voices remained isolated.[96]

---

[90] Leo I, Ep. 10; Edict of Honorius: ibid., Ep. 11; see E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne II (Paris 1957), 160–170.

[91] Leo I, Epp. 6 and 14; 14, 1: "vices enim nostras ita tuae credidimus caritati, ut in partem sis vocatus sollicitudinis, non in plenitudinem potestatis." On the episcopal office, ibid. 14, 11.

---

[92] Leo I, Ep. 9.

[93] On the prehistory and course of the Synod of Ephesus and the Council of Chalcedon, see supra, chaps. 7 and 8.

[94] Letters of Leo and of the imperial family: Epp. 54–58; replies of Theodosius: Epp. 62–64.

[95] Cf. the letters of Leo to Theodosius and Pulcheria: Epp. 43–45 and Ep. 54 ("indefessis precibus divinam misericordiam posco, . . . ne falli vos patiatur"). Cf. P. Stockmeier, Leo I. d. Gr. Beurteilung der kaiserlichen Religionspolitik (Munich 1959).

[96] Letters of Flavian and of Eusebius: ACO II, II, 1, 77–81; of Theodoret in Leo I, Ep. 52.

Like Pope Celestine earlier at Ephesus in 431, now Leo I had to be concerned that at the Council of Chalcedon his doctrinal decision contained in the Epistola ad Flavianum should not be again questioned. In keeping with this concern was the conduct of his legates, who repeatedly stressed the supreme teaching authority of Rome and intended to prevent any procedure that contradicted this notion.[97] As a matter of fact, no formal objection to it was raised at the Council, and the legates could have seen from their point of view a recognition of the Roman standpoint in several incidents, as in the third session of the Council, in which under their presidency and in their formulation, the verdict on Dioscorus was handed down, which referred expressly to the Roman primacy.[98] They could, like Leo himself later, find great satisfaction in the acclamation which greeted the Epistola Dogmatica—"Peter has spoken through Leo"—and interpret this in the sense of an approving confirmation of the Roman teaching authority. In reality the situation was by far not so clear. Without doubt, the letter to Flavian was once again discussed, and a group of the bishops had hesitations because of certain formulations, which had to be cleared up. The acclamations for the Epistola must obviously be understood as the Council's confirmation that Leo's teaching concurred with the tradition of the Fathers; hence the Council regarded itself as authorized, first to examine it and then to proclaim it. The Council acted even more independently in questions of jurisdiction, as, for example, the reinstatement of the deposed bishops, which it decided lay within its competence.[99] This independence appears most strongly in the decree of the Council which is contained in the so-called canon 28 and granted to the see of Constantinople the same rights as the Roman See possessed, since they were of equal rank as the imperial cities. From this was derived for the Bishop of Constantinople the right to ordain all the metropolitans of the Dioceses of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace and of all bishops in the areas bordering these territories. The Council maintained this decree against the protest of the papal legates, but after the conclusion of the sessions turned to the Pope, again expressly recognized his teaching authority, explained the meaning of the canon, and asked him "through his recognition to honor" this decree also. The Emperor Marcian and Bishop Anatolius also petitioned Leo in the same sense.[100] Leo's protracted comments in letters to the imperial pair and to the Bishop of Constantinople evaluated canon 28 as a serious affront to the decrees of Nicaea and solemnly declared it invalid,[101] but achieved only a temporary suspension of the decree.

---

[97] On the following cf. W. de Vries, "Die Struktur der Kirche gemäss dem Konzil von Chalkedon," OrChrP 35 (1969), 88–122.

[98] Verdict on Dioscorus: ACO II, 1, 15ff.; in Latin: Leo I, Ep. 103.

[99] Leo I, Ep. 98.

[100] Text of the canon: ACO II, I, 3, 89–94; letter of the Council: ibid., 116–118. Letters of Marcian and Anatolius: Leo I, Ep. 100f.

Glancing at this complex situation, one must say that the Council of Chalcedon did not express an unlimited and full recognition of Leo's understanding of the primacy, but the Roman teaching authority in the strict sense found a measure of assent previously unknown and later never again realized, whereas a competence of Rome in questions of ecclesiastical discipline and jurisdiction could not be established, but was only occasionally accepted by individual bishops. How unenduring was even this relative success was quickly revealed by the struggle that at once began in the East over the validity of the Council of Chalcedon.[102] Of course, in the West the primacy of the Roman Bishop was no longer challenged in the full breadth understood and formulated by Leo I. Certainly, the surpassing personality of this Pope contributed to this: in the contemporary West no figure of similar importance could be set beside him. Above all, through Leo's fearlessly standing up for the protection of Rome and Italy in the face of Attila (452) and of the Vandal King Gaiseric (455),[103] the Pope had become the support and anchor in their earthly misery in the eyes of many in place of an imperial office that was completely breaking down.

---

[101] Leo I, Ep. 104–106.

[102] See Chalcedon II, 13–177.

[103] Prosper, Chron. ad ann. 452 and 455.

CHAPTER 16

The Clergy of the Church of the Empire

At the beginning of the fourth century there had long been a general conviction that, within the Christian community, there had to be a special clerical state with various ranks, to each of which were allotted specific duties in the service of the community. The synodal and papal legislation of the age, as well as the initiative of individual bishops, tried to assure to the mandate of this state the highest possible efficacy, especially by defining the conditions for admittance, more clearly distinguishing the spheres of activity of the individual offices from one another, and caring for the spiritual and intellectual formation of its members. Individual authors produced outlines of a priestly ideal, which could keep alive the seriousness and meaning of the priestly mission.

The Various Orders

The actual division of the clergy into two groups, characterized by Innocent I as clerici superioris and inferioris ordinis,[1] was familiar to the fourth century. To the first clearly belonged bishops, priests, and deacons, whose ordination was reserved exclusively to bishops and whose special rank was also recognized by state legislation.[2] The lesser ranks, on the contrary, were subject to wide variations, not only in regard to their number and esteem but also to their field of activity.[3] The orders most often named in the sources—those of subdeacon, acolyte, exorcist, porter, and lector—were not actually found in all local congregations, nor was admission to the next highest order strictly related to the exercise of the preceding degree; there was not even agreement whether each of the orders named really represented a clerical function. The lectorship[4] was usually regarded as the stage of entry into the clerical career: in the fourth century it was often conferred on boys who seemed suited for the clerical state. At first the lector was responsible for the reading of the Scripture in the liturgy, later also for the singing of the psalms. The East gradually distinguished the singer from the reader, without however ordaining the former for his function,[5] whereas in Rome the liturgical choir was constituted of lectors. Since the function of the lector presupposed a certain education, this order was usually regarded as the necessary preliminary for admission to one of the higher orders.[6] The office and function of the porter are rather hazy in the sources: in the enumeration of the orders by Siricius, Innocent I, and Zosimus it was not usually mentioned, whereas at the end of the fifth century Gelasius I named it but did not count it in the clerical state. However, it existed at Milan under Ambrose, in Africa the porter was regarded as a cleric, and the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua expressly speak of his ordination. In the East the function appeared in some sources of the fourth century, but the Apostolic Constitutions did not know any ordination to it. In the time of Justinian, the porter no longer belonged to the clergy and was not again mentioned after the [2] Even a chorepiscopus could ordain a priest or deacon: Council of Antioch, canon 10. A rule of the Emperor Arcadius decided that bishops, priests, and deacons could not be required to serve in a curia: Cod. Theod. 12, 1, 163.

---

[1] Ep. 2, 3.

[3] Cf. especially W. Croce, op. cit.

[4] See H. Leclercq, "Lectorat," DACL VIII, 2247–2269; A. Quacquarelli, "Alle origini del lector," Convivium Dominicum (Catania 1959), 381–406.

[5] Council of Laodicea, can. 23, 24; Const. Apost. 2, 26, 3; Jerome, Ep. 52, 5. Only the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, probably compiled by Gennadius of Marseille c. 475, in canon 98 name as the last clerical stage the psalmista, probably adopted from the East.

[6] Council of Serdica., canons 10 and 13 respectively; Test. D.N.J. Chr. 1, 45.

Trullan Council. The name and the presentation of the church keys in the ordination probably assigned to him a supervision of the church and of those present during the celebration of the liturgy.[7] The Apostolic Constitutions also denied a special ordination for the office of exorcist, since he possessed a charism directly bestowed by God for his task, which consisted in the care of the catechumens and energumens. In East and West the function clearly lost importance from the fifth century and finally ceased to exist.[8] Whereas the office of acolyte was never able to establish itself in the East,[9] it acquired in the West, and especially at Rome, a certain respect: its holders appeared as the assistants of the subdeacons in the liturgy, although they are found in Gaul only toward the end of the fifth century.[10] The subdiaconate must be regarded as a splitting-off from the office of deacon, but its functions were not, of course, clearly defined everywhere. At Rome its number corresponded to that of the Seven Deacons, and this indicates them as their assistants. Their cooperation in the liturgy, as with the case of the acolytes, gradually withdrew behind tasks which were entrusted to them in the administration of Church property.[11] In the course of the fourth century there occurred in the rapidly growing communities a further differentiation of the duties of deacons and priests; their more precise definition led on occasion to considerable difficulties. Since the deacons were in many respects the direct cooperators of the bishop, at times even his representatives—they played a special role in the administration of Church property, in the choice of candidates for ordination, and in liturgical functions—their reputation and influence were quite often greater than that of the priests. At Rome they constituted the collegium of the Seven Deacons, whose head was called the archdeacon by the end of the fourth century, and it was mostly from their number that the Pope (or also the Antipope) was elected.[12] The sources make known that they rather often claimed liturgical functions that were reserved to the priests or in general sought precedence over these. And so various synods had to remind them of their real rank and clearly relegate them to the place behind the priests.[13] These had full authority to administer baptism and celebrate the Eucharist in the event that they were appointed to a church of their own; otherwise, they supplied for the bishop in these functions in his absence. At times they were even entrusted with preaching, which was basically the bishop's responsibility.[14]

---

[7] Cf. DACL XIV, 1525–1533; R. Gryson, "Les degrés du clergé et leurs dénominations chez s. Ambroise," RBén 76 (1966), 119–127.

[8] DACL V, 964–978; Const. Apost. 8, 26; W. Croce, op. cit., 264.

[9] Only Eusebius, Vita Const. 3, 8, mentions acolytes once in the retinue of the bishops at the Council of Nicaea.

[10] DACL I, 348–356; Stat. eccl. ant., can. 94.

[11] DACL XV, 1619–1626; Council of Laodicea, can. 21, 23, 25.

[12] On the Roman deacons cf. V. Monachino, La cura pastorale a Milano, Cartagine, e Roma nel sec. IV (Rome 1947), 327f. For the Popes from the college of deacons, see M. Andrieu, "La carrière ecclésiastique des papes," RevSR 21 (1947), 90–120. Diaconate in the East: P. Rentinck, La cura pastorale in Antiochia nel sec. IV (Rome 1970), 172–175.

In the fourth and fifth centuries attempts were made to reevaluate the priesthood with a view to the rank of the bishop and also to justify this in theory. The notion of one Aërius of Sebaste, for whom the episcopate and the priesthood were equal in rank, was rejected by Epiphanius of Salamis on the ground that only the bishop could ordain priests. Chrysostom also saw as the sole difference between priest and bishop the full power of the latter to perform the ordination of clerics.[15] In the West the Ambrosiaster and Jerome regarded the distinction between the two orders as not original, since priest and bishop are in principle sacerdotes; the later distinction in rank goes back, they said, to mere considerations of expediency. Similar ideas are found in the treatise De septem ordinibus (after 420) and, independently of it, in Isidore of Seville.[16] Tendencies of this sort were however rejected by Innocent I, who expressly calls priests secundi ordinis, and later by Gelasius I, who aimed to penalize with deposition the encroachments of priests, e.g., the ordaining of acolytes and subdeacons and the preparation of the chrism.[17]

While the Synod of Serdica enacted the general rule that the cleric should prove himself for a time in the individual orders before he could advance to a higher one, Popes Siricius and Zosimus established definite intervals—tempora, the later interstices—for remaining in one order, but the observance of this had to be again imposed by Leo I. Then Gelasius I championed the noteworthy idea that these prescriptions were to be treated flexibly and should be accommodated to the contemporary demands of preaching.[18]

As regards the numerical strength of the clergy, both in individual communities and in entire provinces and countries, there are few reliable reports from this period, but no doubt in the Church of the Empire of the fourth century it grew considerably in proportion to the number of Christians. Complaints about the lack of recruits for the priesthood were raised in Africa, however, at the time of the Donatist controversy and in Italy as a result of the chaos of the migrations of the peoples.[19]

---

[13] Gaudemet, op. cit., 103; the "haughtiness" of Roman deacons was strongly censured by the Ambrosiaster: Quaest. Vet. et Novi Test. 101 (CSEL 50, 193ff.).

[14] Ibid. 101, with footnote.

[15] Epiphanius of Salamis, Adv. haeres 74, 5; John Chrysostom, In ep. I ad Tim. hom. 11.

[16] See J. Lécuyer, "Aux origines de la théologie thomiste de l'épiscopat," Gr 35 (1954), 56–89.

[17] Innocent I, Ep. 25, 3; Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 6; cf. Leo I, sermo 48, 1; Ambrosiaster, In 2 Tim. 3, 10.

[18] Gaudemet, op. cit., 149–152; Gelasius, Ep., 14, 2.

Preliminaries for Admission to the Clerical State

In contrast to certain particular early Christian factions, such as Montanists or Priscillianists, the Church of the Empire on principle admitted only men to clerical orders. Deaconesses, who in the Latin West never achieved the same importance as in the East, were, it is true, inducted into their state by a special rite—imposition of hands and prayer—but the really sacramental sphere was not open to them. Their service was chiefly oriented to the women of the community, whom they prepared for baptism, took care of in the actual baptism, nursed in sickness, and acted as their contact with the clergy of the community.[20]

Ecclesiastical legislation of the period in general required for admission to the individual orders a maturity corresponding to their importance, but in determining the age for ordination it was still fluctuating and not uniform.[21] From the decretal of Pope Zosimus on the length of the interstices the following minimum ages result: for the acolyte and subdeacon, twenty-one; for the deacon, twenty-five; for the priest, thirty years. The most frequently mentioned age for the ordination of a bishop varied from forty-five to fifty years of age.[22] The numerous exceptions indicate that these statements referred to standards whose observance could be disregarded if there was question of the ordination of an especially qualified man. For example, Ambrose of Milan became a bishop eight days after his baptism at the age of twenty-four, and Hilary of Poitiers before he was thirty-five; Epiphanius of Pavia (d. 496) became a subdeacon when he was eighteen, a deacon at twenty, a priest at twenty-eight, and in the same year he was made a bishop.

The previously universally observed requirement of physical integrity and psychological health in the candidate for ordination was differentiated from the fourth century. Not only self-mutilation but strongly deforming scars or the lack of a bodily member excluded one from ordination,[23] as did mental disorder and epilepsy.[24] But more important for the Church was the fitness in moral character for the ecclesiastical state, and the testing of this was demanded with increasing urgency. This testing included a rather protracted probation of the previous layman in the faith and a moral life, and so the ordination of a neophyte was possible only by way of exception.[25] This probation clearly had to be denied to those who had apostatized in a persecution.[26] But a greater flexibility was shown to those who came to the Catholic Church from a schismatic or an heretical community, and on occasion their clerics might be left in their previous rank, as in the case of the Novatians at Nicaea and of the Donatists in North Africa.[27] It was more difficult to determine an objective standard for the evaluation of moral qualities. The general view was that no fitness for the clerical state was present in those who had had to submit to public ecclesiastical penance because of serious sins.[28] The earlier mentioned Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, a sort of manual for the clerical state, demanded that, in addition to usurers, agitators and those who took justice into their own hands were excluded from orders.[29] That these norms were often not observed is proved by the complaints, raised again and again, by the Popes on the ordination of indigni and the exclusion, decreed by them, of the guilty from the clerical state.[30] That the clergy had to have at its disposal an extensive theological and pastoral knowledge because of its duty of proclaiming the faith and caring for souls was stressed by many authors and bishops of the time as well as by the Popes of the fourth and fifth centuries,[31] but the sources provide only slightly varied statements on the contemporary educational program of clerics. The leading bishops and theological writers of the age, a minority compared to the totality of the clergy and for the most part members of the educated class, had attended the profane schools of the fourth and fifth centuries and hence were also in a position to acquire the requisite theological knowledge through private study.[32] In the East this group could acquire a high degree of theological formation at the few theological schools, of which at that time the Asceterium of Diodorus at Antioch occupied an exalted rank.[33] There were also men with this type of education who regarded certain fields of profane knowledge as necessary for a deeper grasp of theology. But the great majority of the lesser clergy at this time had at their disposal no theological institutions with a definite program of studies, and so the clerical aspirants were for the most part introduced by the contemporary local clergy into Scripture, the manner of administering the Sacraments, and the rest of pastoral activity. Under especially favorable conditions, as, for example, in large communities or under a bishop who welcomed initiative, a sort of scholastic instruction could develop, as was already foreshadowed in the Roman schola cantorum of the third century and then must be assumed in the beginnings of the vita communis of the clergy of the Church of Vercelli under Bishop Eusebius (d. c. 371) and for some communities of North Africa.[34] The clergy of the congregation of Hippo obtained an optimal formation under Augustine in his monasterium clericorum, but in his letters he had at times to complain in distress about the low level of knowledge of some clerics in the country.[35] From the fifth century also some monasteries of the Latin West acquired a great importance for the education of clerics, as, for example, the South Gallic island monastery of Lérins, from which proceeded many bishops, who then sought to form the clergy in their sees on the Lérins model.[36] The heart of the priestly education was generally considered to be the knowledge and understanding of Scripture, which was strictly demanded by all the contemporary "mirrors" for priests and bishops.[37] The Statuta ecclesiae antiqua required that it be ascertained in a candidate for the episcopacy before his ordination that he possessed a satisfactory literary education, was familiar with Scripture and reasonable in interpreting it, that he knew the doctrines of the Church and concurred with the basic truths of faith.[38] The cultural and economic crisis that accompanied the migration of the peoples and the consequent lack of recruits naturally caused these requirements often to be to a great extent disregarded.

---

[19] For North Africa see R. Crespin, op. cit., 55–60; other references in Gaudemet, op. cit., 106f.

[20] The most important sources in J. Mayer, "Monumenta de viduis, diaconissis virginibusque tractantia," FlorPatr 42 (Bonn 1938); also A. Kalsbach, RAC IV, 917–928 (with literature). On the problem of the ordination of deaconesses: P. H. Lafontaine, 64–67, and R. Gryson, Le ministère des femmes.

[21] Lafontaine, 164–216.

[22] Zosimus, Ep. 9, 3; earlier, Siricius, Ep. 1, 9–10.

---

[23] Council of Nicaea, can. 1; Jerome, Ep. 52, 10; Innocent I, Ep. 37, 1, 3; Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 2.

[24] Council of Elvira, can. 29; Council of Orange (441), can. 15(16); Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 2.

[25] Lafontaine, 354–393.

[26] Council of Nicaea, can. 10.

[27] Ibid., can. 8 and 19. On the Donatists, see R. Crespin, op. cit., 99–103.

[28] Siricius, Ep. 1, 14; Council of Toledo I, can. 2; Innocent I, Ep., 2, 2; 39; Statut. eccles. ant., can. 84; Augustine, Ep. 185, 10, 45; Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 2.

[29] Statut. eccles. ant., c. 55.

[30] Damasus, Ep. ad Gallos episc. 5; 14; 16; Siricius, Ep. 1, 8; Innocent I, Ep. 2, 2; 39; Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 2.

[31] Lafontaine, 311–334; R. Lebel, "La formation intellectuelle et pastorale des prêtres au grand siècle patristique," Le prêtre hier, aujourd'hui, demain (Paris 1970), 102–114.

---

[32] Cf. Augustine, Ep. 21, in which he asks Bishop Valerius for the free time.

[33] R. Leconte, "L'asceterium de Diodore," Mélanges bibliques A. Robert (Paris 1959), 531–536.

[34] For Vercelli, Ambrose, Ep. 63, 65. Several synodal decrees from North Africa require that youngsters being considered for the clerical career should be instructed in Scripture and the conciliar decrees before ordination: Breviar. Hippon., canons 1–2; Council of Carthage, canon 3; conc. eccl. afr., canon 18.

[35] Cf. F. van der Meer, Augustinus als Seelsorger (Cologne 1951), 270–280.

[36] E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, 3 (Paris 1965), 332–341.

[37] Worthy of mention here are all the homilies of John Chrysostom; Jerome, Ep. 52 ad Nepotianum (c. 8: sermo presbyteri scripturarum lectione conditus sit); Augustine, Doctr. christ. (4, 6: scripturarum tractator et doctor); Gregory I, Ep. 4, 29; 5, 48; 10, 34; 13, 15.

[38] Statut. eccles. ant. I.

Certain structures of the society of late antiquity also presented the Church and State of the fourth and fifth centuries with problems in regard to admittance to the ecclesiastical state, and both of them, at times from different motives, tried to solve them, for the most part in the same direction. For example: the slave was basically an equal and full member of the Christian community, but his social and legal lack of freedom in contemporary society often made him seem as unsuited for a clerical function as were the serfs bound to the soil on the State domains or the estates of the owners of latifundia by the colonate legislation. Even the freedman was to be included with them in a certain sense, since he remained bound to his former lord through various obligations, and in certain cases the lord could cancel the manumission. And so the Synod of Elvira (c. 306) forbade the ordination of freedmen whose patroni were still pagans, a prohibition which the First Synod of Toledo (400) modified to the extent that it made the admission dependent on the consent of the former lord.[39] Pope Leo I expressed himself in a general way against the ordination of slaves and other dependents, because their ties to their lords did not permit them to devote themselves totally to the service of God.[40] Pope Gelasius I justified this regulation on the ground that the ordination of these unfree would disregard the rights of others and the state legislation, except in the case of the colonus who had obtained the written permission of his lord. Slaves ordained contrary to this rule had to return to their lord, unless they were already priests; deacons could retain their office only if they supplied a substitute to their lord.[41] The state laws here mentioned by Gelasius were, first, a decree of the Emperor Theodosius II, which forbade the ordination of a colonus without the consent of his lord and only permitted one already ordained to continue in the service of the Church if he paid the tax laid on him and a substitute took over his former duties. Furthermore, a decree of the Emperor Valentinian III forbade the ordination of slaves and coloni and left bishops and priests from these classes in their offices only if they had already occupied them for thirty years.[42] In addition, state legislation sought to keep members of individual professions or holders of state or urban offices from entry into the clerical state because they seemed indispensable for the operation of the administration and the economy. These included especially the decuriones, members of the urban curiae; the holders of this office formerly desired it, because it was privileged, but later it became a compulsorily hereditary administrative function, and from the third century its holders were subject to growing financial burdens since they had to be responsible from their own resources for the raising of the taxes assessed on their city and in addition had to perform costly services for the State and the community. A possible way of escaping from such burdens was entry into the ecclesiastical state (or into a monastery); hence in the late Empire this was forbidden to decuriones by frequently renewed state legislation or was made more difficult by financial sanctions.[43] The Church formally yielded to these demands, but only half-heartedly, since it had to be concerned for adequate recruits to the clerical state. Popes and synods, it is true, repeatedly referred to the observance of the imperial directives but only rarely pronounced corresponding penalties against those who violated them and again and again subsequently granted a dispensation.[44] For its part, the Church had hesitations about the admission of former state officials, who after the reception of baptism could have been forced, for example as soldiers or judges, to shed blood or to preside over pagan feasts.[45] Here the long existing Christian conviction that one in so "secular" a service could be freed of guilt only with difficulty came into operation in a concrete manner. According to another interpretation, former administrators of property or trustees could be ordained only if they proved that they were free of all possible obligations arising from their previous activity.[46]

---

[39] Council of Elvira, can. 80; Council of Toledo I, can. 10.

[40] Leo I, Ep. 4, 1.

[41] Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 2; 14, 14; 20; 50.

[42] Theodosius II =Cod. Just., 1, 3, 16; Valentinian III: Nov. 35, 3 and 6.

Clerical Marriage and the Beginnings of Celibacy

At the beginning of the fourth century there were in the Church clerics of all ranks of the hierarchy who continued, without any limitations, the married life they had entered before ordination and others who, of their own accord, had decided for continence in marriage or for the renunciation of any marriage. In the pre-Constantinian sources married clerics are naturally mentioned more frequently than the unmarried. From the third century, in the wake of the high esteem of the ideal of virginity, the continentia of the clergy was extolled with great praise. Tertullian and Origen made clear their sympathy for it, and justified it with the greater efficacy of its prayer and the special purity required for intimacy with the Christian mysteries. Clement of Alexandria adduced as motive for the continence of the clergy, which he found in the Apostle Paul, the greater availability for the care of souls and the example proposed to virgines.[47]

---

[43] Cf. A. H. Jones, The Late Roman Empire II (Oxford 1964), 745f.

[44] Innocent I, Ep. 3, 4; 37, 3; Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 3; 15, 1.

[45] Damasus, Ep. ad Gallos episc., 10; Siricius, Ep. 6, 1, 3; 10, 5, 13; Innocent I, Ep. 3, 4; Council of Toledo I (400), can. 8.

[46] Council of Carthage (348), can. 8 and 9.

Of the married cleric it was at first required only that his marriage be spotless in every respect, that is, that both spouses enter into marriage as virgins and always maintain mutual fidelity. A second marriage did not measure up to this ideal, and so a man who had remarried or the husband of a widow was excluded from the clerical state. This rule at first lasted throughout the fourth century, but even so there were in the East discussions as to whether a marriage contracted before baptism should be considered here and whether the prohibition of the second marriage applied only to the higher orders. However, one who, when unmarried, had received one of these orders could not later enter into a marriage; a possibility envisaged by the Synod of Ancyra (314) that a deacon might, at his ordination, reserve for himself the right to a later marriage was soon abandoned.[48] True, in the East there was no lack of tendencies which desired of the married cleric, especially in the higher orders, a total continence in his marriage, but the Council of Nicaea had not accepted a motion for a legal stipulation in this sense.[49] And the Synod of Gangra (340 or 341) had sharply rebuked the adherents of Bishop Eustathius of Sebaste, who demanded the strictest asceticism, because they refused to take part in the Eucharist celebrated by a married priest. The Canons of Hippolytus rejected the demand that a priest to whom a child was born should be deposed, and the Apostolic Canons forbade a bishop, priest, or deacon to dismiss his wife "on the pretext of piety."[50] It was only under the Emperor Justinian I that the practice of the Eastern Church experienced a substantial limitation, when he forbade a man who had children or grandchildren to be ordained a bishop: concern for them could all too easily distract him from his duties toward God and Church and bring him into the temptation to bestow ecclesiastical property on his descendants. The definitive legislation for the Eastern Church came from the Quinisext Council of 692, which required of the married candidate for the episcopacy separation from his wife and her entrance into a monastery, whereas it permitted to priests and deacons the continuation of their marriage and demanded continence only on days on which they celebrated or concelebrated the liturgy.[51]

---

[47] R. Gryson, Origines, 7–32.

[48] Council of Ancyra, can. 10; see N. Jubany, AST 15 (1952), 237–256.

[49] Sozomen, HE 1, 11.

[50] Council of Ancyra, can. 10; Can. Hippol., no. 8; Can. Apost., no. 5

[51] On the legislation of Justinian and of the Quinisext, see R. Gryson, 110–123.

In the Latin West the development ran in another direction, since here from the late fourth century, under the authoritative leadership of Rome, the demand was made and firmly established by law that clerics of the higher orders were obliged, if they were married, to absolute continence after ordination. It is true that such an obligation was first stated at the beginning of the century at the Spanish Synod of Elvira,[52] but it remained a local matter. The first Roman document that was concerned in detail with the question was the letter of Pope Damasus I (366–384) to the Gallic episcopate. It justified the regulation by arguing that a bishop or priest, who preached continence to others, had himself to give an example and must not esteem physical fatherhood more highly than the spiritual fatherhood which his office so often bestowed on him. The model of the Apostle Paul and that of the priesthood of the Old Testament obliged the servants of God always to preserve themselves "pure," since they had to be prepared at any moment to administer baptism, to celebrate the Eucharist, and to reconcile sinners. The violation of this "cultic purity" by the priest meant that he did not deserve this name and was not worthy to have the mysterium of God confided to him.[53] Damasus's successor, Siricius (384–399), took up the question in two other decretals, which disapproved strongly of the practice whereby in Spain remarried men were admitted to the higher orders without objection from bishops or metropolitans or that priests, after their ordination, continued married life and for this even appealed to the priesthood of the Old Testament: for the future, he declared, no bishop, priest, or deacon who violated this law would find clemency or pardon.[54] Around the turn of the fourth to the fifth century the strict continence of married clerics in the three higher ranks of the hierarchy was a clearly decided question in the pronouncements of the Popes. Innocent I added to the decrees of his predecessors the provision that a monk who aspired to admission to the clergy must not for that reason count on being freed from the obligation of celibacy that he had earlier assumed. The further inculcating of the rules of continence by Popes Zosimus (417–418) and Celestine I (422–433) made it clear, of course, that violations still had to be deplored again and again. Leo I (440–461) finally extended the law, without detailed justification, to subdeacons, whose growing approach to direct service at the altar brought them closer to the deacons.[55]

The papal legislation on clerical marriage at once found expression in the synodal decrees of various ecclesiastical territories. The Synod of Carthage of 390, referring to the enactments of an earlier council, imposed total continence on bishops, priests, and deacons, and, like the Popes, justified it by their service at the altar. Eleven years later a Synod of Carthage of 401 decided that offenses against the law should be punished by the removal of the guilty from their offices. Such sanctions seem rarely to have been necessary, since Augustine expressly praised the model attitude of the African clergy in this matter.[56] The Synod of Turin in 398 issued similar rules for Upper Italy, and for the Balkans Pope Leo I expressly confirmed the regulations already long in force there.[57] Likewise, the Synod of Toledo in 400 admitted into its decrees the directives on clerical marriage given by Pope Siricius for all the Spanish provinces.[58] In Gaul the effects of the papal decretals were felt only relatively late at the First Synod of Orange in 441, which for the future would only admit married men if they bound themselves to continence.[59]

---

[52] Council of Elvira, can. 33.

[53] Damasus, Ep. ad Gallos episc. 2, 5–6.

[54] Siricius, Ep. 1, 15, 20; Ep. 5, 3–5.

[55] Innocent, Ep. 2, 10–13; Zosimus, Ep. 9; Celestine I, Ep. 4, 6–8; Leo I, Ep. 14, 4.

Not only the papal decretals but the corresponding synodal legislation were motivated in their requirement of the sexual continence of the higher clergy most often by the cultic purity requisite for the administration of the Sacraments. In this unsatisfactory justification there operated, in addition to the Old Testament prescriptions of purity, especially the idea of the high dignity of the Christian priesthood, which was seen as fundamental in its relation to the Eucharist.[60] A more exact investigation of the total picture of the contemporary priesthood, as it is sketched in the patristic literature and appears in the texts of the ordination liturgy,[61] can, however, establish a series of further essential motives for priestly continence: the greater availability for service in the preaching of the gospel;[62] the exemplary life of the priest, who preaches continence and virginity to others the more efficaciously if he sets a convincing example;[63] the spiritual fatherhood of the priest, who imparts the higher spiritual life through administering baptism and reconciling penitents;[64] and finally, even if more indirectly, the imitation of the priestly model of Christ himself and the specific participation in his priesthood. The essence of this lex continentiae can be understood only against such a total background.

---

[56] Augustine, De coniug. adult. 2, 20, 22.

[57] Council of Turin, can. 8; Leo I, Ep. 14, 4.

[58] Council of Toledo I, can. 1; 3–7; 18; 19.

[59] Council of Orange (441), can. 21.

[60] See R. Kottje, "Das Aufkommen der täglichen Eucharistiefeier in der Westkirche und die Zölibatsforderung," ZKG 82 (1971), 218–228.

[61] There is no comprehensive investigation of the picture of the priest in the Early Church. A survey of the available individual studies is given by J. Onatibia, "Introducción al estudio de los Santos Padres sobre el ministerio sagrado," Teología del sacerdotio I (Burgos 1969), 95–122; also R. Gryson, Le prêtre selon s. Ambroise (Louvain 1968), and E. Boularand, "Le sacerdoce mystère de crainte et de l'amour chez s. Jean Chrysostome," BLE 72 (1971), 3–36.

[62] Besides the decretals mentioned, see also Eusebius, Dem. ev. 1, 9, 14f.; Epiphanius, Panar. 59, 4, 1–7; Chrysostom, De sac. 4, 2.

The episcopal recommendations of total continence in the higher clergy must have been suggested by the idea of uniting the clerical office and celibate monasticism, as was often the case in Egypt as early as the days of Athanasius.[65] Probably this union was also true of the already mentioned vita communis of the clergy of the Church of Vercelli, which Bishop Eusebius introduced; Augustine implemented it in the monasterium clericorum of the community of Hippo, for which he also found sufficient recruits. The Gallic Bishop Veranus, probably of Lyon, who corresponded with Pope Hilary (461–468), championed the idea that monks should be ordained as priests, since a number of select and proved men, even though it might be smaller, would through their example be of use for the Church's tasks.[66] It is clear here that at first individual bishops, going beyond the general ecclesiastical regulations, demanded the affirmation of total celibacy as a condition for admission to the clergy of their local churches.

Choice and Ordination of the Clergy[67]

The vocation to an ecclesiastical office occurred in principle through election made by the entire community, clergy and people, but the manner in which the people participated showed considerable differences.[68] Reflected most clearly in the sources is the manner of the election of a bishop. Generally the new bishop was called from the clergy of the local church because a candidate of this sort could best be evaluated by the electors; to be sure, exceptions were not at all rare.[69] Since as unanimous a choice as possible was desired,[70] the clergy of the community first agreed on a candidate, whom the people then approved and for whom the assent of the bishops of the ecclesiastical province, especially that of the metropolitan, was asked. Occasionally, as in the case of Ambrose of Milan, the community in a public demonstration demanded the ordination of a man acceptable to it. And the participation of the people is demonstrable in the election of a series of Popes. But this was gradually limited by several factors. For example, the circle of the laity was reduced to the socially leading class of members of the community, such as curiales, senators, and others, who came to a decision in private discussions, while the rest of the people only acclaimed. To the decline of the lay element corresponded the growing influence of the bishops of the ecclesiastical province, which was often fostered by the lack of agreement of the community on the candidate to be elected or by its decision for a candidate who was canonically unsuitable. If the bishops themselves were divided in their choice, the final decision belonged to the metropolitan.[71] Apart from Central Italy, for which the Pope possessed the metropolitan rights, the latter intervened only if disputed cases were referred to him; for the rest, he limited himself to inculcating the norms generally valid for the election. Finally, the secular authority also interfered in the filling of vacant episcopal sees, either through high officials or through the Emperor personally, without thereby creating a legal basis for such a procedure. This exercising of influence is especially found in the East, where all types—from the discreet wish through heavy pressure to unambiguous command—were made use of. Even if in the majority of cases an entirely worthy candidate was chosen bishop, a large number of precedents is demonstrable in the fourth and fifth centuries in which the episcopal election was burdened or debased by abuses of various sorts, such as designation of his successor by the previous bishop, the selfish favoring of a candidate, and simoniacal or similar intrigues.[72]

---

[63] Chrysostom, op. cit. 3, 17; 6, 2; 6, 8; Isidore of Pelusium, Ep. 3, 176.

[64] Besides Eusebius and Epiphanius (footnote 62 supra), see also Ephrem, Poem. Nisib. 19; Chrysostom, loc. cit. 3, 5; Damasus, Ep. ad Gallos episc. 2 (which likens the binding of the bishop to a church with the ring of married persons); Augustine, Sermo de ordin. episc. 7 (PL, Suppl 2, 642).

[65] Athanasius, Ep. ad Dracontium (PG 25, 532) gives the names of seven monk-bishops.

[66] Sententia s. Verani de castitate sacerdotum, PL 72, 701f.

[67] Cf. F. L. Ganshof, "Note sur l'élection des evêques dans l'empire romain au IV^{me} et pendant la première moitié du V^{me} siècle," Rev Internat Droits de l'Antiquité 4 (1950), 467–498; especially for Gaul: E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne II (Paris, 2nd. ed. 1966), 213–235.

[68] Popes Zosimus to Gelasius I held firmly to a participation by the people in some form; see Gaudemet, 332, footnote 1.

A peculiar mentality of the time was revealed by some reports on ordinations to which the candidate envisaged was compelled by stratagem, surprise, or direct force: this procedure was apparently not seen as questionable. No bishop, no pope, no synod declared such ordinations invalid, only rarely were they blamed, and only once does an imperial edict declare invalidity in an individual case.[73] At times the unanimous will of the people may have been regarded as God's voice; sometimes the refusal of the one elected was more an initial reaction of terror in the face of the responsibilities which such a function imposed. But one also gets the impression that it pertained to the style of the age to utter a formal rejection of the office in order not to fall under the suspicion of seeking the episcopal dignity from ambition or greed.[74]

---

[69] G. Bardy, "Sur la patrie des évêques dans les premiers siècles," RHE 35 (1939), 217–242.

[70] Gelasius I, Fragm. 1.

[71] According to the Statut. eccles. ant. I, it was required: "consensus clericorum et laicorum; conventus totius provinciae episcoporum; metropolitani auctoritas vel praesentia."

[72] Examples in Gaudemet, 108, with footnote.

Since the fundamentals of the rite and law of ordination were laid down in the pre-Constantinian period, especially by means of the Traditio Apostolica of Hippolytus, it is sufficient here to refer to the additions that completed them. Now in the Latin West ordinatio became in the colloquial speech of the Christians the designation for the rite of ordination, whereas consecratio was reserved for the ordaining prayer that accompanied the rite of the imposition of hands.[75] Furthermore, definite times for ordination were developed: for episcopal ordination, Sunday, which Leo I designated as an ancient custom; for the ordination of priests and deacons, the Ember Saturdays and the Saturday preceding Passion Sunday. All ordinations were incorporated into the celebration of the Eucharist.[76] While the Apostolic Constitutions knew the imposition of hands also for subdeacon and lector, in the West it remained reserved for the three higher ranks of the hierarchy;[77] in East and West the imposition of the book of gospels was also added to the rite of episcopal ordination.[78] Although Gelasius I emphasized the exclusive right of the bishop to ordain, by way of exception he granted to the priest the bestowing of the ordination of subdeacons or acolytes. Quite frequently the bishops of this period had to be reminded that they could exercise their right of ordination only within their sees and in regard to members of their own church.[79] In principle, clerics were ordained for service in a definite local church; a transfer to another church should be possible only by way of exception, but, especially in the case of bishops in the Eastern Empire, it was more frequent than the ecclesiastical legislation envisaged.[80]

---

[73] Nov. 11 of the Emperor Majorian (460).

[74] Cf. the Emperor Leo I, Cod. Just. 1, 3, 30: indignus est sacerdotio, nisi fuerit ordinatus invitus. Also in the Late Roman Empire the verbal rejection of power was customary even in the choice of the Emperor.

[75] P. M. Gy, "Réflexion sur le vocabulaire antique du sacerdoce chrétien," Études sur le sacrement de l'ordre (Paris 1957), 125–145, =Das Apostolische Amt, 92–109; J. Gaudemet, "L'ordre dans la législation conciliaire de l'Antiquité," ibid., 233–356 and 172–192 respectively.

[76] Leo I, Ep. 10; Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 11 and 15, 3; Constit. Apost. 8, 5.

[77] Constit. Apost. 8, 21f. Statut. eccles. ant., can. 90–92; ibid., can. 93–97 enumerate the instrumenta which symbolize the duties of candidates for the lesser orders.

[78] Constit. Apost. 8, 4; Statut. eccles. ant., c. 90. See P. Batiffol, "Las liturgie du sacre des évêques," RH 27 (1927), 733–763; B. Botte, "Le rituel d'ordination des Statuta ecclesiae antiqua," RAM 11 (1939), 223–241.

[79] Examples in Gaudemet, 116f.

Privileges of the Clerical State

Under the first Christian Emperor not only was the special status of the clergy, hitherto prevailing within the Church, also recognized by the State: in addition, it became a clearly privileged state by the granting of specific rights in comparison with the average citizen or the various professional groups. Constantine first freed it from the so-called munera, specified services performed for the State, such as the duty of assuming the office of decurio, properly provisioning the imperial retinue or troops passing through, or performing certain compulsory services (munera sordida), in order to make possible the unrestricted carrying out of its ecclesiastical duties.[81] An exemption of clerics from the land tax, granted by the Emperor Constantius in 346, was as early as 360 again limited to ecclesiastical property in the strict sense, and all clerical privileges in regard to taxation were annulled by the Emperor Valentinian III in 441 because of the precarious financial status of the Empire.[82] The exempting of the clergy from the lustralis collatio, a tax which merchants had to pay every five years, seems to have had an especially negative effect on the reputation of the Church.[83] The numerous complaints about clerics engaged in business on behalf of the Church show that this privilege opened the door to abuses and obliged the State and the Church to repeated restrictions and prohibitions.[84]

Of special importance for the credit of the Church in public life became the recognition of the judicial activity of the bishop in civil disputes, hitherto exercised only within the local episcopal congregation, that is, the incorporating of the so-called audientia episcopalis into the Roman civil law procedure.[85] Constantine was convinced that an episcopal court, because of the high moral authority of the judge, guaranteed justice more and specifically protected Christians from the danger of being subjected to a prejudiced pagan judge, although now the pagan citizen could entertain the same suspicion with regard to the Christian bishop. In practice, then, this privilege proved to be for the Church a rather dubious gift. Hilary of Poitiers indicated that the function of a state judge clearly contained dangers for Christians if it was sought from ambition and because, even with disinterested motives, it inevitably ensnared them in quarrels and injustice.[86] The majority of bishops were overburdened in this way because of a lack of juridical education; however, they could renounce the performance of this function as judge. Augustine, who was not lacking in the prerequisites for it, complained very strongly that this judicial function claimed many an hour which he would prefer to devote to prayer or the study of Scripture and that the bishop's verdict usually displeased one party, which then accused him of having bent the law. Yet he thought it was right that Christians should not have recourse in their disputes to the state court, but he regretted that no lay Christians were available for the office of judge.[87] Around the turn of the fifth century the audientia episcopalis was restricted to the merely mediating function of arbiter, which a Council of Carthage in 397 had already favored and which was far more suited to the meaning of the episcopal office. It seems that, for the Church's part, no one complained about this, and the same was true when the Emperor Valentinian III restricted this mediator's activity to purely ecclesiastical cases.[88]

---

[80] Ibid., 112f.

[81] First known edict of October 313: Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 2, and Eusebius, HE 10, 7, 2; later decrees on freeing from service as curiales: Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 1; 16, 2, 7 (also for Donatists); 16, 2, 11; 16, 2, 18. Freeing from munera sordida: ibid. 16, 2, 10 (probably 346).

[82] Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 10; Nov. 10.

[83] Cod. Theod. 16, 28 (343); expanded by Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 10 (346), and 13, 1, 1 (356).

[84] Quaest. Novi et Veb. Test. 127, 35; Sulpicius Severus, Chron. 1, 23; Dial. 3, 15; Jerome, Ep. 52, 5; Augustine, Enarr. in ps. 70, s. 1, 18f.; Maximus of Turin, hom. 114. Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 15 (359); 13, 1, 11 (379); 16, 2, 36 (401); Nov. 35, 4 (452); Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 15.

Because of the summoning of the bishops to judicial functions there were attempts to deduce the raising of the episcopate of the Church of the Empire to noble status by the Emperors and hence its legal enrollment in the high ranks of the official hierarchy of the Late Roman Empire; it was said that it was already introduced by Constantine when, probably as early as 313, he had created for the Bishop of Rome the rank of the gloriosissimi, which was later made accessible to the other bishops; even priests and deacons, for the sake of honor, obtained the dignity of an illustris.[89] However neither can any vestiges of imperial decrees of such import be detected nor did the imperial chancery in its correspondence make use of the pertinent titles nor can an expression of it be found in the ecclesiastical epistolography of the age.[90] Instead, there developed a properly Christian vocabulary for the address and title of the occupants of ecclesiastical functions; the imperial chancery made use of this, and this made known a gradual differentiation according to the stages of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, which could probably be suggested as such by the state model.[91] In the state sphere must also be sought the models for a series of episcopal insignia, such as the pallium, stole, footwear, and the like, which from the fifth century emerge in the liturgical dress of the clergy; but, again, there is no trace of an official bestowal of such insignia by the Emperor on the claim of an elevation of the episcopate to the nobility. The episcopal cathedra, for its part, was already in the pre-Constantinian age a sign of the episcopal dignity and both a symbol of the bishop's teaching authority and a symbol of the apocalyptic throne of God which could clearly be derived from the collision of Christianity with Hellenistic-Oriental ideas of the throne of the God-King.[92] [85] Cod. Theod. 1, 27, 1 (318); Const. Sirmond. I (333). The second edict was based on the first, which it made more precise. The texts raise much discussed individual problems; cf. Gaudemet, 231f.

---

[86] Hilary of Poitiers, In ps. tract. 1, 10; see T. Klauser, JbAC 5 (1962), 172–174. In Hilary there is no word about bishops, but they may have been meant also.

[87] Augustine, De opere monachorum 29, 37; Enarr. in ps. 25, 13. See A. Pugliese, "Sant'Agostino giudice," Studi P. Ubaldi (Milan 1937), 263–299.

[88] Cod. Just. 1, 4, 7; Cod. Theod. 1, 27, 2 =Cod. Just. 1, 4, 8. Conc. Carth (397), c. 10. Valentinian III, Nov. 35 (452). It is often recalled that in the judicial activity of the bishop misericordia, pietas, and pax should also be dispensed: Ambrose, Expos. ps. 118, 8, 25; Augustine, Sermo 13, 5, 5; Theophilus of Alexandria=Jerome, Ep., 96, 20; Peter Chrysologus, Sermo 145; Statut. eccles. ant., c. 54.

It is undisputed that the episcopal office in the fourth and fifth centuries, both through the development within the Church—growth of the spiritual authority in the numerous and increasingly strong local churches, at synods and councils, enhanced influence through economic and financial independence—as well as through the respectful and considerate treatment of its holders by the Emperors, the court, and the officials of the imperial administration and of the urban authorities gained an enormous social prestige. Unfortunately, it also seemed desirable to the uncalled to a great degree and was often sought with means and methods which had to be censured by the Church again and again in the severest tone.[93] But a considerable gain in prestige accrued to the episcopal office from those manifold social welfare activities which so often made the bishops of the transition period from late antiquity to the Early Middle Ages the advocates of the poor and the miserable, the helpers of refugees, the spokesmen of prisoners, and even the defenders of the episcopal city in the threat of the migrations. The designations pater populi, pater civitatis, pater urbis et pater patriae, which did not signify the bishop's legal position, were the spontaneous echo which this aspect of the episcopal activity aroused in the hearts of those who experienced it in themselves.[94]

---

[89] Thus especially T. Klauser, Der Ursprung der bischöflichen Insignien und Ehrenrechte (Krefeld, 2nd ed. 1953), and JbAC 5 (1962), 172–174, but here restricted to such bishops as had assumed the judicial office in civil processes. The thesis of Klauser is partly exceeded by C. Andresen, Die Kirchen der alten Christenheit (Stuttgart 1971), 405f.

[90] For a criticism of Klauser's idea see H. U. Instinsky, Bischofsstuhl und Kaiserthron (Munich 1955), 83–102; S. Mazzarino, Jura 7 (1956), 351f.; finally, independent of one another, R. Gryson, Le prêtre selon s. Ambroise (Louvain 1968), 106–110; E. Chrysos, Historia 18 (1969), 119–128, and especially E. Jerg (with literature), who exhaustively investigates the styling of imperial laws, charters, and letters of the day and reaches a clearly negative result. Canon 7 of Chalcedon even expressly forbade the assumption of any state dignity (axia) by the clergy.

[91] Examples again in E. Jerg: see also P. Canivet, "Catégories sociales et titulature laique et ecclésiastique dans l'Histoire Philotheé de Théodoret de Cyr," Byz(B) 39 (1969), 209–250, especially 230–239.

[92] E. Stommel., "Die bischöfliche Kathedra im Christlichen Altertum," MThZ 3 (1952), 17–32, and the further discussion in JbAC 1 (1958), 52–78; H. U. Instinsky, RQ 66 (1971), 66–77.

The Collegiality of the Bishops

The presbyterium, which, according to the letters of Ignatius, assisted the local bishop in his duties, retained its function of service and of acting as deputy also in the fourth and fifth centuries. To be sure, at times the bishop was admonished to make use of the advice of his priests in specific cases, but the priests did not constitute a collegium which could act as such independently of the bishop by virtue of its own full power.[95] The efforts described earlier to equate the office of priest and bishop in rank toward the end of the fourth century remained isolated and without direct effects. The ordo episcoporum, for its part, maintained its independence, which since Irenaeus was based on the conviction that the bishops as a whole were the successors of the Apostles and continued their function within the Church. The consciousness of the apostolic succession of the bishops remained also and was fully maintained under the primacy of the Roman Bishop that was at the same time achieving complete recognition and to a degree manifested itself in new ways. This could be observed especially in the development of the terminology, which the age employed for the episcopal office and its function. If the term sedes apostolica was used by the Roman bishops ever more frequently to denote their own see, this was true at the same time for other episcopal sees, even those to which no special rank pertained either from tradition or from their momentary organizational importance: every episcopal see was, therefore, sedes apostolica.[96] The same idea is found in the application of the epithet apostolicus and of the noun apostolatus to the rank and activity of every bishop.[97] The designation of a simple bishop as summus pontifex is even seen for the first time in a papal letter and appears especially in the address of letters to Gallic bishops.[98]

---

[93] The correspondence of Gelasius I especially provides an abundance of disgraceful incidents. For the criticism from monasticism two examples: Sulpicius Severus, Chron. 2, 32, 4; Isidiore of Pelusium, Ep. V, 89.

[94] Gaudemet, 350–356; for Italy, S. Mochi Onory, "Vescovi e città (sec. IV–VI)," RSDI 4 (1931), 245–330.

[95] Priests, compared to the bishop, occupy "the second throne"; Constantine in Eusebius, HE 10, 5, 23; Statut. eccles. ant., can. 2.

An occasion on which the collegiality of the bishops especially appears was an episcopal ordination. Since in canon 4 the Council of Nicaea prescribed the presence of all bishops of the ecclesiastical province, but at least three of them, in this liturgical act, it was regarded as the norm, which was to be observed even under very difficult circumstances and which was again and again called to mind. In Africa a certain preference for the number of twelve consecrators was established—it suggested the idea of a representation of the college of Apostles. Even if no more detailed theological justification for the plurality of consecrators in the episcopal ordination was given, still the idea of episcopal collegiality was clearly expressed by it.[99]

The concept of the apostolic succession also formed the basis for the idea of the collegiality of the bishops, which, especially in the fifth century, was decisively championed by the papacy itself in connection with the Christological controversies.[100] Even before the Council of Ephesus, Pope Celestine referred Nestorius to the fact that, by his doctrine, he was excluding himself from the communion of the episcopal college, and his letter to the Council stressed that the proclamation of the gospel was entrusted to the episcopate in its totality, as it had once been confided to the college of Apostles, from which it had legitimately inherited this commission. Pope and bishops were obliged in their collegial responsibility to guard the true faith for the Universal Church and to stand up against error. For the bishops who continued to support Nestorius there was no place any longer in the episcopal college. Sixtus III invited these bishops "again to enter the synedrion of the bishops" in order to be received back into the ecclesiastical communion. Pope Leo I further deepened this understanding of episcopal collegiality when he emphasized that each bishop, in addition to his own see, bears a responsibility for the Universal Church, that in the ultimate analysis the Holy Spirit produces the inner unity of this college, and that of course no bishop can exercise his pastoral office in the Church if he is not in communion with Peter's successor.[101] This idea of collegiality was defended by the other Popes of the century down to Gelasius I, who emphasized that the legitimacy of the episcopal college is derived from the college of Apostles and in this way precisely is distinguished from every collegium haereticorum. Collegiality thus understood was further expressed in the formula of the consortium and of the communio episcoporum and finally determined also the sense of the designations fratres, coepiscopi, collegae, and consortes, which the Popes liked to apply to the bishops. The further history of the idea of episcopal collegiality makes clear that the understanding of it gained as early as patristic times was again obscured in the future by other developments or almost fell into oblivion.[102]

---

[96] On what follows: H. Marot, "La collégialité et le vocabulaire épiscopal du V^e au VII^e siècle," La collegialite épiscopale (Paris 1965), 61–98; J. Lécuyer, "La communion épiscopale dans les conciles africains entre 400–425," Mel A.M. Charue (Gembloux 1969), 101–122.

[97] Customary are: apostolicus honor, apostolica reverentia, apostolica dignatio, apostolica merita; vir, domnus, praesue apostolicus.

[98] Zosimus, Ep. 9, 2f. Only from the beginning of the twelfth century was summus pontifex reserved to the Pope.

[99] See L. Mortari, Consacrazione episcopale e collegialità (Florence 1969), and P. Zmire, "Recherches sur la collegialité épiscopale dans l'Église d'Afrique," RechAug 7 (1971), 3–72.

[100] See J. Lécuyer, La collégialité . . . 41–57; G. Medico, RSPhTh 49 (1965), 369–402; R. Garcia, "El primado romano y las colegialidad en la controversia nestoriana," Studium 11 (1971), 21–63.

---

[101] A. Tuilier, "Le primat de Rome et la collégialité de l'épiscopat d'après la correspondance de s. Léon avec l'Orient," Nuovo Didaskaleion 15 (1965), 53–67.

[102] Y. M. J. Congar, "Notes sur le destin de l'idée de collégialité en Occident au moyen âge," La collégialité . . . , 90–129; id. "La collégialité et la primauté de Rome dans l'histoire," Angelicum 47 (1970), 403–427.

CHAPTER 17

The Liturgy

The new situation consequent on the gaining of the Church's freedom and the turning of the imperial office to the Christian religion also influenced to a great degree the very heart of the interior life of the Church—the liturgy. These influences were for the most part directly related to the special missionary situation in which the Church then found itself. Now it had to prepare for its initiation a constantly growing flock which, for whatever motives, was requesting admission into the Christian community; hence the existing institution for this preparation, the catechumenate, was subjected to a severe test. Since, with the increasing number of Christians, more mediocrity also penetrated the congregations and with it the number of failures grew, the earlier penitential discipline was again examined in regard to its meaning and function. Furthermore, as always in periods of increased missionary activity, the Church was confronted with the problem of adaptation and hence with the question to what extent it could christianize certain forms of pagan celebrations and piety and incorporate them into its liturgical sphere. And so a series of new elements appeared in its sacramental liturgy, in church building, and in the liturgical year. The new relationship of the Church to the State and to public life made possible and likewise produced new forms, especially in the area of liturgical representation and the expansion of the liturgical calendar of celebrations.

Differentiation of Liturgies in East and West

From the fourth century there can be observed an increasing differentiation of liturgies, hitherto uniform in their basic features, but in principle free in the construction of word and rite: several factors contributed to this. Thus occasionally there was seen a tendency to unite the wording of the liturgical prayers more strictly to fixed norms and subject it to a certain control in order to shield it from possible heretical falsification.[1] Then, the development of much larger ecclesiastical structures supplied an impetus for the differentiation of the liturgies. The liturgy in use in the churches of the chief centers of these areas, especially of the developing patriarchal sees, acquired the character of a norm and gradually established itself in the sphere of influence of these ecclesiastical centers. In addition, the difference of languages and the cultural and national self-consciousness of individual regions produced by them in the areas of the expansion of Christianity repeatedly proved to be an especially effective principle of the differentiation, which included also the liturgical sphere. Finally, after the Councils of Ephesus in 431 and Chalcedon in 451, Nestorians and Monophysites went their own ecclesiastical ways and thereby promoted a special development of their respective liturgies. The process of differentiation naturally extended over a rather long period of time, at the end of which stands the codification of the liturgies, which took place for most of them only in the sixth and seventh centuries, but thereafter still admitted supplements and modifications.[2]

---

[1] See the decrees of two African synods (Hippo in 393 and Carthage in 397), which refer to erroneous prayer formulas, prescribe that prayer address the Father in the liturgy, and demand examination of episcopal prayers adopted from elsewhere: Mansi, III, 884, 895, 922.

Of the great eastern patriarchates—Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople—the first named displayed, with its proximate and remote hinterland, a richly creative liturgical activity. A more ancient core of it belongs to the so-called Apostles' Liturgy of the East Syrians, which first appeared in its complete form in the fifth century in the Syriac language and which remained the liturgy of the Nestorians, of the Uniate Chaldaeans, and of the Malabar Christians.[3] The West Syrian Liturgy was distinguished for a special wealth in anaphoras (formulas of the Eucharistic Prayer or Canon). The Liturgy of James, originating in Jerusalem, must be regarded as their basis, as is testified both by the mystagogic catechisms of Cyril of Jerusalem and by Jerome. Known in the Syriac translation to the author of the Testamentum Domini of the fifth century, it became the normal liturgy of the Christians in the sphere of Edessa (Jacobites).[4] Antioch itself or at least its immediate vicinity was the home of the so-called Clementine Liturgy and of the Syriac Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles, which is today generally regarded as the prototype of the Liturgy of Chrysostom, which was used in the Syrian capital probably even before the Council of Ephesus.[5] In the so-called Liturgy of Mark, Alexandria created its oldest formula, which is attested by papyrus texts of the fourth and fifth centuries and influenced the prayers of the Euchologion attributed to Bishop Serapion of Thmuis (d. after 362);[6] as the Liturgy of Cyril, it is still used by the Copts. Alongside the Liturgy of Mark there later appeared those of Basil and Gregory, which were taken over from Asia Minor or Syria and translated into Coptic. The Coptic liturgical formulas were finally passed on to the Ethiopians, who translated them into their national tongue and enriched them with several anaphoras. The two formulas of the Byzantine Liturgy—those of Basil and Chrysostom—were not original creations of the imperial capital. The first, long preferred to the second, must actually be linked with its namesake, who had elaborated a liturgy already in use at Caesarea. The second, named for Chrysostom only from the tenth century, could very probably have come to Constantinople before 431 in the form of the previously mentioned Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles and been reorganized by Bishop Nestorius.[7] Of all the eastern liturgies, the Byzantine experienced the farthest expansion, especially among the Slavonic peoples, in whose evangelization it was used in the Old Slavonic translation. Among the characteristic features of the oriental liturgies, as these became known in the fourth and fifth centuries, must first be mentioned their understanding of the liturgy as a participation in the angels' heavenly service of God, which was further elaborated to a dramatically fashioned mystery celebration. In this the Christological discussion of the age found its expression in the stressing of the salvific deeds of the Redeemer and of the omnipotence of the divine Logos: the liturgy became the festive representation of the priestly action of Christ, and the liturgical acts became "pictures and symbols communicating the reality of the historical work of salvation, especially of the resurrection" (Schulz)—an understanding of the liturgy which was especially promoted by John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia.[8]

---

[2] An exhaustive characterization of the liturgies according to their form and content is the task of the history of the liturgy. First information in S. Salaville and A. Raes (see the Literature for this chapter). Comprehensive bibliography in A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée, 215–247, to be complemented by the surveys of G. Kretschmar, RGG, 3rd ed., IV, 404–407; A. Raes, LThK, 2nd ed., VI, 1087–1091; B. Fischer, ibid., 1901–1995, and the current reports on the literature of the ALW.

[3] The editing of all Syriac anaphoras was produced by the Papal Oriental Institute at Rome from 1939.

[4] On the East Syrian Liturgy see now B. Botte, Les anaphores syriennes orientales, and D. Webb, "La liturgie néstorienne des apôtres Addai et Mari," Eucharisties d'Orient et d'Occident II, Lex Orandi 47 (Paris 1970), 7–24, 25–49. Clementine Liturgy: Const. Apost. VIII, 5, 11–15, 11.

[5] H. Engberding, "Die syrische Anaphora der zwölf Apostel und ihre Paralleltexte," OrChr 12 (1937), 213–247.

[6] Text in Quasten, Monumenta, 44–48, 49–67.

Since Western Christianity at that time did not know any plurality of languages suited to the liturgy and, apart from Rome, no leading ecclesiastical see of the rank of Antioch or Alexandria could impose its authority, there were lacking here two of the factors, important in the East, for the differentiation of liturgies. Hence all western liturgies were linked by the one Latin language and it is natural to assume that before the completion of the two great liturgical types of the West—the Gallican and the Romano-African—there existed a general basic western form, from which Rome relatively early dissociated itself, whereas the Gallican Rite—to its subspecies belonged the Old Spanish, the Ambrosian, the Old Gallic, and the Celtic liturgies—later opened itself to oriental influences.[9] To the general traits of the Gallic type belongs a relatively uniform order of the Mass, which knew prayers recurring virtually unchanged, and gave, not a fixed Canon, but a proper formula for every Sunday and every feast. In many prayers there appeared a deviation from old tradition, as, for example, in the preface, which often abandoned the character of the earliest prayer of thanks in favor of a prayer of petition. Also in the prayer part, with its inclination to verbosely solemn statement, was seen the influence from the East, which is found also in the rite of the presentation of the offerings, placed before the beginning of Mass. And finally the delight in splendid execution of the rites also recalls similar traits of oriental liturgies. The effect of the confrontation with Arianism can be observed as a striking peculiarity especially in the Spanish and the Gallican liturgies: in this the idea of Christ's mediatorship was pushed into the background and the prayer addressed to Christ was more strongly emphasized. To this corresponded again a preferred worship of the Trinity, just as the Byzantine Liturgy knew it.[10] Only in the Milanese Liturgy was Roman influence, in addition to these general Gallic features, found relatively early, since as early as the time of Ambrose it used the Canon of the Roman Mass. The originally Greek liturgy of Rome completed as early as the third century its translation, begun in the third century, into Latin c. 370, with the introduction of the Latin Canon.[11] Its most important characteristic was its adhering to the idea of Christ's mediatorship, which was manifested in the doxologies of the Mass prayers, which ended only "per Christum," and the prayer addressed to Christ was left to the sphere of popular piety. Furthermore, it gave up dramatic and poetic elements, such as the hymn, in the structure of the liturgy and thereby obtained a feature of objective and sober solemnity, which rather impeded a greater activity of the people. Only the later liturgical exchange with the sphere of the Gallican Liturgy produced a greater liveliness.

---

[7] On the history of the origin of the two Byzantine formulas see the summary of the present state of research in H. J. Schulz, Die byzantinische Liturgie (Freiburg 1964), 18–28.

[8] On the elaboration of the form of the creed of the Byzantine Liturgy see the above-mentioned work of H. J. Schulz.

[9] See J. A. Jungmann, Liturgie der christlichen Frühzeit, 216–226.

New Features in the Sacramental Liturgy

The new missionary situation of the fourth century first operated in the broader area of the baptismal liturgy. Here especially the early institution of the catechumenate fell into an almost startling crisis, which, however, stood in a certain connection with the public recognition of Christianity. Whereas previously the acceptance of a pagan into the catechumenate presupposed in every respect a seriously intended and seriously undertaken commitment to the new faith, to which corresponded an immediately following intensive preparation, usually of three years, for the reception of baptism, now indeed the number steadily grew of those who asked admission to the catechumenate. But the number of pagans who made of it only a preliminary profession of Christianity grew also and at first deferred the reception of baptism, often until they fell into a sickness that endangered life or even, as Chrysostom said, "to the final breath," so that in a flagrantly abused development baptism became for them a sort of Sacrament of the Dead.[12] The question as to the causes of this development permits several answers.[13] Not only Emperors such as Constantine and Theodosius were among those who postponed their baptism, but also Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and others must be included: in their case, on the one hand their involvement with the perils of their profane calling, on the other hand the awareness of a lack of personal maturity made the postponement of baptism seem advisable. But in the case of the greatest number what was probably decisive was the fact that with admittance to the ranks of the catechumens a person was identified publicly as a Christian (with the accruing advantages) and that now, out of convenience or the fear of personal failure, one could evade the moral testing firmly demanded by Christian preaching after the reception of baptism.[14] The consequence was a suspicious increase in the number of merely nominal Christians within the communities.[15] The Church drew conclusions from such a situation and reconstructed the previous order of catechumens, separating the really serious seekers of baptism from the one large class of catechumens. But for one who joined the catechumenate the former manner of admission was complemented by an introductory catechesis,[16] which was supposed to give him a first knowledge of the new way to salvation and place him in the position to receive with some profit the teaching supplied in the normal preaching to which he had access. To this catechesis was joined the rite of admission, which consisted of an imposition of hands, joined with a signing of the cross (consignatio) and, at least in North Africa and Rome, the presentation of salt.[17] If the catechumen was not then induced to take part in the direct preparation for the reception of baptism, he belonged thereafter to the anonymous crowd of those to whom applied the bishops' annual admonition to have themselves enrolled (apographesthai, nomen dare) at the beginning of Lent in the list of those immediately seeking baptism.[18] For this group of photizomenoi, competentes, or electi (Rome) the Church supplied an instruction and a religious training intended for them; the baptismal catecheses preserved from East and West give information on the content and goal of this training. The instruction included, as earlier, an introduction to Scripture and the communicating of the Creed (traditio symboli) and of the Lord's Prayer, both of which were learned by heart so that they could be "given back" in the solemn baptismal profession.[19] The instruction was accompanied by repeated prayer, impositions of hands, and signing with the cross, which were intended to strengthen the candidate on his way to baptism and shield him from demonic influences.[20] The length of this preparation, despite the three years so often mentioned in the sources, was in practice reduced to one Lent, and hence, in spite of all the efforts of the bishops, a really effective "practice in Christianity" was often not realized. With the completion of the christianization of the Mediterranean peoples and the now almost exclusively practiced baptism of infants, this form of the catechumenate came to an end. The mission among the Germans, with its preference for tribal baptism, had to develop new ways and methods for the training in the faith and life of a Christian.

---

[10] J. A. Jungmann, Die Stellung Christi im liturgischen Gebet (Münster, 2nd ed. 1962), and id., "Die Abwehr des germanischen Arianismus und der Umbruch der religiösen Kultur im Mittelalter," Liturgisches Erbe und pastorale Gegenwart (Innsbruck 1960), 3–86.

[11] T. Klauser, "Der Übergang der römischen Kirche von der griechischen zur lateinischen Liturgiesprache," MiscMercati, SteT 121 (Rome 1946), 467–482.

---

[12] See the vivid description of a death-bed baptism in John Chrysostom, Cat. ad illum. I, 1. Blaming of postponement of baptism also In Joh. hom. 18, 1; In Act. hom. 23, 4; In ep. II ad Cor. hom. 2, 6; Basil, Hom. in s. bapt. 7; Gregory of Nyssa, De iis qui bapt. differunt; Ambrose, Expos. in Luc. 7, 220f., 225; De Hel. et jej. 22, 83–85; De Noe, 25; Epp. 79 and 80.

[13] One can hardly mention here the lack of zeal of the pastoral clergy, but must rather think especially of the great demand for it in the large communities. The episode related by Chrysostom, In Act. hom. 46, 3, of a mass baptism of uninstructed catechumens is clearly related to a situation of necessity (earthquake or other catastrophe: orgé Theou), in which the catechumens rushed to baptism and received it.

[14] Chrysostom, Cat. ad illum. 1, 7, treats the problem in detail and refers to the parallel of the postponement of penance. Similarly, Ambrose, Expos. ps. 118 16, 43; De paen. 2, 98.

[15] Augustine, De cat. rud. 5, 9, warns against accepting such candidates: non vult fieri [christianus] potius quam fingere; cf. also Conf. 1, 11, 18, and Abrose, Ep. 17, 8 (nomine Christiani).

[16] De cat. rud. offers two models of such catecheses.

The growing number of Christian families involved at this period an increasing extension and importance for infant baptism, but not without discussion within the Church regarding the most appropriate time and a dispute with Pelagianism over its legitimacy. In the East Gregory Nazianzen and Chrysostom especially championed it on the ground that it bestowed on children as yet free of personal sins the status of children of God and "seal and consecration."[21] In the West Augustine defended infant baptism as an old tradition and justified it theologically against Donatists and Pelagians—in regard to the last-named especially through his doctrine of original sin.[22] A proper baptismal ritual for infants was not developed; the rite of admission of the decaying catechumenate was retained for them—impositions of hands, signing with the cross, presentation of the blessed salt—and the sponsors or parents who took care of them during the baptism made the answers to the baptismal questions and the redditio symboli.[23]

---

[17] On the meaning of the salt ceremony, see A. Stenzel, 171–175.

[18] Itin. Eger. 45, 1; Chrysostom, Cat. bapt. 1, 2; 2, 1; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Cat. 12; Ambrose, Expos. ev. Luc. 4, 76; Ep. 80, 1–6; Augustine, Conf. 8, 2, 4; 9, 6, 14; Sermo 132, 1: ecce Pascha est, da nomen ad baptismum.

[19] Itin. Eger. 46, 3; John Chrysostom, Hom. ad Antioch. 3, 1; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Cat., 11, 1; 12, 25; Ambrose, Ep. 20, 4; Augustine, Sermo 213–214 (traditio symboli); Serm. 56–59 (Lord's Prayer); Sermo 215 (on giving back the Creed).

[20] Still important is F. J. Dölger, Der Exorzismus im altchristlichen Taufritual (Paderborn 1909); the late research is summarized by K. Thraede, RAC VII, 85–100 (with the literature, 114–117).

In the fourth and fifth centuries the importance of the so-called Discipline of the Secret increased;[24] but, of course, its meaning was not entirely grasped when persons understood it as a mere keeping secret the sacred texts and rites. Moreover, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer were familiar from Christian literature and the Bible, and the publication of mystagogic catecheses also spread the knowledge of the baptismal and Eucharistic liturgies. Rather, one should not speak of the mysteries in the presence of those not called or admit them to their celebration. The "not called" were all those who lacked the required means for the right understanding and experiencing of the mysteries. But this possibility was acquired only by "initiation," by the performance of the worship. Anyone who had not yet obtained the status of child of God could not, according to Theodore of Mopsuestia, pray the Lord's Prayer meaningfully and effectively,[25] and so the ultimate meaning of baptism and the Eucharist was only directly made known to the neophyte after his initiation. It must not be denied that influences from the realm of the non-Christian understanding of mysteries were effective, but they could be allowed by the Church all the more unhesitatingly, the more these mysteries themselves lost in real significance.

The Eucharistic celebration also admitted new elements in the fourth and fifth centuries and through continued development in individual points drew ever closer to the form of the "Mass."[26] First, the Liturgy of

---

[21] Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 40, 7, 23; Chrysostom in Augustine, C. Julian. 1, 21.

[22] J. C. Didier, "S. Augustin et le baptême des enfants," RevÉAug 2 (1956), 109–129.

[23] De cat. rud. 26, 50; Ep. 98, 5; see J. C. Didier, MSR 22 (1965), 79–90.

[24] Examples in O. Perler, RAC I, 667–676; also A. Stenzel, 147–153; finally on Chrysostom, T. Finn, 37–39.

[25] Theodore of Mopsuestia, In Rom. 8, 15.

[26] J. A. Jungmann, "Von der 'Eucharistie' zur 'Messe,'" ZKTh 89 (1967), 29–40. Basic for all particular questions on the development of the Mass liturgy is J. A. Jungmann, Missarum solemnia; H. Zwinggi, "Der Wortgottdienst bei Augustinus," LJ 20 (1970), 90–113; 129–140.

the Word of God, usually with three readings from the Old Testament, the Apostle, and the gospel and the sung texts interpolated between them, obtained its definitive structure. The readings, which began immediately after the entry of the clergy and the greeting of the congregation, were proclaimed by the lector or, in the case of the gospel, by the deacon, while the psalm between them was sung by a cantor from the ambo. In the psalm, after each segment, the response sung by the people was inserted; in the first chant it was taken from the psalm itself, but in the second it was the "alleluia verse,"[27] which led into the gospel. In the territory of Antioch there was developed in this place the antiphonal chant, in which the people, divided into two choirs, alternately sang the verses of the psalm.[28] The homily of the bishop or priest was followed by the intercessions—prayers introduced by oremus for the catechumens, the penitents, the faithful, and the whole world, to which the community in the East—Jerusalem and Antioch—sometimes replied with the cry Kyrie eleison.[29] The custom was adopted by the West and here in the form of the Kyrie-litany took the place of the customary intercessions; it was finally transferred to the beginning of the Mass, where it accompanied the entry of the clergy and ended with a prayer.[30] The still remaining oremus of the intercessions thus became the introduction to the prayer over the gifts of bread and wine, which represented the transition to the Liturgy of Sacrifice.

Both the Anaphora of the East and the Canon of the Latin Mass at first display a uniform and obvious structure. The great Eucharistic Prayer of thanksgiving was proclaimed aloud to the silent congregation—this was still the meaning of the term praefatio when it was used for the entire Canon[31]—and it was interrupted only by the Trisagion (Sanctus), adopted from the East, c. 400. In contrast to the East, the West at this time produced a large quantity of prefaces in the narrower sense, which called attention to one or another topical motive for the Eucharistic Prayer of thanksgiving.[32] The central idea of the entire prayer of thanks was the presentation of the sacrifice, which was referred to in a preparatory way in the Te igitur and Quam oblationem of the Roman Canon and was then completed with the words of institution, which at the same time effected the transubstantiation of the gifts of bread and wine. The following prayers, Supra quae and Supplices, renewed the offering and asked for the definitive acceptance of the sacrifice by the Father; the solemn final doxology with the people's Amen of affirmation concluded the Canon. In the Antiochene family of liturgies after the words of institution, according to the baptismal catecheses of Cyril, God was called upon in a special prayer, the so-called transubstantiation epiclesis, to send the Holy Spirit on the sacrificial gifts in order to make them the flesh and blood of the Lord, and thus they brought the recipient to salvation.[33] The clear make-up of the Canon underwent a certain confusion through the placing of the intercessions before and after the anamnesis, for which again the East provided the model. In this the offering of the sacrifice was joined to prayers for the local and the Universal Church and their clergy and special martyrs and saints, with whom people understood themselves as constituting one great community; also inserted were names of those who wished to have a concern of their own included in the sacrifice; finally, especially in Masses for the dead, were mentioned the names of the deceased for whom a remembrance was desired in this sacrifice.

---

[27] H. Engberding, "Alleluja," RAC I, 216–233, and A. G. Martimort, Kyriakon II, Festschrift J. Quasten (Münster 1970), 811–834.

[28] Theodoret, HE 2, 24, 9–10; Philost., HE 3, 13.

[29] Itin. Eger., 24; Const. Apost. 8, 6.

[30] A full form is preserved in the so-called Deprecatio Gelasii; see B. Capelle, RBén 46 (1934), 126–144, and C. Callewaert, RHE 38 (1942), 20–45.

[31] Chr. Mohrmann, "Sur l'histoire de praefari-praefatio," VigChr 7 (1953), 1–15 =Études sur le latin des chrétiens III (Rome 1965), 291–305.

[32] A. Stuiber, "Libelli sacramentorum romani," Theophaneia 6 (Bonn 1950).

While the Communion Rite of the Eucharistic celebration in the eastern liturgies underwent considerable expansion through the acceptance of several new individual rites and of the accompanying prayers,[34] it remained emphatically simple in the Latin Mass. The breaking of the bread, the kiss of peace, and the Lord's Prayer were followed immediately by the communion of clergy and faithful under both species, the deacon ministering the cup. The reception of the Eucharist by all participants in the celebration was the normal thing in the West longer than in the East. After Communion the deacon, with the admonition "Bow your head," announced the prayer of dismissal, the oratio super populum, which was then a part of every Mass. But, probably as early as the fifth century, the Postcommunio was created, the last of the three prayers, which, as the conclusion of the Kyrie-litany, of the preparation of the gifts, and of the Communion Rite, must, because of the precision of their statements and their stylistic purity, rightfully rank as preeminent creations of the Roman Liturgy. Later, together with the prefaces, they were collected in the so-called Sacramentaries, which accordingly represent the texts of the prayers to be uttered at Mass by the celebrant.[35]

---

[33] On the epiclesis: B. Botte, SE 6 (1954), 48–72, and J. P. de Jong, ALW 4 (1955), 245–278; 5 (1957), 33–79.

[34] J. M. Hanssens, Institutiones liturgicae III, 485–519.

[35] On the early sacramentaries and the time of their origin see the introductions to the history of the Latin Liturgy.

At first glance it seems surprising that the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries clung with a fundamental stubbornness to the externally strict penitential discipline hitherto in use, even though the growing throng of average persons of this period would lead one to expect instead a moderation here, just as in the catechumenate. But the testimony of the sources is clear: in addition to a certain further development in secondary details, the previous order was fixed ever more by canonical rules through episcopal letters, synodal decrees, and decretals, and thereby a flexible administration was rendered difficult; above all, the principle of the nonrepetition of penance remained inviolable.[36] Even though a surer criterion was lacking as to which offenses in individual cases were subject to public ecclesiastical penance and which were not, and though Augustine also stressed that the gravity of the offense was to be determined by the intention of the sinner,[37] in practice there was agreement on a rather uniform catalogue of such sins: idolatry, heresy and schism, murder, abortion, adultery, serious theft, implacable hatred, slander, drunkenness, attendance at immoral theatrical performances—these seemed more or less completely crimes deserving of penance in the appropriate enumerations of these decades.[38]

And so, as earlier, the sinner who on his own initiative opened himself up to his bishop or whose offense was notorious, was initiated into the class of penitents at a public Mass by the formal sentence of the bishop.[39] Since he was now no longer a full member of the ecclesiastical community, he, like a catechumen, could attend only the Liturgy of the Word or at least he could no longer offer his gifts for the sacrifice and receive Communion. In the East, which in general tended toward a milder practice, the effort was made to strengthen the penitent, through the elaboration of several degrees of penance in his desire for atonement and by means of a penance priest who took charge of him, at least at Constantinople, to ease his gradual return to full membership in the Church.[40] During the time of penance imposed on him, the length of which depended on the gravity of the offense and on the penitential zeal and hence also on the judgment of the bishop, and differed from place to place, the penitents often received the special blessing of the bishop during the liturgy.[41] The date for the beginning of the period of penance was at first the Monday after Pentecost, then, probably from the fifth century, the Monday after the First Sunday of Lent. It ended with the solemn act of reinstatement, the reconciliatio, which, except in cases of necessity, was reserved to the bishop. It ordinarily took place on Holy Thursday,[42] and was inserted between the gospel and the Offertory procession. After an address the bishop prayed that God would give the penitent back to the Church and then laid his hand on him as he knelt before him and raised him up.[43]

---

[36] Ambrose, De paen. 2, 10: sicut unum baptisma eta it una paenitentia.

[37] De div. quaest. 83, 26; cf. also Enchir. 21.

[38] Such catalogues in Augustine, Sermo 351, and Caesarius of Arles, Sermo 179. Only Pacian, Paraen. 4, wanted to adhere to the old threefold idolatry, murder, and adultery, but he encountered opposition.

[39] Ordo paenitentium, Conc. Araus. (441), can. 3; Conc. Arel. II, can. 28.

[40] See J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg 1955).

Membership in the class of penitents involved for the one concerned, especially in the West, a heavy psychological burden and many restrictions in his private and professional life. The public nature of penance produced a demand that the average Christian of the day was often not equal to, even if the discretion of the bishop, the encouragement of the clergy, and the prayers of intercession of the community could provide help to him. The penitential duties, such as fasting, prohibition of marriage during the time of penance, the forbidding of marital relations among those already married, often lasted for five, ten, or twenty years, and in some cases, especially in Spain, which was inclined to rigorism, for the remainder of life.[44] Any failure during the period of penance led to the permanent exclusion from the ecclesiastical community, which on occasion some were not even willing to grant again to the dying. The heaviest burden of all perhaps was the fact that his previous status clung to the reconciled penitent for the rest of his life. Hence, for example, not only was admittance into the clergy forever denied him, but as a husband he had also to refuse marital intercourse, he could not hold any public office or practice specified professions, including military service; in short, he was forever compelled to a lifestyle which otherwise only a monk would have freely adopted. Again, a nonobservance of these duties ranked as a relapse, which involved perpetual excommunication.[45]

The cause of this rigorism, especially in the Western Church, must be seen most pressingly in the adherence to an understanding of the Church, which aspired to see the communio sanctorum in the strict sense realized in every community in the changed situation of the fourth and fifth centuries and to assure it with severe sanctions. Naturally, this attitude laid more stress on the exact execution of the penalties imposed than on the encouraging of the desire for atonement in the penitent. Augustine represents a praiseworthy exception, since his personal religious pilgrimage, his theological thought, and his awareness of his pastoral responsibility inclined him to a more forgiving outlook.[46] To be sure, he attributed to the penitential discipline a position of importance in the life of the community, but he never lost sight of the fact that the Church in the world will always include "wheat and weeds" and he defended just this sort of Church against the puritanism of the Donatists. The consequences of such strictness were not absent. Alongside the postponement of baptism proceeded the postponement of public ecclesiastical penance, but now the Church, in contrast to the case of baptism, combated this only slightly, even to the extent of finally advising it in special cases, especially in still young men. Now the sinner was invited to make his entire life a constant preparation for penance and reconciliation,[47] which were reserved for advanced age. Thus the period of penance was gradually restricted to the brief span of mortal sickness, and reconciliation took place shortly before death. To be sure, the principle that ecclesiastical penance could not be repeated was saved, but its pastoral sense was undermined. The consequences of this development were, seen as a whole, so negative that eventually a basically new solution, private penance, became inevitable.

---

[41] Sozomen, HE 7, 16, 4–7, describes the rite customary in Rome.

[42] Innocent I, Ep. 1, 7.

[43] Leo I, Ep. 18, 13; 19, 6; Jerome, Dial. c. Lucif. 5.

[44] Thus the Spanish Synods of Elvira (c. 306), Zaragoza (380), and Toledo I (c. 400).

[45] Examples in Poschmann, HDG IV, 3 (1951), 55f.

During the fourth and fifth centuries more energetic efforts of the Church become discernible to incorporate marriage and the wedding celebration into the liturgy, especially since they were included, more than other segments in the course of life, in pagan or profane custom.[48] Increasingly, features of this custom were blamed, such as some dances on the occasion of a wedding, or the effort was made to have the custom of crowning the spouses rendered acceptable by a Christian interpretation.[49] At the same time it was urged that the contracting of marriage be publicly blessed by bishop or priest. In this regard the first steps toward the development of a liturgical rite of marriage become clear. In the East the bishop or priest was invited to the celebration of marriage in a private house and there he pronounced a prayer of blessing over the bridal pair; it was surrounded by the singing of psalms, but definite liturgical texts are not to be found before the eighth century. A blessing of the marriage crown and the crowning by the priest are mentioned in the fourth century, and they finally gave the Byzantine marriage rite its name, stephanoma.[50] At Alexandria the joining of the hands of the bridal pair by the priest was customary toward the end of the fourth century. In the West the Ambrosiaster first said something vague about a benedictio at a wedding; then Pope Siricius and Ambrose mentioned the custom of the velatio, in which the priest spread a veil over the heads of the bridal couple.[51] The Praedestinatus (c. 430–440) first mentioned a Eucharistic celebration in connection with marriage. A canonical rule for the blessing of the marriage by the priest existed at this time, however, only for clerics of the lower orders, to whom marriage was permitted.[52]

---

[46] On the Augustinian practice of penitential discipline see F. van de Meer, Augustinus der Seelsorger (Cologne 1951), 447–453, and J. Vermeylen, "Le cheminement de la pénitence selon s. Augustin," CollMechl 51 (1966), 514–546.

[47] Ambrose, De paen. 2, 11, 107; Conc. Arel. II, can. 24; Caesarius of Arles, Sermo 256, 4; 258, 2.

[48] K. Ritzer, Formen, Riten, und religiöses Brauchtum der Eheschliessung in den christlichen Kirchen des 1. Jahrtausends (Münster 1962).

[49] K. Baus, Der Kranz in Antike und Christentum (Bonn, reprinted 1966), 93–112.

The Liturgical Year

The position of Easter, now as earlier the mysterium praecipuum and the excellentior festivitas of all celebrations[53] which the liturgy observed, was now also brought to prominence in public life, since the Christian Emperors from Valentinian I honored the day by a special amnesty for prisoners,[54] though certain serious crimes were not included in it. In the religious and theological understanding of the feast a certain change occurred in the East, since, following the Trinitarian and Christological discussions of the age, the suffering of the Redeemer was deemphasized in favor of the idea of the resurrection. In the West, however, its original meaning was still retained: in the Easter Triduum from Good Friday to Easter Sunday, "the mystery of the death and resurrection" was celebrated, whereby a new life was given to mankind.[55]

With the fourth century the Easter season entered the final phase of its organization as a great Easter cycle, since now the feast was preceded by a rather long period of preparation—Lent. The Council of Nicaea mentioned for the first time the Tessarakosté without any details of its content; Eusebius spoke of an ascetical exercise of forty days before Easter; Cyril of Jerusalem, of a metanoia of forty days.[56] During his stay in Rome in 340 Athanasius discovered the custom of a forty-days' fast. However, the exact number of forty fast days established itself only after a longer development.[57] The preachers of the time, especially Augustine and Pope Leo I, give information on the liturgical structure and meaning of this Lent.[58] As in no other section of the liturgical year, the weekdays of Lent gradually obtained a public liturgy, which was celebrated at Rome as a stational liturgy. Every day people met for the statio, the fixed place of this celebration at one of the churches of the regions of Rome; the Pope himself conducted it and the many faithful who attended received Communion. The fast accompanying Lent was not prescribed in the modern sense by the Church; rather it was a clear form of curtailment, which knew only one meal, the evening coena, in which wine and meat were renounced.[59] Far greater weight was attributed, however, to self-discipline, to recollection and inner contemplation, which should prove themselves in genuine love of neighbor, readiness for personal sacrifice in almsgiving, and reconciliation. Since at the same time Lent was the preferred time for the immediate preparation of the competentes or electi for the reception of baptism and of the penitents for their reconciliatio, the liturgy of certain days was clearly influenced in its order of readings by this fact. For example, the catechumens were probably admitted to the stational liturgy on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent in order then to learn the text of the baptismal Creed and of the Lord's Prayer.[60] Naturally, the last week was conditioned by the theme of the Redeemer's Passion, which however was liturgically fashioned variously according to the region. In Jerusalem were chosen those readings which reported the events of the Passion Week by the day and hour, corresponding to the biblical accounts. In Spain and North Africa a continuous reading of the history of the Passion was compiled, while Rome decided for the entire reading according to the four gospels on four different days.

---

[50] Gregory Nazianzen, Ep. 231 and 232; John Chrysostom, In Genes. hom. 48, 6.

[51] Ambrosiaster, In ep. I ad Cor. 7, 40; Ambrose, Ep. 19. Paulinus of Nola in carm. 25 describes the wedding of the lector Julian, the later Bishop of Aeclanum.

[52] Praedest., 3, 31; Siricius, Ep. ad Himerium Tarrac. 8; Innocent I, Ep. ad Victr. 4–6.

[53] Leo I, Sermo 47, 1; 48, 1.

[54] Cod. Theod. 9, 38, 3 (367), 4 (368), 7 (384), 5 (385); Cod. Just. 1, 4, 3. Cf. Leo I, Sermo 40, 5; 45, 4; 47, 3.

[55] See W. Huber, Passa und Ostern, 156–206; but against him it must be maintained that Leo I in his Sermones de Quadragesima throughout understands death and resurrection together as the basic idea of Easter. See especially Sermones 43, 3, and 48, 4; Augustine, Ep. 55, 24, speaks of a triduum crucifixi, sepulti, resuscitati.

[56] Council of Nicaea, can. 5; Eusebius, De soll. pasch. 4; Cyril of Jerusalem, Procat. 4.

The Pentecost, that is, the Easter Season, was concluded with the fiftieth day after Easter, which was at the same time devoted to the recalling of the descent of the Holy Spirit and the Ascension of the Lord. As early as the fourth century, however, the remembrance of [57] Athanasius, Easter Letter of 341, appendix. Jerome, Ep. 24, speaks of the voluntary nature of the fast. Socrates, HE 5, 22, mentions a fast at Rome in the three weeks before Easter.

---

[58] List of pertinent sermons of Augustine in S. Poque, SChr 116, 352–354 (about 30); the twelve sermons of Leo I on Lent: SChr 49.

[59] Augustine, Sermo 210, 10f., reproves Christians who again debase the renunciation by a refined selection and preparation of other foods and drinks.

[60] The notice pro scrutiniis electorum in the Gelasian Sacramentary, indicates this; it was in the Mass formulary of that period.

Christ's Ascension was separated from this feast and given a feast of its own on the fortieth day of the Pentecost.[61]

The liturgical year gained its most significant enrichment at this period through an exchange between East and West, in which the West took from the East the feast of the Lord's Epiphany[62] and gave it Christmas; since both celebrations obtained a prolongation and a time of preparation, the basis was laid for the second festive cycle of the liturgical year. The first sure report on a feast which had as its content the birth of Christ and was celebrated on 25 December is found in a list of Christian feasts, the so-called Chronographus of 354, which took this notice from a model going back to the age of Constantine (336).[63] The date of 25 December, for which no one at all could appeal to a solid historical tradition, was probably not "worked out" on the basis of an astronomically symbolic idea.[64] Most probably the choice of this date was motivated by the feast of the birth of the pagan Sun-god, which the Emperor Aurelian introduced at Rome from the East after 274 and which thereafter was observed as dies natalis solis invicti on this day as a high civil holiday. To this Sol invictus the Christians consciously contrasted their Lord as the new light, the new sun, the sol iustitiae, as the one whom the sermons of the Fathers and the texts of the liturgy celebrated on his dies natalis.[65] The sacramentum Christi nativitatis was observed as early as c. 360 in Africa. For the natalis Salvatoris Ambrose composed the hymn Intende qui regis Israel; for Filastrius of Brescia (d. 397) the day was a very high feast, which was also celebrated at Aquileia in the time of Bishop Chromatius (c. 387–407) and was likewise known in Spain before the end of the fourth century, while Paulinus of Nola may have attested it less for Gaul than for South Italy.[66] In the East Christmas was first accepted in Cappadocia, Constantinople, and Syria in the penultimate decade of the fourth century, while it was not received until c. 430 in Jerusalem and Egypt, that is, in the regions which first knew the Epiphany, and for this reason occasionally the mystery of the birth was separated from the festive content of the Epiphany.[67]

---

[61] First attested by Const. Apost. 8, 33; by Augustine, Sermo 254; Ep. 54 presupposes it as a feast celebrated in the Universal Church. See also P. Devos, AnBoll 86 (1968), 87–108, and W. Huber, op. cit., 158, 165, 206–208.

[62] Augustine, Sermo 202, 2, expressly names the ecclesia orientalis as the home of the feast; Ammianus Marcellinus, Res gest. 21, 2, 5, knew in 361 that the Christians of Gaul called the feast Epiphania.

[63] Chron. min.: MGAuctant. 9, 1, 56ff.

[64] Thus L. Duchesne, Origines, 278f.; then H. Engberding, ALW 2 (1952), 25–43; H. Strobel, ThLZ 87 (1962), 183–194.

[65] Examples in B. Botte, Origines, 61–67; F. J. Dölger, AuC VI (1950), 1–56, especially 23–30; H. Rahner, Griechische Mythen in christlicher Deutung (Zurich, 2nd ed. 1957), 190–199; H. Frank, Festschr. Th. Michels (Münster 1963), 136–154.

[66] Optatus Milev., Sermo in nat. ss. Innoc. 1. On Ambrose's hymn, A. S. Walpole, Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge 1922), no. 6; Filastr., Haer. 140, 1–4; Siricius, Ep. ad Himerium Tarrac.; Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 27, 43–45.

Just as epiphaneia in the area of Hellenistic religions meant the arrival or public manifestation of a god or of a god-king, so the corresponding basic idea of the Christian feast of the Epiphany was the appearance of the Lord in the world, his divine manifestation before mankind.[68] Sometimes this Epiphany was seen as realized in his birth, as, for example, originally in Jerusalem, Antioch, and perhaps also in Syria, but also in his baptism in the Jordan, as in Egypt, or finally in the homage of the magi and the miracle at the marriage at Cana, as Epiphanius of Salamis testifies.[69] The fact that 6 January was chosen for the feastday was certainly conditioned by missionary considerations. Thus a feast of the winter solstice celebrated around the same date in Egypt, or that of a miraculous fountain in various cities of the East could be christianized by the declaration that in Christ the true sun has shone or that the water of baptism (photismos) has brought true enlightenment to man.[70] Then, when the Roman Christmas was received into the local liturgies, the baptism of Jesus remained the central content of the Epiphany feast, which also made 6 January a baptismal day and was expressed in a second name for the feast (ta phota), while the celebration of the birth, joined with the adoration of the magi, was reserved for 25 December.

The reception of the Epiphany in the West occurred with no uniformity as to time and place and with differing emphases on the concept of the feast. It is earliest traceable for Gaul, where at first it was probably celebrated as adventus salvatoris in the original meaning of epiphaneia.[71] Paulinus of Nola (d. 431) first mentions, in addition to the adoration of the magi, the baptism in the Jordan and the marriage at Cana as ingredients of the content of the feast.[72] In Upper Italy Ambrose was the earliest witness for the feast; with him the baptism of Jesus was as much in the foreground as with Chromatius of Aquileia and Maximus of Turin, while a little later at Ravenna the tria miracula—adoration of the magi, baptism in the Jordan, and miracle of Cana—together were regarded as the content of the feast.[73] For Augustine the Epiphany was equal in rank with Christmas, the day on which the Lord made himself known to the pagans, who did homage to him in the magi.[74] Rome at the earliest accepted the Epiphany under Pope Innocent I (401–417) and, like the African and Spanish Churches, separated the adoration of the magi from the content of Christmas.[75]

---

[67] For Cappadocia, see J. Mossay (literature); for Constantinople, Gregory Nazianzen is witness in 379; for Antioch, John Chrysostom in 386–88. Bishop Juvenal first introduced it at Jerusalem, probably in connection with the Christological discussion of Ephesus, which also moved Cyril of Alexandria to accept the feast. Only Armenia maintained the one feast of the Epiphany. On the whole matter, B. Botte, Origines.

[68] Chr. Mohrmann, "Epiphania," Etudes sur le latin des chrétiens I (Rome 1958), 245–275; E. Pax, "Epiphanie," RAC V, 902–906.

[69] Jerusalem: Itin. Eger. 25, 6–12; Antioch: John Chrysostom, Hom. in Pentec. 1, 1, 2; Egypt: John Cassian, Coll. 10, 2; Epiphanius of Salamis, Haer 51, 9, 13; 51, 16, 1, 8.

[70] J. A. Jungmann, Liturgie der christlichen Frühzeit, 137f.

[71] Thus Hilary of Poitiers in a fragment (CSEL 65, 16f.); despite B. Botte, Origines, 47f., its authenticity must be held.

[72] Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 27, 46–52.

When both feasts were expanded through gradually growing celebrations in preparation and prolongation, the elaboration of a special Christmas cycle was introduced. A first step toward this appeared in Jerusalem, where the celebration of the feast at the time of the pilgrim Egeria began with a pilgrimage to Bethlehem, which was connected with a midnight Mass in Constantine's Church of the Nativity. After the return in the early morning there followed the daytime Mass in Jerusalem. Later this type of a first Mass was adopted at Rome as the preliminary celebration, when people arrived at the church in honor of Mary built by Pope Sixtus III (432–440) on the Esquiline at midnight for the liturgy in a chapel in front of a model of the grotto at Bethlehem (ad praesepe). Christmas obtained an after-celebration when its octave day was raised to prominence as the feast of the Natale s. Mariae, which by its very name indicated its connection with the Christmas mystery. One may also speak of an after-celebration for the Epiphany, since before the seventh century the gospel readings of the following Sundays and, to a degree, of the weekdays, took up the basic theme of the Epiphany and reported the signs by which Christ displayed his glory (John 2:11).[76]

A period of preparation for the Epiphany or Christmas respectively, in the sense of the later Advent, first appeared, not at Rome, but in Spain and Gaul. Hilary of Poitiers attests that people prepared for the Epiphany per trium septimanarum secretum spatium; the Council of Zaragoza (380) prescribed for the time from 17 December to 6 January—hence likewise for three weeks—a daily attendance at church, and a little later a letter from the circle of the monk Bachiarius urged spending the same period in prayer and fasting.[77] Toward the end of the fifth century there appeared in the fasting regulations of Bishop Perpetuus of Tours (d. 490) a decree that required a fast three times a week for the period from Martinmas to Christmas and hence at the same time provided the first sure testimony for the existence of Christmas in Gaul.[78] Similar admonitions to prepare for the feast of the Lord's birth by prayer and continence are found in Maximus of Turin and Peter Chrysologus of Ravenna. It was only in the course of the sixth century that Rome created an Advent liturgy in the strict sense by the introduction of five Advent Sundays, which Gregory the Great reduced to four and thereby brought to a conclusion the development of the second festive cycle within the liturgical year.[79]

---

[73] Ambrose, In Luc. 4, 76; Chromatius of Aquileia, Sermo 36, 1; on Maximus of Turin (d. between 408 and 423) see A. Mutzenbecher, "Der Festinhalt von Weihnachten und Epiphanie," Stpatr 5, 3 (1962), 109–116; Peter Chrysologus, Serm. 156–160.

[74] Serm. 199–204.

[75] C. Colbergh, "L'Epiphanie à Rome avant s. Léon," RBén 75 (1965), 304–307; Leo I, Serm. 31–38.

[76] U. A. Jungmann, op. cit., 254–257.

---

[77] Hilary of Poitiers, CSEL 65, 16f. Council of Caesaraug; can. 4; Bachiarius, Ep. ad Marcell., PL, Suppl. I, 1039f.

[78] Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. 10, 21, 6.

[79] W. Croce, "Die Adventsliturgie im Lichte der geschichtlichen Entwicklung," ZKTh 76 (1954), 257–296, 440–472.

CHAPTER 18

Preaching and Piety

Catechesis and Preaching

Every attempt to answer the question of how the clergy of the Church of the Empire saw and carried out the pastoral duty of preaching must remain unsatisfactory because of the special situation of the sources. To be sure, approximately 3,000 sermons and catecheses are extant from the period between Nicaea and Chalcedon, but they come from only some thirty authors, hence from a fraction of those who labored as pastors in these 125 years. And more than half of the stock that has been preserved belongs to two bishops, Chrysostom and Augustine,[1] and so it is not representative for a view of the entire clergy of the time. The criteria for this selection were mostly the quality of the sermons or at least the reputation of the author, but occasionally probably only chance preserved something. The average member of the pastoral clergy surely made frequent use of the models of recognized preachers.[2]

---

[1] The numbers can be only approximate; research today assigns about 800 to Chrysostom, to Augustine about 1,000 sermons and catecheses.

The ecclesiastical catechesis was now also exclusively one for adults and embraced the totality of their instruction and practice, through which the unbaptized were made conversant by an official of the Church with the testimonies of faith and the moral demands which should determine the life of a real Christian. Apparently, there was no special catechesis for children before the end of the sixth century, although the practice of infant baptism was steadily growing.[3] In families with a rather long Christian tradition, however, there was the private domestic catechesis, by which father or mother gave the child a first introduction into the Christian life and faith, if, in accord with the custom of the day, the reception of baptism was deferred until later. The Church urgently referred to such a duty of the parents, especially Chrysostom and Augustine; the latter even saw here "an ecclesiastical and, so to speak, episcopal task" conferred on the paterfamilias.[4] The official catechesis was more and more reserved to the clergy: only for the East are isolated lay catechists mentioned, and a special aptitude was demanded in them.[5] At Antioch it was mostly imparted by priests, and the same must be presupposed for the instruction at the Roman titular churches.[6] At Carthage a deacon was entrusted with the introductory catechesis at the admission into the catechumenate; priests probably likewise shared in the baptismal catechesis for the competentes in North Africa, since they also had the right to preach.[7] In the majority of other localities in East and West, however, the bishop was regarded as the teacher of the catechumens; the extant baptismal catecheses of this period came partly from priests, partly from bishops.[8]

Catechesis was determined, as regards its purpose, content, and method, entirely in relation to its missionary context. In his De

---

[2] Augustine De doctr. christ. 4, 29, 62, indicates this; Caesarius of Arles, Sermo 1, 15, refers to "the old custom in the East of having the homilies of the Fathers read in the churches."

[3] Cf. J. C. Didier, "Le pédobaptisme au IV^e siècle," MSR 6 (1949), 233–246.

[4] Augustine, In Joh. tr. 15, 13; John Chrysostom, De inani gloria et de educandis liberis, ed. B. K. Exarchos (Munich 1955); Jerome, Ep. 107 gives to the Roman lady Laeta a program for the religious education of her daughter Paula.

[5] Const. Apost. 8, 32, 17.

[6] For Antioch: John Chrysostom, In Ep. II ad Cor. hom. 30, 2; In Genes. hom. 12, 1; In Ep. I ad Cor. 3, 3; for Rome cf. Monachino, op. cit., 345.

[7] Augustine, De cat. rud. 1, 1; Ambrose, Ep. 2, 27.

[8] It is uncertain whether Cyril of Jerusalem delivered the baptismal catecheses as a priest; those of Chrysostom belong to his days in Antioch (388–389); on the dating of the catecheses of Theodore of Mopsuestia, cf. Quasten, P III, 409.

catechizandis rudibus[9] Augustine gave a systematic guidance for the Carthaginian deacon Deogratias, which influenced practical catechetics down to modern times and has retained its freshness to this day. In the two models which he appended of a longer and a shorter introductory catechesis can be read how he wished to see his advice carried out. Augustine did not underestimate the difficulties and relapses which often tended to demoralize the catechist, but he felt they could be overcome if he let himself be led by the joy of the heart.[10] In this the catechist must adapt himself to the individuality of his hearers, who often brought along very different assumptions, each according to his level of education, to their receptiveness to religious or other motives, which induced them to seek admission into the catechumenate.

The kernel of all catechesis, according to Augustine, had to be the history of salvation,[11] as it was revealed by Scripture in the dealings of God with men. It must be made known to the hearer in its most striking events, in the creation of Adam, the deluge, the covenant of God with Abraham, the priestly kingship of David, the deliverance from the Babylonian Captivity, and the all-decisive Christ-event. This narratio of the mirabilia Dei should show not only the inner connection of the Old and New Testaments, but impart a universal view of all history, as it was framed in God's plan of salvation. When the catechist understood judiciously how to make the inner connection between the history of salvation and the religious route of the catechumen, he would represent to him the love of God for mankind and for him as the ultimate motive of the divine work of salvation, which reached its climax in Christ's death and resurrection. The Christ-event especially was to be made known with such warmth and forcefulness that the catechumen came to the faith by hearing, achieved hope by believing, found love by hoping.[12] In a last exhortatio he should be admonished to guard faith, hope, and love from the allurements of that world out of which he came to the Church and not let himself be led astray by those baptized persons who again succumbed to this world. For the Augustinian catechesis it is also characteristic that it was entirely oriented to the positive exposition of salvation history and renounced polemic and rhetorical ornament. Unfortunately, no complete series of Augustine's Sermones ad competentes from any one Lent has been preserved, but only three separate explanations of the baptismal creed and the Lord's Prayer.[13] The first are by their very nature chiefly dogmatically instructive, but thoroughly alive, clear, and impressively formulated, even lightened by the remark that the catechumens should soon have no fears of failure in the trial recitation of the text to be learned by heart, since he was still their father, not a schoolmaster with the rod.[14] In the explanations of the Lord's Prayer the moral exhortation prevails; they are all the more stamped by the unmistakable tone of Augustinian intensity and warmth of statement, which wins and convinces, because the catechist is himself convinced.

---

[9] Special editions: G. Krüger (Tübingen, 3rd ed. 1934); A. Sizoo (Amsterdam 1947); G. Combes–J. Farges, BiblAug. 11 (Paris 1949); on the dating (not 405 but 399), see L. J. van der Lof, VigChr 16 (1962), 198–204.

[10] De cat. rud. 2, 5: ut gaudens quisque catechizet, ea cura maxima est.

[11] See J. Daniélou, op. cit., 249–262.

[12] De cat. rud. 8.

From the area of Greek speech no work of equal rank with De catechizandis rudibus has been preserved. Gregory of Nyssa, to be sure, in his Logos catechetikos, intended for the Christian teacher, also dealt with methodical questions, such as the adaptation to the individual situation of the hearers, but in contrast to Augustine he preferred a philosophical justification of the truths of faith and let the scriptural and theological foundation retreat unduly into the background.[15]

In the baptismal catecheses attributed to Bishop Cyril of Jerusalem, however, there is realized Augustine's central concern: to make salvation history the center of the instructions in the preparation of the candidates for baptism. The dogmatic exposition was carefully joined to the moral catechesis, occasionally apologetic remarks were inserted, and especially the concluding mystagogic catecheses were very clearly structured. The simple language, the appreciative entry into the situation of the hearers, the clever, deliberate manner of the presentation make these catecheses an especially informative model of Early Christian preaching.[16]

John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia, both outstanding representatives of the Antiochene catechesis, made prominent two aspects of it, since the first preferred the moral catechesis more in accord with his inclinations, while the other preferred the sacramental catechesis, which was apparently applied to hearers with a certain level of education. Chrysostom, the majority of whose extant catecheses come from Easter Week, untiringly inculcated in the newly baptized that they must remain neophytoi for the rest of their lives, and for this the Spirit given to them in baptism qualified them.[17] The explanation of the rite of Christian initiation by Theodore of Mopsuestia emphatically set off the eschatalogical character of baptism and Eucharist: with baptism the "new life" of the Christian begins, and the Eucharist nourishes it, while letting him participate in the death and resurrection of Christ and thus arrive at his own resurrection.[18]

---

[13] Catechesis on the Creed: Serm. 212, 213 (PL, Suppl., II, 536–543), 214; cf. also De symbolo I (PL 627–636); catechesis on the Lord's Prayer: Serm. 57–59; sermo 56 was probably not intended for the competentes.

[14] Tract. de symb. 11.

[15] New edition of the Oratio catechetica by H. Polack in Greg. Nyss., Opera III, 2 (Leiden), will soon be ready.

[16] Complete edition: W. C. Reischl–J. Rupp (Munich 1848–60); only the mystagogic catecheses: F. L. Cross (London 1951); A Piédagnol, Schr 126 (Paris 1966). On Cyril as a catechist sec A. Paulin (with the literature), also G. Touton, PrOrChr 1 (1951), 265–285.

In the mystagogic catecheses of Ambrose of Milan their inner relationship to eastern ideas is striking. Like Cyril of Jerusalem, he placed great importance on the understanding of the symbolic content of the sacramental rites, which he tried to explain by means of the typological interpretation of Old Testament events, figures, and individual books, especially the Song of Songs and Psalm 23.[19]

During the real catechumenate, now for the most part curtailed to one Lent, Christian preaching could not be satisfied with the catechetical introduction here provided. In addition to it, an intensive follow-up was necessary in order to extend the laying of the first foundation of a knowledge of the faith and of moral conduct and to deepen and consolidate it. This task was the lot of preaching, which for that reason long retained a missionary character and in an ever new onset had to free the newly won faithful from stubborn pagan custom and to seek to assure them in regard to pagan opposition that was still flaring up. With the increasing certainty that the future would belong to the Christian profession, these antipagan features of preaching grew in severity, which in some preachers could assume a denunciatory character. In cities having a strong Jewish element in the population, such as Antioch, the anti-Jewish preaching was of great importance, and it too could display a strongly polemic tone.[20] The Trinitarian and Christological controversies and the confrontation with Donatism and Pelagianism likewise found expression in preaching and occasioned a large number of dogmatic sermons. The topic of the sermon was expanded by the now powerfully developing cult of martyrs and saints, which introduced the laudatory sermon, the encomium or panegyric respectively, into Christian eloquence. Burning questions of Christian behavior, raised by the day-to-day care of souls, confer on many a sermon a marked exhortatory feature. Finally, special occasions, such as church dedications, anniversaries of episcopal ordination, and funerals of individuals, mostly of high-ranking personalities, gave the bishop opportunity for sermons of a special type, which were often influenced by their model in the profane sphere. The highest rank of all forms of preaching belonged at this period to the homily in the strict sense, which interpreted either entire books or rather long sections of Scripture or even a single word of Scripture and thereby connected specific concerns of pastoral care.

---

[17] The cathecheses of Chrysostom, edited by A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Varia Sacra (Petersburg 1909), pp. 154–183; the newly discovered baptismal catecheses, edited by A. Wenger, SChr 50 (Paris, 2nd ed. 1970), commentary by W. Harkins, ACW 31 (1963).

[18] R. Tonneau–R. Devreesse, "Les Homélies catéchétiques de Théodore de Mopsueste," SteT 145 (Vatican City 1949); see J. Quasten, ThSt 15 (1954), 431–439.

[19] Catecheses of Ambrose, ed. O. Faller, CSEL 73 (Vienna 1955); ed. B. Botte, SChr 25 (Paris, 2nd ed. 1961).

[20] On the anti-Jewish polemic of the period see supra, chap. 13.

In the Greek East a pupil of Lucian of Antioch, the Arian Asterius the Sophist (d. after 341), who had offered sacrifice in the persecution of Diocletian and therefore was excluded from any clerical function for the rest of his life,[21] was an early representative of the Scriptural preaching of the time. Since the right to preach was more and more attached to the office of priest or bishop from the fourth century, Asterius was one of the last "lay preachers," whose activity was censured by Athanasius as usurpation.[22] Of his commentary on the psalms, attested by Jerome and Theodore of Mopsuestia, most recently thirty-one homilies on Psalms 1 to 25 could be identified, which were delivered a long time after Nicaea to an audience that cannot be specifically localized.[23] The depreciating judgments of Athanasius and Theodore on their quality stands in opposition to the remark of Jerome that they were held in high repute among the author's Arian followers. The Easter homilies of Asterius,[24] thus far investigated in greater detail, justify a more positive evaluation; the sermons reveal in their often spirited form the trained rhetor and are penetrated by a theologically notable and high notion of the Easter mystery. The sixteen extant sermons of another Asterius also surpass the average. As Bishop of Amaseia (d. after 410) he was famous for his special homiletic activity. The six real homilies prefer New Testament pericopes, which are suited for moral interpretation; also the occasional sermons on the cult of martyrs, on fasting, against avarice and the celebration of Kalends show him as a pastor who understood the stylistic rules of rhetoric but feared their excesses.[25]

Of the Cappadocians, Basil likewise drew upon the psalms especially for preaching on Scripture; his fifteen extant homilies were probably taken down by stenographers and published later by him.[26] They interpret verse by verse in a lively language, which did not hesitate to admit improvisation and again and again looked into the situation of the congregation of Caesarea. This was especially impressed by the homilies on the work of the six days, which explained the account of the creation by a continual comparison with the state of knowledge of contemporary science;[27] the colorful descriptions of nature not only charmed their first hearers: Ambrose used these homilies for his work of the same title, and Augustine did the same in a Latin translation for his De Genesi ad litteram.[28] The more thematic sermons of Basil attest his deep familiarity with Scripture, from which the pastor aimed to construct his community. On the other hand, Gregory Nazianzen, whom Jerome called his teacher in the exegesis of Scripture and a later age would call the "Christian Demosthenes," admitted only one exegetical homily into the collection of his "talks,"[29] since he probably wanted to display as models of Christian eloquence only those addresses which he delivered on special occasions, such as funerals, ecclesiastical solemnities, striking incidents of his own life. Here he was pleased to show forth his rhetorical training, without however thereby essentially impairing the vivacity of the discourse and the personal note.[30] The twenty-six extant addresses of Gregory of Nyssa[31] are likewise mostly occasional sermons, in which an all too great space is allotted to contemporary rhetoric, so that at times they weary one with their pathos and their exaggerations. The examples which he delighted to take from natural science and medicine were concessions to the taste of the age; the preferred explanation of philosophical and theological problems and of controverted questions corresponds to Gregory's gifts and inclination. The exegesis of biblical texts—there are six homilies on Ecclesiastes, fifteen on the Song of [21] G. Bardy, Recherches sur s. Lucien d'Antioch et son ecole (Paris 1936), 316–328.

---

[22] De syn. 18, 23.

[23] M. Richard, "Asterii Sophistae commentariorum quae supersunt," SO, fasc. suppl. 16 (Oslo 1056).

[24] H. J. Auf der Maur, Die Osterhomilien des Asterios Sophistes als Quelle für die Gesch. der Osterfeier (Trier 1967).

[25] C. Datema, Asterius of Amasea, Homilies I–XIV (Leiden 1970); two homilies were earlier published by A. Bretz, TU 40, 1 (Leipzig 1914), 107–121.

---

[26] PG 29, 209–493 (nine homilies); see also two homilies on Ps. 14 and 115, PG 30, 72ff. See J. Bernardi, op. cit., 22f.

[27] To the nine homilies on the work of the six days, edited by St. Giet, SChr 26 (Paris 1949), belong the two homilies De origine hominis, edited by A. Smets and M. van Esbroeck, SChr 160 (Paris 1970); ibid., 13–26 and 116–126, on the question of authenticity.

[28] The translation of Eustathius, edited by E. Amand de Mendieta and S. Y. Rudberg, TU 66 (Berlin 1958); on the later effect, St. Giet, op. cit., 70f.

[29] Jerome, Vir. ill. 117; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 37 on Matt. 19:1–12.

[30] See J. Bernardi, op. cit., 93ff., 254–256; B. Wyss, Mus. Helvet 6 (1949), 177–203; E. Bellini, SC 99 (1971), 269–296.

[31] Opera Greg. Nyss. IX, 1, ed. G. Heil, A. van Heck, E. Gebhardt, and A. Spira (Leiden 1967).

Songs, eight on Matthew 5:1–10, and six on the Lord's Prayer[32]—for the most part followed the homiletic form only externally and made abundant use of allegory for the explanation of Gregory's ascetical and theological concerns, but on the other hand surprisingly left the religious life of the community in the background.[33]

The homiletic achievement of John Chrysostom represents the unquestioned climax of Greek Scriptural preaching of the age. In more than 700 preserved homilies he, for the most part when he was a priest at Antioch, interpreted from the Old Testament parts of Genesis, the Psalms, and Isaiah, and, from the New Testament, much of Matthew, John, the Acts of the Apostles, and, with special devotion, most of Paul's Epistles.[34] He did not, it is true, express himself on the theoretical basis of his exegesis in the greater context, but the Scripture was to him wholly the inspired Word of God, to the service of which he knew he was called and to which he sought to do justice with a high sense of responsibility.[35] In relation to Scripture he aimed basically to strengthen the community in its faith and to lead it to a piety which should hold up in the day-to-day life of the great city of Antioch. As no other preacher of the East, Chrysostom possessed for this task one of the most favorable presuppositions, an innate oratorical endowment, which was not subject to the rules of style laid down in rhetoric but made use of them in an outstanding manner. With this native eloquence he joined a cordial understanding for the cares and problems that afflicted his hearers, and this created a unique relationship of trust between preacher and community. The latter openly rejoiced when, after a rather long illness, Chrysostom appeared again in the pulpit, so fortunate was he that he could again feel their love. To have to give up preaching stirred in his hearers as in himself a feeling which he characterized as hunger.[36] In all this he truly spoke to them not to please them: in Antioch, as later in Constantinople, he preached the demands of the gospel without compromise. To no bishop of the capital would the epithet "court preacher" be less suitable than to Chrysostom. Byzantine Scriptural preaching of the future found his homilies to be exemplary and used them again and again, of course mostly only as was possible to Epigoni. Among his admirers was especially his later successor in the see of Constantinople, Proclus (d. 446), but in his case a definitive judgment in regard to his preaching is rendered difficult because of the still unsolved questions relating to authenticity.[37] To his time and especially to his community he ranked as a good preacher who, however, clearly paid his debt to contemporary rhetoric.[38] The sermons today regarded as genuine mostly deal with the feasts of the Lord during the Church year, the Theotokos,[39] the Apostles, or other figures of the Eastern Church. Of the sermons of Theodoret of Cyrrhus (d. c. 460), also an admirer of Chrysostom, only scanty remnants have come down to us, although he was praised by his hearers as an outstanding speaker.[40] The ten talks on providence (peri pronoias)[41] were delivered in Antioch to a, for the most part, Christian and educated public, before which Theodoret was willing to renounce neither the carefully planned exposition of questions of natural science nor the copious use of rhetorical stylistic methods.

---

[32] Opera V, ed. P. Alexander; Op. VI, ed. H. Langerbeck; Op. VII, 2, ed. J. Callahan (ibid., 1960–69); see "Écriture et culture philosophique dans la penseé de Grégoire de Nysse," Actes du colloque de Chevetogne, 1966 (Leiden 1971).

[33] See J. Bernardi, op. cit., 261–332.

[34] PG 48–56.

[35] Hom. in parab. decem mill. tal. 4. On Chrysostom's understanding of Scripture see H. Eising, OrChr 48 (1964), 84–106, and R. Hill, VigChr 22 (1968), 19–37.

[36] Hom. in parab. decem mill. tal. 1; hom. post terrae mot. init. (37) PG 65, 679–888: 27 sermons, of which nos. 2, 4, 17 are fragments, no. 20 to Chrysostom. On the question of authenticity, B. Marx, Procliana (Münster 1940: on 80 sermons of Proclus in pseudo-Chrysostom) and F. J. Leroy, "L'homilétique de Proclos de Constantinople," SteT 247 (Vatican City 1967).

In the sphere of the Latin Church Upper Italy produced a series of bishops who left a quite abundant homiletic legacy. It was inaugurated by Zeno of Verona (362–c.372) whose sixteen sermons and seventy-seven sermon outlines were still clearly marked by the relatively late era of the evangelization of the countryside. From his African home Zeno brought a noteworthy rhetorical formation, which was strongly evident in the longer addresses.[42] Ambrose of Milan in his preaching displayed a decided preference for the Old Testament, from which he took the text for his numerous Scriptural sermons, apart from his commentary on Luke, on which likewise his homilies were based. Even in their book form, revised for publication,[43] his rhetorical education becomes clearly visible: the dignified, solemn language displays the Roman aristocrat as well as the bishop of the contemporary imperial city of residence, who was quite conscious of his position. But on the whole, his preaching, as he required of it also in theory,[44] was simple and natural, adapted to the subject as well as to the understanding of the hearers, and clear in its expression. During his stay in Milan, Augustine found the repute of Ambrose's eloquence confirmed and was deeply touched by the preacher's suavitas sermonis, which aimed rather to enlighten than to charm.[45] The study of the Greek Fathers, especially of Basil and Origen, induced him to adopt the allegorical exegesis of the Scriptural text because it seemed so productive for the preaching of his Christocentric piety.[46] Forty-one sermons, only very recently identified, of Chromatius of Aquileia (388–c. 408),[47] ordained a Bishop by Ambrose, acquaint us with a pastor who, free from rhetorical ambition, sought in simple but vivid language to make clear to his people the mystery of Christ, of his Church, and of their redemption. At the same time they give abundant information on the liturgy of the contemporary Church of Aquileia. Bishop Maximus of Turin (408–423), on the other hand, preferred thematic preaching to the homily in the proper sense.[48] His rhetorical training usually enabled him to find a clear articulation for his theme and a striking formulation of his thoughts. He was always aware that he had to speak in an easily grasped language to people who had not long before been gained to the Christian faith, if he wanted to lead them to a genuinely Christian conduct. A preacher thoroughly convinced of the importance of a tireless and painstaking preaching was the Spanish Bishop Gregory of Elvira (d. after 392), whose twenty-five homilies, together with two addresses of Pacian of Barcelona, represent the extant remnant of the sermon literature of his country from the fourth and fifth centuries. Five homilies are devoted to the explanation of the Song of Songs; the others, except one, interpret Old Testament texts and use them vividly and cleverly with regard to style for deepening his hearers' understanding of the faith.[49]

---

[37] Socrates, HE 7, 28, 41, 43.

[39] The sermon on the Theotokos, delivered in the presence of Nestorius, also in Schwartz, ACO I, i, 1, 103–107.

[40] Photius knew five of his sermons on Chrysostom, PG 84, 47–54. Reference to the response which his sermons found: Theodoret, Ep. 83, 90f., 145, 147.

[41] PG 83, 555–774.

[42] "Zenonis Veronensis Tractatus," ed. B. Löfstedt, CChr 22 (1971), in it, pp. 68*–123*, remarks on the language and style of Zeno.

[43] CSEL 32, 1–2; 62; 64, revised by C. Schenkl–M. Petschenig (Vienna 1897–1919).

[44] Ep. 2, 5, 7; De off. 1, 101; De Isaac 57.

Jerome's homilies provide a surprise in the sense that these sermons on various psalms and pericopes from Mark and other New Testament writings[50] renounce any rhetorical effect and linguistic elegance and show that the Christian preacher who has gone through the school of a profane education can thoroughly free himself from the ballast of the rhetoric of late antiquity. The impromptu homilies are in the traditional form of apparently uncorrected transcripts from the circle of his monks, with whom the "Abbot" of Bethlehem spoke familiarly and frankly on the dangers which could threaten a monk's life.

---

[45] Conf. 5, 13, 23.

[46] E. Dassmann, Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius von Mailand (Münster 1965).

[47] Edited by J. Lemarié, SChr 154 and 164 (Paris 1969–71); on the discovery and transmission of these sermones, ibid. 154, 9–40. Hitherto well known were a sermon on the eight beatitudes and seventeen tractatus on the gospel of Matthew, but despite the title they are not homilies: ed. A Hoste, CChr 9 (1957). Of this commentary on Matthew, thirty-three more tractatus have now been found; see R. Etaix–J. Lemarié, SE 17 (1966), 302–354, which were published in CChr 9A.

[48] The critical edition of A. Mutzenbecher, CChr 23 (1962), regards 111 sermons as genuine.

[49] PL, Suppl. I, 353–527; on the question of authorship, U. Dominguez del Val, Repertorio de las ciencias eclesiásticas en Espãna I (Salamanca 1967), 6–12. Also, G. M. Verd, "La predicación patristica española," EE 47 (1972), 227–251.

Precise in the range and quality of his homiletic achievement, Augustine represents the Latin counterpart of Chrysostom, from whom, however, he took so many individual features that he became a unique figure among Early Christian preachers.[51] The Bishop of Hippo also expressed himself in detail on the goal and form of the sermon and in so doing established the thesis that the Christian preacher need not have gone through the school of rhetoric in order to be able to perform his task objectively. He could model himself for this directly on Scripture and adhere to proved examples; in any event, the gifted preacher would do justice to the rules of eloquence, since they were natural to him.[52] More heavily than all rhetorical brilliance on the one hand or the displeasure of the grammarians because of unpolished diction on the other hand, there weighed on Augustine the duty of explaining the Word of God in so plain a manner that the less gifted could also grasp it.[53] To this end he delighted to give to his preaching the character of a dialogue, of the intimate conversation between the bishop at his cathedra and the congregation, which hung on his words and ingenuously replied to his questions. Augustine's lively spontaneity, his superior gift of improvisation, and his pedagogical skill were of uncommon benefit to such a manner of preaching. His biographer Possidius called special attention to the powerful impression which his method of preaching made on his hearers, and the expression probably coming from his successor in the preaching office repeats this impression in his own way: "now the cricket chirps, for the swan is silent."[54] The deep effect of Augustine's preaching was not least of all conditioned by a unique relation of trust and sympathy which united hearers and preacher. They were glad to come because they loved him and knew they were loved by a shepherd, who, like them, wanted to be only one member in the flock of Christ the Shepherd, by a teacher, who wanted to be only their fellow-pupil in the school of the one Teacher, Christ,[55] who placed significance neither on his intellectual superiority nor on his episcopal authority, who might therefore even scold and reprimand, if the life of the community supplied the occasion. At bottom, Augustine was convinced that one who is not himself first a hearer in his inner being will be only a hollow preacher.[56] Although not unaware of the strong echo which his preaching found in the congregation and which he sensitively recorded in all its nuances, he found the task of preaching a magnum pondus in the evening of his life, often deeply oppressed by the responsibility into which he knew he had been placed.[57] The fertile soil of his preaching was almost exclusively the Holy Scripture: his intimate knowledge of it effortlessly put at his disposal every verse of the Bible for spontaneous use and made his language completely saturated with the Bible. Differing from Chrysostom, Augustine preferred the allegorical exegesis of Scripture for preaching, since it supplied more abundant opportunities to his gift for making clear his understanding of the Word of God, as the homilies on the psalms and on John's gospel attest with special vigor.[58] While in the Enarrationes in psalmos, as well as in the general sermones, the great questions and themes of Christian life—the world as foreign, the meaning of suffering, Christian hope, life as prayer—are in the foreground, the figure of Christ, his message, and his Church are the dominant theme of the Tractatus in evangelium s. Johannis, which in its way represented an unsurpassed high point of Early Christian preaching. The preaching of the Latin Church lived for centuries on his homiletic legacy as a whole.

---

[50] Now also a new edition by G. Morin: CChr 78 (1958).

[51] F. van der Meer, op. cit., 473–544; Chr. Mohrmann, "Saint Augustin prédicateur," Études sur le latin des chrétiens I (Rome 1958), 391–402.

[52] Augustins "Homiletik" im 4. Buch seiner Doctrina christiana (ed. J. Martin, CChr 32 [1962] and G. M. Green, CSEL 80 [1963]); see H. I. Marrou, S. Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (Paris, 2nd ed. 1949), 505–545; J. Oroz Reta, La retórica en los sermones de s. Agustín (Madrid 1963); F. Schnitzler, Zur Theologie der Verkündigung in den Predigten des hl. Augustinus (Freiburg 1968).

[53] Enarr. in ps. 36, 3, 6; In Joh. ep. I, tr. 6, 14, De doctr. christ. 4, 10, 4–25.

[54] Possidius, Vita s. Aug. 31, 9; Eraclius, Sermo 'Puto, fratres,' no. 2 PL 39, 1719; cicada clamat et cygnus tacet.

Of the Latin preachers after Augustine, a later age honored the Bishop Peter of Ravenna (c. 430–450) with the nickname Chrysologus, but his extant homilies do very little to justify it, at least in regard to form. To the principle which he himself laid down—that one must preach to the people only in a popular manner—he proved himself only too often unfaithful because of his delight in rhetorical ostentation.[59] More attractive, on the other hand, are the twenty sermons of Bishop Valerian of Cimiez (d. c. 460). They give a clear picture of the cult of martyrs in contemporary southern Gaul and stress the duty of the Christian to prove himself in daily life by charity toward his fellowmen, readiness for reconciliation, and humility.[60] The sermons of Pope Leo I are distinguished by linguistic elegance and solemn diction and are the first religious talks of a Pope of importance to come down to us. In them the consciousness of the rank of the Roman episcopal see is clearly reflected, but they do not cause one to forget the religious seriousness and the sparkling life of the Augustinian sermones.[61]

---

[55] In Joh. ev. tr. 6, 1; 13, 8; Enarr. in ps. 126, 3.

[56] Sermo 179, 1: verbi enim dei inanis est forinsecus praedicator, qui non est intus auditor; cf. also De doctr. christ. 4, 15, 32.

[57] Especially characteristic are Sermones 17 and 339. Good attendance at his preaching: In Joh. ev. tr. 3, 21; 6, 1; 7, 1. On the audience's approval see the examples in F. van der Meer, 498–502, and J. Zellinger, Festgabe A. Knöpfler (Freiburg 1917), 403–415.

[58] On the quality of the Enarrationes in psalmos, see M. Pontet, L'exégèse de s. Augustin prédicateur (Paris 1946), 387–553; J. Moran, BAC 235 (Madrid 1964), 11*–83*. On the Tractatus in ev. Joh., M. F. Berrouard, BiblAug 71 (Paris 1969), 9–124.

Christocentric Piety

As the basic attitude and center of all piety, devotion to Christ in its various forms was pushed into the awareness of the faithful by Christian preaching even more powerfully than in earlier times. Christocentric baptismal piety, long stressed, still retained its rank, which could be noted in the thought and intensity which pastoral care devoted to the preparation for baptism and the elaboration of the baptismal liturgy. Naturally, the actuality of day-to-day Christian life often did not correspond to the untiringly extolled demand on the faithful to form their lives with regard to their baptismal promises, so that Chrysostom had to warn his neophytes against the example of those Christians whose behavior flagrantly contradicted what they had once promised.[62] Eucharistic piety also now fell short, among the majority of Christians, of the ideal proclaimed to them, since, especially in the large communities of East and West, preaching had to complain ever more of the declining or fluctuating attendance at the liturgy. Here now, more and more, a nucleus of dedicated Christians stood in contrast to the bulk of the members of the community, who found their way to the church only on the solemnities of the liturgical year or for special occasions.[63] Preaching clearly pushed devotion to the Passion to the foreground, as the numerous sermones de passione domini make known, and they prepared for the medieval devotion to the sufferings of the Lord.[64] Their effect was a widespread veneration of the Cross, which was expressed as well in the popularity of the sign of the cross as a gesture of prayer in private and liturgical piety, especially in the adoratio crucis on Good Friday, as in the triumphal cross of the apses of basilicas and of sarcophagi, in the simple cross on the walls of a private house or in the cell of the monk, and finally in the keen interest in the fate of the true Cross of Christ. The popular pilgrimages to Jerusalem had one of their roots here. The visit to the Holy Sepulchre and Mount Calvary, which was an established part of the religious celebration of Holy Week in Jerusalem in the fourth century makes one think of the stations of the later Way of the Cross.[65] The sermon on the Passion was also the occasion on which the demand for the "following of Christ" was made with special urgency: this was emphatically understood as an imitation of the example which Christ gave in his Passion as doctor humilitatis and as physician of suffering mankind.[66] Finally, Christocentric piety manifested itself impressively in prayer to Christ, which further expanded the start made earlier by Origen and the martyrs, and as a consequence of the stimulus which the Christological discussions since Nicaea gave it; the private piety of the prevailing attitude to prayer developed into it and received through Augustine its deepest theological justification.[67]

---

[59] Peter Chrysologus: PL 52, 183–666, and PL, Suppl. III 153–183 (on 180 genuine sermons); see A. Olívar, Los sermones de s. Pedro Crisólogo (Montserrat 1962).

[60] Valerian of Cimiez: PL 52, 691–756; PL, Supl. III 184–188; cf. E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne 3 (Paris 1965), 188–191.

[61] Leo I, Sermones, ed. J. Leclercq–R. Dolle, SChr 22 (2nd ed.), 49 (2nd ed.), 72, 200 (Paris 1961–73).

[62] John Chrysostom, Cat. bapt. 3, 8–18; 5, 20.

[63] K. Baus, "Die Eucharistische Glaubensverkündigung in der alten Kirche," Die Messe in der Glaubensverkündigung. Festschr. J. A. Jungmann (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1953), 55–70; J. P. Montminy, "La participation des laics à l'Eucharistie du III^{e} au VI^{e} siècle," Sciences ecclés. 19 (1967), 351–372. For Antioch: P. Rentinck, op. cit., 86–90; for Milan: V. Monachino, op. cit., 56f.,; for Hippo: F. van der Meer, 209–213.

The earlier arrangement of prayers with its set times for prayer in the course of the day and its basis, which found its first definite form in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, continued to endure under the influence of this writing: morning, evening, and mealtime prayer, prayer at the third, fifth, and ninth hours and once during the night, in order to be mindful at any given time of what the Lord did at these hours for the redemption of mankind. Every Christian had at his disposal as texts for his private prayer, first of all, the Lord's Prayer and the Creed, which he knew by heart from the days of his preparation for baptism: the Church constantly urged him to use them as prayers. In addition, in connection with the Eucharistic celebration, some psalm verses and scriptural pericopes had become familiar to him, and they could nourish his private prayer. When the acts of martyrs were read, he often became aware of the call of Christ to the martyrs or heard how his pastors declaimed prayers on the spot and thus learned spontaneously to compose texts that corresponded to his personal situation. Again and again he was also urged by the Church to read the Bible privately.[68]

---

[64] A quite large number of sermons on the Passion by Chrysostom, Augustine, and Pope Leo I are extant.

[65] "Beiträge zur Gesch. des Kreuzzeichens," I–X, by F. J. Dölger, JbAC 1–10 (1958–67). On the symbol of the Cross: H. Rahner, "Antenna crucis," Symbole der alten Kirche (Salzburg 1964), 361–431. On the adoratio crucis, G. Römer, ZkTh 77 (1955), 70–86; P. Thoby, Histoire du Crucifix (Nantes 1959); P. Stockmeier, Theologie und Kult des Kreuzes bei Johannes Chrysostomus (Trier 1966); E. Dinkler, Signum Crucis (Tübingen 1967), 55–76.

[66] Especially marked in Chrysostom and Augustine: L. Meyer, S. Jean Chrysostome, mâitre de perfection chrétienne (Paris 1934), 220–228; M. Comeau, RSR 40 (1952), 80–89; T. van Bavel, Augustiniana 7 (1957), 245–281; P. C. Eijkenboom, Het Christus-Medicus-motief in de preken van S. Augustinus (Assen 1960).

[67] J. A. Jungmann, Christliches Beten, 6–41 (with the literature); on the Christocentrism of prayer in Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine, see K. Baus, TThZ 60 (1951), 178–188, 63 (1954), 321–339; RQ 49 (1954), 21–55.

An important further elaboration of the form of prayer is represented at this period by the change, effected in part under the influence of monasticism, of the earlier prayer-times from the private sphere into the liturgical prayer of the community in the church building. Here, it is true, the participation of the laity was possible only in the liturgical morning and evening prayer—Lauds and Vespers—but this was recommended so urgently that a serious Christian could not easily dispense himself from it. As regards content, an enrichment of the piety of the laity was thereby effected: they now came to know far more of the world of the psalms, Holy Scripture, and also ecclesiastical hymns and prepared texts, which they could also adopt in their private prayers. This daily liturgical prayer cannot be demonstrated for the fourth century in all areas where Christianity had spread; it was primarily the concern of the community and only in a rather long development became the obligatory Officium to be celebrated for the clergy of the cathedrals.[69]

The great preachers spoke again and again on the meaning and content of prayer and essentially, even with varying stress, they expounded the same ideas: that prayer, as conversation with God, requires the proper attitude of soul; that it is first of all a thanksgiving for God's spiritual gifts and should express the desire for the vita beata; that it must not be restricted to set formulas, even if such are often recommended; that one may pray for earthly things only in so far as they are necessary for life and promote one's salvation.[70]

---

[68] A. Hamman, Prières des premiers chrétiens; D. Gorce, La lectio divina (Paris 1925).

[69] J. Stadlhuber, "Das Stundengebet des Laien im christlichen Altertum," ZKTh 71 (1949), 129–183; D. Y. Hadidian, "The Background and Origin of the Christian Hours of Prayer," ThSt 25 (1964), 59–69; H. Leeb, Die Psalmodie bei Ambrosius (Vienna 1967).

[70] Prayer in Chrysostom: P. Rentinck, op. cit., 146–153; in Augustine: F. van der Meer, op. cit., 202–209.

Forms of Asceticism

"But we are not monks." Again and again Chrysostom had to meet this objection when at Antioch he proclaimed to the laity also the obligation to a life which should be in accord with the gospel.[71] Apart from marriage, however, he and other pastors of the day preached that in principle monks and lay persons were called upon to strive for the same perfection, since there is only a single ideal of perfection for all Christians, which must be realized everywhere. Hence aloofness from the world is for all Christians the basic ascetical disposition which was staunchly emphasized by the Christian preaching and the ascetical literature of the time, which claimed to have been written not merely for monks or to recruit for the monastic life.[72] Fasting was especially recommended as one possibility of its realization, understood not only as liturgical penitential fasting or as preparation for the reception of the Eucharist or even as mere hygienic fasting, but as a personal feat and attitude, which was oriented to man's goal in the next life.[73] Then to all the propertied classes was directed by the pastors a continual admonition to almsgiving, which was not only regarded as a social duty of Christians toward the poor or as a form of expiation of the personal guilt of sin, but was presented as the way to interior freedom vis-à-vis wealth and property. Wealth, of course, was not considered in principle as sinful, but it was always described, at times with powerful rhetorical pathos, as highly dangerous to the individual's salvation.[74] The total renunciation of often vast wealth and of a life of luxury, as was carried out not rarely in the fourth and fifth centuries by members of the upper class in Constantinople, Cappadocia, Rome, Gaul, Sicily, and North Africa, obtained unlimited praise from the ecclesiastical sector. For the most part this step sooner or later followed the entry upon a specific ascetical lifestyle, in which a person remained in his family or community as continens or virgo or joined an ascetic group or, more often, a community of nuns or monks or was admitted into the clergy. The Church at this time recruited intensely by word and writing in the lay world to urge a decision to this ascetical life, as the numerous works on continence or virginity respectively make known.[75] The earliest among them, such as the homilies of Eusebius of Emesa and the pertinent writings of Athanasius, still presupposed that these ascetics continued to live in their parental house or together with some like-minded persons.[76] Gregory of Nyssa emphasized that he wanted to recruit for the ideal of virginity in his treatise, and in it he repeatedly addressed male youth.[77] If, in so doing, he, like Eusebius of Emesa before him and Chrysostom in his early work on the same theme after him, and, even more, Jerome in his polemic against Jovinian, described the difficulty of married life in harsh terms, this was not at all a specifically Christian devaluation of marriage but a variation of a theme which was familiar since Aristotle and current throughout the Stoic diatribe.[78] Later Chrysostom came to a balanced judgment on marriage, and Augustine in his De bono conjugali and De sancta virginitate reproved Jerome's vehemence.[79] With the corpus of Ambrose's works on virginity they represent the high point of Old Latin Christian literature on this theme: the theological justification which Augustine hit upon for Christian virginity, his clear delineation in regard to the quite proper rank of marriage, and the sensible look at its dangers for those who freely chose it, secured for his estimation of virginity its millenial long-range effect.

---

[71] In Ep. ad Hebr. 7, 4: In Gen. hom. 21, 6; In Mt. hom. 7, 7.

[72] Cf., for example, Chrysostom, In Ep. ad Hebr. hom. 24; Ambrose, De fuga saec. Augustine, sermo 170 and sermo de peregrinatione huius vitae (Misc. Agos. I, 285); Eucherius of Lyon, Ep. ad Valerianum cognatum de contemptu mundi; see Z. Alszeghy, "Fuite du monde," DSp 5, 1593–1599.

[73] Augustine gives the deepest motive in De utilitate jejunii; see the translation of R. Arbesmann (Würzburg 1958), XIX–XXXVI.

[74] Basil, Hom. 7 (ad divites), used by Ambrose, De Nabuthe; see the commentary of J. Huhn, De Nabuthe (Freiburg 1950); Gregory of Nyssa, De pauperibus amandis I–II; John Chrysostom, De eleemosyna, see O. Plassmann, Das Almosen bei Johannes Chrysostomus (Münster 1961); Salvian, Ad ecclesiam 11. IV, ed. G. Lagarrigue, SChr 176 (Paris 1971); J. Mausbach, Die Ethik des hl. Augustinus I (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1929), 284–298; E. F. Bruck, Kirchenvater und soziales Erbrecht (Berlin 1956).

Cult of Martyrs and Saints

The freedom won through Constantine's conversion to Christianity gave to the already important cult of martyrs strong new impulses, which caused it to become, in the next hundred years, a very characteristic and, in its consequences, highly significant form of Early Christian piety, in whose development both the private initiative of individual faithful and the Church as representative of public worship shared. The previous view of the martyr as the perfect imitator of Christ, who through the power of grace had given witness to his Lord with his blood and now as coronatus, as the contemporary Christian art liked to show him, united with him in the glory of the next life, underwent no substantial modification; only one feature was now stressed: his dignity and his nearness to the glorified Lord made him the advocate of the faithful on earth and the protector of the individual as well as of the community which chose him as its patron.[80] Out of this esteem grew the strong interest in the grave of the witness to the faith and in the relics which it sheltered. In its direct possession was seen a special guarantee of the protection and intercession of the patron and it was distinguished from all other graves by a special cult building, erected as martyrion or memoria respectively or as a basilica over the grave, which in size and furnishing often vied with the churches of the community within the city walls. The community assembled in these cemetery churches on the dies natalis martyris to celebrate the Eucharist.[81] From the same root sprang the zealous effort to rediscover the tombs of those martyrs concerning whose martyrdom tradition often supplied only a summary account or who had fallen into oblivion in the shadow of an especially vivid martyr-figure, such as an early bishop of the community. The inventio of such a grave, which was often due to a vision or to information provided in a dream, became the most significant event which deeply affected the worship and piety of the community. Especially momentous inventiones of this sort were, in the West, the discovery of the bones of the Milanese martyrs Gervasius and Protasius, Nazarius and Celsus by Bishop Ambrose in 386 and the rediscovery of the grave of Stephen at Kaphargamala near Jerusalem in 415, which produced a new wave of devotion to Stephen, which, with the dispersal of his relics, embraced all areas of the Empire in a very short time.[82]

---

[75] A summary of this work is given by T. Camelot, "Les traités De virginitate au IV^e siècle," Etudes Carmélit. 31 (1952), 273–292.

[76] Eusebius of Emesa, Hom. VI–VII De martyribus or De virginibus, ed. E. M. Buytaert, Eusèbe d'Emèse, Discours conservés en latin I (Louvain 1953), 151–195. A homily of pseudo-Basil, De virginitate, D. Amand, RBén 63 (1953), 34–69, 211–238, is applied directly to the paterfamilias; see D. Amand de Mendieta, RHE 50 (1955), 777–820. On Athanasius: M. Aubineau, "Les écrits de s. Athanase sur la virginité," RAM 31 (1955), 140–173.

[77] Gregory of Nyssa, De virg. praef. 1, 1; c. 23, 3, 4, 7, ed. M. Aubineau, SChr 119 (Paris 1966).

[78] Cf. G. Chr. Hansen, "Molestiae nuptiarum," Wiss. Zschr. Univ. Rostock 12 (1963), 215–219.

[79] J. Dumortier, "Le marriage . . . d'après s. Jean Chrysostome," Lettres d'humanité 6 (1947), 102–166; R. d'Izary, La virginité selon s. Ambroise (Lyon 1952); J. G. Nolan, Jerome and Jovinian (Washington 1957). Augustine's reference to Jerome: Retr. 2, 48, 1.

A new phase of the cult of martyrs began with the translatio of the remains of martyrs to the churches within the city walls, although at first this procedure encountered considerable doubt and difficulties, since it was contrary to a twofold law, binding in East and West, according to which the deceased might be buried only outside city walls, and graves were regarded as "inviolable." The corresponding laws were repeatedly inculcated by the Christian Emperors also, and exceptions required the authorization of the highest administrative officials.[83] For the first known transfer of a martyr's body—that of St. Babylas to Antioch in 354[84]—the Caesar Gallus was able to give it more easily because with the new sanctuary of Babylas it was now possible definitively to displace in the suburb Daphne the cult of Apollo that had especially flourished there. In the transfer of the bodies of martyrs that he had found, Ambrose apparently regarded his position as bishop of the imperial residence as sufficient to exempt him from this law, but other bishops had to ask a dispensation. In Persia Bishop Marutha of Maipherkat requested it in 410 from King Yezdegerd I, and the subsequent transfer of the Persian martyrs into his episcopal city included the change of its name to Martyropolis. In Rome people at first took a reserved view of the all too frequent transfers, but bestowed the greatest care on the martyrs' tombs and the buildings belonging to them. The place of the new burial in the city church could be only in the closest proximity to the center of the church, the altar; the most faithful followers of Christ, who had offered their life in a total self-sacrifice, should be in closest touch with the spot on which the memorial of Christ's sacrificial death was celebrated.[85] Hence altar and martyr's tomb were at that time brought together, both in theory and in practice, into that intimate connection which would later be the rule everywhere, according to liturgical law, where there was a Christian altar.

---

[80] H. Delegaye, Les Origines . . . , 100–140: "L'invocation des martyrs."

[81] On the cemeterial basilicas: A. Grabar, Martyrium I; R. Krautheimer, "Mensa-Coemeterium-Martyrium," CahArch 11 (1960), 15–40.

[82] Ambrose's report: Ep. 22; the discovery of Stephen's grave in A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Analecta Hierosol. Stachyl. 5 (Petersburg 1898), 25–53; the Latin text in PL 41, 807–818.

But this aim could be realized only if portions of martyrs' remains were supplied to those communities and churches which did not have so precious a possession at their disposal, and so it was necessary to proceed to multiply martyrs' relics by division into small and minute parts. The objections springing here from burial law and theological scruples were overcome with the argument that the protection and benefit for a community produced by the smallest particle of a relic was more significant than the integrity of the corpus, and the bodily resurrection of a martyr was not jeopardized, in view of God's omnipotence, by such parcelings.[86] They were also facilitated by the partition, begun earlier, of the Cross of Christ, particles of which went forth from the middle of the fourth century to all areas where Christianity had spread.[87] As with the transfer of whole tombs of martyrs, the obtaining, transfer, and burial of the relics of martyrs in the altar of the church was elaborated into a solemn ceremony. Since even this partition of relics did not satisfy the numerous demands, and since in the West people remained far more reserved in regard to the partitioning, a substitute was established in the so-called "second-class relics," usually expensive fabrics, which were brought into contact with the martyr's tomb or the place where the relics were deposited, to which, in accord with an ancient and Christian idea, the protective and healing power of the original relics then passed.[88] Parallel to the sharing of relics, still controlled by the Church to a degree, ran the intensive exertion of private circles to come into possession of such precious phylacteries, which early led to the doubtful abuses of a far-flung commerce in relics; they were, of course, disapproved by ecclesiastical and civil officials but could never be completely eliminated.

---

[83] Cod. Theod. 9, 17, 6, 7; on translatio in general: B. Kötting, Reliquienkult, 15–24.

[84] Sozomen, HE 5, 19, 13–19.

[85] Ambrose, Ep. 22, 13; see F. Wieland, Altar und Altargrab (Leipzig 1912); T. Klauser, RAC I, 343ff.

[86] Lactantius, Div. Inst. 4, 26, 13; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. c. Jul. 1, 69; Gaudentius, Tr. 17, 35; Paulinus of Nola, Carmina 27, 447.

The conviction of the intercessory power of martyrs led many Christians to want to be themselves buried as close as possible to a martyr's grave. From this burial ad sanctos people expected aid for themselves at the hour of the resurrection, because one was conducted before God's judgment seat by the martyr who rose with him. The sober statement of Augustine that the place of burial of itself guaranteed no help for a dead person, but only the prayer of the living who commended him to the intercession of the martyrs, did very little to check this powerfully blazing desire in the second half of the fourth century for interment near the grave of a saint. Finally, the Church had to regulate by law burial inside a church and reserve it for a small circle of persons—bishops, priests, and a few lay persons of high rank.[89]

The cult of martyrs as an Early Christian form of piety was not promoted chiefly by the lay world or by monasticism, but in its essential features it was motivated, justified, and encouraged by the Church and its theologians. In scarcely any of the not very bulky homiletic legacy of a pastor of the time are there missing sermons in honor of a martyr, which extol his dignity, the power of his intercession, the example of his love of Christ, and the miracle-working efficacy of his relics. The Church not only allowed the interment of his body inside the house of God: it let its liturgical calendar be decisively determined by the memorial days of the martyrs and admitted their names into the text of the Eucharistic Prayer.

---

[87] Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. 4, 10; 10, 19; 13, 4.

[88] On second-class relics see B. Kötting, "Reliquienverehrung," TThZ 67 (1958), 327–334.

[89] Augustine, De cura gerenda pro mortuis 18; burial "ad sanctos": B. Kötting, Reliquienkult, 24–36.

The cult of saints who did not rank as martyrs began somewhat hesitantly in the first half of the fourth century and reached full development in its last two decades; it was, after all, an extension of the cult of martyrs to a group of the dead whose life and actions enabled them to be compared to the martyrs in some degree, because it likewise represented an outstanding profession and witness for Christ. They included, first of all, those who in time of persecution had suffered for the faith in prison, under torture, or in exile, but the desired confirmation by a bloody death was denied them. With such confessores were soon associated individual ascetics and monks, whose life was willingly ranked as unbloody martyrium, and finally also those who especially proved themselves in the Arian troubles or in the missions as courageous adherents and zealous preachers of the orthodox faith. Martyrium sine cruore was granted to all those, and they were quickly celebrated in word and writing, like the other martyrs: the hermits Antony and Hilarion, the Syrian monks, especially the Stylites, the exiled Bishops Paulinus of Trier, Dionysius of Milan, Athanasius, the protagonist of Orthodoxy, Basil, Peter of Sebaste, Ambrose of Milan, the missionary Martin of Tours, and others.[90] To them also was accorded the liturgical celebration of the day of their death and admittance into the liturgical calendar; private individuals and clerics competed in building memorial chapels and churches over their graves, in Syria even, as a precaution, in the lifetime of an esteemed hermit, and their relics were soon equally desired and at times literally fought over, as those of the old martyrs. The people were especially strongly involved in the spread and elaboration of the cult of this group of saints. The accounts of their life and activity were gladly filled in with that colorful detail which appealed to popular fantasy; the charismatic endowment of individuals was felt to be miraculous, and some lives of saints are mere collections of miracula.

In the Christian cult of saints were also included some outstanding figures from the world of the Old Testament, such as Moses, Abraham, David, some of the Prophets, and the Macchabee brothers, even though this was not without its difficulties for two reasons. The first was that thereby a certain recognition, if not commendation, of Judaism was expressed, and yet Christians were often still in polemical confrontation with it. Then, in the life of these persons the inner relationship to witnessing for Christ seemed to be lacking, and hence the decisive criterion for the dignity of martyr or confessor. Christian preaching theoretically countered this difficulty with the argument that these figures were Christians before the appearance of Christ, because their life served the ultimate goal of his coming, and thus the violent death of some Prophets, of Eleazar, of the Macchabees, could be understood as anticipated martyrdom and hence a Christian celebration in their memory was justified. In practice, the Christians of Palestine and Syria often neutralized or overcame the competing Jewish cult of saints by taking possession of the sites of the Jewish shrines and building churches there, such as at Hebron-Mambre, which then became centers of the Christian cult of saints.[91]

---

[90] H. Delehaye, Sanctus, 109–121: Du martyr au confesseur.

The cult of Mary had spread among the people long before theology had clarified the questions regarding her sanctity and virginity.[92] People besought "the protection of the Theotokos" at least at the beginning of the fourth century, as a prayer preserved on papyrus shows. However, in 377 Epiphanius of Salamis had to come out decisively against a sectarian debasement of her cult.[93] Bishop Severian of Gabala was of the opinion that Mary was to be invoked in prayer before the Apostles and martyrs; in the West her cult was theologically clarified and justified especially by Ambrose and Augustine.[94] The oldest Marian feast was celebrated in Constantinople even before the Council of Ephesus as mneme Theotokou on 26 December and in title and content recalled the dies natalis of the martyrs; the first churches dedicated to her go back likewise to this time. The Council of 431 freed the way for the complete development of the cult of Mary.[95]

Early Christian Pilgrimage

Another field of Early Christian popular devotion is found in the pilgrimage system, the prototypes of which are represented by the pilgrimage to the places most significant for memories of the Christian past, which lie above all in the Holy Land, and the pilgrimage to the tombs and relics of saints. The initial steps toward the pilgrimage to Palestine are seen, after a period of caution conditioned by the critical contrast to the Jewish pilgrimage system, in the pre-Constantinian journeys of individual Christians, such as Origen and the future Bishop Alexander of Jerusalem, a native of Cappadocia: they were motivated by theological and exegetical interests or by the desire to pray at the holy shrines.[96] As early as 315 larger crowds of pilgrims from all parts of the East were to be seen in Jerusalem,[97] and the pilgrimage movement received new incentives when, with the beginning of Constantine's sole rule, the external circumstances of the journey became more favorable and when the visit to the holy shrines received encouragement from higher up because of the esteem which the imperial family, especially Helena and Constantine himself, gave to it. But that one should not see in Constantine's measures the basic cause of the pilgrimages to Palestine is made clear by the report of the journey of a pilgrim from Bordeaux in 333, who in Jerusalem came upon a situation quite in accord with the entire pilgrimage system, such as can have developed only in a rather prolonged period of time.[98] In Jerusalem and its closest neighborhood, naturally, what was in the foreground for the pilgrims were the sites which had a relation to the events from the Redeemer's life; then followed the places of Old Testament tradition, while the cult of Christian saints began only with the discovery of Stephen's grave in 415, and the cult of Mary was discernible in Jerusalem still later. Hence the world of the Bible clearly determined the visits of the pilgrims: it was "the real Pilgrim's Guide" for the journey to the Holy Land.[99] This is true also for the places situated farther away, such as Cana in Galilee, Lake Genesareth, Mount Tabor, the Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea, Hebron in the south, and Mount Sinai.

---

[91] M. Simon, "Les saints d'Israel dans la dévotion de l'Église ancienne," Recherches d'histoire judéo-chrétienne (Paris 1962), 154–180.

[92] E. Jousaard, "Marie à travers la patristique," Maria I (Paris 1949), 69–157.

[93] Reproduction of the papyrus: ECatt, "Sub tuum;" against the early dating, but unconvincing, is O. Stegmüller, ZKTh 74 (1952), 76–82.

[94] Marian prayers in Cyril of Alexandria, Hom. 11; Augustine, Sermo 291, 6. C. W. Neumann, The Virgin Mary in the Works of St. Ambrose (Fribourg 1962).

[95] On the Marian feast: B. Capelle, Études mariales 7 (1949), 42ff.; A. Raes, OrChrP 12 (1946), 262–274. Cult of Mary in North Africa after Augustine: H. Barré, RevÉAug 13 (1967), 285–317.

Despite all external activity, as it showed itself occasionally at great pilgrimage centers, despite some bizarre and even grotesque individual features of the traffic in relics here, from the total experience of the Palestine pilgrimage, especially from the great liturgical observances of Holy Week and of the Finding of the Cross, lasting effects were produced on the devotion of the pilgrims, which were passed on by them after their return home. The precious account of the journey of the pilgrim Egeria attests this, despite all the simplicity of the statements, as decisively as do the letters of Jerome, based on observations made over years.[100]

The second type of pilgrimage, the visit to the grave and relics of the saints, naturally presupposed a certain progress in the cult of martyrs and saints, but it influenced its further expansion and intensification. In the course of the fourth century there developed, in the East a bit earlier than in the West, those great pilgrimage centers in all parts of the Empire, which always set large crowds of pilgrims in motion; here only the most important can be named.[101] In the Syrian capital, Antioch, with its many memorials of martyrs, that of the Seven Macchabees was, besides the shrine of Babylas, the most important point of attraction, but both were overshadowed by Kal'at Sim'an, the "rock" of Simeon the Older, the Stylite, who in his lifetime was the most popular ascetic of the entire Syrian area.[102] The grave of the Apostle Thomas at Edessa was as beloved a goal of pilgrims as the Church of Saint Sergius in Rusafa on the Euphrates, which in the Early Byzantine period saw the largest crowds of pilgrims.[103] In Seleucia-in-Isauria was the shrine of the legendary Thecla, Ephesus possessed the graves of the Apostle John and of the Seven Holy Sleepers, and from Chalcedon the miraculous blood-relics of Saint Euphemia proceeded into the Early Christian world.[104] A pilgrimage center with all its accessories had developed in Egypt around the tomb of Menas and made the City of Menas the "Early Christian Lourdes."[105] The highly regarded cult shrines of the capital of Constantinople were connected with outside saints: the two physicians Cosmas and Damian (anargyroi) and Daniel the Stylite; Demetrius, venerated also at Sirmium, obtained a famous shrine at Thessalonica.[106] In the Latin West no city could compete with Rome in the number of martyrs' tombs, among which those of the two Apostles Peter and Paul held the first rank also in the eyes of the numerous pilgrims; following them were the tombs of Hippolytus and Lawrence, all in the course of time distinguished by magnificent cemeterial basilicas. Bishop Paulinus proclaimed the glory of the martyr Felix at Nola in Campania, as the zealous custodian of his tomb.[107] At Carthage the annual memorial of Saint Cyprian attracted many Christians, who, to the sorrow of the bishop of the city, introduced the feast with a hardly edifying preliminary celebration. North Africa became the home of a widespread cult of Stephen, when relics from his grave arrived there after 415 and produced miraculous cures at Hippo, Calama, and Uzala, which were not questioned even by Augustine.[108] Catholics of Gaul and Spain made annual pilgrimages to Martin's grave at Tours; among them were many who expected a cure from their sickness. The Spaniards themselves had in the burial sites of the martyr Vincent at Zaragoza and of Saint Eulalia of Mérida pilgrimage shrines which were celebrated by Prudentius.[109]

---

[96] B. Kötting, Peregrinatio, 83–89.

[97] Eusebius, Dem. ev. 6, 18, 23.

[98] Itin. Burdig. 589–596.

[99] B. Kötting, Peregrinatio, 105.

[100] New commentary on the Itinerarium Egeriae—text in CSEL 39, and CChr 175—by J. Wilkinson, Egeria's Travels (London 1971). Jerome, Epp. 46; 108.

---

[101] Basic is H. Delehaye, Les origines, 141–403.

[102] G. Tschalenko, Villages antiques de la Syrie du Nord I (Paris 1953), 223–276.

[103] See J. Kollwitz, Neue deutsche Ausgrabungen (Berlin 1965), 45–70.

[104] F. Miltner, Ephesus (Vienna 1958), F. Halkin, Euphémie de Chalcédoine (Brussels 1965).

[105] Lives of Menas: BHG 3rd ed. nos. 1256–1269; state of the excavations in Menas City: W. Müller-Wiener, AA 1967, 457–480.

[106] L. A. Deubner, Kosmas und Damian (Leipzig 1907, reprint ed. 1969: report of miracles); A. Wittmann, Kosmas und Damian (Berlin 1967), On the miracula s. Demetrii: P. Lemerle, ByZ 46 (1953), 349–361, and V. Besevliev, Byzantina 2 (1970), 285–300.

[107] H. Leclercq, "Pèlerinage à Rome," DACL 14 (1939), 41–65; G. Bardy, AnBoll 67 (1949), 224–235; J. Fontaine, Oikoumene (Catania 1964), 243–266: Prudentius in Rome. On Felix of Nola: Paulinus, Carmina 15.

As the basic attitude for the pilgrimage the preachers of the period required a disposition which would prove itself in the following of Christ and the imitation of his saints. The motives could differ in individual pilgrims. In the foreground stood the desire and hope to find healing or counsel in personal need, especially in sickness; thanks for help given was also an opportunity for a promised pilgrimage. The notion of penance and expiation was not yet emphasized, even though it would hardly have been missing in the often great hardships of the pilgrim's journey. Criticism of the pilgrimage system was scarcely directed against the pilgrimage as such, but against the misunderstanding of it, its improper motivation, and the manifold corruptions of the practice of pilgrimage, especially as they appeared at the great pilgrimage centers.[110]

Survival of Pagan Customs in Christian Popular Piety

Like missionary work in all ages, so too that of the fourth and fifth centuries had to learn by experience that a relatively brief period of preparation for the reception of baptism did not suffice to supplant deep-rooted pagan practice in the newly converted. And so the pastors of all lands in East and West stood in a ceaseless struggle against various forms of pagan superstitio, which at times was mixed almost inextricably with what was Christian and seriously compromised the purity of devotion. People complained especially of the power of attraction of pagan magic, as practiced by astrologers, soothsayers, and faith-healers, who were again and again sought out by Christians, in spite of all the warnings of preachers.[111] The so-called Synod of Laodicea even had to decree that clerics of all ranks who acted as magicians, sorcerers, astrologers, and makers of amulets were to be deposed from their functions.[112] Chrysostom and Augustine knew practicing Catholics who had recourse to superstitiously selected days, incantations, and amulets, an especially objectionable practice, since they bore the sign of the cross. The Upper Italian Bishops Gaudentius of Brescia, Maximus of Turin, and Zeno of Verona had to censure the same procedure in some of their faithful.[113] Augustine knew that Christians used the book of the gospels to inquire into the future from it; others placed it on themselves in order to cure a headache, and with some resignation he stated that it was not intended for that but it was still at least preferable to pagan magic fillets.[114] In rural districts especially the attachment to the cult of trees, springs, and rocks continued tenaciously to exist, and again and again synods attacked it, apparently with no great success.[115] The attractions of pagan feasts could be dispelled only with difficulty, and persons even participated in revels in pagan temples. Clearly the temptation was irresistible for many when the days came, since on the Kalends of January the new year was introduced with boisterous celebration. Many bishops made the Kalends feast the theme of entire sermons and rejected the appeasing explanation of Christians that there was here still a question of a popular feast by arguing that the celebrations referred by their very origin to a pagan idol.[116]

---

[108] C. Cecchelli, "Il culto delle reliquie nell'Africa romana," RPAA 1939, 97–108; P. A. Février, "Le culte des martyrs en Afrique et ses plus anciens monuments," Corsi di Ravenna 17 (1970), 191–234.

[109] E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne 3 (Paris 1965), 214–259; C. García Rodríguez, El culto de los santos . . . (Madrid 1966).

[110] Such criticism was made by, for example, Gregory of Nyssa, Ep. 2, 17; John Chrysostom, Ad Antioch. hom. 3, 2; Jerome, Ep. 58, 4; Augustine, In Joh. tr. 10. See B. Kötting, Stpatr 5 (TU 80, Berlin 1962), 360–367.

An ingredient of the pagan cult of the dead was the refrigerium, a meal to which came the relatives of a deceased person on the third, seventh, and ninth days after the burial, on the anniversary of the death, and on the great memorial of the dead, the Parentalia, in February. The Christians retained this meal of the dead in a simple form without opposition from the Church and added to it a Christian feature when they had a part of the foods brought turned over to the poor. But in the fourth century this meal at the graves often assumed again, even among Christians, the noisy and unbridled form of pagan celebrations for the deceased.[117] Chrysostom not only blamed the loud lamentation of the relatives and wailers at a Christian funeral as pagan behavior, which contradicted the belief in the resurrection; he also disapproved the pomp which some Christians displayed there.[118] The meals were finally transferred into the churches on the memorials of the martyrs and in some places, especially in Italy and North Africa, degenerated into great revels with dancing and song. At Milan Ambrose, to whom the pagan origin of the refrigeria was always displeasing, early abolished them. Other bishops of North Italy followed him, whereas they continued at Rome, even in St. Peter's.[119] In Africa Augustine was the driving force that sought to end such abuses. He gained Bishop Aurelius of Carthage, where especially serious excesses occurred, for a discussion of the question at the Synod of 393 in Hippo, which forbade the custom. Augustine enforced the synodal decree, not without opposition, at Hippo and at the same time recommended that the foods hitherto destined for the memorial meal in the church be used for an agape at the graves of the dead in the cemetery and that gifts be given to the poor and the needy at the same time, for that was the Christian way, in addition to the liturgical celebration for the dead, to recall the deceased.[120]

---

[111] H. Leclercq, "Magie," DACL X (1931), 1097–1114; A. A. Barb, "The Survival of Magic Arts," A. D. Momigliano, The Conflict between Paganism and Christianity in the 4th Century (Oxford 1963), 100–125; P. Brown, "Sorcery, Demons and the Rise of Christianity," Religion and Society in the Age of Augustine (London 1972), 119–146.

[112] Can. 35.

[113] John Chrysostom, In Ep. 1 ad Tim. hom. 10, 3; In ep. ad Col. hom. 8, 5; Gaudentius, Tr. 4, 13–16, 8, 16–18, 9, 27; Maximus of Turin, Sermo 61, c. 4, 94, 98; Zeno of Verona, Tr. 1, 15, 6; 2, 21, 2. On Augustine, in addition to Zellinger (with literature), see also E. Hendrikx, Augustiniana 4 (1954), 109–136.

[114] Ep. 55, 20, 37; In Joh. tr. 7, 12; En. in ps. 127, 11.

[115] Cf. E. J. Jonkers, "Die Konzile und einige Formen alten Volksglaubens," Vig Chr 22 (1968), 49–53.

[116] Sermons "In Kalendas": Asterius of Amasea, Or. 4; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 38; Maximus of Turin, Sermo 63; Pacian, Paraen.; Peter Chrysologus, Sermo 155. Bo Reicke, "Jahresfeier und Zeitenwende im Judentum und Christentum der Antike," ThQ 150 (1970), 321–334; M. Meslin, La fête des Kalendes de Janvier (Brussels 1970), 95–129.

Of course, it did not escape Augustine's watchful eye that a paganism of a subtler sort than that of the realistic popular devotion continued in some Christians, and he saw in it no slight danger. The traditional pagan vital feeling was carried like a subtle poison, as it were, in the blood: the desires for this world, the pride in one's own virtus, which so greatly opposed the understanding of Christian grace, the instinctive shrinking back, ever more revealing itself, from a crucified God, and finally the strong protest against the basic attitude of humilitas. Adherence to these features of paganism was the reason which made so many Christians of the upper class remain semichristian for years. Like no other preacher, Augustine spoke anxiously again and again of this basic danger to the Christian.[121]

---

[117] On the Christian refrigerium and other features of the cult of the dead: A. M. Schneider, Refrigerium (Freiburg 1928), and the works of Klauser and Stuiber (with the literature).

[118] John Chrysostom, In Ep. ad Hebr. hom. 4, 5; Sermo de Anna 5. 5.

[119] Augustine, Conf. 6, 2 (on Ambrose). Also unclear ideas on the fate after death played a role in the attitude of the bishops; see A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim (Bonn 1957).

[120] Augustine's report on the proceedings: Epp. 22 and 29; synodal decree of 393: Mansi, III, 923. On the liturgy of the celebration of the dead, E. Freistedt, Altchristliche Totengedächtnistage (Münster 1928); A. C. Rush, Death and Burial in Christian Antiquity (Washington 1941).

The Laity in the Church[122]

The division of Christians, into the three groups of laity, clergy, and monks, actually already existing at the turn of the fourth century, became more precise in the course of the century and gradually found its fixed place in law together with the development of the corresponding terminology. In this process a clear change in the previous importance and position of the laity within the Church became perceptible, which went back to several causes. With the end of the persecutions the very intensely experienced community of the pre-Constantinian Church between clergy and laity, created by the same expectation of martyrdom, was relaxed everywhere. The glory of martyrdom now, in the opinion of many, passed ever more to asceticism and monasticism, the lifestyle of which, as already indicated, was esteemed as an unbloody martyrdom, and, even unintentionally created a clear distance between itself and the mass of believers. Further, because of the differentiation of functions and still more because of the expansion of its tasks and authority in the care of souls and administration, the clergy gained such power in authority and public respect that the previous position of the laity could not remain uninfluenced by it. And monasticism, with its outlook of holding itself far aloof from "the world," promoted the idea according to which the effort to work out its salvation directly in this world was regarded as doubtful in principle;[123] finally, the sort of lifestyle of many lay persons in the fourth and fifth centuries produced in some pastors a rather skeptical evaluation of the lay element.

The consequences of this change were, of course, neither the same in all areas of Christendom, nor was there always a question of a merely negative repudiation of lay influence, but often of a shifting within its previous spheres of duty. In the basilica the place of the people was now clearly distinct from the place of the clergy, which no lay person was supposed to enter.[124] In procession there developed a certain order of precedence, whereby the clergy, the monks, and the virgins and widows went ahead of the "people."[125] In the pastoral spheres, lay persons still took part in the preparation of the catechumens for baptism, especially widows in the instruction of the women; in cases of necessity lay persons could baptize, but women should not administer baptism, any more than they might instruct men.[126]

---

[121] Cf. P. Borgomeo, L'église de ce temps dans la prédication de s. Augustin (Paris 1972), 102–112.

[122] P. G. Caron, I poteri giuridici del laicato nella chiesa primitiva (Milan 1948); G. H. Williams, "The Role of the Layman in the Ancient Church," Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies (Durham 1958), 9–42; W. H. C. Frend in St. Neill–H. R. Weber, The Layman in Christian History (London 1963), 57–87; E. Lanne, "Le laïcat dans l'Église ancienne," Verbum Caro 18 (1964), 105–126.

[123] Y. Bodin, "S. Jérôme et les laïcs," REAug 15 (1969), 113–147.

The ancient right of the laity to cooperate in the choosing of their clergy continued in principle and was still especially exercised in the election of the bishop. Of course, the form of their collaboration was not precisely fixed: for the most part it consisted of an acclamation of the candidate proposed. The people were also supposed to be consulted in the possible transfer of a bishop to another see; however, at least in the deposition of a bishop they were usually ignored. The Emperors especially often intervened in the election of a bishop, without regard for this right of the laity. The Synod of Laodicea, however, expressed itself against a participation by "the crowd" in the choosing of the clergy. In the West lay persons occasionally could take part in the annual synods; once, at a Gallic synod, the presence of lay representatives was prescribed.[127]

More and more the notion prevailed that the right "to teach" had to be reserved to the clergy. Thus lay preaching virtually ceased. Pope Leo I expressly forbade it and extended the prohibition to monks also, even if they had a certain level of education.[128] The few known exceptions only confirm the general practice. But the Apostolic Constitutions still permitted a lay person to be a teacher of catechumens, if he showed himself suited by his ability and his conduct. Only once was it permitted a layman to teach in the presence of clerics: however, this was not a right of the laity but a concession of the clerics.[129] Parallel to this limitation of an official teaching activity of the laity there developed, however, a growing sharing of the laity in the theological literary work of the time, which can be ascertained expecially in the West. Well-known "lay theologians" of this sort were, for example, Arnobius, Lactantius, Firmicus Maternus, Marius Victorinus, perhaps the "Ambrosiaster," and Prosper of Aquitaine.[130] The Donatist Church displayed qualified lay theologians in the teacher Cresconius and in Tyconius; in the circle of Pelagius were likewise found theologically interested laymen, and there were others, like Helvidius, among the correspondents and literary opponents of Jerome.

---

[124] Const. Ap. II, 57, 4–5; Synod of Laodicea, can. 19.

[125] Victricius, De laude sanctorum 2–3.

[126] Council of Elvira, can. 38; Const. Ap. III, 9; Augustine, C. epist. Parmen. 2, 13, 29; Stat. eccl. ant., can. 37, 41, 100. On the group of "widows" see R. Gryson, Le ministère des femmes dans l'église ancienne (Gembloux 1972).

[127] For the West see J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'empire romain (Paris 1959), 331–333; for the East, Const. Ap. 7, 31, 1; 8, 4, 2; Theodoret, HE 1, 7, 10; 5, 9, 17; Sozomen, HE 5, 13, 2; 2, 19; Palladius, Dial. 16; Socrates, HE 1, 9; Chrysostom, In II Cor. hom. 18, 3; In II Ep. ad Tim. hom. 5, 1; In Act. hom. 14, 3; Synod of Laodicea, c. 13. According to the Stat. eccl. ant., can. 10, the bishop must obtain the testimony and agreement of the laity before ordaining a priest. Laity at synods: Conc. Illib. init.; Conc. Regense (439); CChr 148, 73.

[128] Leo I, Ep. 118, 2; 119, 6; 120, 6.

[129] Const. Ap. 8, 32, 17; 3, 5; Stat. eccl. ant., can. 38.

Unmistakable also was the influence of lay persons in high official or private position on the many areas of ecclesiastical life. Augustine's friend, the Count Marcellinus, could conduct the religious debate of Carthage in 411 and even act as arbiter. In the East ministers and high officials such as Eutropius, Candidian, John, Irenaeus at Ephesus, Chrysoretus, and Chrysaphius played a considerable ecclesiastico-political role. Well-to-do lay persons followed the example of Constantine as promoters of ecclesiastical construction and as founders of charitable institutions or supported the Church's care of the poor by corresponding bequests.

The calling upon the laity for the administration of Church property was often practiced but not uniformly regulated. In North Africa seniores laici, probably elected by the community, as a sort of ecclesiastical council, established an institutionalized field of duties. But in the East they were more and more replaced by clerics, although Chrysostom regretted that, for this reason, these were unable to do justice to their proper task of caring for souls.[131]

In East and West the importance and goal of the lay apostolate was clearly seen and urgently called for by the Church. It was seen as justified in the always recognized general priesthood of the laity, and hence it should be intended for the Universal Church. Chrysostom and Augustine precisely circumscribed the field of duties of this apostolate: they moved to first place the exemplary day-to-day Christian life, whereby a pagan would sooner be gained to Christianity than by any scholarly theological argument. Then, it should show itself in prompt and energetic help for the fellow Chrstian in religious or moral danger, who should be strengthened by the further giving of what one has learned in church from Christian preaching. To the unalterable content of such an apostolate belonged, finally, the missionary work of the layman among the pagans or heretics of his circle of acquaintances, who could be reached only with difficulty by the official preaching of the Church. The lay apostolate should be exercised in close collaboration with the clergy, who, according to Chrysostom, always need the prayer, the advice, and, at times, also the criticism of the laity,[132] as, conversely, the Church prays especially for the laity.[133]

---

[130] M. Sauvage, Catéchèse et laïcat, 97–99; 152–161.

[131] On the seniores laici: W. H. C. Frend, JThS, n. s. 12 (1961), 280–284. Synod of Antioch, c. 25; John Chrysostom, In Mt. hom. 85, 3; In ep. ad Tit. hom. 1, 4. Council of Chalcedon, c. 26.

---

[132] On the general priesthood of the faithful in the patristic age: J. Lecuyer, MD 27 (1951), 5–51; for the view of Chrysostom and Ambrose, cf. A. Nocent–B. Studer, VetChrist 7 (1970), 305–324, 324–340. The lay apostolate according to Chrysostom: P. Rentinck, op. cit., 235–250.

[133] Serap., Euchol., can. 3, 5, 6.

CHAPTER 19

Early Christian Monasticism: Development and Expansion in the East

I. THE RELIGIOUS AND HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

When, in the two decades preceding the turn from the third to the fourth century, individual Christians in Egypt and, perhaps quite independently of these, in eastern Syria broke with their previous life in their family and community and went into solitude apart from other human beings in order to lead a life there of voluntary poverty and sexual continence, the step was taken which was to move beyond Early Christian ascetism to monasticism proper. Thereby began the history of a phenomenon of the inner life of the Church which had far reaching consequences for the Christianity of the succeeding centuries in East and West and characterizes it in various ways down to the present.

In a few decades areas remote from populous centers in Upper Egypt, later called the Thebaid from its geographical center of Thebes, and the region of the Nitrian Desert southwest of Alexandria, as well as the hilly country around Edessa in East Syria were settled by numerous anchorites, who built primitive huts for themselves or were satisfied with a cave. Many of them led their life in full isolation from one another and remained hermits in the strict sense for their lifetime; others, without any firm tie by means of a promise or a fixed rule, attached themselves to one of their number, who was to be their spiritual adviser and thus established a loose union of anchorites. History does not know any clearly outlined figure from whom, through his mere example or enticing word, the notion of realizing the following of Christ in such a way first proceeded. The young Egyptian Antony, who c. 273 left his native village of Kome in central Egypt in order to live as a hermit, first in its vicinity, later in the Libyan Desert, and then on a hill on the Nile, is indeed often called "the Father of Egyptian monasticism" but he was not the first anchorite: he was only one of many,[1] for whom, however, his charismatic endowment and the rank of his biographer Athanasius gained a very high repute. Since for the anchoretic life of East Syria, which was beginning about the same time, no clearly tangible founding figure can be named, the question of the causes of this unique phenomenon acquires special importance.

The history of religion, in the search for an answer, has looked carefully at non-Christian models, from which Christian monasticism may perhaps have been derived. Thus for a while it was believed that a preliminary stage had been found in the so-called Katochoi of the Egyptian god Sarapis, hence in those men who served their god in individual cells at the temple of Sarapis in Memphis or at other shrines, temporarily renouncing their possessions.[2] Certain common features of the religious attitude seem to speak in favor of deriving monasticism from some religious and philosophical trends in Hellenism, especially Neoplatonism and Neopythagoreanism, such as the emphasis on inner recollection and on holy silence in the interest of a clear self-knowledge, and finally a strikingly full agreement in ascetical terminology.[3] Most recently there has been an emphasis on certain influences which proceeded from Manichaeanism—and indirectly through it even from the contemporary Buddhism—on Early Christian asceticism and above all on the monasticism that further developed from it, not only in Egypt, but even more in Syrian Mesopotamia.[4] Here are adduced certain external traits, which are common to both movements, such as the extremely severe fasting, the absolute disengagement from every family tie, as well as the extreme rejection of earthly possessions and of manual labor. Finally, the question must present itself as to whether the immediate precursor of Christian monasticism, at least for the cenobitic type of the first disciples of Pachomius, must not be found in the "monastic community" of Qumran:[5] in its strict organization of the community life, its rejection of private property, its obligation to celibacy, and in its day-to-day ascetical practice, the Pachomian monasticism was to a great degree anticipated in the Qumran community.[6]

---

[1] Athanasius, Vita S. Antonii 3.

[2] Cf. the research of P. Gobillot, "Les origines du monachisme chrétien et l'ancienne religion de l'Égypte," RSR 10–12 (1920–22).

[3] Important are: R. Reitzenstein, "Das Athanasius Werk über das Leben des Antonius," SAH 1914, 8, and id. Historia monachorum und Historia Lausiaca (Göttingen 1916); for the terminology see K. Holl, "Die schriftstellerische Form des griechischen Heiligenlebens," Ges. Aufs II (Tübingen 1928), 249–269.

[4] First K. Heussi, Der Ursprung des christlichen Mönchtums, 287–291; then A. Vööbus, "History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient," CSCO 184 (Louvain 1958), 158–169.

[5] See vol. I, 459 (literature) and 63–66; also E. F. Sutcliffe, The Monks of Qumran (London 1960).

If Early Christian monasticism is first studied according to its self-understanding, there can be advanced from the corresponding literature a whole series of motives by which monks justified their decision for the form of life that they selected.[7] The idea of the following of Christ can, without difficulty, be recognized as the basic motive, which could be realized without compromise earliest in the radical estrangement from the "world," as Basil emphasized.[8] The monk intended "to go the humble way of Christ," the narrow and painful way of which Scripture speaks, whereby he might some day repeat the words: "See, we have left everything and followed you." (Matt. 19:27).[9] He was deeply permeated with the understanding that the following of the Lord forever placed him under the Cross, so that the Pachomian monks had themselves constantly reminded of the basis of their existence by a cross sewn on to their cloak, and Basil could define the existence of the monk precisely as "a carrying of the Cross."[10] In a steady gazing on their crucified model, the monks took up the hardships of their life and intended thus to effect their dying together with Christ.[11] They knew that in this they were gathered into a great troop, which was already living up to such an ideal before them, beginning with the Old Testament models of monasticism, Abraham, Moses, and Elijah, by way of John the Baptist, who in many respects seemed to them the founder of their mode of life,[12] to the Apostles and the primitive community in Jerusalem, which seemed to them, in its life characterized by an ascetic enthusiasm, the ever valid realization of the following of the Lord.[13] Without doubt a strong influence on the origin of early monasticism was this reaching back to the primitive Christian ideal whose theoretical rooting in the biblical world of ideas is already demonstrated. Since the days of Ignatius of Antioch the death of the Christian martyr ranked as the exalted form of the following of Christ; so the monks saw in the martyrs an inspiring prototype and made the latters' sacrifice of their lives for the Lord a constantly examined motive for their own attitude right down to the concrete demands of day-to-day asceticism.[14] In the persecution of Diocletian some of them had themselves been able to experience the mood of death proper to Christians; they now esteemed as their immediate precursors the ascetics of the third century and their own struggles as an unbloody martyrdom, which likewise deserved the corona martyrii, since it was practiced from the same conviction as the bloody form.[15] [6] I. van den Ploeg, "Les Esséniens et les origines du monachisme chrétien," Il Monachesimo orientale (Rome 1958), 321–339; F. S. Pericoli Ridolfini (see the literature for this chapter).

---

[7] U. Ranke-Heinemann, Das frühe Mönchtum. Seine Motive nach den Selbstzeugnissen (Essen 1964).

[8] Basil, Reg. fus. tract. 6, 1.

[9] Apophthegm. Patr., Arsen., 33; Ammonas, 11.

[10] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 32; Basil, Renunt. saec. 1.

[11] Pachomius, Vita I, 11: according to Chrysostom, In Hebr. hom. 15, 4, the monk should be "one crucified."

[12] Cf., for example, Serapion, Ep. ad mon. 11 (PG 40, 937B), and Jerome, Ep. 22, 36; 125, 7; for Abraham as model cf. Antony, Ep. 1, 1; Jerome, Ep. 58, 3.

[13] Cf. H. Bacht, "Heimweh nach der Urkirche. Zur Wesensdeutung des frühen Mönchtums," Weltnähe oder Weltdistanz (Frankfurt 1962), 114–140. The emotional nuance of "homesickness" and "nostalgia" should not cause one to soften the sober realism of ancient monasticism.

The following of Christ, supported by the concept of martyrdom, was finally preferably identified by early monasticism on a broad plane with the angelic life, that catchword that so drew people to asceticism; it was already used by the early Alexandrian theologians and helped to characterize the premonastic asceticism of East and West. It was reached only by way of the apotaxis, the renunciation of the world, through enkrateia, to be practiced in body and soul, through the exercise of the specific monastic virtues of poverty, obedience, and virginity, which led to the height of apatheia, the peaceful security in the possession of monastic perfection. In its perfection the vita angelica of monasticism thus became a life in the community of the angels, an anticipated life in Paradise.[16] With this a further motive for the monastic form of existence was touched upon, which did not, it is true, stand so prominently as others in the foreground, but was surely effective: the eschatological outlook of monasticism, which not only embraced the constant thought of one's own death, but also meant the conscious and wakeful expectation of the Lord's Parousia. A reawakening of the primitive Christian expectation of the Parousia is unmistakable in the early phase of monasticism,[17] and here there may be assumed at the earliest the influence of a certain disillusionment and sorrow over a legacy of the universal Early Christian enthusiasm, as it undeniably appears with the numerical growth of large Christian congregations in the period of peace of the third century.[18] However, this must not be equated with a rejection or a protest against the hierarchical Church as such or even only against the Church of the Empire of the fourth century, the problems of which did not take effect until monasticism had long been in a flourishing state and which therefore cannot be regarded as a cause for its origin.[19] [14] See the copious material in E. E. Malone, op. cit.

---

[15] See vol. I, 295; also U. Ranke-Heinemann, op. cit., 97f.; also Jerome on the Corona de Liliis, which approaches the martyrdom of asceticism: Ep. 108, 31.

[16] Cf. S. Frank, ΑΓΓΕΛΙΚΟΣ ΒΙΟΣ (Münster 1964), which summarizes previous individual studies on the subject.

[17] Cf. U. Ranke-Heinemann, op. cit., 31f.

[18] Cf., for example, Origen, In Ierem. hom. 4, 3; Eusebius, HE 8, 1, 7–9.

With the realization of the following of Christ, thus understood, the Early Christian monk believed he could best fulfill two essential requirements of the gospel—those of a genuine striving for perfection and of a true love of God. The Lord's words in Matthew 19:21, "if you wish to be perfect," not only directly produced in Antony the decision as to his vocation: to many monks of the early period they became a motive, always to be reflected on anew, for their way of life.[20] Abbot Theodore designated the Pachomian system as the model for everyone who wanted to gather men around him in order to guide them to perfection.[21] The motive of the love of God is sounded everywhere in the literature of Early Christian monasticism: it is the source on which its asceticism is nourished. When Basil wanted to retain his friend Gregory for monasticism, he referred him to this, that "he who loves God abandons everything and withdraws into solitude with God"; Theodoret of Cyrrhus gave to his collection of monks' biographies the significant title of History of the Love of God.[22]

It thus became clear that Early Christian monasticism regarded itself as the realization of the purely Christian ideal of perfection and hence must be understood as a genuinely Christian creation, for an explanation of which a grasping at non-Christian models would be useless. The previously mentioned harmony between ascetical terminology and certain formulas of Hellenistic religious philosophy makes one think most easily of an indirect influence from this area, for example, by way of the teaching on perfection of Alexandrian theology, but this influence could be effective in a greater degree only in a later phase of monasticism, when educated men such as Evagrius Ponticus joined it in growing numbers. Among the early anchorites of Egypt and Syria, who mostly came from a lower social stratum, there were simply lacking the presuppositions for a deeper knowledge both of Hellenistic philosophy and probably of Origen, who may be regarded as the pioneer of monasticism in that through his doctrine of perfection he helped create a climate favorable to it.[23] And in regard to the Qumran sects, no ideological connection with later monasticism can be established, since their basic ideas directly contradicted the ideals of monasticism. To the Early Christian monk it would have been impossible to hate the sinner or to preach hatred of him; the consciousness of being an elect of the Sons of Light was just as foreign to him as the idea of ritual impurity, which at Qumran constituted the negatively oriented motive for the renunciation of marriage and of personal property. Finally, the protest of the Qumran people against the "wickedness in the temple" as the reason for their seclusion in the desert was as different from the motive of the following of Christ as was the eschatological hope of the monks for the Lord's Parousia from Qumran's expectation of the end of time, which was to bring the Messianic Kingdom to earth after a holy war against the Sons of Darkness.[24] Certain organizational similarities—a period of trial before admission,[25] manifestation of conscience to a superior—and ascetical practice, such as the external attitude in prayer, forms of fasting, depreciation of the bodily, can be established everywhere as common features where the followers of a religion aim to realize their ideals in the purest form in a community of their own, even a loosely organized one, and in this connection one may think of the Manichaean or Buddhist asceticism. Saint Ephrem pointedly expressed himself on this problem when he thus characterized the relationship between Syrian asceticism and that of the Manichaeans: "Their works are similar to ours, their fasting is like ours, but their faith is not like our faith."[26] The spirit on which the Early Christian monasticism lived was entirely different from that which externally similar religious tendencies or ways of behavior evoked. The question of the concrete occasion, which in the second half of the third century caused the turning of so many Christians to the monastic manner of life, can probably only be answered by saying that the ascetical ideal, long proclaimed in contemporary Christianity and already realized in an early form, was now so mature and strong that it pressed with an irresistible force for realization in an ultimately possible form, as this became tangible at the same time in Egypt and Syria.

---

[19] H. Bacht, "Mönchtum und Kirche," Sentire Ecclesiam, Festschr. H. Rahner (Freiburg 1961), 113–133, especially pp. 115–123.

[20] Vita s. Antonii 2; Basil, Ep. 223, 2; Reg. fus. tract. 8, 1; Cassian, Collat. 21, 5 (quibus evangelicus cotidie intonat sermo); ibid. 3, 4 (Antony).

[21] T. Lefort, Vies coptes de s. Pachôme (Louvain 1943), 276.

[22] Basil, Ep. 2, 4; Theodoret, Φιλόθεος ἱστορία (PG 82); cf. U. Ranke-Heinemann, op. cit., 18–25.

---

[23] See H. Crouzel, "Origène, précurseur du monachisme," Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris 1961), 15–38; W. Schneemelcher, "Erwägungen zu dem Ursprung des Mönchtums in Ägypten," Christentum am Nil (Recklinghausen 1964), 131–141, especially 139; K. S. Frank, "Vita apostolica," ZKG 82 (1971), 145–66, especially 159ff.

[24] J. van den Ploeg, op. cit. 321–339.

[25] Cf., for example, A. Penna, "Il reclutamento nell'Essenismo e nell'antico monachesimo orientale," RQum, 1(1959), 345–364.

[26] Ephrem, Prose Refutations I (London 1912, ed. C. W. Mitchell), 184; on the thesis of A. Vööbus cf. A. Adam, GCA 213 (1959), 127–145.

II. DEVELOPMENT AND EXPANSION IN THE EAST

1. Egyptian Anchoritism. The Pachomians. The Monasticism of the Deserts of Nitria and Scete

THE EGYPTIAN ANCHORITISM. The early form of Christian monasticism was embodied in the anchorites, those Christians who, from the second half of the third century in a rapidly growing number, added to the asceticism hitherto practiced within the Christian community the permanent withdrawal from family and community. It became especially clearly discernible in Egyptian anchoritism, because in this case the state of the sources permits one of the richest glimpses into the development of early monasticism. A still recognizable intermediate stage between asceticism and anchoritism, in which an ascetic withdrew temporarily into solitude, existed also in other geographical areas: thus in the first years of the third century the later Bishop of Jerusalem, Narcissus, and before the mid-century the Roman priest Novatian, "out of love for [another] philosophy," went for a while into solitude.[27] Out of the world of Novatian rigorism proceeded also the anchorite Eutychian, who shortly after 300 lived on Bithynian Olympus as a highly esteemed hermit, without its being possible to demonstrate a connection with Egyptian anchoritism.[28] That Egyptian anchoritism had existed long before the great Antony is proved by the figure of the hermit living in the vicinity of his native village, whom Antony sought out soon after his own embracing the life of an anchorite and made his model.[29] Thus as the Early Christian asceticism in the cases just mentioned, apparently independent of one another, led to anchoritism in the vicinity of one's native village, so the latter in turn led to the stricter form of eremitism in the Egyptian desert. Here too a relatively early initial effort c. 300 is warranted, since a reliable report on the hermit Ammun presupposes the existence of some hermits in the Nitrian Desert and perhaps also in distant Scete long before his turning to anchoritism in common c. 320–330.[30] When in several favored areas the settlements of the hermits grew in number, there occurred the formation of anchorite communities, loose associations in which the hermits gathered around a monk of high repute who was to be their spiritual adviser and father, without, however, the position of superior of this community being given to him in the sense of an "abbot," for example, through a definite rule. Such groups of anchorites, which often united a considerable number of hermits, living separate from one another in their huts or other lodgings (cells), are frequently mentioned in the apophthegmata literature and the related descriptions of anchoritism of the Historia Lausiaca of Palladius and the Historia monachorum. Thus in the Upper Egyptian Thebaid were the monks Or, Apollo, Pityrion, and Copres, "fathers of many brothers"; in the area of Arsinoe hermits flocked around the Abbot Serapion, who was also a priest.[31] The highest repute was gained by the colonies of anchorites of Lower Egypt, which were formed southwest of the Nile Delta in the wildernesses of Nitria and Scete.

---

[27] Eusebius, HE 6, 9, 6–10 (Narcissus); 6, 43, 16 (Novatian); see F. J. Dölger, AuC VI, (1950), 61–64.

[28] Socrates, HE 1, 13, 1–10.

[29] Athanasius, Vita s. Antonii 3.

[30] Socrates, HE 4, 23; see K. Heussi, op. cit., 75.

Antony the Great (c. 251–356), however, who overshadowed all the others, was regarded in the early monastic literature as the "Father" of a community of anchorites, first because his charismatic gift of leadership made him a unique spiritual guide ever more sought out by the hermits, and then because his biography, composed by the Bishop of Alexandria, Athanasius, who knew him personally, assigned him a singular position in the development of Egyptian monasticism. The special character and tendency of this account, whose authenticity can no longer be doubted,[32] must, of course, be noted, if one wants to obtain an accurate picture of Antony's life from the incidents and individual features here related. It has been rightly said that it offers no photograph of the saint but rather the work of a painter, who, so far as he can, aspires to reproduce the reality in which Antony lived.[33] As early as the first period of his anchoretic life, in which Antony lived in the burial chambers of the cemetery near his native village, are found essential characteristics of Egyptian monasticism: manual labor, prayer, and reading of Scripture. On each monk who had made progress, however, there was laid a task which he could not evade: the struggle with the demon, who played an especially ample role in the life of Antony.[34] It was ultimately a struggle with all the forces opposed to God, which had to consist of an ever new start and could be endured only in faith. Since a person was most strongly exposed to the demonic in the extreme solitude of the desert,[35] that was precisely where he took his stand and best proved his monastic character. Only one who had stood this final test could be a guide and adviser to others in their struggles.[36] Thus, when he was about thirty-five years old, Antony also left the vicinity of his home and proceeded to an abandoned fort on the other side of the Nile on the edge of the desert, which for twenty years was the scene of his struggle.[37] When he again left it in order to strengthen in their courage as confessors the Christians imprisoned at Alexandria in the persecution of Diocletian,[38] he came forward "as from a holy shrine, initiated into deep mysteries and as one filled with God."[39] He stayed for some years in this fort, but now as "father" of many hermits,[40] until he went still deeper into the desert c. 313, to the "inner mountain," some distance from the west bank of the Red Sea, but here too he was soon sought out by many "brothers" who wanted his advice and by clerics and lay persons who begged his aid.[41] Antony fully shared of the wisdom he had thus gained with the anchorites in his conversations, which Athanasius put together in long discourses; in them, despite all the rhetorical ornament, resound the Pauline ideas of demonic powers, which are overcome only by faith in the power of Christ. Antony attributes ultimately to this power his insight into the nature of the demonic and its power.[42]

---

[31] Cf., for example, Hist. mon. 2, 1; 8, 2; 10, 1; 15, 1; 18, 1.

[32] Cf., for example, K. Heussi, Ursprung des Mönchtums, 78–81.

[33] Thus L. Bouyer, op. cit., 39.

[34] Ibid., 69–98, and G. Switek, "Wüstenväter und Dämonen," GuL 37 (1964), 340–358.

[35] Athanasius, Vita s. Antonii 51–53.

[36] Ibid. 8–14.

CENOBITISM OF THE PACHOMIANS. In fact, it was an anchorite who had gone through Pauline school who understood that many a monk was imperilled rather than protected by this severest type of eremitism, and that therefore he was in need of a life in a community which gave him both a foundation and support through the brothers and through a spiritual adviser accessible at any time and at the same time made him equal to the numerous ascetical renunciations which a life in common imposed. Pakhôme, or Pachomius, born in the Upper Thebaid c. 287, as a young soldier under Maximinus Daia had come into contact with Christianity and after his military discharge had been baptized and then attached himself to a hermit named Palamon.[43] After spending several years as a hermit, he established a monastic community near the Upper Egyptian village of Tabennisi between 320 and 325: the members, by accepting a rule he had composed, bound themselves to realizing an ascetical manner of life in common that was the same for all, under the direction of a superior.[44] In this way Pachomius became the founder of cenobitism, which since then has never ceased to be practiced and was first to give to Christian monasticism its specifically religious and cultural effectiveness. This was true even when, for example, simultaneous foundations of a similar type could not be excluded,[45] since only to the work of Pachomius can really creative significance be assigned, which was based on his personality and was recognized as such by his contemporaries as well as by future ages. Certainly, for the first Pachomian monastery at Tabennisi, as well as for the monastic Rule, a rather long period of growth and maturation must be assumed, during which the ideas of the founder were clarified, especially the details.[46] Hence, in its extant form, the Pachomian Rule and the biographies of him reflect a certain completing of the monastic development.

---

[37] Ibid. 11–12.

[38] Ibid. 46.

[39] Ibid. 14.

[40] Ibid. 15.

[41] Ibid. 49–50; 61–64; 68; 72.

[42] Ibid. 5; 7; 9; 11; 30; 39; 40; 74–80; 83–84.

[43] T. Lefort, Vies coptes, 84; Vita graeca I, 12.

[44] The Coptic sources, especially Vies coptes, 67–69, report somewhat hazily of a first unsuccessful effort of this sort. The "Rule" is completely preserved only in Jerome's Latin translation. To the various Coptic versions must be added the Greek lives of Pachomius, of which the Vita prima is the most important, as well as Arabic and Syriac texts. On the extremely complex problem of their reciprocal relations, see finally A. Veilleux, op. cit., 11–107.

The exterior structure of a Pachomian monastery makes clear the new concept as opposed to anchoritism. The entire area of the monastery was surrounded by a wall and hence stressed its separation from the world: it could be entered only through the porter's quarters.[47] As its center may be regarded the great room (synaxis—ecclesia) in which the monks gathered for the liturgy.[48] The refectory for all the inhabitants of the monastery also underlined the community character of the new foundation.[49] The community, directed by the "father of the monastery," beside whom stood a substitute,[50] did not, however, live in a large continuous building, but was spread out in a series of houses, whose thirty to forty inmates were appointed for the most part to special duties in the service of the community—weavers, gardeners, bakers, fishers, shepherds—and were subject to their own house-superior or a "second" respectively.[51] The monastic community obtained its support partly through the work of monks again occupied in their former craft, the products of which were to some extent sold, and partly through the management of property which was acquired near the monastery.[52] Two traits of the Pachomian form were already noteworthy, which could easily have become a danger for the real ideal. One was the numerical size of the community, which certainly included several hundred monks.[53] This could only, in the long run, make heavier the function of the abbot, who should be the spiritual father of all his monks, or at least make it questionable. Second, the economic planning for the management of the large monastery led of itself to the acquisition of important property, finally to wealth and economic power, which for their part could gradually threaten the ideal of poverty.

---

[45] The Vita graeca I, 33–34; 42, etc. speaks of monai, who did not belong to the Pachomian community.

[46] Vita graeca I, 24f., describes the beginnings of common life with the first three disciples, whose number rapidly mounted.

[47] Praec. 84; Vita gr. I, 42; 81.—Praec. 50–52; Vita gr. I, 28; 40.

[48] Praec. 3; 31; 100; 102. Vita gr. 170; 88; 131, and passim.

[49] Praec. 28; 43; 91; 135.

[50] Pater monasterii in the "Rule" —Praec. 49; 51; 53–55, etc. —pater tes mones in the Vita gr. I, 28, etc. For the deuteros and secundus respectively, see Vita gr. I, 1.c; and Liber Orsiesii, 14 and 18; see B. Steidle, "Der 'Zweite' im Pachomiuskloster," BM 24 (1948), 97–104, 174–179.

[51] Praec. 1; 13; 15f.; 19f., and passim; Vita gr. I, 28 (house superior: oikiakos), 58f.; 94f.; 121f.; Jerome, Praef. ad Reg. 2; 6; Epp. Pachom. 4; 6; 7.

[52] Praec. 24; 58–65; 76f.; 108. Ep. Pachom. 8.

At first, however, the central religious idea under which Pachomius made his foundation remained decisive, namely, that of a holy community (koinonia) which was supposed to orient itself expressly to the community ideal of the primitive congregation. Just like the latter, the Pachomian community was to be manifested not only in separation from the world and the renunciation of personal possessions, but primarily in the common striving for salvation. "All should be a help to you, and you should assist all."[54] This saying of Pachomius to his monks was again and again taken up by his successors, with variations. For his beloved pupil Theodore there could be no more serious offense against the holy community than that a brother should become a scandal to another.[55] Horsiesi implored his monks not to limit themselves to care for their own salvation, but out of love for the brother one should become the servant of the other, and thus all represent "God's own family."[56] Offenses against fraternal charity were, then, especially severely blamed in the Rule of Pachomius and in the teaching of the Pachomian abbots, because they seriously jeopardized the basic law of Pachomianism, the hierà koinonia.[57]

The Pachomian community received the strength to realize its basic law from a life in and with the Holy Scripture. A painstaking examination of all important sources for Pachomian cenobitism has here led to a significant correcting of the earlier thesis concerning the aloofness of Early Christian monasticism from the Bible.[58] A glance at the letters and instructions of Pachomius reveals that he himself had a broad and deep knowledge of the Bible and was able to use it in all earnestness in the religious guidance of his monks.[59] Moreover, he aspired to educate all monks to a familiarity with the Bible and knew how to do so. Hence the Rule sharply inculcated that the individual monk should learn parts of Scripture by heart, and that the illiterate must learn to read for that purpose.[60] The order of the day in the monastery offered abundant opportunity "to meditate" on Scripture, that is, to recite to oneself the texts learned by heart.[61] An intimate acquaintance with the Bible also characterized the Pachomian Abbot Horsiesi, whom Gennadius praised in his catalogue of writers as a "holy man, perfectly versed in Scripture."[62] In a supplement to the Rule that probably goes back to him, it is said in an instruction to the house-superiors that the religious instruction of the monks should be accomplished "in accord with Holy Scripture," and those superiors should be regarded as good to whom Scripture was the norm of their performance of their office.[63] The individual prescriptions of the Rule were explained by a commentary of Horsiesi in a constant recourse to the Bible.[64]

---

[53] The round numbers of the monastic enthusiasts Palladius and Jerome (Hist. Laus. 32, and Praef. ad Reg. 7) are greatly exaggerated; cf. the more sober opinion of D. J. Chitty, The Desert A City, 24f., and footnote.

[54] Pachomius, Katech. (Lefort, Oeuvres, 5).

[55] Theodore, Katech., 59 (Lefort); cf. ibid., 38, 41, 50, 52.

[56] Liber Orsiesii 8, 26, 28.

[57] Pachomius, Katech. 15–17; cf. Theodore, Katech., 53, 57, 62 (Lefort); Liber Orsiesii 23, 38, 55. On the koinonia of the Pachomians, see A. Veilleux, 167–197.

[58] See especially H. Bacht, Théologie de la vie monastique 42–47; id., "Vom Umgang mit der Bibel im ältesten Mönchtum," Theol Phil 41 (1966), 557–566.

In complete consistency there proceeded from the Pachomian basic law of koinonia another essential feature of Pachomianism: the fundamental equality of all monks in their obligation to the Rule. To all without exception applied its prescriptions in regard to clothing, food, furnishing of their cells, manual labor, as well as in regard to the form of the religious life. There was no place here for the individualism, sometimes assuming bizarre forms, of separate anchorites in their manner of life nor for their subjective attitudes of asceticism and piety. With a surer look Pachomius understood that the inclination to spectacular ascetical feats often derived from very questionable motives. He had the instinct to know that each superior in the Pachomian system also had to be under the law of the Rule, if he did not want to compromise his authority in principle. Ultimately it was also care for the preservation of this uniform koinonia which determined Pachomius only rarely to accept priests into his community and to refuse the priesthood for himself,[65] an attitude which was therefore, but quite incorrectly, interpreted as proof of a tension between early monasticism and the hierarchical Church. For there are unambiguous testimonies for a high estimation of the priest on the part of Pachomius, which he tried to communicate to his monks also. Further, such a view contradicts the continual and close contact of the monastic founder with his local bishop and above all with Athanasius, which was transmitted to his successors, and their relations with the hierarchy.[66]

---

[59] Pachomius, Epp. 3–5; Katech., 1–26 (Lefort); here alone thirty-one books of the Old Testament and twenty-one of the New Testament are cited.

[60] Praec. 13, 49, 122, 140.

[61] H. Bacht, "'Meditatio' in den ältesten Mönchsquellen," GuL 26 (1955), 360–373.

[62] Gennadius, Vir. ill. 8.

[63] Praec. et. Instit. praef.

[64] In Lefort, Oeuvres, 81–91.

[65] Vita gr. I, 27; Vies coptes, 96 (Lefort). At first the monks attended the Sunday Mass of the nearest village church; later they had a diocesan priest come to celebrate the liturgy.

However, the uniformity in the Pachomian monastery was assured in the long run only if two presuppositions were fulfilled: the poverty of the individual as a radical renunciation of any personal possession, of every independent ability to dispose even of things of daily use, and unconditional obedience toward superiors of every rank. Apparently Pachomius found the definitive type of the cenobitic ideal of poverty only after an experiment with the form of relative poverty practiced in groups of anchorites—responsibility of the individual, at least for food and clothing—which, however, led to serious disadvantages.[67] Now possessions which were necessary for the life of a large monastery became the "property of Christ,"[68] which the monk could use only under obedience. Obedience, as the Pachomians understood it, differed from that of the anchorite in regard to his spiritual father not only in degree but in principle. Among the anchorites it was at times almost a technical training, which aimed to make the self-will and the private judgment so submissive that the monk, after achieving its highest form, could be sent forth into self-reliance; whereas, according to Pachomius, it was an unalterably permanent attitude which should cause the monk to grow to perfection in and through his community.[69] The prescriptions of the Pachomian Rule on the meaning and importance of poverty and obedience in the monastery of cenobites were never essentially improved by later monastic rules, and this too is evidence of the creative significance of the Coptic monastic founder.

A further characteristic of the Rule of Pachomius must bring into prominence the following other features. It was of an emphatic simplicity in form, which permitted the gradual growth of the ascetical perception of its author to be discerned. Pachomius was not concerned for a planned, systematic structure and did not aspire to an impressive formulation of his thoughts. Likewise, the objective content of the regulations here assembled were simple in a definite sense: in them is not found an expression of a theologically based ascetical theory, such as, for example, the doctrine of perfection which the Alexandrian theologians offered. Finally, a balance in individual ascetical demands, determined by a deep knowledge of souls, was a special characteristic of this Rule. It sought, as a binding norm for all the members of the monastery, a prudent average, which on the one hand left full scope for more expression of personal initiative, and on the other hand punished transgressions against the norm with penalties that always respected the inner dignity of the person.

---

[66] Cf. especially H. Bacht, "Mönchtum und Kirche," Sentire Ecclesiam, 115–122; also P. Tamburrino, Aspetti ecclesiologici del monachesimo pacomiano del secolo IV (dissertation, Rome 1968).

[67] Vies coptes, 3–5, 66–69 (Lefort).

[68] Ibid., 195. For the ideal of poverty see H. Bacht, Strukturen christlicher Existenz, Festgabe Fr. Wulf (Würzburg 1968), 283–300.

[69] Cf. Vies coptes, 178 (Lefort), for the high praise which Pachomius bestowed on the monk who lived "quite simply in obedience," and the enthusiastic recognition which the obedience practiced in the Pachomian monasteries found in other monastic circles: John Cassian, Inst. Coenob. 4, 1; 4, 30, 2.

Corresponding to the elevated religious quality of Pachomius's Rule was its far-reaching impact on the future,[70] which was, however, more strongly evident for the Latin West than for the East. Thus it can be assumed that, for his concept of cenobitism, Basil was influenced by the Pachomian monasteries he visited in 357, even though occasionally in the form of a critical judgment on individual features; thus a literary dependence of his asceticism on the Rule of Pachomius is not sure.[71] Its impact is due especially to the translation by Jerome, which he made in 404 from the Greek for monks, originally from the Latin West, of the Pachomian monastery of Metanoia in Canopus near Alexandria. After him it was especially John Cassian, who, as Abbot at Marseille (d. c. 430), through his De institutis coenobiorum directed interest toward the Pachomian system.[72] In the so-called Regula Vigilii, which probably originated in Italy c. 500, there appeared a revision of Pachomius's Rule, and later in the sixth century the rules of two bishops of Arles, Caesarius and Aurelius, unmistakably show its influence.[73] In Italy also it was adapted to the needs of the local monasteries before Benedict, who himself in his Regula monasteriorum often made use of it, but as a master.[74] In the ninth century Benedict of Aniane (d. 821), in the course of the reform of Frankish monasticism, again assured a wider influence to the Rule of Pachomius, when he admitted it to his collection of rules then known and often appealed to it for individual reforms.[75] Finally, its long-range effect can be established at the beginning of modern times, since it served as a model for details of the constitutions of the Society of Jesus.[76]

---

[70] See C. de Clercq, Mélanges L. Halphen (Paris 1951), 169–175, and H. Bacht, Liturgie und Mönchtum H. 11 (1952), 92–96.

[71] J. Gribomont, Theologie de la Vie monastique . . . ,111f.

[72] See Book 4, 1; 4, 4; 4, 10; 4, 17; 4, 30, 2, and the corresponding examples in the issue of SChr 109 (1965).

[73] On the Regula orientalis see Boon, op. cit., XLIIff. and A. Mundó, StudMon 9 (1967), 231; on Caesarius and Aurelius of Arles, DACL 2, 3199–3205; 11, 1864.

[74] H. Bacht, op. cit. 95f.

[75] PL 103, 423–702, 717–1380.

The Pachomian ideal of koinonia quickly displayed its power of attraction. A group of monks from Tabennisi made a new foundation in the village of Phbow (Pabau), some miles down the river. Two already existing independent "monasteries" in the same place asked admittance to the Pachomian community—they were the monasteries of Scheneset (Chenoboskeion) and Tmuschons (Monchosis)—and thereby submitted to the Pachomian Rule, whose correct observance was assured by the fact that Pachomius assigned monks from his own foundation to these monasteries. He himself moved c. 337 from Tabennisi to Phbow, which thereafter became the chief monastery and motherhouse of the Pachomian system.[77] With the founding of new monasteries and the accepting of existing monastic communities, Pachomius had taken a decisive new step. He had called into being the first "Order" in the history of Christian monasticism, for all the monasteries recognized his Rule as the basis of the koinonia and saw in him the common superior-general of the monastic union. This first group of four monasteries was followed in the lifetime of the abbot-general, Pachomius, by other foundations, one in the district of Latopolis, four in the area around Panopolis (Akhîm) some sixty miles down the Nile, and finally even two monasteries of nuns: hence at the death of the founder in 346 the Order included eleven settlements.[78] Beside the abbot-general was an economus, by whom the economic administration of all the monasteries was controlled. The unity of the Order was maintained by frequent visitation journeys of the superior-general and by a "general chapter," held semiannually, which brought together all Pachomian monks into the motherhouse of Phbow, first for the common celebration of Easter and for religious renewal, then again in the summer to discuss the periodic economic and organizational questions of the Order.[79]

In a summary of the lot of the Pachomian Order down to the Council of Chalcedon two figures are especially prominent from the time of the founder, and each was significant for the community in his own way. Horsiesi had, as a youth, joined Pachomius at Tabennisi and was appointed by him superior of the monastery of Scheneset.[80] When Pachomius's successor, Petronius, shortly before his death in 347, appointed him as abbot-general, Horsiesi assumed this function not without anxiety, since he knew the limits of his ability for the leadership of a great Order. It soon became clear what the authority of the founder had meant for the cohesion and the spirit of the community. In his visitations Horsiesi repeatedly had occasion to point out that it was not in keeping with this spirit for individual monks to strive openly for positions in the Order.[81] Still more distressing was the knowledge that the economic interests of monasteries acquired as property were threatening to obscure the original ideal of poverty and paralyzed the ascetical energy of the foundation period. A surge of secularization was laying hold of most of the monasteries and led in the second generation of cenobitism to an Early Christian "poverty controversy," when the abbot of the monastery of Tmuschons rebelled against Horsiesi's demands, worked successfully in other monasteries for a more moderate observance, and finally threatened the secession of his monastery from the Order.[82] Since Horsiesi was unable to control this situation, he summoned the former Abbot of Tabennisi, Theodore, to Phbow, made him his vicar, and withdrew to his former monastery of Scheneset.[83]

---

[76] H. Bacht, op. cit., 96.

[77] See Vies coptes, 91, 155 (Lefort); Vita gr. I, 54.

[78] Vita gr. I, 83; monasteries of nuns: ibid. 32, 134. On the chronology and the geographical location of the monasteries see D. J. Chitty, TU 64 (Berlin 1957), 379–385.

[79] Cf. J. Rezać, OrChr 23 (1957), 381–414. On the importance of the Pachomian general chapter see B. Steidle, Erbe und Auftrag 44 (1968), 104–110.

[80] Vies coptes, 220, 273f. (Lefort); Vita Pachom. gr. I, 117, 119.

With Theodore the external direction of the Order was assumed by a monk who had once been Pachomius's favorite disciple, had been early named by him as Abbot of Tabennisi, and finally had become his close collaborator at Phbow.[84] As "vicar" of Horsiesi, but in constant consultation with him, he gradually restored discipline by discretion and energy, saved the imperiled unity of the Order, and, in the eighteen years of his vicarship (350–368), by means of visitations of the monasteries, his instructions for the monks, and his constant appeal to the spirit of the founder, again led the koinonia to internal and external growth, so that at his death it counted twelve houses of monks and three of nuns.[85] Horsiesi had to carry responsibility for the direction of the Order alone for four more years—he died after 386—but he tried to do justice to his task through his own gifts of a deep interiority and a piety nourished on the Bible. In regard to the ideals that he desired as characteristics of the Pachomian Order, a document from his pen, which has been rightly named his testament, inform us. In the so-called Liber Orsiesii he urgently called upon his monks, with constant appeal to the legacy handed down from their father Pachomius, to uncompromising poverty, to the preservation of the koinonia through a joyful participation in the ordering of the monastic life, and finally to a living on Holy Scripture, which must be the foundation of their ascetical striving.[86]

---

[81] Vita Pachom. gr. I, 126.

[82] Ibid. 127.

[83] Ibid. 129–130. On Theodore see B. Steidle, "Der heilige Abt Theodor von Tabennisi," Erbe und Auftrag 44 (1968), 91–103.

[84] Vies coptes, 100–104, 132 (Lefort); Vita Pachom. gr. I, 78.

[85] Vita Pachom. gr. I, 134; see D. J. Chitty, The Desert A City, 36.

For the period after Horsiesi's death, the sources for the history of the Pachomian Order flow in trickles only. True, there was an important new foundation on the Egyptian coast of the Mediterranean, where Theophilus of Alexandria c. 390 had the Pachomian monastery of Metanoia built in place of the shrine of Sarapis at Canopus, which he had destroyed. In it monks from the Latin West also joined the Pachomian system, and for them Jerome translated the Rule of Pachomius from a Greek version into their mother tongue in 404.[87] C. 400 and later, authors often mention the Pachomians but only in a very general way, so that not even the names of the abbots-general after Horsiesi are known.[88] The abbot of a particular monastery is occasionally named, such as Victor of Tabennisi, who took part in the Council of Ephesus in 431, or Martyrius of Phbow, who had a large church built in honor of the Order's founder.[89] However, the silence of the sources cannot be regarded simply as a sign of a decay of the cenobitic ideal. In the second half of the fourth century there arose right in Upper Egypt two other cenobia which, it is true, did not join the Pachomian Order, but one of which made the expanded Pachomian Rule its norm of life. This, still partly standing today, was the so-called White Monastery near the village of Atripe, which the Copt Pgol founded and which obtained historical importance through his nephew Schenute of Atripe (c. 333–451). As to the nature and aims of this man, his many letters and speeches, whereby he became the founder of the Coptic national literature, give more copious information than the eulogistic biography by his successor, Besa.[90] Without any doubt, Schenute was an impressive figure, on whom however his lack of balance and the impetuosity of his temperament cast many a shadow. His ascetical strictness, tending to rigorism, occasionally burdened his monks excessively: at times he punished failings against the Rule with brutal chastisements.[91] He censured in fiery words abuses in the life of Egyptian Christians, and he proceeded with fanatical hatred against the remnant of paganism. Outside his monastery he worked, without being a theologian himself, through partisanship for the view of the Alexandrian patriarchs in the Christological strife of his day,[92] as well as through his relations, by means of letters, with the leading personalities. He himself stood in an unresolved tension between the cenobitic and the anchoretic ideal, which often led him for rather long periods into solitude and operated negatively on the inner harmony of the White Monastery. The not slight power of attraction of his community, despite everything, was conditioned by its purely Coptic character. The consequent limitation impeded Schenute's influence from reaching beyond the boundaries of Egypt, such as fell so richly to the lot of Pachomian cenobitism because of its openness and prudence: Schenute let himself be all too little influenced by its spirit.

---

[86] See H. Bacht, Das Vermächtnis des Ursprungs, 29–52, and B. Steidle, "Der 'Oberen-Spiegel' im 'Testament' des Abtes Horsiesi," Erbe und Auftrag 43 (1967), 22–38.

[87] On the monastery of Metanoia see E. Schwartz, ACO II, 1, 2, 217, and D. J. Chitty, op. cit., 57 and 77.

[88] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 38–41; Sozomen, HE 3, 14, 19–18; Hist. mon. 3.

[89] See P. Ladeuze, op. cit., 202f.

[90] The Life of Schenute by Besa: CSCO 41 (Louvain 1906), edited by J. Leipoldt; Latin translation by H. Wiesmann in CSCO 129 (ibid., 1951). Besa's other writings were edited by K. H. Kuhn, CSCO 157–158 (ibid., 1956); on Besa see the articles by K. H. Kuhn, Muséon 66 (1953), 225–243; JThSt, n. s. 5 (1954), 36–48, 174–187, 6 (1955), 35–48.

[91] A monk died as a result of whippings which Schenute himself administered: J. Leipoldt, Schenute von Atripe, 143.

THE MONASTICISM OF THE DESERTS OF NITRIA AND SCETE. In addition to the Thebaid, Egyptian monasticism had another important area of colonization in Lower Egypt on the northern border area of the Libyan Desert, which extended from the south by way of the base-line of the triangle Rosetta–Cairo–El-Alamein to the area west of the Nile Delta. The old sources early distinguished three centers of gravity of monastic settlement here, whose exact geographical situation could be clarified only very recently.[93] The first lay in the vicinity of the village of Nitria (today Barnugi), the entrance to the Libyan Desert, about nine leagues southwest of ancient Hermopolis Parva (today Damankur). One day's march farther south from Nitria lay the Kellia (ta kellia), a settlement of widely scattered monks' huts, which had a church as its center. The third center of gravity was about forty leagues south of Nitria in the so-called Desert of Scete (he Sketis), modern Wadi-el-Natrûn, where even today a salt and soda enterprise exploits the presence of sodium there.

A relatively abundant source material gives information about the monasticism of Lower Egypt also. The Historia monachorum, a travel story, which was written in Greek c. 400, perhaps by the Alexandrian deacon Timothy, and was revised a few years later by Rufinus in Latin,[94] reproduces the impressions of a traveling party which c. 395 had come from Jerusalem to visit the monastic colonies of the Thebaid as far as

---

[92] He accompanied Cyril of Alexandria to the Council of Ephesus in 431: J. Leipoldt, Schenute von Atripe, 41f.

[93] By H. G. Evelyn White, The History of the Monasteries of Nitria and Scetis (New York 1932); see C. Martin, NRTh 62 (1935), 113–134, 238–252. See the sketch-map in H. G. Evelyn White, Plate I, and D. J. Chitty, The Desert A City, before p. 89.

[94] On the priority of the Greek text, see A. J. Festugière, Hermes 83 (1955), 257–284. The Latin version of Rufinus in PL 21, 389–412, probably used other material.

Diolcus on the Mediterranean. Some twenty years later (419–420) Bishop Palladius of Helenopolis in Bithynia published his description, based on his own observation, of contemporary monasticism in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor; called Historia Lausiaca because it was dedicated to a chamberlain, Lausus, it is in the form of brief edifying biographies, which show many legendary features. Especially rewarding for a knowledge of the spiritual, religious atmosphere of Egyptian monasticism are the so-called Apophthegmata Patrum (Sayings of the Fathers), in the Greek original a collection, arranged alphabetically according to the names of eminent monks and often composed of anecdotes, of religious and ascetical instructions or symbolic acts of the Fathers, which an editor compiled soon after 500—it was known to the Rule of Benedict—from oral and written material in circulation.[95]

The first monk to settle on Mount Nitria, soon after 330, was Ammun, a native of the Delta area; he built there two cells, in which he lived for twenty-two years.[96] Only a few years later the number of monks had so grown that some of them desired a greater solitude and built for themselves new cells some leagues farther to the south, from which grew the settlement of the Kellia; it remained in contact with the Nitrian colony and toward the close of the century included approximately 600 monks.[97] On Mount Nitria lived anchorites in the strict sense, alongside others who united in quasi-monasteries, which numbered as many as 200 monks.[98] The center of the settlement was a large church, in which the monks assembled on Saturdays and Sundays to celebrate the liturgy. To perform it and to see to preaching and administration there were in Palladius's time eight priests among the monks. The many visitors were received in a special hospice.[99] The reputation of the Nitrian monks led to the selecting of bishops for Egyptian sees from their ranks quite early.[100]

However, the highest esteem was enjoyed by the monasticism of Scete, for this was a desert in the full sense of the word (he paneremos), whose wildness made the greatest demands on the physical and moral strength of the hermits. One who could cope with them had passed the most severe test and was counted among those monks who "in perfection and wisdom towered over all who dwelt in the monasteries of Egypt."[101] Macarius the Egyptian, after a long itinerant life of asceticism, was the first to discover the route to Scete c. 330, and, during the sixty years that he lived here—from c. 340 as a priest—he became the undisputed spiritual father of the hermits of Scete.[102] In Scete too the number of monks grew rapidly: toward the end of the fourth century they were divided into four semianchoretic communities, from time to time cared for by a priest.[103] But the real direction belonged to the Old Fathers (gerontes), to whom God had given the charism of the enlightening "word." The beginner subjected himself to them in order to be introduced into the meaning of monastic life, and around them assembled all who were striving for a higher perfection. "Father, say a word to me on how I may be saved": this is the formula constantly repeated in the Apophthegmata whereby the monk asked the saving help of the Old Father, who thus became the living "rule" in place of the written Rule of the Pachomian monasteries. The "words" of the Old Fathers did not, of course, proclaim any profound "theology of monasticism," since they took a rather skeptical view of theological speculation and hence treated with mistrust the learned monks in their ranks, such as Evagrius Ponticus.[104]

---

[95] The Latin version, Verba seniorum, coming from various translations from the second half of the sixth century is arranged thematically (according to monastic virtues). On the status of the research in the question of the Greek textual tradition see J. C. Guy, RAM 41 (1965), 113–124.

[96] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 8; Hist. mon. 22.

[97] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 7.

[98] Palladius, Vita s. J. Chrys. 17.

[99] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 7.

[100] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 10, 12, 46; Vita s. Chrys. 17.

The last two decades of the fourth century have been labeled the Golden Age of the monasticism of Nitria and Scete. It came to an end when Bishop Theophilus of Alexandria, in his conflict with real or alleged adherents of Origen, withdrew his former favor from the monks of Lower Egypt, bitterly persecuted them, and thereby put many of them to flight from c. 400 on.[105] A more severe blow struck the colonies of Scete in 407–8, when the barbarian tribe of the Maziken made a plundering attack, an episode which older fathers interpreted as punishment for the loss of the genuine monastic spirit of earlier years.[106] In crowds they then abandoned their cells, most never to return—among them John Kolobus, superior of one of the four anchorite communities of Scete, the famed Poimen with his brothers, and also the highly esteemed Arsenius, allegedly of a Roman senatorial family, to whom the Apophthegmata attribute the despairing saying: "The world has lost Rome"—an allusion to the taking of Rome by Alaric in 410—"the monks, Scete."[107] Other later plundering expeditions further weakened the settlements at Scete. The four monasteries still standing in the Desert of Scete and still partly inhabited, with their strong walls and defense towers, from the sixth to the ninth centuries, make known that the monks of later times still had to assure themselves against incursions by the desert tribes.[108]

---

[101] Cassian, Collat. 10, 2, 3; cf. J. C. Guy, "Le centre monastique de Scété dans la littérature du V^{e} siècle," OrChrP 30 (1964), 129–147.

[102] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 17; Apophth., Macarius.

[103] Cassian, l.c., see D. J. Chitty, The Desert A City, 35.

[104] J. C. Guy, "Les Apophthegmata Patrum" Théologie de la vie monastique, 73–83; Apophth., Evagrius, no. 7.

[105] See H. G. Evelyn White, op. cit., 125–144.

[106] D. J. Chitty, The Desert A City, 66f.

2. Monasticism in Palestine and Syria

The biblical past of the Sinai Peninsula makes it understandable that from the fourth century it became not only the goal of many a pilgrim to the Holy Land but also a favorite site of settlement of early monasticism.[109] The monk Silvanus, originally from Palestine, with a group of twelve disciples who had gathered around him in the desert of Scete, came to Mount Sinai c. 380, and there he stayed for several years before founding a new monastic colony at Gerasa in Palestine. One of his pupils, Netras, was summoned to occupy the episcopal cathedra of Pharan in the peninsula.[110] When, between 381 and 384, the pilgrim Egeria visited Mount Sinai, there were many anchorites' huts on its slopes and at the summit a small church, in which the monks asembled to celebrate the liturgy.[111] Apparently the types of anchoritism of Lower Egypt were adopted here. The great age of Sinaitic monasticism began, however, only with the founding of a monastery of cenobites by the Emperor Justinian I. The monastic settlements near the port city of Rhaitou on the east bank of the Gulf of Suez also go back to the fourth century, even though the report by one Ammonius of a raid by the Blemmyes on Rhaitou, in which forty monks were killed, merits no credence.[112]

The Holy Land could not but exert an especially strong power of attraction on the budding monasticism. It is true that the first steps here are in darkness but the beginning of the activity of Saint Chariton must be placed c. 330. According to his vita, written in the sixth century, he came as a pilgrim from Iconium in Asia Minor to Palestine and had his cell at Pharan, northeast of Jerusalem; from it developed the "Laura of Saint Chariton."[113] With the word laura is obtained the designation for the specifically Palestinian type of monastic settlement, in which the cells of the monks, situated close to one another, were erected around a center of the colony, which, in addition to other buildings, included the church, in which all members of the laura gathered for worship on Saturdays and Sundays. The vita ascribed in Chariton the founding of two more lauras, one at Duha near Jericho, the other at Suka, which probably lay south of Bethlehem. These three lauras going back to Chariton are attested elsewhere too for the fourth century.[114] While for them no dependence on Egyptian prototypes can be demonstrated, the two other monastic foundations of the fourth century in Palestine were more surely closely linked with Egyptian monasticism. Hilarion, to whom before 392 Jerome devoted a much read brief biography that glorified him to an heroic degree, had studied at Alexandria, then spent some time with Antony the Great, and after his return to his native Palestine lived, first, for about twenty years, following the Egyptian anchoretic manner, near Maiuma, the port of Gaza. Later he left Palestine and, after a long wandering life, died on Cyprus c. 370. Even if some details of his vita by Jerome are questionable, still the defined historical framework is acceptable.[115] Perhaps even Epiphanius, the later Bishop of Salamis on Cyprus, was Jerome's source; in any event, he became acquainted with monasticism in Egypt and then founded near his Palestinian birthplace, Besanduk near Eleutheropolis, a monastic community, which he governed for thirty years.[116]

---

[107] Apophthegmata under John Kolobos and Poimen, Arsenius, no. 21.

[108] On the later history of the monasticism of Scete see H. G. Evelyn White, op. cit., 217ff.

[109] Cf. D. Gorce, "Pelerins et residents du Sinai des premiers siècles de l'ère chrétienne," L. Prevost (ed.), Le Sinai (Paris 1937), 127–182.

[110] Apophth., Silvanus, especially nos. 4–5; Sozomen, HE 6, 32, 8; Netras: Apophth., s.v.

[111] Itinerarium Egeriae 3–5; the monasteria (plurima) 4, 6, are here clearly the lodgings of the monks. For the chronological start of the Itinerarium see P. Delvos, AnBoll 85 (1967), 165–194.

[112] The Egyptian monk Sisoes repeatedly encountered the monk Ammon of Rhaithou: Apophth., Sisoes, nos. 17, 26. On Ammonius's report see R. Devreesse, "Le christianisme dans la péninsule sinaïtique des origines à l'arrivée des musulmans," RB 49 (1940), 205–233.

Of great importance for the further development of Palestinian monasticism in the fifth and sixth centuries was a foreigner, Euthymius, from Melitene in Lesser Armenia, who came to Palestine in 405 and lived first in a cell near the Chariton laura of Pharan.[117] With a friend he found here, Theoctistus, he settled six years later in the present Wadi Mukellik west of Qumran. When other monks joined them, they first wanted to establish a laura of the Pharan type, but then decided for a cenobium, the direct control of which was assumed by Theoctistus, while

---

[113] Vita Charit. 13, 21, 24. Cf. G. Garitte, DHGE XII, 421–423.

[114] On the location of the lauras see D. J. Chitty, op. cit., 14f., and the sketch-map before p. 88. The laura of Duka is mentioned by Palladius, Hist. Laus. 48; for Suka, cf. Cassian, Collat. 6, 1; for Pharan, Cyril Scythop., Vita s. Euthymii 6–8.

[115] E. Coleiro, "St. Jerome's Lives of the Hermits," VigChr 11 (1957), 161–178; for Hilarion: Sozomen, HE 3, 14, 21–27; 5, 10, 1–4.

[116] Sozomen, HE 6, 32, 2–3; Jerome, C. Joann. Hieros. 4.

[117] Cyril Scythop., Vita s. Euthymii 5–6.

Euthymius lived in a nearby cave as spiritual adviser.[118] Here he made contact with a Bedouin tribe, which he gained for Christianity and whose sheik, at his suggestion, was ordained by Bishop Juvenal of Jerusalem as first "Bishop of the Camp."[119] Euthymius was also active as a missionary when he spent some time in the wildernesses of Ruban and Ziph, south of Hebron. After his return he founded, following some resistance, in the vicinity of the monastery of Theoctistus a laura, from which, after his death in 473, the whole cenobitic complex became the monastery of Euthymius.[120] Here for four decades Euthymius was the outstanding figure of Palestinian monasticism and continued to have an impact through his disciples, among whom, besides Theoctistus and others, were Domnus, later Bishop of Antioch, Stephen, later Bishop of Jamnia, Martyuris, later Bishop of Jerusalem, Abbot Gerasimus, and the young Sabas, who was destined to become the preserver and enlarger of the Euthymian monastic ideal in the sixty years after his teacher's death. Euthymius was responsible for that custom which characterized the relation of cenobium and laura in Palestine and was made by Abbot Sabas the norm: the young monk was first schooled in the cenobium and only after a certain testing by his abbot was he freed for the harder demands of the semianchoretic form of life of the laura.[121]

Also worthy of mention as a monastic founder was another foreigner, who came from the Georgian princely house of Nabarnugi, lived first as a hostage at the court of the Emperor Theodosius II at Constantinople, then fled to Jerusalem c. 429, soon became a monk there and founded in Jerusalem a hospice for pilgrims and the poor, from which grew "the Monastery of the Iberians." Peter the Iberian—this was his name as a monk—had to leave his Jerusalem monastery because of his Monophysite views, lived near Gaza, and in 453 became Bishop of Maiuma. The controversies over Chalcedon forced him to flee again, first to Egypt, then to Phoenicia, where he died in 488.[122] Under Bishop Juvenal, Palestinian monasticism obtained an "archimandrite of the monks"[123] in the person of the Chorepiscopus Passarion. This incident shows that individual bishops quite early were striving for a close binding of monasticism to the Church. Then the Council of Chalcedon enacted the canonical rule which subordinated the monastic system in principle to episcopal supervision.

---

[118] Ibid. 7–9; the monastery was later called the Theoctistus Monastery.

[119] Ibid. 10 and 15; on the role of this Bishop Peter at the Council of Ephesus of 431, see Vita s. Euthymii 20, and ACO II, 6, 57.

[120] Vita s. Euthymii 16 and 39; on the excavations at the Monastery of Euthymius see D. J. Chitty, PEFQSt 1928, 134f.; 1932, 188ff.

[121] Cf. Cyril Scythop., Vita s. Euthymii 31; Vita Joann. Hesych. 7.

[122] A vita preserved in Syriac reports on him, edited by R. Raabe (Leipzig 1895); see D. M. Lang, "Peter the Iberian and his Biographers," JEH 2 (1951), 158–168.

[123] Vita s. Euthymii 16. Passarion had himself built a large cenobium in Jerusalem: Vita Petri Iber., 35 (Raabe).

Latin Monasteries in Palestine. Sooner or later eastern monasticism had to exercise its power of attraction on the Latin West also, which had already obtained authentic accounts of the new asceticism from Athanasius, when he was at Trier in 335, at Rome in 340–43, at Aquileia in 345, and could soon become enthusiastic about these forms of Christian life when Athanasius's Life of Antony had become accessible to it in a Latin translation. Before long individual Christians were in Egypt and Palestine,[124] but only on Palestinian soil did there arise monasteries which were founded by Latins and which received a special character from them.

Among the three monastic foundations to be mentioned here from the period before Chalcedon, a woman from the Roman aristocracy always took part in a decisive way with her resources and her ascetical enthusiasm. The first was Melania the Elder,[125] born c. 341, who, following the death of her husband, Valerius Maximus, Prefect of the City in 361–63, joined an ascetic circle, journeyed to Egypt c. 372, and after a visit to the monastic settlements on the Nitrian range came to Palestine. At Alexandria she may have made the acquaintance of Rufinus of Aquileia, with whom c. 380 she founded a double monastery on Mount Olivet, for whose support she supplied the means. In this very first Latin settlement there was established a characteristic which would appear normal also in the later Latin foundations: the lively interest in ascetical and theological literature.[126] After a prolonged stay in the West, during which she visited her cousin Paulinus at Nola in 400 and Augustine at Hippo in 404, Melania died in her monastery on Mount Olivet c. 410, whereas Rufinus, who had left Palestine in 397, never returned there.

The second Latin monastic foundation was the common work of Jerome and the eminent Roman lady, Paula the Elder.[127] The former had lived since soon after 372 as an anchorite in the desert of Chalcis southeast of Antioch but felt unequal to the demands of the life and had returned to Rome, where he took care of an ascetical circle of prominent ladies. In 385 he left Italy with several monks because of a strong antimonastic movement and went to Palestine; some months later Paula, with her daughter Eustochium, followed him there. After a visit to the monastic colonies at Nitria they went back to Palestine and in 386 selected Bethlehem as their permanent abode. In the next three years a convent of nuns and a monastery of monks arose here, and also a hospice for pilgrims, for the building of which Paula was responsible. The nuns were divided into three groups according to their social background, each with its own superior—such an arrangement presupposes a not insignificant number of members.[128] The community of the monastery of men was smaller, but the intellectual prestige of its superior, Jerome, gave it great importance. The house that he directed, in which the Latin liturgy was to a great extent retained, was not only a center of pastoral care, which attended to the catechumens and Christians of the vicinity, but it became, especially for many pilgrims from the West, a welcome Latin island in the Holy Land. In addition, Jerome's monastery played a role in the confrontations on the burning religious questions of the day—the controversy over Origen, Pelagianism—and through the active correspondence which its abbot maintained became a powerful source of information on the Christian East for Latin Christianity, from which proceeded numerous stimuli to the monasticism of the West.[129] After Paula's death in 404, her daughter Eustochium[130] assumed the direction of the nuns for the next fifteen years; she died c. 419. The tradition was continued by her niece, Paula the Younger, who had come to Palestine c. 415 and who became an eager disciple of Jerome.[131] He himself died on 30 September 419 or 420 at Bethlehem, and with his death information on his monastery ceased.

---

[124] For Jerusalem Florentinus and Martinianus are named c. 370: Jerome, Epp. 4 and 5.

[125] See F. X. Murphy, "Melania the Elder," Tr 5 (1947), 59–77. The most important sources: Palladius, Hist. Laus. 46, 54–55; Paulinus of Nola, Epp. 28–29, 31, 45.

[126] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 55; Rufinus, Apol. 2, 11.

[127] Cf. A. Lippoldt, "Paula," Pauly-Wissowa, Suppl. X (1965), 508f., with the literature. Principal source of Jerome's necrology, Ep. 108.

The third Latin monastic complex in Jerusalem owed its origin to the noble Roman husband and wife, Pinian and Melania the Younger,[132] granddaughter of Melania the Elder. After the early death of their two children, they decided on the ascetic life and placed their vast wealth at the service of this ideal. Fleeing before Alaric's Goths, they spent the year 410 in Sicily together with Melania's mother Albina, and there they met Rufinus. After that they lived for seven years on their North African property, were in contact with Augustine,[133] and, after the now obligatory visit to Egypt in 417, settled definitively in Jerusalem. At first the Egyptian experience motivated them to a more anchoretic life, but then its burdens induced Melania to build a convent for nuns; after her husband's death in 432, a monastery for monks followed.[134] A young monk Gerontius, encouraged by the couple, gradually developed into its superior; he later wrote the biography of his benefactor. It was in accord with the tradition of Jerome that these Latin foundations of the fifth century also displayed theological interests. But the greater force of attraction proceeded this time from the abundant charitable activity of the founder and her relationships with the aristocracy, which brought Melania into contact with the court of Constantinople and especially with the Empress Eudocia, whom she could welcome in her convent and accompany on a journey to the Holy Land.[135] With Melania's death on 31 December 439 her foundations passed into Greek hands and thereby gradually lost their Latin character.

---

[128] Ep. 108, 14, 20.

[129] His letters went to Italy, Gaul, North Africa, and Pannonia.

[130] The grave inscription for Paula, composed by Jerome: Ep., 108, 33; on Eustochium: Jerome, Ep. 22; 46; 54; 107–108; 151, 3; D. Gorce, DHGE 16, 43–45.

[131] On Paula: Jerome, Ep. 134, 2; 143, 1; 153; Gerontius, Vita s. Melan. jun. 40; 63; 68. The famous Ep. 107 of Jerome on Paula's education was addressed to her mother, Laeta.

[132] On them see H. Leclercq, DACL XI (1933), 209–230, and especially D. Gorce in his introduction to the edition of the Vita s. Melaniae, SChr 90 (1962), 20–45.

SYRIAN MONASTICISM. Early Christian monasticism found an eminently favorable climate in the larger Syrian area, whose Christian population quickly showed itself responsive to the ascetical ideal to an especially strong degree. The Encratite movement of the second century, with its stern demands for renunciation of marital rights and abstinence from wine and meat for every Christian, here found a stronger echo than in other regions to which Christianity had expanded.[136] In East Syria as late even as the fourth century the reception of baptism was often joined to the commitment to a life in poverty and complete continence, so that the baptized, as "Sons and Daughters of the Covenant," represented the elite of the Church whereas other Christians continued in the catechumenate.[137] It is, however, incorrect to refer these features proper to Syrian Christianity exclusively to Persian or Manichaean influences, as well as to regard the whole early Syrian Church as a purely ascetical movement and to derive from this the early monasticism of this district, characterized by it. In the question, very recently again discussed, whether Syrian monasticism was autochthonous in its origin, that is, independent of any Egyptian influence, it is permissible to assume for early eremitism the possibility of an independent development from the strict asceticism in the pre-Constantinian Syrian Church.

---

[133] Cf. Augustine, Ep. 124–126; Gerontius, Vita s. Mel. jun. 19–21.

[134] Monastery of women (ninety nuns): Vita s. Mel. jun. 41; monastery of monks: ibid. 49.

[135] Vita s. Mel. jun. 53–55, 58–59.

[136] See vol. I, 177f., 298.

[137] Cf. E. Beck, SA 38 (1956), 343–347, with the evidence from Afrahat and Ephrem.

But in the post-Constantinian period the Egyptian example more certainly had an impact on the further development, since, for example, Chrysostom preached enthusiastically on it and urgently recommended to his Antiochene audience the reading of the Life of Antony by Athanasius.[138] But certain peculiarities of Syrian monasticism, such as the tendency to excessive severity, to striking and bizarre forms of asceticism, and the uncritical and enthusiastic admiration of these by the Christian population, must probably be regarded as the expression of the Syrian cultural inclination towards religious exuberance.

In his History of the Monks Theodoret gives a vivid description of the different types of the Syrian monasticism of his time:

> Some struggle in community; there are many thousands of such monasteries; others choose the eremitcal life and are intent on conversing with God alone. Others praise God while living in tents and huts, others still in holes and caves. Many . . . endure the hardships of the climate. Now they grow numb in the extreme cold, now they burn under the scorching rays of the sun. Some stand without interruption, others allot the day to sitting and praying. Some have inclosed themselves within walls and avoid contact with men, others renounce such seclusion and are accessible to all who want to see them.[139]

Here as elsewhere eremitism was first in time, here a development independent of Egyptian monasticism was earliest conceivable, especially since certain ascetical forms, such as the wearing of heavy iron chains and the neglected coiffure, were rejected by the Egyptians as empty show.[140] In fasting and renunciation of sleep and of bodily hygiene the anchorites demanded results which often led to serious and permanent injury to health, even to mutilation, but only rarely did they encounter a sure official criticism.[141] A specifically Syrian peculiarity in eremitism was represented by the so-called Stylites, whose first highly esteemed representative in the pre-Chalcedon period was Simeon the Elder (c. 390–459). After a long stay in a monastery near Teleda, he became a hermit near Televsnin in the desert south of Cyrrhus and because of his kindness and amiability was sought out by numerous pilgrims. In an effort to escape the accompanying annoyances, Simeon withdrew into a hut on the platform of a pillar that grew constantly taller, and from this he again preached to the people. After his death there arose around this pillar one of the largest churches in Syria (Kal'at Sim'an).[142]

---

[138] On the thesis of dependence on Persian and Manichaean influences, defended by A. Vööbus, see the weighty objections of A. Adam, GGA 213 (1960), 127–145. On the relationship to Egyptian monasticism: S. Jargy, PrOrChr 2 (1952), 112–124; A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism I, 138–146. Chrysostom on Antony: In Mt. hom. 8, 5. The translations of the Pachomian Rule from the period after Chalcedon, of the Apophthegmata, and of the writings of Evagrius into Syriac expanded the contacts with Egyptian monasticism.

[139] Theodoret, Hist. rel. 27.

[140] Examples for ascetical exuberance in Theodoret, Hist. rel., passim; A. Vööbus, II, 277f. Rejection: Hist. Mon. 8; A. J. Festugière, Antioche, 355.

[141] Criticism by Bishop Meletius of Antioch: Theodoret, Hist. rel. 26.

The organizationally intermediate stage between the individual hermit and the cenobitic monastery, the community of anchorites with a hermit as spiritual father was found also in Syria.[143] Favorite areas of settlement of such anchorites were the mountains in the immediate vicinity of Antioch, then the desert of Chalcis, the Amanus Range in the north, the neighborhood of Edessa in Osrhoene, and the mountainous country of Tur'abdin in northern Mesopotamia. Even women chose the eremitical life, but mostly they decided for the convent community, which they found more suitable.[144] From the second half of the fourth century the number of monasteries in all the Syrian provinces increased remarkably. Occasionally the sources state that in these monasteries people lived according to the "rule" which the founder or an esteemed superior had given them, but it remains unclear whether this referred to a rule fixed in writing. The canons enacted by Bishop Rabbula of Edessa[145] show that even in this early period there were the beginnings of an ordering of the monastic life by set norms.

Characteristic of early Syrian monasticism was the unbounded esteem which it enjoyed in high and low alike. The simple folk, members of the upper class, the episcopate, and the contemporary imperial family were among its admirers, who made pilgrimages to the hermits and monasteries and expected help from the monks through their prayer and gifts of miracle and prophecy. Corresponding to this esteem was the vast influence which monasticism exercised on the religious conduct and piety of the people.[146] From its circles, especially from those of cenobites, the leaders of episcopal sees were chosen in increasing number.[147]

---

[142] See H. Delehaye, Les saints stylites (Brussels 1923), XXIV–XXXIV; A. J. Festugière, Antioch, 347–401. On Kal'at Sim'an, cf. G. Tschalenko, Villages antiques de la Syrie du Nord I (Paris 1953), 233–276.

[143] Theodoret, Hist. rel. 2; 4–5; 10.

[144] Theodoret, ibid. 29–30; also J. M. Fiey, OrSyr 10 (1965), 281–306.

[145] Survey of the monasteries in A. J. Festugière, Antioche, 311–346, and especially in A. Vööbus, II, 61–69, 140–146, 159–184, 224–255. On the "rules": A. J. Festugière, Antioche, 315–319; A. Vööbus, OrChrP 24 (1958), 385–392, and id., Syriac and Arabic Documents regarding Legislation relative to Syrian Monasticism (Stockholm 1960); here the canons of Rabbula of Edessa on pp. 24–50, 78–86. An inscription of 354 from al-Hit in Hauran (southern Syria) proves already the existence of an organized cenobium with an archimandrite, an economus, and a church dedicated to St. Sergius: Waddington, Inscr. de la Syrie 2/26.

As usual in the early monasticism of the East, so too in Syrian monasticism of the early period no special theological interest can be ascertained. Only rarely did members of the upper class enter a monastery, and this step clearly involved a renunciation of one's profane education. Reading and writing were important means of providing access to Holy Scripture, entire sections of which, for example, the psalms, were learned by heart so that one could meditate on them and use them in the common prayer.[148] Occasionally monks are mentioned who mastered the art of copying manuscripts, but they used this skill for producing biblical manuscripts.[149] At times monks came forward as opponents of Arianism or of Messalianism,[150] but this was exceptional. Monastic schools in the proper sense, which supplied the young monks with an education beyond the elementary, did not exist,[151] and still a great space was allotted to theological study. This only became possible after cenobitism had left its founding phase behind it and the monasteries had obtained a secure economic foundation. Hence at this period monks as theological authors remained exceptional phenomena, such as Rabbula, the later Bishop of Edessa (d. 435), or Narsai, who for about twenty years (437–457) was director of the school of Edessa.[152]

To the picture of early Syrian monasticism belong two more features, worthy of a positive evaluation: its social charitable activity and its missionary work.[153] The early hermits, despite their modest resources, had an open hand for strangers and pilgrims who stopped at their cells and a helpful heart in regard to the needs of the poor and the sick. Individual monks courageously stood up for a fair treatment of the socially dependent vis-à-vis proprietors, tax collectors, or moneylenders. Monasteries soon organized their social activity through the constructing of hospices for strangers and hospitals.

---

[146] Cf. A. Vööbus, II, 316–326.

[147] Examples in Theodoret, Hist. rel. 2–3, 5, 10, 17. Itinerarium Egeriae, 19–21. List of Syrian monk-bishops before Chalcedon in O. Hendriks, PrOrChr 8 (1958), 4–6.

[148] Knowledge of the psalms and reading of Scripture: Theodoret, Hist. rel. 2, 5, 20.

[149] Chrysostom, In 1 Tim. hom. 14, 4; John of Ephesus, POR XIX, 209.

[150] Theodoret, Hist. rel. 2, 3.

[151] Chrysostom, Adv. oppugn. vitae mon. 3, 11; 3, 18 urges the people of Antioch to entrust their children to the monks of the neighborhood, who can give them instruction in Greek and even in Latin, but this does not presuppose an organized monastic school. Cf. A. J. Festugière, Antioche, 18ff., 209f.

[152] Ephrem's writing can hardly be claimed as an achievement of Syrian monasticism, since it is uncertain whether Ephrem himself can be reckoned as a monk: cf. E. Beck, RAC 5, 521–524, against A. Vööbus, Literary Critical and Historical Studies in Ephrem the Syrian (Stockholm 1958) and History of Asceticism II, 394–399. Cf. finally L. Leloir, "Saint Ephrem, moine et pasteur," Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris 1961), 85–97.

[153] See A. Vööbus, Einiges über die karitative Tätigkeit des syrischen Mönchtums (Pinneburg 1947); O. Hendriks, "L'activite apostolique des premiers moines syriens," PrOrChr 8 (1958), 3–25.

Since the hermits' cells were mostly in the country, in the midst of an often still strongly pagan population, missionary work was offered a direct opportunity here. In the neighborhood of Edessa the monk Abraham gained a whole village for Christianity; another Abraham, of Karra, successfully preached the gospel in the district of Emesa in Phoenicia Secunda. For the Phoenician mission, which John Chrysostom encouraged from Constantinople, Syrian monks put themselves at his disposal, and he could entrust the missionary activity on the Euphrates to monks from the monastery of Zeugma.[154] Also active as a missionary in Mesopotamia was the founder of the Acemetae, Alexander, first as a hermit, later with his entire monastic community. Special success was achieved by the missionary preaching of the Stylite Simeon the Elder, to whom was due the conversion of the Bedouin Arabs.[155] Very probably Syrian monks also had a considerable share in the evangelization of Armenia and even of Ethiopia.[156]

Still to be noted was the especially favorable relationship of Syrian monasticism to the official Church: there were no substantial tensions. A positive presupposition for this was surely the already mentioned fact that the number of bishops taken from the monastic institute was relatively large. It is true that the heralds of Syrian monasticism, Ephrem, Chrysostom, and Theodoret, say little about an active participation of monks in the religious life of the congregations. Most hermits even seem to have participated only rarely in the Eucharistic celebrations of the communities, but Communion was kept in one's dwelling and could have been given to oneself if a priest who happened by on occasion had celebrated the Eucharist among them;[157] the Church took no offense at that. The priesthood for its own sake was not sought by monks, and even less the episcopal office, but the motive was clearly awe of the high responsibility thereby imposed. Hence the monk encountered priest or bishop with the greatest deference, and obedience to them was a matter of course. Chrysostom saw this relation of monasticism to the Church[158] in a more profoundly theological context than did Theodoret. According to him, monasticism was called to be a sign for Christianity that it is possible radically to realize the gospel's ideal of perfection and through a life of poverty and virginity to proclaim the eschatological message of the coming of the Kingdom of God in a way that could not be ignored. If the need of the moment demanded it, the monk must of course be prepared temporarily to give up his existence as a hermit or cenobite and assume a concrete task in the Church, that is, put himself at the Church's disposal as preacher or missionary or, if the aptitude were present, through accepting the episcopal office.

---

[154] John Chrysostom, Epp. 49, 53–54, 123, 126.

[155] Cf. B. Kötting, "Das Wirken der ersten Styliten. Missions- und Erbauungspredigt," ZMRW 37 (1953), 187–197.

[156] See Hendriks, op. cit., 22–24.

[157] Cf. P. Canivet, "Theodoret et le monachisme syrien avant le concile de Chalcédoine," Théologie de la Vie monastique (Paris 1961), 241–282, especially pp. 278f. Cf. Basil, Ep. 93.

3. The Monasticism of Asia Minor and Constantinople

The beginnings of monasticism in Asia Minor are connected in the sources with the name of the later Bishop Eustathius of Sebaste,[159] who is noted in the acts of a Synod of Gangra in Paphlagonia c. 341 as head of an ascetic group whose ideals seemed to threaten the internal order of ecclesiastical life in the congregations of Asia Minor. According to the letter of the members of the Synod and their decrees, consisting of twenty canons, the Eustathians so disdained marriage that they declined to participate in a Eucharist celebrated by married priests. They upheld an extreme ideal of poverty which they stressed externally by intentionally wretched dress and by the disregard of all bodily care, but which they proclaimed didactically when they declared that no one could attain to salvation who did not renounce all possessions. In opposition to the Great Church they fasted especially on Sundays, and some rejected all bodily pleasure. Also, the customary celebrations in honor of the martyrs did not meet with their approval; they assembled in private houses for their own liturgies and thereby produced the danger of schism. Here there was question probably of a radical ascetical movement, perhaps influenced from Syria; supervision of it and its incorporation into ecclesiastical life had not yet been achieved.[160] But then this task was assumed by a man who, like the family from which he came, saw in Eustathius of Sebaste a great model of the ascetic, monastic form of life.[161] After his baptism, Basil of Caesarea was convinced that this sacrament obliged every Christian to the ascetical life in the meaning of the gospel, and he moulded on it the life of the community of ascetics which gathered around him and his friend, Gregory Nazianzen, at Annesi in Pontus.[162] Even as a bishop he remained united with it, but he also preached to his congregation at Caesarea the ideals of virginity and poverty, without, however, making them a law for all members of the community: he thereby tacitly overcame the extreme tendencies of the Eustathians. When the group of ascetics at Annesi and probably also at Caesarea developed gradually by a sort of dead weight into a cenobitic community, there followed more and more from the questions posed by day-to-day life also the necessity of an "ordering" in writing. The origin of Basil's asketikon must be viewed in the light of this development; to it he brought not only the knowledge he had gained on a journey made for information to the monastic centers of Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and Mesopotamia,[163] but in a second version he introduced the insights to which day-to-day practice in a cenobitic community led.[164] It was from the first intended only for the monks connected with Basil at Annesi and Caesarea, and hence it was not a rule of an Order in the canonical sense.

---

[158] J. M. Leroux, "Monachisme et communauté chrétienne d'après saint Jean Chrysostom," ibid., 143–190, especially 174–186.

[159] Sozomen, HE 3, 14, 31–37; Epiphanius, Panar. 75.

[160] Cf. S. Salaville, "Eustathe," DThC 5, 1565–1574.

[161] Basil, Ep. 1; 119; 223, 5; 244, 1; Gregory of Nyssa, Vita Macrinae (op. 8, 377–380).

According to Basil the fundamental law of all ascetical life is the love of God, which demands a radical renunciation in regard to a world which despises God's commandments.[165] This law is best realized in a specific community, which carries along and forms the individual. The eremetical life cannot give this help, and, besides, it contradict's man's social nature.[166] Giving up of the world and its goods is turned by Basil into something positive as self-discipline of renunciation (ekrateia) and is clearly distinct from any Manichaean dualism. The monk can still in certain cases personally manage his property that he has dedicated to the Lord, but it is recommended that the administration be turned over to an individual.[167] Life in the community demands order and subordination, which is to be effected in obedience to the superior (proestos). This obedience finds its deepest justification in the example of the Lord, who gave himself always and entirely to the Father's will. The superior himself, with his vicar, at whose side is a council of seniors, is placed in a serious responsibility, first of all as spiritual father of those entrusted to him.[168] Basil gives a high rank to manual labor, because, first of all, it should make possible to the monastery charity toward the poor and become the touchstone for the purity of the love of God.[169] In so fundamental a deriving of the monastic existence from the word and spirit of the gospel, as the asketikon offers it, a definite dedication of the monks to the study of Scripture is self-evident.[170] A further trait of the Basilian "Rules" is, despite all absence of compromise in what is basic, a deep discretion and magnanimity in things of second rank, which does not keep at hand a ready solution for all possible individual situations of everyday life but leaves them to the decision of the superior or of the individual monk. This should also be gained interiorly, in the case of a transgression of the rules, by mild punishment and loving reprimand for their true observance.[171] An excelling human and religious mind was here at work. The gradual maturing of he Basilian monastic life gave it an inner balance and elasticity that made essentially new forms superfluous in Byzantine monasticism: every later "reform" of eastern monasticism, such as that of the Studites, was therefore ultimately always a return to the Basilian legacy. Its quality becomes discernible in the influence which, like the Pachomian Rule, it exercised on the Latin monasticism of the West, beginning with Rufinus and Cassian by way of Benedict of Nursia to Benedict of Aniane, who gave it a place in his Concordia Regularum.[172]

---

[162] Basil, Ep. 223, 5.

[163] Basil, Ep. 223, 2; see J. Gribomont, RHE 54 (1959), 115–124.

[164] The textual history of the Asketikon reveals that there were a first and a second version; the first, Little Asketikon, was the model for the translation of Rufinus. Only the second, definitive edition, the Large Asketikon, has two parts, called by the copyists the "large" and "small rule" respectively (PG 31, 889–1306), which was probably finished after Basil's ordination as Bishop. Cf. L. Lèbe, RBén 76 (1966), 116–119.

[165] Basil, Regulae fus. tract. 1.

[166] Ibid., Reg. 3–5.

[167] Reg. fus. 16–17; 9; Reg. brev. 85; 87; 107; 187.

The sources are silent in regard to monastic foundations in the provinces of central Asia Minor in the period before Chalcedon. But on the Asiatic shore of the Bosporus, still within the limits of the capital, several monasteries arose around this time. One of the most important was Rufinianai, founded by the imperial minister, Rufinus, who first colonized it with Egyptian monks, but after his fall in 395 they abandoned it. Circa 400 the monk Hypatius, on whose activity as superior his pupil Callinicus reported,[173] took charge. There was also a monastic settlement on the Rhebus stream, several kilometers above the east end of the Bosporus, and on Mount Auxentius, north of Chalcedon, there arose a convent of nuns and a monastery of monks, both in the fifth century.[174]

---

[168] Reg. fus. 24–54, contains the norms on the organizational aspect of community life. On the understanding of obedience in Basil, see J. Gribomont, VS Suppl. (1952), no. 21, 192–215.

[169] Reg. fus. 37–41.

[170] Reg. brev. 235–236; 95.

[171] Reg. fus. 50–53.

[172] Cf. J. Gribomont, L'Histoire du Texte . . . , passim.

[173] On Rufinianai, see R. Janin, ÉO 22 (1923), 182–190.

[174] Rhebas: Callinicus, Vita s. Hypatii, can. 45; Mount Auxentius: R. Janin, DHGE 9, 27.

In regard to the beginnings of monasticism at Constantinople the sources give information that is partly contradictory. The capital certainly attracted monks from the eastern provinces of the Empire early, and at first they lived there as individuals or in rather small groups. To the Church historian Sozomen Marathonius was already regarded as superior of a monastic community (synoikia monachon): he was a former official who had been won for the ascetic life by Eustathius of Sebaste c. 350. On the other hand, the hagiographical literature attributes the founding of the first monasteriŏn in Constantinople to the Syrian monk Isaac c. 382. But even before Isaac the number of monks in the city must have been considerable, since they played an important role in the controversy over the doctrine of Macedonius. From the end of the fourth century other monasteries appeared in rapid succession, since the Council of Ephesus in 431 recognized Abbot Dalmatus, Isaac's successor, as superior of all monks in the city. In 448 representatives of twenty-three monasteries signed the judgment of the Synod which repudiated the teaching of Eutyches.[175] Among these monasteries that of the so-called Acemetae occupied a special place: it had been founded by the monk Alexander near the Church of Saint Menas. He had lived for a time in a monastery in Mesopotamia, then wandered, preaching through the Syrian provinces with a crowd of monks, and c. 425 came to Constantinople, where many monks from other monasteries soon entered the community he directed. A special force of attraction proceeded from the custom, brought along from Syria, of celebrating in the monastery uninterrupted prayer throughout the night—hence the name akoimētoi for these monks—for which groups of monks of different languages took turns. When jealousy and intrigues drove the Acemetae from the city, they went to Asia Minor, where Alexander's successor, John, could finally make a new settlement at Eirenaion on the Bosporus, which began its great growth under its third abbot, Marcellus. From this monastery in 468 the Patrician Studios summoned some monks for his new foundation in the capital that was later to be so famous.[176]

The monks of this period did not always give joy and comfort to the bishops of the capital. They were eager to share, at times tumultuously, in the confrontations raging around the "orthodoxy" of their bishops, of whom Macedonius, Gregory Nazianzen, and Nestorius were able to experience their power and aggressiveness as much as John Chrysostom, who urged them to better monastic discipline and aspired to exercise a certain control over their life.[177] In this attitude of the monasticism of the capital it becomes very clear that a framework had to be discovered which also incorporated it canonically into the total life of the Church. For the area of Eastern Christianity this momentous work was undertaken by the Council of Chalcedon in a series of canons.[178] The most important norm was given in canon 4, which subjected every monastery to the supervision of the diocesan bishop. Without his knowledge neither a small colony nor a monastery could be established in the future. The canon further decreed that a monk remained bound for the duration of his life to the monastery in which he began his ascetical career: he could leave it only for a weighty reason and temporarily with the consent of the diocesan bishop. Canon 8 also strengthened the position of the bishop in relation to the monastery: monks who were clerics, and hence members of the hierarchy, remained explicitly subject to the bishop's jurisdiction. Other canons tried to guarantee the ideal of the vocation by forbidding the assumption of a secular function or military service and denying to monks and nuns entry into marriage.[179] With this legislation of Chalcedon eastern monasticism, as an ecclesiastical state, obtained its official position in the total organism of the Church. True, the canons did not exhaust all possibilities of canonical regulations for monasticism, but they offered a framework capable of sustaining the burden, which could be filled in by later decisions if new developments within monasticism should make them necessary.

---

[175] Sozomen, HE 4, 27, 4 (Marathonius); on the monastery of Isaac: R. Janin, Les Églises et les monastères de Constantinople (Paris, 2nd ed. 1968), 86–88; Synod of Ephesus on Abbot Dalmatus: ACO I, 1, 7, X–XI; list of monastic representatives of 448: ibid. II, 1, 147.

[176] On the monastery of the Acemetae: R. Janin, RÉB 12 (1954), 76–79.

4. Messalianism

In the second half of the fourth century there appeared in Syria and Mesopotamia a movement led by monks, whose ascetical practice and teaching soon evoked opposition from ecclesiastical circles. The first to speak of them was Ephrem the Syrian; he called them Messalians—those who pray intensively—and spoke rather vaguely of their lack of discipline.[180] Gregory of Nyssa spoke of ascetics known by him who lived at the expense of others and valued the daydreaming they regarded as revelations more highly than the teachings of the gospel.[181] Epiphanius of Salamis knew of them from hearsay and stressed their moral licentiousness.[182] Theodoret of Cyrrhus was the first to name some of the "authors of error," among them a certain Simeon. He states also that the Messalians, if necessary, avoided being cut off from the Church by disavowing their doctrines. According to his report, Bishops Letoius of Mytilene, Amphilochius of Iconium, and Flavian of Antioch especially fought against the movement. It was also Amphilochius who c. 390 submitted the question of the Messalians to a synod at Side in Pamphylia, which, after adherents of the movement had been heard, rejected the following doctrines: baptism does not eradicate the root of sin, but only incessant prayer, which alone can expel the demon dwelling in the human soul; the Messalian pneumatic must reject work; he can foretell the future, see the Trinity with the eyes of his body, and physically perceive the descent of the Holy Spirit in his soul.[183] A Synod of Constantinople of 426 raised basically the same objections against the Messalians, except that it now emphasized at the head of the propositions to be condemned their thesis that in each newly born person dwells a demon which drives him to his evil deeds. Newly added was the charge of a false understanding of the doctrine of the Trinity and of Christology, which caused the Messalians to approach Sabellianism and Docetism. For its verdict the Synod relied on an investigation of a Messalian work, on which Bishop Valerian of Iconium reported.[184]

---

[177] See G. Dagron, op. cit., 261–72.

[178] The canons in ACO II, 1, 2, 159ff., and in COD 63–75. On the entire matter L. Ueding, Chalkedon II (Würzburg 1953), 569–676, is fundamental.

[179] Canons 7 and 8.

[180] Ephrem, Sermo 22, 1 (CSCO 169, 79, Beck). The first to mention the Greek name Euchitai for the Messalians was Jerome, Dial. adv. Pelag. (PL 22, 498).

[181] Gregory of Nyssa, De virg. 23, 3. See M. Aubineau, SChr 119 (Paris 1966), 534–541, with the literature.

This work, called Asketikon, was presented to the Council of Ephesus of 431, when, on the motion of Bishops Valerian and Amphilochius of Side, it took up the Messalian movement, which had then spread, especially in Pamphylia and Lycaonia. The decrees of the Synod of Constantinople of 426 were confirmed, the Asketikon was condemned, disavowal was demanded of persons suspected of the erroneous doctrine. deposition and excommunication were decreed against clerics who refused to comply and excommuniation against lay persons, and the Messalians were forbidden to have monasteries. Furthermore, the Council rejected eighteen individual propositions extracted from the Asketikon, which John Damascene placed in his History of Heresies.[185] They refer to the binding of the human soul to the demon, to the effect of baptism, the importance of prayer, to the physically perceptible presence of Christ and of the Holy Spirit; the reproach of overesteeming dreams, of aversion to work, and of licentiousness was no longer raised.

In the investigation of the Asketikon and its probable author, patristic scholarship through an important discovery was placed before an abundance of new problems in regard to Messalianism. To a series of the propositions condemned at Ephesus there were found more or less exact parallels in the Spiritual Homilies, which, under the name of Macarius of Egypt, occupied a high rank in the ascetical mystical literature of the Christian East.[186] An intensive preoccupation, begun at once, with the complex of questions thereby raised led not only to the discovery of further writings of the same sort and provenance: it is believed that their author has been found in that Simeon of Mesopotamia called a Messalian by Theodoret and some manuscripts, and he must also be regarded as the author of the Asketikon.[187]

---

[182] Theodoret, HE 4, 11, 1–8, and Epiphanius, Haeret. fab. comp. 4, 11.

[183] List of condemned propositions: Kmosko, n. XXI (PS I, 3). A Synod under Flavian of Antioch confirmed the verdict.

[184] In Kmosko, no. XIV.

[185] The Horos of the Synod of Ephesus in E. Schwartz, ACO I, 7, 117f.; the individually condemned propositions from the Asketikon in Kmosko, no. XVI.

However, in this work there is definitely no longer a question of the "vulgar" Messalianism of the early years, which Ephrem, Gregory of Nyssa, Epiphanius, and the first anti-Messalian synods had condemned. As now presented, any moral laxity is condemned in it, the work of the "brothers" is highly esteemed, and the phantasies of many a pneumatic no longer play a role. Here one encounters rather a refined theology of experience, in which a high but not an exclusive importance is assigned to prayer, in which ascetical training is a self-evident presupposition for the acquiring and preserving of the Spirit and his grace, and in which a devaluation of baptism is no longer traceable. Of course, this purified Messalianism is also not free of abnormalities—for example, an exaggerated view of the value of the experience of grace and the "tangibility" of the love of God—but according to the more recent observations Gregory of Nyssa and Diadochus of Photice regarded this Messalianism, after a tacit correction of its errors, as an ascetical attitude possible to them.[188] Hence it seems that doubts are not to be excluded whether the Asketikon condemned at Ephesus represented such a Messalianism or whether extracts presented from it did not give a distorted picture of its doctrine.[189] Of course, the negative verdict of Ephesus burdened it, without however being able to exclude the enormous influence of its writings on the mysticism of the future.

---

[186] The observation is due to the Benedictine, L. Villecourt, "La date et l'origine des Homélies spirituelles attribueés à Macaire," CRAIBL (Paris 1920), 29–53.

[187] Thus first H. Dörries, Symeon von Mesopotamien (see the sources).

[188] R. Staats, Gregor von Nyssa und die Messalianer (PTS 8, Berlin 1968), defends with noteworthy reasons the priority of the Great Letter of the Messalians to Gregory's De instituto christiano. H. Dörries, "Diadochus und Symeon," Wort und Stunde (Göttingen 1966), 334–417, indicates a similar and at the same time correcting and adopting "dependence" of Diadochus. G. M. Bartelink, VigChr 22 (1968), 128–136, calls attention to Messalian formulas in the Vita of Hypatius by Callinicus.

[189] See H. Dörries, "Die Messalianer im Urteil ihrer Bestreiter," Saeculum 21 (1970), 213–227, and J. Gribomont, op. cit. Also, in M. Canevet, RÉG 82 (1969), 404–423, the discussion on the authenticity of Gregory of Nyssa's De instituto christiano.

CHAPTER 20

The Monasticism of the Latin West

While the Latin West, especially in Rome and North Africa, had its own Early Christian asceticism on a considerable scale,[1] a native monasticism in the proper sense, independent in origin and development from the movement in Eastern Christianity, cannot be demonstrated with certainty for the West. Both the eremitical life and the organized monastic system began in the West only after the middle of the fourth century—at a time, then, when the knowledge of eastern monasticism had long ago reached the West through various channels and could have a further stimulating impact, especially when the already lively relations between Eastern Christianity and the Christian congregations of the West became more intense in the early phase of the Arian struggles. As early as 324 Hosius of Córdoba was at Alexandria to perform a task for Constantine, and there he certainly obtained knowledge of the just blossoming monasticism. The same is true of the pilgrims from the West, who came to the East in growing numbers after 324 and were able to observe in Palestine the great interest of the imperial family in the holy places. The wholly credible report that Constantine and his sons sent letters to Antony in Egypt[2] shows the significance which persons of the highest station attributed to monasticism. The repeated stays of Athanasius in the West—at Trier in 335, at Rome c. 340–343, at Aquileia c. 345–gave him and his entourage the possibility of speaking as eyewitnesses of the powerful movement which had taken hold of the East. His testimony achieved its full impact when his account of the life and work of Antony, written c. 357, became accessible to a larger Latin circle of readers in an early Latin translation soon after 360.[3] A momentum favorable to monasticism certainly proceeded also from the itinerant eastern monks who appeared from time to time in the West, especially in Rome.[4]

The knowledge of eastern monasticism at first, however, operated in the West only to reinforce the already existing ascetical communities, which, especially in Rome, saw themselves sanctioned in their ideals, gained further members, and were able to found new ascetical circles. The fact that a relatively long starting-time was needed in the West before an organized monastic system arose—this development began on a broader plane, apart from individual cases, only toward the end of the fourth century—becomes intelligible when the state of the expansion of Christianity in the West c. 350 is kept in mind. The real Christian centers were the cities with their relatively densely populated hinterland, but, according to the ideas of the time, these were precisely not the areas of settlement favorable to monasticism, which required solitude.[5] Not until the conversion of a majority of the rural population was achieved were conditions advantageous to an organized monasticism of some magnitude created. A survey of the individual regions of the West makes clear at the same time important differences within Latin monasticism itself as well as in comparison with its eastern precursor.

---

[1] See vol. I, 295–299. On the temporary eremitical life of the priest Novatian (c. 250), see H. J. Vogt, Coetus Sanctorum (Bonn 1968), 39, 228.

[2] Athanasius, Vita s. Antonii 81.

[3] See supra, chap. 19, II.

[4] Palladius, Hist. Laus. 37, 45. Jerome, Vita Hilarionis 29–40, knows of a tradition according to which Hilarion in his wanderings is said to have gone as far as Epidaurus and Salona in Dalmatia.

Rome and Italy

The growing knowledge of eastern monasticism exerted its greatest influence in the circles of the Roman communities of Christians who were already open to the ascetic ideal. The correspondence of Jerome, who was especially active during his second Roman sojourn (381–384) as a zealous promoter and propagandist of the monastic ideal, informs us that the members of these circles were mostly ladies of the upper class, who, like Asella, Marcellina, sister of Bishop Ambrose of Milan, and Irene, sister of Pope Damasus I, at first led a life of virginity as individuals in their families or, like Marcella, decided on the ascetic type of life as widows.[6] More and more they joined in larger ascetical groups or domestic communities respectively, among which those of the prominent Romans, Lea, Paula, Melania the Younger, and Proba played a special role.[7] A substantial approach to the monastic form of life was indicated when ladies of these circles left Rome and continued their former community on one of their properties in the country.[8] But some of them, such as Melania the Elder, Paula the Elder, and finally Melania the Younger, apparently saw that the possibility of a complete realization of the monastic ideal could take place only in the East and emigrated there.[9] Augustine was the first to speak of a real monastery of Roman women c. 387: he knew a group of widows and virgins who lived together, gained their support by the work of their hands, gave themselves a rule of the house, according to which tried "superiors" undertook the moral and spiritual direction of the community, and in which caritas was reckoned as the highest command.[10]

---

[5] Jerome unceasingly stresses the necessary "flight from the cites": Ep. 14, 6, 1; 58, 5, 1; 125, 8, 1; In Amos 2, 11; In Marcum (CChr 78, 459f.).

[6] Asella: Jerome, Ep. 24; Marcellina: Ambrose, De virg. 3, 4, 37; Paulinus, Vita Ambr. 4; Irene: A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana (Vatican City 1948), 107–111; Marcella: Jerome, Ep. 127.

[7] Lea: Jerome, Ep. 23; Paula: Jerome, Ep. 108; Melania the Younger: Palladius, Hist. Laus. 61, see D. Gorce, SChr 90 (Paris 1962), 40f., Proba: Jerome, Ep. 130, 7.

[8] Such as the above-named Marcella, Lea, and Melania the Younger.

The ascetical ideal apparently found a far weaker response among the men of the Roman community. There were, it is true, ascetics living alone here too quite early, but there seems not to have been the intermediate stage between them and the monastery, the community of male ascetics. Before long, even some of these ascetics, because of their extravagant behavior in dress and conduct, evoked the opposition of Christian circles.[11] Again Augustine attests the existence of several organized monasteries of men, in which men educated "in the divine science" were superiors and the community, "according to the custom of the East," as he stressed, assumed responsibility for its support through its own labor.[12]

For Rome it is only natural to raise the question of the position of the Roman Bishop in regard to the monastic movement of this period. Pope Damasus I (366–384) surely has to be considered as a definite promoter especially of women's asceticism: he encouraged it in word and writing. His successor, Siricius (384–399), was of the same mind: he expressed his opposition to a devaluation of the ascetical ideal. When, after the fading of the threat from the barbarian invasions in the early fifth century, the number of monks increased, Popes Innocent I (401–417) and Zosimus (417–18) intervened to issue regulations.[13] Among the Popes of the century are included also the first Roman founders of monasteries. The Monasterium in Catacumbas near the basilica of the Martyr Sebastian on the Via Appia owes its origin to Pope Sixtus III (432–440), and his successor, Leo I (440–461), founded a monastery near the Vatican basilica, later called that of Saints John and Paul; it was probably responsible for the liturgy in the basilica.[14]

---

[9] See supra, pp. 360f.

[10] Augustine, De mor. eccl. cath. I, 33, 70–73. A convent of women, allegedly founded by Constantina, sister of Constantine, at S. Agnese fuori le mura cannot be definitely proved; see G. D. Gordini, op. cit., 229f., against P. Schmitz, RBén 38 (1926), 189–195.

[11] Jerome, Ep. 22, 27–28.

[12] Augustine, De mor. eccl. cath. I, 33, 70.

[13] LP I, 220 (Innocent); Zosimus, Ep. 9 (PL 20, 670).

[14] On the foundations of Sixtus III and Leo I, see G. Ferrari, Early Roman Monasteries (Vatican City 1957), 163–172.

In a glance at the rest of Italy, what is first noteworthy is a relatively strong spread of the eremitical life on the coasts and islands of the Tyrrhenian Sea and, less often, in the Adriatic. The first island hermit known by name was Martin of Tours, who, after a brief time as a hermit in the vicinity of Milan, had to yield to pressure from the Arians and withdraw to the island of Gallinara off the Riviera, opposite the city of Albenga, c. 357–360.[15] Augustine knew a monastic community on the island of Capraria, modern Capraia, northeast of the northern tip of Corsica. The same island was named by Rutilius Namatianus as the abode of men "dreading the light," who called themselves monks. He also mentioned the island of Gorgo, today Gorgona, on the latitude of Livorno, because a young ascetic who had abandoned wife and property "had buried himself alive" there.[16] On the island of Tinetto at the northwestern exit from the Gulf of La Spezia, excavations have revealed the remains of a hermitage of the late fourth century.[17] Bonosus, a friend of Jerome, withdrew c. 374 to an island off the Dalmatian coast. Ambrose and Jerome spoke quite generally of this eremitism, which populated numerous islands of the Tyrrhenian Sea and the remote inlets of the coast.[18] Clearly here the island character was felt to be a substitute for the solitude of the wildernesses into which the anchorites of Egypt and Syria went.

The first founding of a monastery on Italian soil is connected with the name of Bishop Eusebius of Vercelli, who gave this foundation a specific orientation. Before being called to become bishop of the North Italian city, Eusebius had been a lector at Rome and had already decided on a life of virginity and asceticism before he was banished to the East in 355 because of his fidelity to the Nicene Creed. It was probably only after his return from exile in 363 that he united the clergy of his cathedral in a monastic vita communis; hence he was the first founder of a monasterium clericorum in Church history, since, until then, there was in East and West no model for his institution, so far as the sources inform us, and his contemporaries were quite aware of the novel character of his work.[19] Ambrose mentions the singing of hymns, common prayer, study of Scripture, manual labor, and fasting as important ingredients of the life of the clerical community of Vercelli,[20] which thus appears as the anticipation of Augustine's monasterium clericorum at Hippo and, with the requirement of the study of Scripture, already displays a specifically western element.

---

[15] Sulpicius Severus, Vita s. Martini 6, 5; see the commentary of J. Fontaine, SChr 134 (1968), 582–602.

[16] Augustine, Ep. 48; Rutilius Namatianus, De reditu suo 439–452; Gorgo: ibid., 515–526. Spanish studies identify, probably incorrectly, Capraria with the island of Cabrera in the Balearics: cf. Hülsen, Pauly-Wissowa 3, 2, 1546.

[17] Cf. R. Trinci (among others): Bollettino Ligustico 9 (1957), 45–62.

[18] Bonosus: Jerome, Ep. 3, 4; Ambrose, Exaem. 3, 5, 23; Jerome, Ep. 77, 6: "insulas, Etruscum mare . . . reconditos curvorum litorum sinus, in quibus monachorum consistunt chori." Island monasticism received reinforcements from Africans who left their country in the period of Vandal rule.

Milan under Bishop Ambrose must also be named as a further center of ascetic monastic effort in Italy. At the time of Augustine's stay at Milan there existed outside the city gates a monastery of men; the superior of the numerically not inconsiderable community was a learned priest, and Bishop Ambrose himself was its eager patron.[21] Elsewhere too Ambrose stood up as the advocate of monasticism, when he praised the island eremitism, extolled the work of Eusebius of Vercelli, or bitterly reprimanded two former monks who now reviled what they had once vowed.[22] But his care was directed in a special way to women who had vowed ascetical virginity. He put his word and his pen at the service of their ideal: from his efforts speaks the resolute seriousness of the Roman-become-Catholic-Bishop, who contrasted the exalted claim of Christian discipline with a lax pagan moral concept.[23] While virgins came from Piacenza and Bologna, and even refugees from North Africa, to Milan in order "to take the veil" (ut his velantur) there, Ambrose did not find in his episcopal city unanimous approval of his recruiting, and so he once sarcastically remarked: "I preach here and find a hearing elsewhere; I would almost prefer to preach elsewhere in order to convince you!"[24]

In the rest of Italy, apart from Bologna, where the monastic community counted some twenty nuns, there existed in Ambrose's day one convent of nuns at Verona, on which Bishop Zeno expended his care.[25] Jerome addressed one of his letters to the virgines in his native Haemona. As early as 370 Rufinus was a monk in a monastery of his home town, Aquileia. When c. 400 he translated Basil's Asketikon for the monks of a monastery of Pinetum, he asked that copies be sent "also to other monasteries" of the West.[26] In South Italy asceticism first got a foothold with Paulinus, who came from Bordeaux and from 395 led a monastic life with his domestic community. The ascetical communities which Melania the Younger established c. 408 on her properties in Sicily and Campania may also have been "domestic monasteries" of this sort.[27] Later biographies ascribe to many a bishop of the fourth to the sixth century special interest in monasticism or even the founding of monasteries, but in individual cases this cannot be ascertained with certainty from other sources.[28]

---

[19] Ambrose, Ep. 63, 66: ". . . primus in occidentis partibus diversa (i.e., monasterii continentiam et disciplinam ecclesiae) coniunxit." Pseudo-Maximus of Turin, Sermo 7, 22 (CChr 23, 25): "eosdem monachos instituit esse quos clericos; . . . ut si videres monasterii lectulos, instar orientalis propositi indicares." The sermon is to be assigned near the end of the fourth century. In his letter from exile to his congregation at Vercelli Eusebius does not mention the clerical monastery: Ep. 2 (CChr 9, 108). On Eusbius: C. de Clercq, DHGE 15, 1477–1483.

[20] Ep. 63, 82: "hymnis dies ac noctes personant; orationibus conciliare crebris; student lectioni, operibus continuis mentem occupant; jejunii labor."

[21] Augustine, De mor. eccl. cath. I, 33, 70; Conf. 8, 6, 15.

[22] Ambrose, Ep. 63, 7–9; Enarr. in ps. 36, 49.

[23] Especially to be mentioned here are works developing out of sermons on the ideal of virginity: De virginibus, De viduis, De virginitate, De institutione virginis, and Exhortatio virginitatis; see the special editions in Altaner–Stuiber, 382; the literature in E. Dassmann, Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius von Mailand (Münster 1965), 250, footnote 223.

[24] De virginibus I, 11, 58–61.

Gaul

For Gaul also we must presuppose a premonastic asceticism, even if the testimonies for it are relatively sparse and of a later date. A decree of the Emperor Valentinian I (c. 370), which exempted the consecrated virgins of Gaul from a tax, assumes the existence of women's asceticism, just as does a canon of the Council of Valence (374), which dealt with the virgines who had abandoned their former state.[29] Also at Trier there is known about the same time the institution of virgines deo dicatae, and even before the turn of the century a decree of Pope Damasus I (366–384) or of his successor, Siricius (384–399), expresses itself on the question of the treatment of such virgins who became unfaithful to their vows.[30] The majority of these virgines in Gaul still lived with their families, but they occasionally gathered into rather small groups following the trend toward a monastic community.[31]

The first reports on male asceticism in Gaul are connected with the name of the man who ranks clearly as the founder of Gallic monasticism—Martin of Tours. His discharge from military service was motivated by his decision for an ascetical existence, which, after a short stay with Hilary of Poitiers, he first put into practice as an itinerant ascetic in the Balkans, then outside the gates of Milan, and, as already mentioned, on the island of Gallinara off the Ligurian coast.[32] After Hilary's return from exile in 360, Martin lived at first in a hermitage in the vicinity of Poitiers, with great probability on the site of the later monastery of Ligugé, eight kilometers south of the city.[33]

---

[25] Ambrose, Epp. 5 and 6; in De virginitate, 130, Ambrose praises the Bishop of Bologna, Eusebius, for his successful work for virginitas.

[26] Haemona: Jerome, Ep. 11; Aquileia: Rufinus, Apol. I, 4; Pinetum: Rufinus, Praef. in Regul. s. Basilii (CChr 20, 241).

[27] Nola: P. Fabre, S. Paulin de Nole (Paris 1949), 39ff.; Melania: Palladius, Hist, Laus. 61.

[28] See G. Penco, Storia, 27–42.

[29] Cod. Theod. XIII, 10, 4; Conc. Valent., can. 2 (374).

[30] Augustine, Conf. 8, 6, 14 (Trier); the papal decretals: PL 13, 1178.

[31] Sulpicius Severus, Dial. 2, 11, was the first to mention a monasterium puellarum; see R. Metz, op. cit., 119–124. Bishop Victricius of Rouen requested from Pope Innocent I (402–417) instructions for the care of virgines lapsae: PL 20, 469–481.

By accepting a few disciples, this hermitage gradually became a colony of anchorites, and the same is true of the cell to which Martin withdrew soon after his call to be Bishop of Tours c. 371; from it grew the monastery of Marmoutier. The rapidly growing number of hermits—soon there were some eighteen—caused the appearance here too of certain forms of common life, such as common meals and common prayer. Since manual labor remained forbidden to monks in an effort to keep from them a spirit of acquisitiveness—only some younger monks prepared the manuscripts needed for reading and prayer—the community's support had to be defrayed from the property supplied by brothers coming from well-to-do families and from the aid of the congregation of Tours. A series of traits of this monastic colony points unmistakably to like structures in Egyptian monasticism, as they are demonstrable in Antony's union of hermits or of those on Mount Nitria. Among these characteristics must be counted not only the loose, unregulated organization, but especially the basic ascetical concept that understands the monk's being as the following of Christ, as realized in apostolic poverty on the model of the primitive community—common possessions, clothing—and in constant warfare with demons. The essential ingredient of this struggle with demons was the destruction of pagan temples, the erecting of Christian churches in their place, the instructing of people through preaching, and the foundation of new monastic settlements.[34] In this way Martin's monasticism received a decidedly pastoral and missionary trend, which gave it a specific character. Since new bishops were eagerly chosen from the circle of Martin's disciples and they promoted the monastic ideal in his spirit, the early monasticism on the Loire retained its special nature also in the future. Naturally, it aroused opposition among some bishops, to whom Martin's vast influence among the people was distasteful, but whose reputation, defended and propagated by the literature on him written by Sulpicius Severus, guaranteed a decisive and continuous impact, especially in southwestern Gaul.[35] After renouncing his paternal inheritance, Sulpicius also personally sought to realize in practice Martin's ascetical ideal with some modifications, when he introduced for himself and his household at his country residence, Primuliacum,[36] a lifestyle which united individual ascetical features, such as living in separate cells and a simple monastic garb, with intellectual activity and a ready hospitality to monks, especially those of Marmoutier. For this ascetic circle the memory of Martin was the unifying bond and the tomb of his pupil Clarus, whom Sulpicius Severus had buried at Primuliacum, was a constant stimulus for his veneration.[37] The influence of Martin may also be assumed for the monasticism of the bishopric of Rouen, farther northwest, since the bishop of that see, Victricius, knew Martin personally, venerated him, and, just like him, had monasteries established near newly erected churches.[38] And Maximin, who founded a monastery at Chinon on the Loire, west of Tours, was a disciple of Martin.[39] [32] Sulpicius Severus, Vita s. Martini 5, 1–3; on Martin's stay at Milan and on Gallinara, see supra, p. 377. It is possible that even before 356 Hilary of Poitiers had lived as an ascetic or in a community of ascetics with his clergy; cf. J. Fontaine, op. cit., 559, footnote 2.

---

[33] Sulpicius Severus, Vita s. Martini 7, 1. On the most recent excavations at Ligugé cf. the reports of J. Coquet in the RMab 1954–1961, especially 51 (1961), 54–70; the first to use the name Ligugé were Venantius Fortunatus, Vita s. Hilarii 1, 12, and Gregory of Tours, Virtutes s. Martini 4, 30.

[34] The question of where Martin got his knowledge of eastern monasticism seems secondary, since there were many possibilities from the mid-fourth century. A derivation of Martin's monasticism from that of Italy, as made by F. Prinz, op. cit., 93f., only puts off the question, since the East was also the model for the Italian monasticism of the fourth century.

About a decade after Martin's death the second phase in the expansion of Gallic monasticism began, which especially included Provence and was to surpass Martin's form of monasticism in its significance for Church history. The starting-point and, for a century, also the center of this movement was the double island off the coast of Cannes, today called Lérins. On the larger island, Lerinum or Lerina, there settled, between 405 and 410, with his friend Caprasius, Honoratus, of a prominent family, after he had decided in his early manhood for the ascetical life against the opposition of his father.[40] From its modest anchoretic beginning, there developed in the course of twenty years an ingens fratrum coenobium, as John Cassian called the foundation c. 425.[41] Honoratus, soon ordained a priest, remained, until his call to be Bishop of Arles in 428, the spiritual father of the monastery: while he perhaps did not supply it with a written Rule, he did give it an order of life entirely oriented to the Egyptian model. The reputation of the coenobium on this beata insula not only attracted many visitors but brought it a remarkably high percentage of recruits from the upper class families of Late Roman Gaul, which gave to the monasticism of Lérins a character clearly in contrast to that of Martin. Even more momentous for the Gallic Church of the fifth century was the fact that monks of Lérins coming from this very class were chosen as bishops and thus brought to their new circles of work the spirit that determined the religious and theological character of the monastery. Besides Honoratus, they included his cousin, Hilary, who became his successor at Arles and, as pastor and energetic metropolitan, for two decades determined the destinies of the Church in southeastern Gaul. There were also Maximus, second Abbot of Lérins, elected to the see of Riez, and Faustus, who succeeded him in both the abbatial dignity and the episcopal office.[42] Bishop Eucherius of Lyon (from 434) remained an enthusiastic champion of Lérins throughout his life; c. 420 he settled with his wife and children on the smaller island, Lero, and named as tutors of his sons no less than the monks Hilary of Arles, Salvian, Priest of Marseille, and Vincent, who may be identified with the author of the famous Commonitorium.[43] A brother of this Vincent was the monk Lupus, later Bishop of Troyes, while the sons of Eucherius, Salonius and Veranus, went as bishops to Geneva and Vence respectively.[44] Apparently there was in progress here a development similar to that in the Eastern Church, in which the selecting of bishops from the monastic state became the rule. Thus the spiritual and theologically unique character of the island monastery is found again in the monastic community established by Hilary at Arles and in that existing at Lyon even before Eucherius's time.[45] From Lyon the spirit of Lérins radiated also to the Jura monasteries, since Romanus, founder of the first of these, Condat (Saint-Claude, c. 430), had learned "the life of the monks" in a monastery at Lyon, and at Condat under the later Abbot Eugendus the monks read, in addition to the ascetical works of Basil, Pachomius, and Cassian, also "what the holy fathers of Lérins" had published.[46] Another important influence on the monasticism of the fifth century in southeast Gaul proceeded from the work of John Cassian, just mentioned. He came probably from the Romanized Dobrudsha (natione Scytha) and hence was a Latin-speaking monk. After a first stay in a monastery at Bethlehem, he had lived some ten years among the anchorites of Scete in Egypt until c. 400; he was next a deacon under John Chrysostom at Constantinople and later, probably as a priest, a member of the clergy of the Church of Antioch. In the service of his bishops he was twice in Rome, where he became acquainted with the later Pope Leo I. For reasons that cannot be clarified with certainty, he came c. 416 to Marseille, where Bishop Proculus gave him the Church of Saint-Victor outside the city.[47] Here he founded the famed monastery of monks, dedicated to Saint Victor; it was followed by a convent of nuns, to which Caesarius of Arles later sent his sister for her formation.[48] At the Church of Saint-Victor Cassian composed his two great works on the way of life and the spiritual world of eastern monasticism—the Instituta Coenobiorum c. 424 and the Collationes c. 426–28. Here too was displayed his collaboration in the theological discussion of his time on Nestorianism and Augustine's doctrine of grace.

---

[35] On the peculiarity of Martin's monasticism, one is referred especially to the commentary of J. Fontaine in SChr 134, on the Vita s. Martini, canons 10 and 13. New foundings of monasteria by Martin: Vita, canon 13; Dial. 2, 8; 3, 8. On the literary character of the Vita s. Martini, see also J. Fontaine, SChr 132, Introduction; its basic tendency is that Martin was a second Antony; see F. S. Pericoli Ridolfini, "La vita Martini e la vita Antonii," Studi e Materiali stor. rel. 38 (1967), 420–433.

[36] On the road from Bordeaux to Narbonne, in the border area of Aquitania and Narbonnensis, see J. Fontaine, op. cit., 32–38, and SChr 134, 894f. (map).

[37] Clarus: Sulpicius Severus, Vita s. Martini 23; Ep. 2, 5; Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 32, 6 (tomb inscription).

[38] Victricius, De laude sanctorum (PL 20, 443–458); Sulpicius Severus, Dial. 3, 2; Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 18.

[39] See E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne III, 329.

---

[40] Sermo de vita s. Honorati 4–13 (eulogy by Hilary of Arles on his predecessor on the anniversary of his death, probably 431).

[41] In the Praefatio to the Collationes XI–XVII, which he dedicated to Honoratus and Eucherius.

[42] Faustus of Riez, Sermo 34 of the homilies of pseudo-Eusebius, PL, Suppl. III, 633–640 (eulogy on Maximus).

[43] Eucherius, De laude eremi 42–43 (praise of the island); Instruc. I, praef. (teacher of his sons). On Vincent: F. Prinz, op. cit., 52, and, more cautiously, E. Griffe, op. cit., III, 337.

[44] E. Griffe, op. cit., II, 222f., 287. Here are considered only the monks of Lérins who became bishops to about the mid-century.

The Abbot of Marseille himself stated the goals of his monastic writings in the dedications, which were directed to the various bishops, monastic superiors, and anchorites of Gaul.[49] He aspired to familiarize, in detail and reliably, the leadership of Gallic monasticism both with eastern cenobitism and also with the spirituality of the eremitism there. The proved cenobitic rules of the East, especially that of Pachomius, whose individual features were lovingly described in the Instituta Coenobiorum, should be a help to the Gallic monasteries, often founded rather haphazardly and still not sure of their way, for the preservation of the apostolic tradition, in which Cassian seemed to regard as advisable a certain adaptation to the climate and customs of life of the country.[50] He assigned to anchoritism an objectively higher rank, it is true, since it presupposes a deeper ascetical discipline, but its high requirements could even become a danger. Although his admiration and secret love belonged to this form, he selected for himself, in a sense as a model for Gallic asceticism, the ordered life in the monastery within the city. Two characteristics of the monasticism of the Rhone certainly go back to Cassian's work: first, the decidedly high estimation of the eastern, really the Egyptian, model, which was here grasped more keenly and more profoundly than in the monasticism of Martin of Tours, and, second, the greater receptivity to a "theology of monasticism," which he brought as a legacy of the East from the circle around Evagrius Ponticus to Provence. From this resulted ultimately the lively interest in the theological discussion of the time on the validity of the Augustinian doctrine of grace, in which the monasticism of southeast Gaul took a laudable share. Still more important, of course, was probably the long-range impact of this abbot who had come to Marseille from the Balkan Peninsula. The discreet, intelligent judgment, the sure view for the ascetically possible, the winning purity of his ideals, and the attractive style of his writings decisively prepared for the great future of Latin monasticism in the Middle Ages.[51] Finally, southeastern Gallic monasticism experienced certain impulses from the East which went back to the contacts of Jerome with the monastic circles in Toulouse and Marseille. Through the monk Sisinnius he was informed of the ascetical movements in Toulouse, which induced him to dedicate his commentary of Zechariah to Bishop Exsuperius and his exegesis of Malachi to the monks Minervius and Alexander.[52] In a letter to a certain Rusticus of Marseille, who in 427 became Bishop of Narbonne, he recommended the ascetic life in a community of brothers, whereas he expressed himself rather critically in regard to Martin of Tours.[53]

---

[45] Arles: Vita s. Hilarii 10; on Lyon: F. Prinz, op. cit., 66f.

[46] Vitae Patrum Jurensium 11 (Armanus); 174 (Eugendus): SChr 142 (1968), 250, 426.

[47] On Cassian's homeland: H. I. Marrou: Miscell. G. de Jerphanion II (Rome 1947), 588–596; on his membership in the clergy of Antioch, see E. Griffe, BLE 55 (1954), 239–244; on his activity in Marseille, again H. I. Marrou, RMA 1 (1945), 5–26.

[48] Gennadius, Vir. ill. 62; L. Laurin, Notice sur l'ancienne abbaye Saint-Victor de Marseille (Marseille 1957); Vita Caesarii Arelat. 1, 35.

[49] Cf. J. Leroy, "Les préfaces des écrits monastiques de Jean Cassien," RAM 42 (1966), 157–180; id., "Le cénobitisme chez Cassien," ibid. 43 (1967), 121–158.

---

[50] Instit. Coenob., praef. 8–9. Here there seems to be a reproof for the relative freedom of Martin's monasticism. But Cassian knew and esteemed also the few anchorites in the area of Provence, such as Helladius and some monks on the Stoechades islands (Iles d' Hyères off Marseille), to whom he dedicated Collationes XVIII–XXIV; see the preface to Coll. XI and XVIII.

[51] Cf. E. Pichery in his introduction to SChr 42 (1955), 56ff.

[52] Sisinnius is mentioned by Jerome, Ep. 119, 1; Comm. in Zach. prol.; Contra Vigil. 3, 17. Minervius and Alexander: Comm. in Amos III, prol.; Comm. in Malach., prol. Ep. 119 is also addressed to them.

[53] Letter to Rusticus: Ep. 125; on Martin, without naming him, Ep. 60, 9.

Spain

While premonastic asceticism is first attested for the Iberian Peninsula by the Synod of Elvira,[54] reports on the existence of monasticism here do not occur until c. 380, but then they of course make clear that it was not a question of an institution just coming into being there. Bishop Hosius of Córdoba, who stayed at Alexandria in 324 as Constantine's delegate, was able to report about eastern monasticism, so that he will be first thought of as the agent, in the reference of Athanasius, through whom Spain also had obtained knowledge of the life of Antony. But it is known for sure only that he dedicated a work on virginity to his sister, who belonged to a group of consecrated virgins.[55]

The Synod of Zaragoza in 380 used the term monachus for the first time in a Spanish text in a special context: it decreed punishment for the passage of a cleric to monasticism because he thereby "aspired to appear [as] a more zealous observer of the law."[56] Five years later, on the other hand, Pope Siricius (384–399) in a letter to Bishop Himerius of Tarragona expressed the wish that clerics should especially be chosen from monasticism; in the same letter monasteries of men and women are mentioned as a normal thing in the province of Tarragona.[57] Monasteries are also taken for granted for the same time in a correspondence between a society lady and a nun, who advised the former to withdraw to a convent for prayer from Christmas to Epiphany.[58] It is uncertain whether the islands off the east coast of Spain knew monasticism at this time.[59]

A unique representative of Spanish monasticism in the last years of the fourth century was Bachiarius, of whom Gennadius reports that he chose the peregrinatio in order to preserve his asceticism; in fact, Bachiarius defended his itinerant monasticism spiritedly.[60] In his De lapso he showed himself to be an ascetic of sound judgment and great knowledge who had studied Tertullian, Cyprian, and Jerome. Of course, his itinerant monasticism brought on him the suspicion of being an adherent of Priscillian ideas, which, however, he decisively repudiated in an apologia.[61]

---

[54] Council of Elvira, can. 13.

[55] Gennadius, Vir. ill. 5; Athanius, Vita s. Antonii 93. Jerome remained close to an ascetical couple from Spain: Epp. 71, 75. The First Council of Toledo (c. 400), 6, 16, 19, was also concerned with virgines.

[56] Conc. Caesaraugust., 6.

[57] Siricius, Ep. ad Himerium 1, 13, and 1, 6.

[58] G. Morin, who attributes both letters to Bachiarius, edited them with commentary: RBén 40 (1928), 293–302, reprinted in PL, Suppl. 1, 1035–1044.

[59] On the monasticism of the Balearic island of Cabrera, see supra, p. 377., footnote 16.

[60] Gennadius, Vir. ill. 23; Bachiarius, De fide 2.

No doubt, however, the reaction to Priscillian's movement brusquely interrupted the further development of monasticism in the Iberian Peninsula. True, Priscillianism must be evaluated primarily as a dualistic heterodox theology and hence is dealt with in another place, but from this theology its adherents developed an extreme and exaggerated ascetical practice, which brought even orthodox monasticism into disrepute and evoked in some bishops otherwise not unfriendly to asceticism a long-lasting distrust of it.[62] This burden and the disturbances beginning after the turn of the century, which were connected with the occupation of the country by the Sueves and later the Visigoths, delayed until the beginning of the sixth century a stronger recovery of monasticism.

North Africa

Especially in North African Christianity the ascetical life had achieved a noteworthy expansion and a high esteem as early as the third century. From the days of Tertullian, the North African Church knew virgines or continentes of both sexes, who were encouraged by Bishop Cyprian with special care and often proved themselves in time of persecution. They continued to exist throughout the fourth century and apparently increased in number and importance, since the synods of this period were repeatedly concerned with them and issued rules which pushed them more and more in the direction of the common life.[63] Perhaps the rank and spread of asceticism were a reason why in a glance at the rest of the development of the inner life of the Church in North Africa real monasticism appeared there relatively late. To be sure, the thesis has been proved untenable that the monasticism of North Africa owed its origin, its basic organization, and its first expansion to Augustine exclusively.[64] For he himself testified to the existence of several monasteries at Carthage c. 400, and they could not have originated on his initiative because in them an understanding of monasticism was represented by at least one group of monks which was diametrically opposed to the Augustinian view.[65] The characteristics of this group, condemned by Augustine with the utmost sharpness, their extraordinary coiffure, their rejection of all manual labor, their complacent appearance in public, and especially the subjectivity and capriciousness of their scriptural exegesis apparently betrayed Messalian influences.[66] And the itinerant monks, strongly condemned by him, whose unworthy conduct brought their entire state into discredit, clearly reveal eastern peculiarities.[67] If, then, Augustine cannot be called the "father" of African monasticism,[68] nevertheless to him belongs the credit for instituting a monasticism which bore the stamp of his spirit and through its quality was called to become a highly significant element of the inner life of the Church, first in that of North Africa, then through its continued operation in all of Western Christianity.

---

[61] De lapso: PL 20, 1037–1062; see J. Duhr, Le De lapso de Bach. (Louvain 1934). De fide: PL 20, 1019–1036; see J. Madoz, RET 1 (1940–41), 457–488.

[62] Cf. Sulpicius Severus, Chron. 2, 50; the Synods of Zaragoza and Toledo (380 and 400 respectively) already hinted at a reaction.

[63] See G. Folliet, "Aux origines de l'ascétisme et du cénobitisme africain," SA 46 (1961), 25–44. For the decrees of the Synods of Carthage of 349, 390, 397, and that of Hippo of 393, ibid., 31–34.

[64] Thus following P. Monceaux, "Saint Augustin et saint Antione," Miscell. Agostiniana II (Rome 1931), 61–89, especially J. M. del Estal in a series of essays in La Ciudad de Dios, pp. 169–172 (1956–59), and finally in StudMon 3 (1961), 123–136.

Augustine's Monastic Rule

Certainly decisive, first of all, for the formation of this monasticism was the personal direction of both monasteries founded by Augustine at Hippo—the monastery of lay persons, of which he as a priest was superior, and the later episcopal monasterium clericorum, as he called it.[69] The intensive study of the problem of the Augustinian Rule in the most recent period has led to the conclusion that Augustine put in writing his ideas on a monastic form of life. A comprehensive investigation of the manuscript tradition of all pertinent texts has shown that the so-called Praeceptum, earlier called the Regula tertia or recepta, can alone claim to be regarded as Augustine's monastic Rule,[70] and a comparison of this text with Augustine's other writings, especially the De opere monachorum, has confirmed this result with the strong stylistic and factual relationship here demonstrable.[71] Hesitations about Augustine's authorship, which may be drawn from the not strictly logical train of thought or from the fact that Augustine did not mention this text in the Retractiones—the list of Augustine's writings in Possidius is, besides, incomplete—lose weight if it is accepted that it was destined only for private use, not for publication. Of course, the question of the dating of the Rule is still open, since reasons can be adduced for a relatively early (shortly before 400) as well as for a later beginning (c. 425–26).[72]

---

[65] Retract. 2, 47: cum apud Carthaginem monasteria esse coepissent. At the request of Bishop Aurelius of Carthage, Augustine intervened with his De opere monachorum in the violent controversy over these monasteries.

[66] See G. Folliet, "Des moines euchites à Carthage en 400–401," Stpatr 2 (TU 64, Berlin 1957), 386–399.

[67] Characteristics of itinerant monasticism: De opere monachorum 28, 36.

[68] Also the statement of Petilian, that Augustine had introduced hoc genus vitae (sc. monasteriorum et monachorum), cannot be understood in this sense; cf. B. Quinot, RevÉAug 13 (1967), 15–24.

[69] Sermo 355, 2.

[70] The result is published by L. Verheijen in volume I of La règle de s. Augustin; ibid., 417–437, the critical edition of the text of the Praeceptum. Volume II of L. Verheijen contains the history of the research on the question of the Augustinian Rule; on Verheijen see A. Manrique, Misc. patrística, Homenaje P. A. C. Vega (El Escorial 1968), 289–328.

An effort to put forward what was specifically Augustine's in his understanding of monasticism must not overlook that Augustine only gained his insight through a rather long development, determined by the stages on the way of his religious life. At times these became for him the opportunity to rethink his ascetical ideal and concretely to realize the insights thereby acquired. The Confessiones clearly show that Augustine's first encounter with monasticism in Italy forever stamped his understanding of Christian asceticism. But even then he knew that anchoritism in the real sense was not possible for him personally even if he spoke of it with admiration.[73] In the vita communis, which, with some like-minded persons, he established in his paternal home at Thagaste after his return from Italy, an Augustinian peculiarity will be seen alongside certain features common to that cenobitism, such as seclusion from the world and renunciation of marriage: the high rank which was assigned to intellectual activity, the contemplative grasp of Christian revelation. Still, the community of Thagaste cannot yet be called a monasterium in the full sense, since apparently the renunciation of personal property was not yet required of all its members, who came chiefly from the educated class. These limitations do not occur in Augustine's two foundations in Hippo, in which he tried to realize the now definitively acquired monastic ideal. In the monastic life at Hippo the following features may be called specifically Augustinian: 1. The vita communis was understood as one of the highest possibilities for realizing the love of God and neighbor on the basis of a deeply Christian understanding of amicitia, which unites all.[74] 2. The life of the community was supported by the atmosphere of a great inner breadth in the relationship to one another and to the superior, which was determined by the freedom bestowed in grace.[75] 3. For lectio, spiritual study in the broader sense, a pride of place was demanded and maintained, which gave to the Augustinian monastery a characteristically intellectual alertness and receptiveness to all religiously significant questions.[76] 4. The monasterium clericorum was put definitely at the service of the care of souls, so that the Augustinian monasticism was emphatically apostolically oriented and effectively bound to the ecclesia.[77]

---

[71] See T. I. van Bavel, Augustiniana 9 (1959), 12–17. A commentary on the Praeceptum, the common work of Bavel and Verheijen, will clarify this relationship.

[72] For the early beginning, besides I. van Bavel and L. Verheijen, especially D. Sanchis, StudMon 4 (1962), 7–33; for a later dating, A. Sage, RevÉAug 14 (1968), 128–132.

[73] Augustine, De mor. eccl. cath. 31, 67.

[74] Praeceptum I, 2: "sit vobis anima una et cor unum in deum." V, 2: "ut in omnibus superemineat caritas." Sermo 356, 8: "caritatis unitas."

This Augustinian monastic ideal operated in the future in a double form: first, directly in the area of the North African Church in the monasteries which were founded here by friends and disciples of Augustine and were directed in his spirit; then, indirectly through the influence which the Augustinian Rule acquired on other monastic systems outside Africa. Augustine's biographer Possidius stressed that he personally knew some ten men, who were called out of the monasterium clericorum in Hippo to be bishops and founded monasteries in their sees.[78] It can hardly be doubted that they gave to their establishments the Augustinian Rule as the norm of monastic life, just as Augustine by his personal contacts exercised a further influence on them.[79] A prudent appraisal establishes that up to his death some thirty monasteries of men came into existence in North Africa which more or less bore his stamp. Even the foundations that occurred after his death in the later part of the fifth century for the most part referred back to the model he created.[80] No less important was the later impact of the Augustinian Rule on the newly created monastic rules of the future. Caesarius of Arles and Benedict were under obligation to him in their new creations;

---

[75] Praeceptum VIII, 1: "observetis haec omnia cum dilectione . . . non sicut servi sub lege, sed sicut liberi sub gratia constituti." VII, 1: the superior is pater; "plus amari adpetat quam timeri." IV, 9: consideration and understanding for the erring. III, 1, 3, 5: warm-hearted care of the sick.

[76] Praeceptum V, 9–10: rules for the monastic library; Possidius, Vita s. Aug. 31; Enarr. in ps. 99, 12: lectio is the monks' occupation. Study of Scripture: Ep. 21, 3; cf. A. Penna, "Lo studio della Bibbia nella Spiritualità di s. Agostino," S. Augustinus, Vitae spir. Magister I (Rome 1958), 147–168; A. Manrique, Los monjes y los estudios (Poblet 1963), 13–39.

[77] See L. M. Verheijen, Théologie de la Vie monastique (Paris 1961), 205ff., and A. Zumkeller, "Biblische und altchristliche Leitbilder des klösterlichen Lebens im Schrifttum des hl. Augustinus," Augustiniana 18 (1968), 5–21.

[78] Possidius, Vita s. Aug. 11: ". . . ferme decem, quos ipse novi, sanctos et venerabiles viros continentes et doctos beatissimus Augustinus diversis ecclesiis, non nullis quoque eminentioribus, rogatus dedit. Similiter et ipsi . . . monasteria instituerunt et . . . fratres ad suscipiendum sacerdotium praestiterunt."

[79] The superior of the lay monastery at Hadrometum in 427 asked Augustine instruere his monks in regula monasterii: Aug., Ep. 216, 6.

[80] J. J. Gavigan, op. cit., 116–144, gives a list of the North African monasteries of the fifth century according to the literary sources and archeological finds.

the Regula Monasterii Tarnatensis of the sixth century was chiefly only an adaptation of the Augustinian Rule, the use of which can also be ascertained in the Regula Pauli et Stephani and in early Spanish monastic regulations.[81]

Thus the most recent results of research prove that also in this aspect of the Church's inner life Augustine was a creative initiator and continuing force.

Anti-Monastic Currents

A phenomenon as striking as monasticism could not but immediately arouse the interest of pagan circles, which of course did not examine it according to its own self-awareness but for the most part condemned it only because of its external appearances and thus reached an often pointedly negative verdict. The Emperor Julian, it is true, admitted that Christians "in great number" decided for this form of life, but in their senseless asceticism, which drove them into the desert or burdened them with chains and iron collars, he could see only the activity of a demon, to whom they voluntarily subjected themselves.[82] The rhetor Libanius attributed to them a dark life of wickedness, which concealed itself under their ascetical exterior, and attributed to them the ultimate responsibility for the destruction of pagan temples.[83] A similar view was held by Eunapius of Sardes, who reproached them especially for the cult of martyrs—they had, he said, made gods out of slaves executed because of their crimes—and even accused them of high treason, since in 395 they had, so he claimed, facilitated Alaric's invasion of Greece via Thermopylae.[84] The historian Zosimus formulated the reproach, often raised later, that monks, because of their renunciation of marriage, were worthless to human society and, under the pretext of wishing to support the poor, they made mankind poor because of the gifts they begged.[85] The former Prefect of the City of Rome, Rutilius Namatianus, also had harsh words for eremitism; he branded it as a scandal that recently a young man of a prominent family gave up marriage and "buried himself alive" on the island of Urgo.[86]

However, the Christian Emperors also occasionally had reason for criticism of the behavior of some monks and did not hesitate to take energetic legal measures because of certain encroachments. When monks from the Nitrian Desert took part in 375 in a riot of the population of Alexandria, which was directed against the installation of the Arian Bishop Lucius, the Emperor Valens forced them abruptly into military service and threatened severe punishments in cases of refusal.[87] And the Emperor Theodosius I had to complain repeatedly of the tumultuous appearance of monks who in 387 took part in a riot in Antioch and made themselves prominent in the destruction of the synagogue at Callinicum. In 390 he even forbade them to settle in cities, and six years later an edict by his sons sharply condemned their seditious intervention in favor of men who had been condemned to suitable punishments because of their crimes.[88]

---

[81] Cf. L. Verheijen, La règle de s. Augustin II, 213–217, with map. A. Manrique is preparing a study of the later impact of the Augustinian Rule down to Benedict of Aniane.

[82] Julian, Emperor, Ep. 89f.

[83] Libanius, Or. 2, 32.

[84] Eunapius, Vitae sophist. p. 472f., 476.

[85] Zosimus, Hist. nova 5, 23.

[86] Rutil. Namat., De reditu suo 429–452, 515–526.

In the properly internal sphere of the Church there were often at first tensions between episcopate and monasticism, which had various causes. It could not but disturb the bishops that here an institution had come into being which at first escaped control by the hierarchy. The hierarchy could rightly point to the fact that at times monasteries had been established whose existence seemed not adequately assured; that questionable elements often found admission, whom a previous careful investigation would have excluded; that monastic superiors were chosen who were in no sense equal to their task. Thus are explained the exertions of the episcopate to incorporate monasticism as a state in the Church and to place it on the organized bases established by canon law, just as they were first secured by the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon.[89] And the claim made, at least de facto, by some monks to belong to a state which was of higher rank than the episcopate occasionally produced friction.[90] Additional matter for conflict was given, finally, when the strictly ascetical life of the monks operated as a silent reproof vis-à-vis the attitude, remote from renunciation, of some bishops, a motif which becomes clearly discernible in the distrust of the Gallic and Spanish episcopates in regard to monasticism in the fourth and fifth centuries.

The antimonastic movement proved to be strongest in lay Christian circles of the fourth and fifth centuries: it appeared as a reaction to the exuberant enthusiasm for monks at the time. Here also the discrepancy between the new ascetic ideal and the ordinary lifestyle of the upper class in the large cities of late antiquity was felt as a reproach, and

[87] See Jerome, Chron. ad a. 375; Orosius, Adv. pag. 7, 33, 3; Cod. Theod. XII, 1, 63.

[88] Theodosius against Ambrose: monachi multa scelera faciunt, Ambrose, Ep. 41, 27; the imperial edicts: Cod. Theod. XVI, 3, 1; IX, 40, 16.

[89] See supra, p. 371.

[90] Cf., for example, Athanasius, Ep. ad Dracontium 10.

people sought to counter it by a sort of defensive attitude. This is clearly attested for Antioch by John Chrysostom, according to whom local Christians branded monks as charlatans and seducers who enticed men from their previous environment to a dismal life in the desert.[91] In Rome the ladies of the higher-class circles who had gathered into ascetical communities found themselves exposed to the caustic mockery of their former friends. At the burial of Blesilla, whose early death some ascribed to excessive asceticism, there were scenes of protest, in which it was demanded that "the monastic rabble" should be expelled from the city or thrown into the Tiber.[92] When the prominent married couple from Aquitania, Paulinus and Theresia, chose the ascetic life, Ambrose predicted that this step would produce a wave of indignation.[93] Augustine likewise had to defend monasticism in Africa; its individual representatives themselves evoked much blame by their defiant appearance, which was later manifested at Carthage also.[94] Finally, in both East and West the opposition of some parents, never entirely quieted throughout the later centuries, was also vigorous: they took precautions to prevent their children from exchanging a hidden life in the bosom of their family for self-burial in the monastery.[95]

The antimonastic atmosphere of some circles expressed itself finally in a discussion, conducted at times with vast bitterness, simply about the justification of the ascetical ideal. Of course, an at times imprudent and all too enthusiastic exaltation of the ideal of virginity could be felt to be a devaluation of Christian marriage. In Rome the layman Helvidius in 382 published a work which attacked Mary, the model of all virginity, and denied her perpetual virginity by appeal to Matthew 1:8 and 1:25 and Luke 2:7 and 8:20. The refutation by Jerome, who was then living at Rome, became of enduring significance for the history of dogma because of its Mariology.[96] A few years later occurred Jovinian's attack against some fundamental theses of Christian asceticism: in his glance at the high estimation of celibacy he maintained the equality of the states of virgins, widows, and the married, since only the reception of baptism determined the rank of the Christian. To the high esteem for fasting he replied with the thesis that it is just as meritorious to eat with thanksgiving to God. Jerome's excessive reaction was followed by the condemnation of Jovinian by a Roman Synod c. 390, with which Ambrose of Milan agreed.[97] He himself was moved to a written defense of monasticism when two members of the monastery of men at Milan departed and made propaganda for Jovinian's ideas in neighboring Vercelli.[98] Once again Jerome put in an appearance when c. 406 the priest Vigilantius from southern Gaul, censured, in addition to what he regarded as the excessive cult of martyrs and relics, especially the overestimation of the monastic ideal by the Christian people. What, he asked, was to become of an orderly pastoral care, who would win sinners and the children of the world for virtue, if everyone went into the monastery? Retreat into solitude from such duties was, he said, rather a desertion than a fight.[99]

---

[91] See his apologia, Against the Despisers of Monasticism, with the commentary by A. J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne (Paris 1959), 192–210. Also Gregory of Nyssa, De virgin. 23, 4, criticized the rigoristic as well as the lax conduct of some monks.

[92] Jerome, Ep. 38, 5; 45, 4; 39, 6, the expression genus detestabile monachorum.

[93] Ambrose, Ep. 58, 5.

[94] Augustine in his De opere monachorum and De moribus ecclesiae catholicae; c. 411 the Consultationes Zachaei et Apollonii 3, 3, are also critical. For North Africa as the place of origin of this work, P. Courcelle, RHR 146 (1954), 174–193. Cf. also Salvian, De gub. mundi 8, 14, 19.

[95] John Chrysostom, Contra detrect. vit. mon. 1, 2; In Ephes. hom. 3; Ambrose, De virginibus, passim.

[96] Jerome, Adv. Helvidium, PL 23, 183–206; on Helvidius, cf. G. Jouassard, Melanges Saumier (Lyon 1944), 139–156; P. Antin, "Le monachisme selon s. Jérôme," Théologie de la Vie monastique (Paris 1961), 191–201.

This antimonastic reaction, to which was denied a greater success than it intended, had, however, noteworthy positive effects. To the extent that it was aimed at actually existing abuses in the asceticism and conduct of some monks, it contributed to their elimination and helped to prevent other false developments. The ecclesiastical leadership was obliged to guide the at times impetuously enthusiastic movement along orderly paths and finally it provided the possibility of accepting monasticism as such without restrictions.

---

[97] Jerome, Adv. Jovinianum, PL 23, 211–238; Augustine also took a stand against Jovinian in his De bono conjugali and De sancta virginitate. On the Roman Synod see Hefele–Leclercq II, 78ff. On Ambrose and Jovinian cf. F. Homes Dudden, The Life and Times of St. Ambrose II (Oxford 1935), 393–398.

[98] Ambrose, Ep. 63, ad eccl. Vercell.

[99] Jerome, Adv. Vigilantium, PL 23, 339–352; see Ep. 61, ad Vigilantium.

CHAPTER 21

Church and Society

In the process, extending over the entire fourth century, of the evangelization of the population of the Roman Empire, the Church was confronted with social structures, economic relations, forms of cultural life, and the daily habits of the society of late antiquity, which pressed for a confrontation under various aspects. The following account will show briefly on what especially relevant areas of the social life of the age the Church took a position, positive or negative, whether it sought or achieved a change—in short, in what respects the society of late antiquity experienced a transformation because of the existence and influence of Christianity.

Marriage and Family

A judgment on the esteem of the area of marriage and family by the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries must distinguish between the preaching of pastors and the writings of ecclesiastical authors, with their predominantly moralistic and exhortatory tendency, and the canonical regulations which were directed to this complex of questions. It must first be ascertained that the Church had to a great extent accepted the rules of the currently valid secular law of marriage, such as the legal contracting of a marriage and its consequences, the position of the paterfamilias, and the law of inheritance.[1] When ecclesiastical writers indicated contradictions between the Christian order of marriage and profane laws on marriage, they were referring concretely to the different evaluation of individual questions and did not intend to reject the totality of the civil legislation on marriage. Also, the profane customs surrounding weddings were often retained by Christians and on the Church's part were challenged only in those features which were connected with pagan religious notions or in their occasionally coarse boisterousness, which contradicted Christian sensitivity.[2]

However, those regulations of the Roman marriage law which employed a different standard in regard to the evaluation of adultery by the man and the wife did encounter a clear repudiation from the Christian side. People found unjust a law which penalized the adultery of the wife in every case but that of the husband only if it was committed with a married woman. It was further disapproved because it forced the husband to separate by a prescribed procedure from his wife when she was guilty of adultery and deprived him of the possibility of forgiving her and thereby saving the marriage.[3] The Church came into a still sharper opposition to the civil law of marriage with its definite defense of the indissolubility of marriage in principle and, based on this, its repudiation of remarriage of Christians divorced in accord with the current law. It is true that from some expressions of Christian writers and pastors it can be inferred that the Church permitted the remarriage of the man, not of the woman, if he was divorced from his wife on the ground of her infidelity. But a careful analysis of these passages and of their context and the consideration of all views of the writing of the period on the entire complex of questions make clear that the overwhelming majority of contemporary Christian theologians did not approve the remarriage of divorced persons.[4] Some false interpretations of pertinent patristic texts are conditioned by the fact that they assent to the separation of the couple on the basis of the so-called Matthew-clauses (5:32 and 19:9) but do not express themselves on the question of remarriage, which, however, in no sense means approval of it. Occasionally, Christians who were living in an unrecognized second marriage were, after appropriate penance, admitted to the ecclesiastical community and the reception of communion. But this practice is to be understood only as a pastoral, helpful measure in a complicated situation, not as a recognition of the legality of such a marriage. As the ultimate justification of this fundamental attitude of the Church, the really new element in the Christian understanding of marriage is given: it cannot be regarded only as a contract, again terminable for certain reasons, between the marriage partners, but as a union based on a divine ordinance, which obtains its indissolubility from that higher reality which Augustine termed sacramentum and in which he saw the sharing of the couple in the union which binds Christ and his Church.[5] Even under the Christian Emperors the Church was unable in this question to change the civil law substantially. A decree of Constantine I of 331, which at least limited the grounds for divorce, may indeed have been influenced by Christianity, but it did not attack the principle of the dissolubility of marriage by divortium (separation by mutual agreement) or repudium (after the adultery of one party) and of the then possible remarriage any more than did the constitution of his sons of 339, which made the punishment for adultery more severe.[6] In a synodal decree of 407 or 416, which unambiguously maintained the prohibition of a remarriage of divorced persons, no matter which party was guilty, the African bishops required that there should be a demand for an imperial law on this question, but as late as 449 a civil regulation still did not give up the principle of dissolubility by repudium, but only made divorce more difficult "in the interest of the child" and in so doing made husband and wife equal in law.[7] Hence, in this matter, the "Constantinian Turning-Point" meant no decisive change for the Church.

---

[1] R. Orestano, Struttura giuridica del matrimonio romano I (Milan 1951), 410ff.

[2] This is especially stressed by Chrysostom; see P. Rentinck, La cura pastorale in Antiochia nel IV secolo (Rome 1970), 256–259.

[3] G. Delling, "Ehebruch," RAC IV, 676f.

---

[4] This comprehensive analysis is provided by H. Crouzel, L'église primitive face au divorce (Paris 1971); here, pp. 11–18, also the bibliography on the question. Only the Ambrosiaster, Comm. in ep. ad Rom. 7, 3–4.8–11.15. 39–40, expresses himself clearly for the permissibility of remarriage of the legally separated husband.

[5] Augustine, De bono conjug. 7–8, 6–7; De nupt. et concup. 1, 10. 17. 21.

[6] Cod. Theod. 3, 16, 1, on this and the later imperial laws, F. Delpini, Divorzio e separazione dei conjugi nel diritto romano e nella dottrina della Chiesa fino al secolo V (Turin 1956).

The enthusiastic recruiting, already described in chapter 18, of ascetical writers for the ideal of virginity led to a reaction on the part of some Christians, who incorrectly saw it as eclipsing the real worth of Christian marriage. This caused some Church Fathers to define their view of the relationship of marriage and virginity and more deeply to establish the understanding of marriage. Chrysostom and Augustine especially made clear that the higher rank demanded for virginity was by no means to be understood as a devaluing of marriage.[8] Ambrose considered it necessary to deal with the scruples which were asserted in the interest of the State against the strong ecclesiastical propaganda for the ideal of virginity in a look at its possible demographically negative effects.[9] The Church had no objections against regulations of the civil law of marriage which in specific cases forbade the contracting of marriage, as, for example, because of close relationship. But for its own part it decreed new marriage impediments, which followed from its understanding of the conjugal union among Christians and here too it was able to influence civil legislation. Thus, more and more in the fourth century it objected to marriages between Christians and pagans or Jews, although such marriages occasionally brought missionary acquisitions—one thinks of the ladies of the Roman upper class. The numerous canons of the synods of the time, despite the prohibition, did not regard such marriages as invalid but merely inflicted canonical penance on the parents or the married partners.[10] The civil law here went beyond the view of the Church in so far as it legally forbade marriages between Christians and Jews and punished offenses against the law with the death penalty or with the sanctions laid down for adultery.[11]

While Roman law denied any juridical worth to marriage between slaves, the Church regarded them as valid, but also had to have regard for the rights of the slaves' master. Perhaps it must be attributed to ecclesiastical influence that a law of Constantine I forbade the master to break up slave families in a partitioning of his property.[12] If the slaves did not belong to the same master, the Church made the recognition of their marriage dependent on the agreement of both masters. The real problem was that of marriage between slaves and free persons, which the civil law forbade. The Church could and would recognize such marriages of themselves, but demanded the emancipation of the slave before the contracting of his marriage, thereby of course at the same time leaving it to the discretion of the slaveowner.[13]

---

[7] Canon of the African bishops: Mansi III, 799 and 1163; Cod. Just. 5, 17, 8 (of 449).

[8] For Chrysostom, see J. Dumortier, Lettres d'humanité 6 (1947), 102–166; T. Zissis, Kleronomia 1 (1969), 285–310; P. Rentinck, op. cit., 251–280. For Augustine, N. Ladomierszky, S. Augustin, docteur du marriage chrétien (Rome 1942). Jerome, Ep. 49, makes precise his view expressed in Adv. Jovinianum.

[9] Ambrose, De virg. 7, 35–37; Augustine, De s. virgin. 13; Jerome, Ep. 123, 14.

[10] Council of Elvira, can. 15–17; Council of Arles (314), can. 11; Council of Hippo (393), can. 12; Council of Carthage (397), can. 12; Council of Laodicea, can. 10, 31; Council of Chalcedon, can. 14.

[11] Cod. Theod. 16, 8, 6 (339); 3, 7, 2 (388).

The Church furthermore changed the meaning and extent of the rights which the Roman patria potestas gave to the paterfamilias over the contracting of marriage by his children. It wanted this to be understood not so much as a right but rather as concern for the child. Thereby it also gave the mother a voice and finally allowed the child the right, if the occasion arose, to reject the spouse destined for him or her by the father.[14]

Finally, the Church redefined the relations of the married couple to each other and hence gave to married life a much deeper basis than profane law had ever been able to do. This relationship was to be measured in principle against the model of the union which existed between Christ and his Church. Accordingly, its foundation was love, caritas coniugalis, which knew a thoroughly hierarchical ordering of marital and family life, but which abolished all legal inequality in a spiritual and religious community of life.[15] This caritas took from the husband in his basically recognized role of leadership the harshness of the Roman dominus and gubernator praepotens in marriage; it made the reverentia mulieris a voluntarily assumed subordination of the wife, which was now based, no longer on the inequality of the sexes but on the position and role of the wife in the family life.[16] Such equality of the partners bound them to equal fidelity and hence regarded failings against this as equally serious; in fact, the adultery of the man was even more serious, since he, as head of the family, was bound to exemplary behavior.[17] When the Christian writers and pastors of this period in their preaching praise as virtues of the wife pudicitia and castitas coniugalis, display the figures of Susanna and Mary as models, and characterize care for husband and children as their foremost duty, this should be valued positively, especially with a glance at some features of contemporary social life, and no antiemancipatory attitude of the Church should be seen, even if the reality more and more lagged behind the proclaimed ideal.

---

[12] Cod. Theod. 2, 25, 1 (325).

[13] On the marriage of Christian slaves see R. Orestano (supra, footnote 1), I, 420ff.

[14] Augustine, Ep. 254 (on the mother's role); Ambrose, De virg. 1, 9, 56; 10, 58; De virginit. 5, 25. But some of the Fathers maintained the unlimited right of the father.

[15] Ambrose, Exaem. 5, 7, 18; Augustine, De bono conj. 7; C. Faust. 19, 26; 23, 8; Sermo 51, 13; Jerome, Ep. 77, 10; Chrysostom, In Gen. hom. 45, 2; In ep. I ad Cor. hom. 19, 1; 26, 8; In ep. ad Eph. hom. 20, 2.

[16] Basil, Hom. in ps. 1, 3; Ambrose, Exaem. 5, 7, 19; on Augustine cf. F. J. Thonnard, "La morale conjugale selon s. Augustin," RevÉAug 15 (1969), 113–131, here 127ff.

[17] Augustine, De conjug. adult. 2, 7.

Likewise the relationship of parents and child experienced under the influence of Christianity a change, the effects of which were clearly perceivable in the society of late antiquity. Even the Church conceded to the paternal authority vis-à-vis the child the chief role, but it diminished its absolute character, since it esteemed it more as a duty than as a right, softened the patria potestas to paterna pietas, and especially sought to give the mother greater influence on the education of the child.[18] There were ever more admonitions to parents to be understanding teachers and models in living for their children.[19] The paternal authority found its limits when it sought to deprive the child of the free decision for the Christian faith or wanted to force the daughter to enter a convent out of material considerations.[20] Parents who neglected their duty to support their children should be punished with ecclesiastical punishments, just as the children's duty of caring for their parents in need bound them too.[21]

Just how much the Church's emphasis on the care of the child was justified is made clear from some rather melancholy features of the society of late antiquity. Augustine knew that parents with one to three children decided against any more because they did not wish to compel their offspring ever to beg.[22] The Council of Elvira excluded for life from the ecclesiastical community "the mother or any other relative" who exposed their children to prostitution out of greed.[23] The practice of the poorer classes of selling their children, and thus usually of depriving them of their freedom, was clearly condemned by the Church but maintained itself tenaciously: imperial laws as late as 391 and 451 still had to forbid it.[24] The exposing of children, quite common in the ancient world, early encountered the strong condemnation of the Church, which saw in it a barbaric effect of the patria potestas.[25] Ecclesiastical writers attacked the causes of this abuse, which must not be attributed chiefly to great economic need but to the utilitarian viewpoint of the head of the family, unwilling to share his means with a large group of children. They bewail even more the harsh lot of the exposed, who, in the event of escaping death, were mostly destined for the life of a slave, a catamite, or a prostitute.[26] A law of Constantine I brought about in 331 the first limitation of the custom, in so far as it deprived the child's father of the right to demand the foundling back later from the foster parents, but the practice itself was still tolerated, and only under Valentinian I was it subjected to certain penalties under the influence of the Church.[27] Basil, Ambrose, and Augustine make clear that it still occurred frequently in their days; Augustine reports that virgines sacrae occasionally gathered up such children and had them baptized.[28] In 412 the Emperor Honorius once again had to emphasize that the exposure of children was deserving of punishment.[29] The decrees of two Gallic synods required that a person should report the receiving of a foundling to his church, which saw to it that, after a period of ten days, he remained forever with the foster parents.[30] Hence there was the individual Christian, who took an interest in such children, and the Church approved and encouraged this attitude of Christian caritas. Many Christian grave inscriptions make known what a good relationship had bound foster parents and alumnus or threptos in life.[31] Under the Emperor Anastasius I (491–518) there were in the East orphanages (orphanotropheia) conducted by the Church; a law of the Emperor Justinian I was the first to speak of church homes which especially received and educated foundlings (brephotropheia); hence they appeared at the latest in the second half of the fifth century.[32] The State as such developed no initiative of its own in this matter: it left these, as in other cases also, to ecclesiastical caritas.

---

[18] H. Karpp, "Eltern," RAC IV, 1206–1219; M. Roberti, "Patria potestas e paterna pietas," Studi Albertoni I (1935), 257–270; R. Laprat, "La rôle de la mater familias d'après s. Augustin," RMA 1 (1945), 129–148.

[19] Basil, Moral. 76, 2; Exaem. hom. 9, 4; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 7, 5; Const. Apost. 4, 11. On Chrysostom, J. Dumortier, Rech Sciences humaines 15 (1947), 222–238.

[20] Basil, Epp. 276; 119, 18; Jerome, Ep., 54, 3.

[21] Conc. Gangr., can. 15 and 16; Ambrose, Ex. ev. Luc. 8, 73; Augustine, In Joh. tr. 30.

[22] Augustine, Sermo 57, 2.

[23] Council of Elvira, can. 12.

[24] Basil, Hom. 6, 4; In ps. 14, 2, 4; Ambrose, De Nab. 5, 24; De Tob. 8; Cod. Theod. 3, 3, 1; Nov. Val. (III), 33. Constantine had permitted the selling of children in cases of necessity: Cod. Just. 4, 43, 2.

Likewise in the matter of the adoption of children, a practice influenced by Christian doctrine established itself. Whereas, according to

---

[25] Justin, Apol. 27; Min. Fel., Oct. 31; Tertullian, Ad nat. 1, 15.

[26] Lactantius, Div. Instit. 6, 20.

[27] Cod. Theod. 5, 9, 1 (331); Cod. Just. 8, 51, 2 (374).

[28] Basil, Ep. 199, 33; Ambrose, Exaem. 8, 6; Augustine, De nupt. et. concup. 1, 15, 17; Ep. 98, 6.

[29] Cod. Theod. 5, 7, 2 (412). Only Justinian I definitively regulated in 529 the legal situation of the foundling, who was to be in principle "free" and might not be made a slave or colonus: Cod. Just. 8, 51, 3.

[30] Council of Vaison, can. 9, 10 (442); Council of Arles II, can. 51.

[31] Examples in H. Leclercq, "Alumni," DACL I, 1295–1301.

[32] Cod. Just. 1, 2, 17.22.

Roman law, the possibility of adoption again was in the father's power, which however was usually conditioned by economic interests, since a substitute was sought for the deceased heir or the nonexistent one, now the wife also obtained the right of adoption, and acceptance as a child was seen primarily as concern for the orphaned child and was recommended by the Church as a work of mercy.[33]

Just as did ancient medicine, so the Church too energetically attacked abortion, which in the late Roman Republic and throughout the imperial period had achieved a special expansion, and issued severe ecclesiastical penalties for it.[34] Augustine saw facing him a theoretical difficulty, because one could not with certainty determine the moment when the fetus was infused with the soul, but his fundamental rejection of the ending of pregnancy at any time was unambiguous. Like Tertullian, he had, in conformity with the medical practice of the day permitted embryotomy by the physician in the event that this was the only possibility of saving the life of the mother.[35] When the Emperors Severus and Antoninus inflicted punishment for abortion on the wife as crimen extraordinarium, they justified their action on the ground that it deprived her husband of his child, but the girl who had an abortion went unpunished. Ecclesiastical writers, on the other hand, saw in it a double murder—the suicide of the aborting wife, whose deed often had fatal consequences for her, and the murder of the unborn child.[36] The Church's synodal legislation was concerned from the early fourth century with the question and steadfastly defended the right to life of the unborn child.[37] That the constant sharpening of the conscience of its members by the Church had a positive effect can scarcely be doubted.

Less numerous and productive are the statements in the sources on the situation of the illegitimate child, which was very unfavorable in Greece and Rome and could apparently be little influenced by the Church. Augustine regarded children born of incest as unqualified to inherit. But Jerome was opposed to the illegitimate child's having to suffer for the sins of his parents.[38]

---

[33] RAC I, 102f.; Const. Apost. 4, 1–2.

[34] F. J. Dölger, "Das Lebensrecht des ungeborenen Kindes und die Fruchtabtreibung in der Bewertung der heidnischen und christlichen Antike," JbAC 4 (1934), 1–61, 280–282; J. H. Waszink, "Abtreibung," RAC I, 56–60.

[35] Augustine, Enchir. 23, 85f., Quaest. de Exodo 80; De nupt. et concup. 1, 15; C Faust 15, 7; De mor. eccl. cath. 2, 18, 65; Sermo 10, 5; 267, 3.

[36] Const. Apost. 7, 3, 2; Basil, Epp. 118, 2.8; 186, 2; 199, 3; 217, 52; Chrysostom, In ep. ad Rom. hom. 24, 4; In Mt. hom. 28, 5; Ambrose, Exaem. 5, 58; Jerome, Epp. 22, 13; 121, 4.5.

[37] Council of Elvira, can. 63, 68; Council of Ancyra, can. 21; Council of Lérida, can. 2 (546).

[38] Augustine, Quaest. sup. levit. 76.

Unfortunately there are no detailed descriptions of day-to-day Christian marital and family life in the sources of the time, and hence its impact on contemporary society is not really comprehensible.[39] Chrysostom quite often draws the ideal picture of Christian family life, which, according to a comparison favored by him, should represent a "Church in miniature." According to it, a religious atmosphere unites parents, children, and servants into a community in the Holy Spirit, which is marked by peace and concord. The father is responsible for instructing wife, children, and slaves in the faith, for reading Scripture with them, and with seeing to the common prayer.[40] Some families sought, it is true, to live up to such an ideal, as especially inscriptions or monuments or, for example, the reports of the three Cappadocians on their families make known, despite a bit of idealization,[41] but no sure statement is possible as to the extent of their influence.

The Social Sphere

The reform of the Empire, begun by the Emperor Diocletian and completed by Constantine I, had long-range consequences for the Empire's social structure. In the absolute monarchy established by them all political power was concentrated in the person of the Emperor, at whose disposal for exercising it was a tightly organized central imperial administration, which in turn required a greatly enlarged bureaucracy in the provinces and an expanded control machinery.[42] The power thus concentrated on the one side created new dependencies on the other. It became directly discernible in the effects of a tax system which had to produce the enormously high revenues demanded by a more than grandiose lifestyle of the court, the salaries of the officialdom, and the support of the army. The pitilessly collected taxes hit the small handicraft industries as well as the peasants and small tenants especially hard, above all since steadily rising prices placed an additional burden on them.[43] In an effort to escape this compulsory situation, many small tenants surrendered themselves as coloni, with property and family, to the protection of the owner of latifundia. However, they only exchanged their former "freedom" at the cost of a still harsher dependence, for a law of Constantine I of 332 bound them and their descendants forever to the soil of their new master, and later laws left them the status of freemen only theoretically. Together with the State domains, a higher percentage of the arable land was concentrated in the hands of a numerically small upper class, which ruthlessly exploited its economic privileges in the fixing of prices and, on the basis of its power, was also in a position to ward off efforts at a stronger control by the provincial bureaucracy.[44] The decuriones also, occupants of an originally honorable function in the administration of the cities, now had not only to bear the responsibility with their own property for the cities' tax yield, but were, together with their heirs, bound by law to this function.[45] The workers in State factories—weaving and spinning, mints, arms, the great bakeries of the capital—in so far as they were not already slaves, and the members of specified professions—retailers, smaller transport enterprises, and so forth—were subjected to still stronger compulsion. Their collegia, in which they were associated according to profession, were transformed into a sort of compulsory guild: any change to another calling, and in most cases even the change of the place of work, was forbidden to the members, and not even entry into the army was allowed. Hence in practice the possibility of social advance and social mobility was ended. Included in the compensation for work, as in the case of slaves, were food and lodging and minimal cash wages. The attempt to escape this situation by flight was penalized by harsh punishments, which especially affected those who granted refuge to an escapee. The fact that persons even dared flight across the frontier explains the bitter expression of Salvian that many would now see Roman humanitas among the barbarians, because they could no longer endure the barbaric inhumanitas in their homeland.[46] The State tried to make up for the growing decline in working class strength by sending those condemned by penal law and vagabonds to its factories. The series of laws quickly following one another shows, first, how very much the State was at this time overburdened by the economic problems, and also their content reveals a profoundly inhumane attitude toward the great mass of the socially unimportant. Thus the unsolved opposition between potentiores and humiliores became a powerful element in the process of the dissolution of the Western Empire. How did the Church react in this situation?

---

[39] J. Gaudemet, "La transformation de la vie familiale au Bas-Empire et l'influence du christianisme," Romanitas 5 (1962), 58–85.

[40] Examples in P. Rentinck, op. cit., 277–280.

[41] DACL II, 1015–1054; V, 1099–1102, 1853–1856; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 18, 8; 43, 12; Basil, Ep. 223, 3; Gregory of Nyssa, Vita Macr., passim; cf. also Salvian, Ep. 4, 11–14.

[42] On the form of government and bureaucracy see A. H. M. Jones, op. cit. I, 321–410.

[43] On the tax system, ibid., 448–469.

---

[44] Law of 332: Cod. Theod. 5, 17, 1. On the colonate, P. Palasse, Orient et Occident, à propos du colonat romain au Bas-Empire (Lyon 1950).

[45] See A. H. M. Jones, II, 737–757, and W. Schubert, ZSavRGrom 86 (1969), 287–333.

[46] Salvian, De gub. dei 5, 21. See N. Charbonnel, "La condition des ouvriers dans les ateliers impériaux aux IV^e et V^e siècles," Aspects de l'Empire Romain (Paris 1964), 61–93; 88–92, list of laws.

MAGNATES AND DEPENDENTS. Neither the absolute monarchy of the Late Roman Empire nor its economic system nor the basic structures of contemporary society were questioned in principle by the Church of the time. True, it saw the harshness and injustices which were a part of the totality of these relationships and felt them as such, but considered them as the consequences of sin, which were to be endured. It neither envisaged nor sanctioned a change in the existing order, for example, by means of violence. This fundamental viewpoint becomes especially clear both in the theoretical evaluation of ancient slavery and in its attitude in practice to those subjected to it. According to Augustine, slavery certainly was opposed to the will of God, who had created man free, but injustice and force brought out inequality among men, just as sin made him as an individual the slave of his passions—which was even more severe. He believed this twofold form of slavery would continue to the end of time, "until wickedness ceases and all dominion and human power are empty and God is all in all."[47] Whenever the Church Fathers spoke of the lot of the slaves, however sharply they criticized their inhumane treatment, they did not demand the ending of slavery by law or by revolution.[48] They saw it partly as a necessary element of the contemporary economic order or as a form of property and hence, as a whole, respected the enactments of civil law applying to slaves. The Church even took slaves into its service and possession when they came to it through legacies and, if necessary, defended its right to own them.

At the same time, however, the Church stood up more decisively and comprehensively for the alleviation of the lot of slaves than any other institution or social group in the world. If master and slave were Christians, it could relax the relationship between them to a great extent by its preaching that no social differences carried any weight before God, since all the baptized are brothers, children of one heavenly Father, to whom emperor and beggar, slave and master pray.[49] Hence in the liturgy there was no sequestering of slaves from the free, the marriage of slaves was regarded as valid, and a slave was admitted to offices in the Church if his master consented or even gave him freedom. Christian preaching ever more demanded that the treatment of the slave in a Christian home should correspond to this evaluation. Included here were not only clothing and food and the avoidance of every cruelty, even in the punishing of a guilty slave, but positive kindness and gentleness, and especially care for his religious welfare, instruction in the faith by the master of the house, and participation in the common prayer of the familia.[50] It was due to the influence of the Church that from the fourth century the emancipation of slaves grew to a considerable extent. Since it regarded the possession of slaves as legitimate, it could only recommend their emancipation, but it did so energetically and purchased the freedom of slaves with its own means. However, freedom did not always seem to the slave a desirable goal since it did not automatically bring social security. Hence Chrysostom advised that, before emancipation, slaves be permitted to learn a craft which would assure them their livelihood.[51] It is in this context that one must see the fact that some of their slaves expressed themselves against emancipation when Melania the Younger and her husband Pinian, after their turning to asceticism, freed several thousand slaves on their properties, and wanted to remain in the service of one of their relatives.[52] Doubtless it must be attributed to this constant intervention of the Church for the voluntary emancipation of slaves that in 331 the Emperor Constantine I gave the Church the right of carrying out the emancipation by a special act within the church building with all the legal consequences which were united to the civil law procedure. In this manumissio in ecclesia the master presented his slave to the bishop; in the presence of the congregation the libellus, the charter of emancipation, was read aloud, the bishop was asked to ratify it, and then the tabulae were broken which contained the documents of the earlier act of purchase or the unfree status of the one to be freed.[53] This officially recognized form of ecclesiastical emancipation established itself, it seems, over a rather long period of time in the Universal Church,[54] and was finally adopted into the laws of the Burgundians and Visigoths which applied to the former Roman population.

---

[47] Augustine, De civ. dei 19, 15; Gregory of Nyssa, In Eccl. hom. 4; Chrysostom, In Gen. hom. 4; De Lazaro hom. 6, 7–8.

[48] Council of Gangra, can. 3; Augustine, Enarr. in ps. 124, 7–8. Also Salvian, De gub. dei 43, 6, who sees the cause in the crimes of slaves rather than in the bad treatment of them by their masters and does not summon to revolt.

[49] With constant appeal to the Epistle to Philemon; cf. Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. 15, 23; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 7, 23; 40, 18; Chrysostom, In ep. ad Philem. (entire); In ep. I ad Cor. hom. 19, 4; In ep. ad Eph. hom. 22 (entire); In ep. ad Hebr. hom. 25, 3; Lactantius, Div. Inst. 5, 14; Augustine, Ep. 23, 1; Enarr. in ps. 32, 2, 29; Sermo 58, 2; 59, 2; 211. On the concept of "brotherhood" in the High Patristic Age, see J. Ratzinger, "Fraternité," DSAM 5, 1151–1155, with the literature, 1166f.

---

[50] Const. Apost. 4, 6, 4; Chrysostom, In ep. ad Eph. hom. 22; Conc. Illib., can. 5; Ambrose, Ep. 2, 31; Augustine, De civ. dei 14, 14–15; Expos. ep. ad Gal. 64; Maximus of Turin, Sermo 36, 3; Peter Chrysologus, Sermo 26.

[51] Const. Apost. 4, 9; Chrysostom, In ep. I ad Cor. hom. 40, 5; Augustine, Sermo 31, 6; 356, 3.7.

[52] Gerontius, Vita s. Melan. 10, and Palladius, Hist. Laus. 61, 52; Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 21, 251–263.

[53] Law of Constantine: Cod. Theod. 4, 7, 1 (to Bishop Hosius of Córdoba); description of a manumissio in ecclesia in Augustine, Sermo 21, 6; formula of a libellus of emancipation in Ennodius, Opusc. 8. On the whole matter, F. Fabbrini, La manumissio in Ecclesia (Milan 1965).

A further possibility of assisting slaves was offered to the Church when the ancient right of asylum[55] was extended to Christian churches, and thus slaves who fled to a church were under its special protection. But since the former master usually asserted his right of ownership, conflicts in such cases were not rare, and State laws sought to limit the right of asylum for slaves more precisely. A law of 398 seems generally to have ordered the restoration of slaves who had fled to the protection of the Church to their earlier position with Church cooperation. Later, in 432, the extradition after one day of an unarmed slave who had fled to a church was ordered, presupposing his master accorded him freedom from punishment "in honour of the place where he sought help."[56] The right to sell the refugee slave to another master did not, of course, belong to the Church. The Synod of Orange in 441 decreed ecclesiastical penalties on one who, as a substitute for his own escaped slaves, forcibly took possession of other slaves of the Church.[57]

The flight of the slave to a monastery was also the subject of a protracted quarrel between State and Church,[58] since the former could not, for economic reasons, tolerate a mass flight of slaves to monasteries, but monasticism neither would nor could reject slaves when their motives for entry into the monastery proved to be unobjectionable. However, the Church had severely censured the sect of the Eustathians, who stirred up slaves against their masters, and Basil was willing to grant to a slave admission to the monastery only when his master compelled him to sin. Jerome and Cyril of Alexandria also stressed that the obedience of the slave to his master had its limits.[59] The Emperors Arcadius and Honorius promised slaves freedom and the protection of the Church if they would abandon their Donatist masters, because they were said to be compelled there to rebaptism.[60] Finally State and Church agreed at the Council of Chalcedon that slaves could become monks only with the express consent of their master, which had to be presented in writing.[61]

---

[54] In Africa persons hesitated at first: Cod. eccl. afr., cans. 64 and 82; in Gaul the Synod of Orange of 441, can. 7, and the so-called Second Synod of Arles, cans. 33 and 34, demanded its recognition.

[55] L. Wenger, "Asylrecht," RAC I, 836–844.

[56] Cod. Theod. 9, 45, 3 (398); 9, 45, 5 (432).

[57] Council of Orange, can. 5 (6).

[58] Cf. H. Bellen, op. cit., 78–92.

[59] Council of Gangra, can. 3; Basil, Reg. fus. tract.l 11; Jerome, In ep. ad Gal. 3, 6; In ep. ad Tit. 2, 3; Cyril of Alexandria, De ador. in spir. et verit. 8.

[60] Cod. Theod. 16, 6, 4.

Far less successful were the exertions of the Church to control the abuse of power of which the potentes, the high officials and the owners of great wealth, often the same group of persons, made themselves guilty in the late Empire. Augustine frankly said that many proprietors in North Africa had acquired their wealth through fraud and robbery. The proverb "You are what you have" was, he said, the slogan of these robbers, the oppressors of the peasants and small tenants, of those who forcibly took possession of others' goods and disavowed the goods entrusted to them. Many Christian senators in Africa did not concern themselves with the lot of their coloni. And Augustine had to admit: hardly anyone dared say it to their face because that was too dangerous.[62] Salvian extended even to the bishops the charge that persons would keep silent about the violent deeds and exploitation by the ruling class or spoke of them only half-heartedly; the bishops, of course, did not so act out of cowardice but in order not to stir up the guilty to worse still, and so the poor, widows, and orphans had to keep on suffering. If the Gallic priest must be regarded as engaging in some degree of rhetorical exaggeration, his diagnosis that the Roman Empire was breathing its last (extremum agens spiritum) because of such wickedness of the potentes, was correct.[63] The few synodal decrees of the Church hardly altered anything in the total situation. The Council of Toledo of 400 wanted to cite before the episcopal court a magnate who pillaged a poor person or cleric and, in the event of his refusal, excommunicate him; the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua instructed the bishops to accept no gifts from those who oppress the poor.[64] The scattered individual measures of the Emperors proved to be ineffective.

Rich and Poor. Only a variation of the phenomenon of power and dependence in the society of late antiquity was the relationship of wealth and poverty, which the Church challenged to a decision in its crisis of these decades. Three features stood in the foreground in this matter: overwhelmingly unequal distribution of property and wealth, which made only the potentes also the divites, who wanted to see the disposal of their property unrestricted by any obligation toward the pauperes; the usually luxurious lifestyle of the proprietors, who placed no limits on themselves in the enjoyment of their wealth; the extensive lack of a purposeful concern of the State for a legal basis which would have ameliorated the situation of the economically and socially weak.

---

[61] Cod. Chal., can. 4; Nov. Val. (III), 35, 3 (452).

[62] Augustine, Ep. 58, 3; Enarr. in ps. 72, 12; in ps. 51, 14: "proverbium avarorum rapacium, innocentes opprimentium, res alienas invadentium, commendata negantium; 'Quantum habebis, tantus eris.' "

[63] Salvian, De gub. dei 5, 5; 4, 6.

[64] Council of Toledo I, can. 11; Stat. eccl. ant., can. 94 (69).

Although the Fathers, with certain nuances in individual points, defended the opinion that the current distribution of property and wealth was not without sin, that is, that it came about through injustice, force and fraud, they accepted it as it was. They neither thought of a legal redistribution of property nor did they say a word about a change of this condition by force. Basically, they recognized private property and did not regard wealth in itself as sinful, even if their sharp words in the censuring of its abuse by its possessors could at times arouse the impression that they had championed the thesis that private property is theft.[65] Quite the contrary: they stressed very definitely the social obligation of private property—and this is the really new element in the stand of Christianity on the social question of the day. Since God determined the goods of this world for the welfare of all, the present possessors are, in the last resort, only their stewards; private property is legitimate only when it is administered in the sense of its social bond.[66] This means on the one hand to renounce every unchecked dependence on wealth and every injustice in acquisition and gain, every egoistic enjoyment, and on the other hand to use it for the alleviation of social hardships, to give to the poor what belongs to them. In the concrete question of what part of his property and income the individual must use for this, the views of the Fathers were not unanimous. Some, such as Basil and Jerome, certainly showed their sympathy for radical renunciation, as the gospel recommends, but they knew that was only a counsel. There was agreement that "the superfluity" was intended to assure the necessities of life for the poor. Some recommended using one-half or one-third of the revenues for that; others suggested that among the heirs one more—Christ—should be counted and then to give to all the same share in the property: the pars Christi would then belong to the poor.[67] Collectively, the expressions of the pastors and writers on the social bond of private property are so serious that one could not measure up to them by an occasional alms but only by a clear renunciation.

To the urgency of these demands corresponded the relentless condemnation of the behavior of some rich persons and of the methods and practices which had become common in economic and commercial life. The characterization of the well-off proprietors of Cappadocia by Basil is just as impressive as the pictures which Chrysostom sketched of the rich merchants or shipowners at Antioch.[68] Ambrose described the wealthy spendthrift, who distributed enormous sums for the presentations of circus games, theatrical performances, or his hunting enjoyment, as well as the unscrupulous greedy one, who in times of famine speculated with the hunger of the poor.[69] On the same level lay the blame for the inhuman believer who compelled his debtor to sell his children or even prevented his being buried until the debt was paid.[70] The Church Fathers led a bitter struggle against every form of overcharging in business, against usury, as they regarded the request for interest on a loan. Synods issued a series of decrees which forbade lay persons and clerics to charge interest. Their repetition lets us infer a continuing nonobservance, especially since the civil law in this matter in no way supported the Church's view.[71] Apparently the Church also turned directly to the State in the interest of the poor. A Synod of Carthage in 401 once asked of the Emperor the appointment of defensores to protect the poor from the encroachments of the rich.[72]

---

[65] The thesis of the Eustathians that wealth excludes from salvation was rejected by the Synod of Gangra in its circular. On the differing views of individual Fathers see St. Giet, RSR 35 (1948), 54–91; on Augustine's notion of private property, D. J. Macqueen, RechAug 8 (1972), 187–229.

[66] See especially P. Christophs, L'usage chrétien du droit de propriété (Paris 1964).

[67] On the portion of the property set aside for the poor as the basis of the so-called soul's portion in the later law of inheritance, see E. F. Bruck, Kirchenväter und soziales Erbrecht (Berlin–Heidelberg 1956).

The Church did not rest satisfied with appeals to the conscience of the faithful, but in the growing misery initiated a social welfare work which made its preaching credible. This work was supported by the individual community, and the local bishop was ultimately responsible for it; the direct administration was entrusted to a deacon, who had deaconesses and widows at his disposal for specific services. Especially in the communities of the larger cities the local caritas had to deal with an abundance of demands and duties. Chrysostom gave a vivid account of the conditions in Antioch. Of the already Christian majority of the population of the city, he says, 10 percent could be reckoned among the really wealthy, and equally great was the number of the poor "who possess nothing at all," while the remaining 80 percent formed the economic middle class. On the list of poor of the community were some 3,000 names of widows and virgins, who received daily support. To them must be added "the captives, the sick and convalescing in the xenodocheia, the strangers, the cripples, the clergy, and still others, who appear by chance every day." The revenues of the Church of Antioch, however, were not greater than those of one rich man and of one man of the middle class combined, and ten times more was needed to be able really to deal with the poverty. Hence it was even more urgent to depend on the gifts of the faithful, whose right hands were, unfortunately, not too generous.[73] The once so flourishing agape had long not been equal to the needs, since it was exercised only privately, whenever a well-off person invited a crowd of the needy to a meal.[74] It was true that now the congregations in a growing number were coming by means of legacies into the possession of landed property, but the revenues, from which the bishop had to support also his clergy and the churches, did not suffice at this time for all purposes. Augustine agitatedly told how the poor accosted him on his way to the church and asked from him a word in their behalf with the faithful, but he had to admit: "We give what we have, we give so far as we can, but we are not in a position to help according to need."[75] The same was even true for the Rome of Pope Leo I, since every year in Lent he urgently announced a collection for the poor, for which people should plan their gifts.[76]

---

[68] Basil, Or. 6, 2, ad divites; Chrysostom, In Kal.; In Mt. hom. 28, 5. Cf. also Gregory Nazianzen, De pauperum amore; Gregory of Nyssa, De pauperibus amandis I–II.

[69] Ambrose, De Nab., passim; De off. 3, 2, 13; 3, 6, 41; 3, 9, 41; see F. Homes Dudden, The Life and Times of St. Ambrose II (Oxford 1935), 461–468, and J. Huhn, Ambrosius von Mailand als sozialer Bischof (Fulda 1946). For Augustine, Sermones 13, 16, 41, 123, and Enarr. in ps. 38, are important; see H. Rondet, "Richesse et pauvreté dans la prédication de s. Augustin," RAM 30 (1954), 193–231. Also, Zeno of Verona, Tract. 1, 3, 5–6; Maximus of Turin, Sermo 17, 2; 18; Gaudentius Brix., Sermo 13.

[70] Ambrose, De Nab. 5, 21; De Tobia 8, 30; 10, 36.

[71] See St. Giet, "La condemnation du prêt à interêt au IVe siècle," Science religieuse (Paris 1944), 95–128.

[72] Cod eccl. afr., can. 75.

As the preeminent accomplishment of the caritas of this period may be reckoned the establishing of houses which saw to the care of the sick and the aiding of the poor, the orphans, and the peregrini, both because of their direct service to the needy of every sort and because of their signal importance for the caritas of the following centuries. The entirely unique justification of Christian social care, which was found ultimately in Christ, suffering need and a stranger, was basically different from the few non-Christian enterprises of a similar sort in antiquity, which were based, not on religious, but on generally humanitarian considerations.

The first charitable institutions were probably inns for "foreigners" passing through; it had long been regarded as an officium hospitalitatis of each bishop to take care of them. They originated as real pilgrimage hostels on the occasion of the flourishing of this movement at the mostly more important pilgrimage centers, such as Jerusalem, the city of Menas, and Nola in Campania.[77] The first known xenodocheion, which existed as early as 356 at Sebaste, accepted also the sick and lepers.[78] This must have been generally the case in the smaller communities, which had only one house of this kind. The high estimation of hospitality by monasticism caused a xenodocheion to appear in every larger cenobitic monastery, and the receptiveness of Egyptian and Syrian monasticism for the needs of the poor and sick was early an object of praise. During a famine at Edessa Ephrem the Syrian shook the rich out of their apathy and with their contributions erected a hospital for the needy with 300 beds; those from the rural neighborhood who were in misery were received there.[79] The drawing of monasticism into the Church's charitable work by Basil[80] was to have an especially positive impact, since it not only provided new helping forces, but also brought about an enduring connection of monasticism with the Church's daily work. The most important undertaking in organizational planning and execution is connected with the name of Basil the Great, who had an institution built on the city borders of Caesarea, which included, besides a monastery and residences for the clergy, a hospice for pilgrims and a hospital for the poor, to which were attached all necessary services, physicians, nurses, workshops, and means of transportation. Its size even led to a gradual shifting of the center of the city around this new foundation, which in the fifth century was named for its founder Basilias.[81] In Antioch also the community possessed a rather large hospital and a special hostel for strangers.[82] When the first founding of such houses at Constantinople must be placed is uncertain, but in 472 the Emperor Leo I confirmed privileges which had been granted to early hostels for strangers and poor houses.[83] In the Latin West the first works of caritas arose around the turn of the fifth century; the employing of the Greek names for them indicates the eastern model. At Rome the wealthy Fabiola had the first hospital (nosocomium) constructed, and a xenodochium was built at the expense of Pammachius at Porto near Ostia.[84] The hospice at Nola which Bishop Paulinus described was a home for both pilgrims and the aged. Augustine likewise called the institution erected by him at Hippo a xenodochium, but remarked that the thing itself was known in Africa before the Greek loan-word.[85]

---

[73] Chrysostom, In Mt. hom. 66, 3.

[74] Chrysostom, In I Thess. hom. 11, 5; Jerome, Ep. 22, 32; Augustine, Sermo 178, 4; 259, 5.

[75] Augustine, Sermo 61, 13. The Church's real property increased considerably only toward the end of the fourth century, when also more of the rich belonged to the Church; see P. M. Conti, "La proprietà fondiaria della chiesa dal secolo V all'VIII," Misc. hist. eccl. IV (Louvain 1972), 43–51. Basil and Ambrose in their lifetime distributed their property among the poor, and Gregory Nazianzen bequeathed his by testament. The text of the testament in Pitra, Juris eccl. Grace. hist. et monum. 2 (Rome 1962), 153–160; see F. Martroye, Mém. Soc. nat. antiquaires de France 76 (1923), 219–263.

[76] See his Sermones "De collectis" (6): SChr 49, no. 20–25.

---

[77] B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa, 375–386; on the unique basis for Christian hospitality, P. Miquel, DSAM 7, 815–819.

[78] Epiphanius, Adv. haer. 3, 55.

[79] Sozomen, HE 3, 16, 12–15 (Ephrem); cf. A. Vööbus, Einiges über die karitative Tätigkeit des syrischen Mönchtums (The Baltic University 1947).

[80] Basil, Reg. brev. tr. 155.

[81] Basil, Epp. 94; 176; 143 (hospice for the poor at Amaseia c. 373); Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 43; Sozomen, HE 6, 33, 4 (Basilias). On the entire matter, St. Giet, Les idées et l'action sociale de s. Basile, 417–423.

[82] Chrysostom, Ad Stagir. cons. 3, 13; In Mt. hom. 66, 3; In Act. hom. 45, 4.

[83] Cod. Just. I, 3, 32, and 34.

The Church also included in its charitable care captives and prisoners. Visits by the bishops to prisons were already an established custom when in 409 the Emperor Honorius granted them control of the administration of penal institutes and of the treatment of captives. Some State decrees of the fourth century, which reorganized the carrying out of punishments and tried to make it more humane, may go back to Christian influence.[86] For the support and ransom of captives, who were often carried off in raids by barbarians, the Church at times spent considerable sums.[87]

At this time the State furnished the Church some support in its charitable work and granted privileges to individual establishments, and in the Early Byzantine period, of course, State supervision was assured. The fact remains that nothing of equal rank by the State could be set beside the comprehensive social concern of the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries, either in regard to its efficiency or its ethical and religious justification.

The Cultural Sphere

At the beginning of the fourth century Christianity represented only a minority in the society of late antiquity, the cultural life of which was still stamped by paganism in all areas. With the growing number of those Christians who, on the basis of their social provenance and position, had been formed by this culture, the Church was presented in an acute form with the question of what could be accepted or adapted from it from the Christian viewpoint and what was to be rejected. The answers which Christian writers gave to this question were very different, partly determined by their personal experience, partly depending on the significance which the individual attributed, negatively or positively, to a particular feature of this culture. The evaluations varied often in the course of time, as the trend toward dissolution became clearer in the cultural life of late antiquity and a Christianity that had become more self-conscious regarded as less serious the dangers threatening it from there.

---

[84] Jerome, Epp. 77, 6.10; 66, 11.

[85] Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 20, 114–117; Augustine, Sermo 355, 2; In Joh. tr. 97, 4. CIL 8, 5341, records the erecting of a hospice for strangers by an official at Calama.

[86] Cod. Theod. 9, 3, 1–6 and 7 (409); J. M. López Riocerezo, "La humanización en la penalogía de la Ciudad de Dios," Ciudad de Dios 167 (1956), 311–334. At Easter, for example, prisoners were granted amnesty: Cod. Just. 1, 4, 3; Leo I, Sermo de quadr. 2 and 7, 4.

[87] Ambrose, Ep. 18, 16; De Off. 2, 15, 70f.

The content of profane literature of antiquity was for the most part repudiated; the mythology that dominated it was rejected as immoral, and occasionally ridiculed, and the style of some authors was denounced as frivolous.[88] But not quite every educational value was denied it. Thus Basil wanted to retain the study of Greek literature in the education of youth, presupposing that a proper selection was made of it and there was a clarification of its moral quality.[89] Gregory Nazianzen expressed himself even more positively: he thought that since, according to the Apostle Paul (2 Cor. 10:5), one should take all thought into the service of what is Christ's, the knowledge of profane literature could also lead to the strengthening of the faith. Ambrose saw that the works of pagan authors should be considered so that their errors could be refuted, but he attributed a proper value to some of their philosophers also. Jerome, on the contrary, usually expressed himself negatively, but he had to endure the charge by Rufinus that his facile repudiation of profane literature was opposed to his practice, since he constantly quoted its authors and in the monastery at Bethlehem read "his Virgil" and other pagan poets and historians with the young.[90] Augustine himself indicated the development which his view in this question had gone through.[91] His baptism was not, despite all the existential seriousness of his conversion, an absolute repudiation of everything that ancient culture had formerly meant to him, but the beginning of a critical process which only ended in his years as a bishop. Certainly, already at Cassiciacum, he gave up the vanitas litteraria of rhetoric and rejected the curiositas, the eagerness to know the new for its own sake, to which he had once succumbed. But ancient authors such as Cicero and Virgil still meant much to him; for his literary creations he retained the dialogue form and the stylistic laws of rhetoric, and his program of religious and philosophical studies was oriented to the old artes liberales.[92] Augustine the pastor only completed the real break with ancient culture when in his day-to-day activity for souls he believed he experienced not only their insignificance for his work but even more he noticed their impeding effect on the final serious acceptance of the gospel by the faithful. Now his judgment on the formalism of rhetoric and the striving for oratorical elegance became coolly repudiating and his blaming of the immorality of this literature, whose effects he ever more encountered, became unrelenting. He avoided the coarsely massive invective which others used, because he had recognized that, like the culture that supported it, it was also destined for collapse. Corresponding to this was his almost sober outline of a properly defined course of education, which was conceived, it is true, primarily for the education of the clergy, but which he hardly would have presented differently for the Christian laity. According to the De doctrina christiana, the study of the Bible, based on the faith, is the unum necessarium for the spiritual work of the cleric; from the program of a profane education great importance belongs to the sciences, such as geography, history, natural science, and so forth, since they promote a better understanding of Scripture. A small circle, which possesses the compulsion and inclination for a vita contemplativa in the Christian understanding may pursue philosophical studies further. The final reason for Augustine's radical repudiation of profane culture is the knowledge, gained through personal experience, of the exclusive worth of the summum bonum, which more and more filled him with that deep skepticism in regard to everything that must be ascribed "to this world."[93]

---

[88] Chrysostom, In Tit. hom. 5; Lactantius, Div. inst. 1, 9–21; Augustine, De civ. dei 5.

[89] Basil, Πρὸς τοῦς νέους, ed. F. Boulenger (Paris, 2nd ed. 1952).

[90] Ambrose, Exp. ev. Luc. 1, 2; Rufinus, Apol. c. Hieron. 2, 11. Jerome's knowledge of Greek literature was of course limited: P. Courcelle, op. cit., 47–78.

[91] Augustine, Retract. 1, 3.

[92] F. G. Maier, Augustin und das antike Rom (Stuttgart 1955), 21–25.

Augustine's theses certainly had their effects in the circles and relationships which he could directly influence. With all his distrust of the profane educational system of the day, still he, like the rest of the Fathers, did not require a properly Christian school in which his program could have been realized.[94] The children of Christians continued to go to the secular schools, the youth continued to attend the higher academies, at which for a long time yet the pagan teachers were in the majority, and they were still on familiar terms with pagan education. The Church hoped that the religious instruction in the family, as Basil and Chrysostom recommended it, would make it immune to the danger here threatening and that the gradually increasing number of Christian teachers in the schools would help to neutralize pagan influence in the framework of the instruction. Also lacking were all indications that the Church would have sought to gain at the State's expense influence on the form of the instructional program of the secular schools. Even in ecclesiastical legislation its attitude of aloofness vis-à-vis profane education found only slight expression.[95]

---

[93] Fundamental is the analysis of De doctrina christiana by H. I. Marrou, S.Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (Paris, 2nd ed. 1949), 331ff.; cf. also E. Kevane, "Augustine's De doctrina christiana," RechAug 4 (1966), 97–133.

[94] H. I. Marrou, Geschichte der Erziehung im klassischen Altertum (Freiburg–Munich 1957), 465ff.

Thus it is not surprising that all important authors of the Church of this period made the formal influence of their profane education evident. Gregory Nazianzen could never hide his pride in his rhetorical training, Gregory of Nyssa was to a great degree dependent on it, Ambrose handled the literary genre of the consolatio in his funeral sermons just like a profane author, and the confrontation with his pagan opponent Symmachus over the Altar of Victory showed him to be quite equal to the latter in dialectics. Poets such as Gregory Nazianzen, Prudentius, and Paulinus of Nola bear comparison with the contemporary poetry, just as do Eusebius, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Optatus of Mileve, or even Orosius with the profane historians. Christian epistolary literature had representatives in Basil, Jerome, and Augustine, who clearly left a Libanius and a Symmachus behind them.[96] Certainly the superiority of the Christian literature of the Golden Age of the Fathers was based primarily on its content of ideas, on the freshness and power of conviction of its testimony, which knew that the future belonged to it, that in it was a new hope of awakening faith in a new-found meaning of human existence. Besides, the Latin authors could make use of a vocabulary which was at their disposal in Old Christian Latin and which gave a new life to the language of the West, threatened by a dangerous sclerosis.[97] In the Greek-speaking Church, it is true, it had not reached the point of forming a special Greek language, because the great writers here could make use of the standard classical tongue, which, if used flexibly, was understandable even by the audience of a Chrysostom and especially embraced the reading circle, the gaining of which was of ever greater importance to the Church.[98] The total impact of this Christian literature on the society of the time would not have been possible without this recourse to the formal elements of the classical tradition.

In regard to a further sector of the cultural life of late antiquity the Church's attitude remained consistently implacable—that of the theater, the circus games, and the system of entertainment. The performance of the ancient tragedies had, from the Hellenistic Age, been supplanted by mime and pantomime, the stage with cabaret and ballet now served for the relaxation of the people, the fights of gladiators and hunting of animals in the amphitheatres, chariot-racing in the circus of the big cities, on the numerous festivals of the year attracted thousands of often fanatically enthusiastic spectators.[99] Chrysostom and Augustine complained strongly that on days of such entertainments the churches remained almost empty.[100] The Church's criticism was directed against the waste of vast sums, which the arranging of the games required, but even more against the immorality which was propagated by the stage. To some degree the fight against gladiatorial combats was successful, since, because of their brutality and brutalizing effect, they were also objected to by pagans. As early as 325 Constantine I had had them forbidden in the eastern part of the Empire, but in the West, according to Augustine's testimony, they still enjoyed the greatest popularity until the Emperor Honorius definitively had them stopped here too at the beginning of the fifth century.[101] At first the State did not attack the other forms, stage and circus, especially since a great part of the games was built into the official calendar of festivals.[102] The ecclesiastical mission and preaching were, however, firmly convinced that here lay a substantial hindrance for the spreading and appreciation of Christian moral doctrine. In its opposition it went even to the extent of outlawing all professions which were in the service of the theater and of the contemporary entertainment industry. Not only prostitutes and pimps, but also actors of every sort, the organizers of the performances, gladiators and hunters in the pursuit of animals fell under the verdict. Augustine could appeal to ancient Roman tradition, which did not reckon the profession of actor among those socially recognized.[103] Hence the performer had to give up his profession if he wanted to be admitted to baptism, and Communion was denied to Christians among them.[104] The Emperors Gratian and Theodosius I supported the Church in so far as they wanted to remove Christian women from these professions, sought to stop the training of zither-players, and forbade their appearance at theatrical presentations or private celebrations.[105]

---

[95] Stat. eccl. ant., can. 5 (16) forbids only the bishop to read the pagan authors.

[96] Jerome wrote De viris illustribus because he could then (393) demonstrate that Christian literature no longer lagged behind the pagan: Prolog., see P. Nautin, RevÉAug 16 (1970), 39.

[97] Chr. Mohrmann, "Quelques observations sur l'originalité de la littérature chrétienne latine," Le latin des chrêtiens I (Rome 1958), 139–150.

[98] See, besides Mohrmann, C. Fabricius, "Der sprachliche Klassizismus der griechischen Kirchenväter," JbAC 10 (1967), 187–199.

---

[99] M. Bieber, The History of Greek and Roman Theatre (Princeton, 2nd ed. 1961); G. Ville, Les jeux des gladiateurs dans l'empire chrétien (Paris 1900).

[100] C. Baur, John Chrysostom and His Time I (London 1959), 235–255; F. van der Meer, Augustinus der Seelsorger (Cologne 1951), 73–83.

[101] Augustine, Conf. 6, 7, 11–13; De civ. dei 3, 14; De symb. ad cat. 22. The imperial prohibitions: Cod. Theod. 15, 12, 1; Cod. Just. 11, 41.

[102] The laws on the closing of temples (Cod. Theod. 16, 10, 3.17. 19 of 342, 399, and 407) stress that the popular feasts were not affected by this.

[103] Cf. O. Brabant, "Classes et professions 'maudites' chez s. Augustin d'après les Enarrationes in psalmos," RevÉAug 17 (1971), 69–81, here 71–75.

[104] Council of Elvira, c. 62; Cod. eccl. afr., can. 63 (Carthage 401); Council of Arles. I, can. 4, 5; Council of Arles II, can. 20; Council of Carthage (397), can. 35; Augustine, De civ. dei, 2, 13; In Joh. tr. 100, 2; Enarr. in ps. 102, 13; 147, 3.

Christian preachers of morals had to recognize that in this field a thoroughgoing success would be denied them unless they managed to eliminate the many profane feastdays with which the ludi circenses and ludi scaenici were connected or to neutralize their character, that is, to christianize the profane festive calendar and gradually replace it with a purely Christian one.[106] The enormous difficulties of this project could not be mastered without the direct assistance of the Emperors. But the latter had to take into consideration the great popularity of the ludi of every sort with the masses, whose awareness of the pagan origin of such entertainment of the people was, moreover, very much missing. A series of feasts could be decontaminated by dropping the names of the pagan gods and the sacrifices which had been connected with them, as was done c. 357 by a decree of the Emperor Constantius II. The Church could hardly object to the feastdays on which the Emperor's or his ancestors' accession to the throne was commemorated, and hence in these cases the games continued. The designation of the Christian Sunday as a day of rest, ordered by Constantine I and later repeated, was a first step on the road to a christianized calendar of feasts.[107] Then in 389 the Emperor Theodosius I in a decree published an arrangement of feastdays in which the Christian days of celebration already predominated over a series of neutral feasts, such as the birthdays of Emperors, harvest feasts, and so forth: all Sundays and the two weeks before and after Easter, Epiphany, and Christmas were here recognized by the State as Christian festival times, and the previous pagan feasts were no longer included in it.[108] It was a further concession to the Church that the same Emperor also forbade the circus contests on Sundays, but, of course, only if the "Emperor's birthday" did not fall on a Sunday.[109] And so only a half-success was on the whole gained by the Church here. The circus continued to maintain its fascination, especially in the East, at Constantinople, Antioch, and Thessalonica. Further progress could be expected only from a purely liturgical calendar of feasts.

If one should still ask, at the end of this presentation, what changes were accomplished in the society of late antiquity in the period between

---

[105] Cod. Theod. 15, 7, 4.8.10.12.

[106] An extant festive calendar, the so-called Chronographus of 354, already offers a singular mixture of originally pagan calendar and Christian days of celebration, among which are Easter, the days of burial of the Roman Bishops, and the dies natales of the Roman martyrs. See H. Stern, Le calendrier de 354 (Paris 1953).

[107] Cod. Theod. 2, 8, 1; 2, 8, 18.

[108] Cod. Theod. 2, 8, 19, again ratified by the Emperor Arcadius in 395; ibid. 2, 8, 22.

[109] Cod. Theod. 2, 8, 20.

Nicaea and Chalcedon from the aspect of Church history, the answer can be summarized roughly thus: the fundamental fact is the change in religious confession, by which this society moved from a pagan to a Christian majority. In this Christian majority two groups became socially relevant: the clergy, graded according to rank and sphere of function, and monasticism, which appeared as special states and exercised a powerful impact on society. Then, beside them were changing groups, which developed in the violent confrontations over the correct understanding of the content of the Christian faith, covering this whole period, and at times led to the formation of Christian sects. Out of this struggle over "orthodoxy" grew that serious hardening and establishing of religious intolerance, which marked this society as a whole and which is passed on as a legacy to the future. No group could allow the others the right to their own respective understanding of the faith; for the "orthodox," Arians, Donatists, Macedonians, and Monophysites, those belonging at the time to the other groups became heretics, whom people sought to combat with the aid of the State and also to curtail their civil rights. The victorious group was only more bitterly charged by the defeated with the flaw of erroneous belief, violence, and injustice.[110]

This now Christian society did not aspire to alter anything in the basic organization of the State, and could alter very little in the economic and social structure. In some areas, such as that of the family, of the estimation of marriage and of the child, of the status of the slave, of the understanding of property, and of charitable concern, positive beginnings were created, at times with the modest support of the State. It is difficult to appraise the change in the moral conduct of this society. The moral preaching of the time leaves no doubt that here there was no radical modification. Only a minority, strong though it was, seems to have taken Christian ethics seriously in a genuine commitment. But the sources still indicate a change which did not call attention to itself very spectacularly: this was the gradual, quiet infiltration of Christian images, ideas, and subjects, which came from the world of the Bible and slowly altered daily speech; it was the becoming accustomed, still in progress, to Christian standards of value and ways of behaving, which preaching sought tirelessly to communicate. In some areas, not merely to be understood spatially, the Church was still in a missionary situation: the span of 125 years between Nicaea and Chalcedon was still the time of sowing rather than of the harvest.

---

[110] J. Vogt, "Toleranz und Intoleranz im konstantinischen Zeitalter," Saeculum 19 (1968), 344–361; Colm Liubhéid, "Theodosius II and Heresy," JEH 16 (1965), 13–38.

PART FOUR

The Early Byzantine Church

CHAPTER 22

The Henoticon and the Acacian Schism

The great ecclesiastical assembly at Chalcedon produced no peace, despite the exclamation of the Council Fathers: "We are agreed; there is only one faith!" On 31 October 451, without the assent of the Pope's legates, the Synod had issued that celebrated canon 28, which, following the precedent of the First Council of Constantinople, further consolidated the primacy of the "archsee" of Constantinople and thereby profoundly disturbed Rome—and, naturally, not only Rome. But it was also not to be expected that the dogmatic decisions of the Council would be readily accepted everywhere, and the fate of the Second Council of Ephesus of 449 had demonstrated that even imperial synods need not be unalterable. True, in their dogmatic decision the Fathers of Chalcedon had exerted themselves to praise Cyril of Alexandria, but they had made no effort to harmonize Cyril's famous formula mia physis tou theou logou sesarkomene with their own formula, en duo physesi hen prosopon kai mia hypostasis. Rather, with their definition they consolidated a conceptual development which was in advance of the contemporary state of the theological awareness of many bishops of the East and could only evoke the opposition of those to whom tradition was dearer than precision. It was not to be expected that the historically conscious Egyptians would submit to the renunciation of the Cyrillan theology parenthetically. Besides, the Synod had dared to depose the Patriarch Dioscorus, Cyril's successor, and to rehabilitate Theodoret of Cyrrhus, the bête noire of the Alexandrians.

In spite of a diplomatic letter of the Council Fathers to the Pope, especially in regard to canon 28, Leo the Great argued that the canon encroached upon the rights of Alexandria and Antioch and hence he tried to mobilize the eastern patriarchates.[1] But in this he had no success: the two superior sees intended to enforce their claims without Rome's help and so the Pope had to address himself in his polemic chiefly to the Patriarch of Constantinople, Anatolius (451–58), who had to experience all its severity, whereas the Emperor was treated more considerately.

Because of all these questions of rank, the Pope neglected far too long to come out, officially and energetically, for Chalcedon's theological decisions. It was only on 21 March 453 that, under pressure from the

---

[1] In letters of 22 May 452 to Marcian, Pulcheria, and Anatolius.

Emperor, he could give a decision in their favor.[2] And when, soon after, Anatolius gave his consent to a general letter, which expressed apologies and regrets,[3] Leo had to regard this matter as settled—in any event he no longer returned to it with vigor. Of course, the loss of time could never be made up. If the recognition of the Tome of Leo at the Council had meant a climax of papal influence on the theology of the East, there now quickly followed a cooling of relations, from which the East-West connection would never recover. Above all, the old bond between Alexandria and Rome, which had made possible the conciliar politics at Ephesus, split. True, the Pope's last years did not witness the collapse of his work in the East, but after account had been taken of his authority at a critical moment, people now tried to get along without Rome.

The fate of Chalcedon was in principle decided in Egypt. Out of fear of the deposed Patriarch Dioscorus, the Egyptian bishops had refused to accept the Tome of Leo. Dioscorus was living in exile. Now the Orthodox had to concern themselves with selecting a successor to him who was qualified to pacify the enraged Egyptians, who already saw in their patriarch their recognized "national" leader. Thus a former intimate of Dioscorus, the Archpriest Proterius, was designated as his successor, without its being possible, however, to gain more than four bishops for him. This election resulted in a revolt of the people: the soldiers who were supposed to establish order were driven back and burned in the Sarapeion. Without new troops from Constantinople there was no hope of calm. Dioscorus died in 454, and in 457 he was followed by the Emperor Marcian, who had held Chalcedon very dear. Again there was rioting in Alexandria, and the leader of Dioscorus's adherents, the Priest Timothy the Cat, was ordained by the anti-Chalcedonians as their Patriarch on 16 March 457. The imperial governor immediately had him arrested, but the excitement among the people was so great that the measure had to be annulled. Nevertheless, the movement of revolt could no longer be checked, and a few days later the Orthodox Patriarch Proterius was murdered while he was officiating at Mass. Since the new Emperor Leo I (457–474)[4] at first had to let go the reins in Egypt, Timothy the Cat was able to establish himself. He succeeded in filling the episcopal sees in the country with his followers, and a Synod at Alexandria excommunicated the Pope and the Patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch. The Alexandrian Pope, conscious of his power, provoked schism, and all the complaints made against him in Constantinople could accomplish nothing against it. Only the punishment of the assassins of Proterius could be achieved. On the whole, the activities of Timothy the Cat probably had little to do with dogmatic questions. The censure against Rome, Constantinople, and Antioch was probably intended to avenge Chalcedon's refusal to take Cyril's formulas into consideration, but even more the deposition of Dioscorus, Timothy's predecessor. And the new position which Constantinople was now determined to assume in the Universal Church—a position which Alexandria had hitherto occupied in the East—was certainly also included. If the rest of the East came to terms with Chalcedon only partially, this was probably less a sign of genuine conviction than a certain display of weariness. Anatolius was not a convinced defender of the dogmatic decision of 451, but the Council had to be of interest to him because its canon 28 concerned him—he was its beneficiary. Besides Egypt the chief centers of the opposition were the monastic circles in Palestine, to which the constant maneuverings of their Patriarch Juvenal, whose first concern at all ecclesiastical meetings was the independence of his patriarchate, supplied an occasion for discontent. The monks blamed him for betrayal of Cyril's theology. In the Empress Eudocia,[5] widow of the Emperor Theodosius II, who lived and intrigued in Jerusalem, they found the necessary, even financial, support. It was due to her influence that soon there was no monastery in the vicinity of the Holy City which maintained loyalty to Juvenal. Under the leadership of a monk, Theodosius, they gave the Patriarch on his return the alternatives of repudiating Chalcedon or resigning. Juvenal fled, swarms of monks raged in Jerusalem, bishops were murdered, and vacant sees were everywhere filled with adherents of this Theodosius. Only military units, which engaged in a pitched battle with the monks, were able to relieve Jerusalem and restore quiet. The leaders of the monastic revolt fled, but Eudocia maintained her position.

---

[2] Ep. 114: Pl 54, 1017–1020, and ACO II, 1, 2, 61.

[3] In the corpus of Leo's letters, no. 132: Pl 54, 1082–1084.

[4] On Leo I, cf. W. Ensslin, Pauly-Wissowa, s.v. XII, 2, 1947–61.

The Emperor Leo I was a military man who held himself aloof from religious questions; he had quite enough to do to reach an understanding with his Protector, the powerful Aspar, and gave to Chalcedon only a part of that attention which his predecessor had devoted to it. Timothy the Cat thought he could demand of him the revision of the decrees of Chalcedon by a new council. However, he had no success with this. Nevertheless, the Emperor permitted an investigation to take place, which he hoped would clarify how people stood in regard to recognizing Timothy the Cat as legitimate Patriarch of Alexandria and whether the decrees of Chalcedon should be maintained. The replies from most ecclesiastical provinces of the Eastern Empire were unanimously against the recognition of Timothy, and only one voice rejected the Council.[6] The answer of those provinces whose letters are no longer extant would be interesting. Perhaps they were more negative than positive in regard to the Council. In any event, Leo, probably under pressure from Aspar, long maintained a delaying policy, although the Pope did all he could to induce him to take steps against Timothy. It was only in 460 that the Emperor sent the Alexandrian into exile in Paphlagonia and finally to the Crimea. Timothy Salofaciol became Patriarch, but he did not succeed in restoring ecclesiastical unity in Egypt.

---

[5] H. G. Beck, "Eudokia," RAC, s.v.

When the Emperor Leo I died in 474, the Isaurian Zeno, whom Leo had finally played off against the overmighty Aspar, had himself proclaimed Augustus by the Empress Ariadne and their minor-aged son, Leo II. He probably had even less interest in theology than his predecessor, but already, as Magister Militum per Orientem, he had been under the influence of the personality of a priest, Peter the Fuller (Gnapheus–Fullo),[7] who, relying on the power of the Magister, had forced his election by a synod as Patriarch of Antioch, contrary, of course, to all the canonical rules. The Emperor Leo soon had him arrested and deported to Egypt, but Peter succeeded in fleeing to Constantinople, and, since he promised to keep quiet, he was entrusted to the rigidly orthodox Acemetae monks in the neighborhood of Constantinople. Zeno, even as Emperor half-barbarian, did not know how to make himself popular. As early as 475 he had to give way before a conspiracy, and Basiliscus, a brother of Zeno's mother-in-law, the Empress Verina, tried to seize the throne—with no more luck than Zeno. He believed he could dismiss Verina and thereby isolated himself from both factions. Perhaps he was of the opinion that he could form a strong following if he met the anti-Chalcedonians halfway. Without consulting a synod, he issued an Encyclion,[8] in which he decreed that people should be satisfied with the Nicene Creed and its confirmation by the First Council of Constantinople and that of Ephesus. The Tome of Leo and the Horos of Chalcedon were anathematized, and anyone who did not agree with this anathema should, if he was a cleric, be deposed, and, if he was a monk or lay person, be banished. The Encyclion was in no sense an innovation in matters of faith or even a Monophysite document. The brief explanations of the faith which it offers are orthodox, but only on the status of the period before the Council of Chalcedon: the tactic of backing down in terminology. The decree made it possible for Timothy the Cat to return to Egypt. He took the route via Constantinople, where the new Patriarch Acacius gave him the cold shoulder, and a majority of the monks would have nothing to do with him. On the other hand, he participated at Ephesus in a synod of the province of Asia: this must have been a satisfaction for him, because here Constantinople's detested patriarchal rights over the province were denied. Then he celebrated a triumphal entry into Alexandria, after Timothy Salofaciol had tamely withdrawn to a monastery. For the rest, Timothy the Cat adopted a moderate attitude and did not push his triumph to extremes. Peter the Fuller returned to Antioch and for some time again occupied "his" see. The Patriarch of Jerusalem also signed the Encyclion. The opposition to it was concentrated at Constantinople, where the Patriarch Acacius (471–489) mobilized clergy and people. Success was quick in coming, because the position of Basiliscus became even more difficult. In his need he now had the Encyclion followed by an Antiencyclion,[9] which annulled the former pro forma and ordered that every bishop should keep his place and that the drama of Nestorius and Eutyches must be definitely closed. With this the chaos was complete. In September 476 Zeno was able to march back into Constantinople, and Basiliscus went into exile. Likewise, the Fuller and the refractory Archbishop of Ephesus had to leave their sees, and Timothy the Cat was supposed to be deported a second time, but finally the old man was allowed to die in peace in June 477. His adherents acted quickly and chose as his successor his old friend, Peter Mongus, who, following the proved models, at once disappeared to a hiding place and from there ruled his flock, while Timothy Salofaciol was recalled by the authorities and ruled officially as Patriarch of the Church of the Empire. Whoever else had signed the Encyclion hastened to ask pardon and to accept the Council of Chalcedon. Everything seemed again in order, but anyone who watched more closely could hardly find this rapid pacification reassuring. Other means had to be thought of to give peace to the Church. The Patriarch Acacius of Constantinople took this task upon himself.

---

[6] The replies are collected in the so-called Codex Encyclius; see ACO II, 5, 24–98; T. Schnitzler, Zum Kampf um Chalcedon, Geschichte und Inhalt des Codex Encyclius von 584 (Rome 1938).

[7] U. Riedinger, LThK, 2nd ed., s.v., VIII, 384. E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, 182ff.

[8] Text in Evagrius, HE III, 4, 101–104; variant in Vat. gr. 1431, ed. E. Schwartz, "Codex Vaticanus gr., 1431, eine antichalkedonische Sammlung aus der Zeit Kaiser Zenons," AAM 32, 6 (Munich 1927), 49ff.

Acacius was certainly not a fiery adherent of the formulations of Chalcedon. But he knew that the privileges of his see depended on the recognition of this Synod; he was by no means a "Monophysite"; and also he saw clearly that the inextricable confusion in the Church of the East could not be corrected by formulas, because it had not originated in formulas, but that it was a question of dealing with personalities, and in this there was little promise of success by going too far into the past in examining such persons. It was important to rebuild a front of good will, to let oikonomia rule, and not to make any theologumenon into a shibboleth. It was especially urgent to understand that, despite Rome, the theological development could not be brought to a halt even with Chalcedon, any more than it had stopped with earlier synods. Experience had taught that nothing was gained in a situation where two bishops contradicted each other to choose a third—leading only to a third faction—that one must rather balance the two candidates at the favorable moment and test their good will—and do so hic et nunc. This was the policy of Acacius—a policy, depending on one's point of view, of cunning or of a desperate good will. To be able really to judge Acacius one must know just how in his own ideas and in those of his contemporaries there could be an "ecumenical" synod of obligatory validity, and whether Chalcedon was in accord with these ideas. But we do not know this, and it is to be surmised that the experiences with the two Synods of Ephesus did not ease the problem for people of that day. Also, to not a few decisive procedures at the First Synod of Ephesus the label latrocinium was suitable: Acacius cannot be denied a certain greatness. He had to founder, not because he himself had been wrong in his idea, but because this concept required a flexibility which only a few would grant him, since they suspected a betrayal of the faith where the subject in debate was solely an effort not to cut a Gordian Knot, but patiently and gradually to untie it.

---

[9] E. Schwartz, ed., Codex Vaticanus 52.

In 481–82 there came to Constantinople at the order of the Patriarch of Alexandria, Timothy Salofaciol, the monk John Talaia,[10] with the request that, after the Patriarch's death, a successor be chosen who was an adherent of Chalcedon but also a member of the Egyptian clergy. The Emperor was in agreement, but he made John Talaia take an oath in the presence of the Patriarch and the Senate that, under no circumstances, would he, Talaia, accept the episcopal office. The Emperor was moved to this step because of Talaia's connection with the Isaurian Illus, in whose regard Zeno had reason to entertain suspicions. If Talaia became Patriarch of Alexandria, Illus would find in refractory Egypt, so the Emperor believed, an all too powerful partisan. Salofaciol died in February 482 and Talaia pomptly became guilty of perjury by letting himself be elected as his successor. Rome was notified of the allegedly unanimous election, and the Pope was asked to confirm it.[11] The furious Emperor Zeno had Talaia deposed, and since at the same time Egyptian monks in Constantinople vouched for the person of the Patriarch Peter

---

[10] E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, 195ff.

[11] Coll. Avell. 99, 448.

Mongus, the Patriarch Acacius undertook the first attempt for a solution of the Egyptian question: Peter should be recognized in so far as he gave guarantees which were incorporated into an imperial edict, the manuscript of which clearly points to Acacius as its author. The Edikton Zenonos[12] stressed first of all the inviolability of the decisions of Nicaea, Constantinople, and Ephesus. New was the canonical recognition of the anathemas of Cyril of Alexandria. It was modified by the acceptance of the Formula of Union of 433. There was no mention of Cyril's mia physis formula and its disavowal by Chalcedon was not annulled. Whoever did not accept this faith was punished with anathema, as was anyone who now or previously thought otherwise, whether "at Chalcedon" or at another synod.[13]Accordingly, the edict formally glided over the Synod of Chalcedon, but it was no more rejected than was the Tome of Leo. It was not the Council that was rejected, but apparently an anti-Cyrillan interpretation of its decrees, whereas excessive "Cyrillanism" had been repudiated by the Formula of Union of 433 and the disregard of the mia physis formula. The edict thereby anticipated to a certain extent an interpretation of the Chalcedonian decrees which did not prevail in Orthodoxy until the sixth century, but then for ever. Naturally the die-hards could only view the glissando over Chalcedon as a treachery to the Synod, just as the die-hard "Monophysites" felt the failure to condemn this same Synod. Acacius, the composer of the edict, which has entered history under the title of the Henoticon, could nevertheless hope to establish peace on the basis of this document. He succeeded in gaining Peter Mongus for the Henoticon and received him into the communion of the Church. Of course, the monks who supported John Talaia upbraided him, as before, as a heretic. Many renounced communion with him; he agreed to a few concessions which satisfied no one, and it required all his shrewdness to keep the excesses within bounds. At Antioch the Patriarch Calandion refused to sign the Henoticon, but he was unwise enough to conspire with the faction of Illus against the Emperor and hence had to go into exile in 484. Once again Peter the Fuller found the opportunity to occupy the coveted See of Antioch. He signed the Henoticon, but Acacius did not for that reason see the possibility of accepting ecclesiastical communion with this scintillating personality. Jerusalem made no difficulties. On the other hand, it was ominous that Rome showed no appreciation for the personality politics of Acacius. Unfortunately the Emperor had failed to publish the Henoticon at Rome, probably because he saw in the document no new regulation but only an explicatio fidei.[14] In any case, people at Rome were apparently pleased with it, for it presented no serious dogmatic confrontation but rested entirely on questions of law and discipline, which were essentially more congenial to the Roman mentality. The Emperor himself announced to Pope Simplicius the recognition of Peter Mongus.[15] The Pope protested to the Emperor and exhorted Acacius to have the Emperor change his mind. Acacius shrewdly cloaked himself in silence. In 483 Felix II became Pope, and this vigorous defender of Roman interests did not let himself be put off. He wrote to Emperor and Patriarch and again represented the view that Peter Mongus was a condemned heretic. The fact that Peter had professed the orthodox creed of the Henoticon was not mentioned at all, nor was the perjury of Talaia.[16] The last-named, meanwhile, had arrived in Rome and filed an official complaint against Acacius. In these circumstances the Pope decided on the extraordinary step, contrary to the tradition that a Patriarch could be condemned only by an imperial synod, of summoning Acacius before his court, spurred on by a letter from the Acemetae monks of Constantinople, who had at that time claimed a monopoly of Orthodoxy and now accused the Pope of being too remiss in the defense of the true faith.[17] His legates received instructions first to get into contact with precisely these Acemetae and obtain advice from them. As would happen all too often later, Byzantine skill succeeded in bringing the papal legates to the right way "with pastry and the lash," as E. Schwartz expressed it. Soon after their arrival in Constantinople, they were seen going solemnly, with Acacius and the envoys of Mongus, through Constantinople to the church. They kept themselves aloof from the Acemetae and promised the Patriarch to push forward at Rome the case of Mongus against Talaia. After their return, Pope Felix had the unfortunate legates deposed by a synod. Peter Mongus was again refused communion as a heretic, and Acacius was declared deserving of the most severe penalties. Soon after, the Pope took the further step of formally excommunicating the Patriarch of Constantinople. The reasons were the Patriarch's interference in the affairs of the other Eastern Churches—hence, fundamentally, the exercising of his primatial rights on the basis of canon 28 of Chalcedon—and his measures taken by order of the Emperor, but above all his communion with Mongus. Nothing was said about his faith.[18] By his not having obeyed the Pope's summons he had declared his own guilt. This was in 484 and, since Acacius did not submit, the so-called Acacian Schism was a fait accompli—a schism in which questions of faith were consciously evaded by both sides, and questions of personalities were tormented to the limits of the impossible. For this reason Acacius probably thought he should not reply, because the Pope had not at all looked into the explanations by the Emperor Zeno of Acacius's personal politics. What would he have been able to add to what had been said? The fact that Felix continued to uphold John Talaia gave little hope of the possibility of an agreement.

---

[12] Text in Evagrius, HE III, 14, 111–114, E. Schwartz, Codex Vaticanus, no. 75, 52–54. Cf. S. Salaville, "L'affaire de l'Hénotique ou le premier schisme byzantin au V^{e} siècle," ÉO 18 (1919), 255–266, 389–397, 19 (1920), 49–68, 415–433; id., "Hénotique," DThC VI, 2153–2178; W. T. Townsend, "The Henoticon Schism and the Roman Church," JR 16 (1936), 78–86.

[13] . . . οὐ καινίζοντες πίστιν, ἀλλ' ὑμᾶς πληροφοροῦντες (Evagrius, HE III, 14, 113).

---

[14] Coll. Avell. 60, 152.

[15] The letters of the Pope to Emperor and Patriarch, ed. E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, 63–69, 69–73, and A. Thiel, Epistulae Romanorum Pontificum genuinae I (Brunswick 1868), 222–239.

[16] E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen 3, no. 1.

[17] Evagrius, HE III, 19, 117.

Acacius died in 489, and his policy seemed to crumble. His successor, Fravitas, was able, apparently under pressure from the Acemetae, to induce the Emperor to resume negotiations with Rome. However, the memory of Acacius was supposed to be spared, and the communion with Mongus to be maintained.[19] Hence, Fravitas was evidently under the incorrect impression that at stake was the recognition of Orthodoxy and not of primatial rights. Pope Felix undeceived him and insisted on the deletion of the names of Acacius and Mongus from the diptychs. Fravitas died in 490 without having seen the Pope's reply. His successor was Euphemius, a Syrian, the man of the Acemetae—or so it has been assumed—but in any event a strict Chalcedonian. On his own authority he removed Peter Mongus from the diptychs and in a letter to the Pope acknowledged the Synod of Chalcedon without reservations.[20] He was unwilling only to condemn Acacius, and in such a champion of Chalcedonian Orthodoxy this fact was a powerful testimony in favor of Acacius. It also prevents one from seeing in Euphemius an unscrupulous creature of the Acemetae, who roundly hated Acacius. Evidently Euphemius saw no Christian necessity to condemn Acacius after his death, as Rome demanded, even though the deceased Patriarch's policy may have been questionable to him also. Pope Felix remained obstinate and thereby prolonged the schism for some twenty years unnecessarily. The Emperor Zeno died in 491. The new Emperor Anastasius I (491–518) had been a high court functionary, not inexperienced in ecclesiastical matters and at one time even a candidate for the patriarchal See of Antioch.[21] In contrast to the last years of his predecessor, he was determined not to stake the politically undeniable successes of the Henoticon in the East and not to sacrifice them even to a Pope who, in his eyes, living under the protection of an Ostrogoth outside the actual sphere of power of his Empire, was pursuing a policy which did not take into consideration the difficult circumstances of the Eastern Churches and the idea of imperial unity. But at Rome Pope Gelasius I (492–496) unflinchingly continued the policy of his predecessor; Euphemius did not receive the least support, and with each day it became clearer that, for Rome, not the question of Chalcedon but that of the primatial position of Constantinople represented the questionable heart of the matter. Even though the Patriarch informed the Pope that the condemnation of Acacius would inevitably lead to a revolt of the "demes," that is, the so-called circus factions,[22] Gelasius persisted in his demand, and, even when the Emperor Anastasius sought to put pressure on him by means of King Theodoric, this was of no avail, probably because the King had at that time no interest in attaching the Pope to Constantinople.

---

[18] The papal edict, ed. E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, 6–7. It contradicted the traditional law and hence was criticized on the ground that a Pope, on his own, without an ecumenical synod, deposed a colleague in the patriarchate.

[19] Mentioned in the Pope's answer: A. Thiel, op. cit., 266–269; E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, 111–113.

[20] The letter is mentioned by the chronicler Theophanes, p. 135 (de Boor). Cf. Grumel Reg 175.

In 495 Euphemius was succeeded as Patriarch of Constantinople by Macedonius (495–511), whom the Emperor invested only after he had signed the Henoticon. At Rome the intransigent Gelasius was followed by Pope Anastasius II (496–98), who apparently exerted himself to prepare for an end to the schism by a judicious policy. But he died as early as 498, and hence his plans could not mature. In addition, there now broke out in Rome the so-called Laurentian Schism, which made any eastern policy impossible until 502.

If the opposition at Rome to the Henoticon, or, more precisely, to Acacius, was thus impeded, the vacillation of Acacius's successors in the East strengthened the opposition to the Hemoticon, which proceeded from theologians, to whom, it is true, the label of Monophysites can be simply attributed, but who energetically rejected the Synod of Chalcedon and saw in the Henoticon an all too compliant document. For them Cyril's theology was the starting point and the goal of Christological terminology: they rejected its explanation by Chalcedon. The most important men of this faction were Xenaia (Philoxenus) of Mabbug (Hierapolis) and Severus of Antioch.

Already as a teacher at the school of Edessa, Xenaia[23] had bitterly attacked the theology of the old Antiochene School, which for him represented nothing but pure Nestorianism. Peter the Fuller promoted him to the episcopal see of Mabbug and here he developed in the Syriac language, with which he alone was familiar, an active literary activity not only against the Council of Chalcedon, but also against the old Antiochenes, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa. He even sought to explain the "True" faith to the Emperor and for this purpose came to Constantinople, where, of course, Macedonius did not receive him, and so he soon angrily departed. Severus,[24] a Greek from Pisidia, had considerably more success in the capital. He had first studied law and then was gained for the monastic life at Maiuma near Gaza. He employed the time in the monastery not only for the exercises of the ascetical life but also for a deeper study of all theology. Thus Severus became an opponent of the Synod of Chalcedon, whom the Chalcedonians could counteract only with difficulty. What led him to Constantinople was, first, the conflict with a certain Nephalius, who had originally belonged to his own faction but now vehemently defended the interests of the Chalcedonians and slandered the monastic groups around Severus to the Patriarch Elias of Jerusalem to such a degree that Elias had them driven out of their monasteries. Accompanied by crowds of monks, Severus traveled as their counsel to the Emperor, who received him with the greatest honor. Even when his case had been decided, he remained in the city from 508 to 511, and, in word and writing, developed a mighty propaganda against Chalcedon and, implicitly, also against the Henoticon. He gathered the opponents of the Patriarch Macedonius around himself, and people did not hesitate to spread falsehoods in order to compromise the Patriarch and to bring about his ruin. The shibboleth of Severus's cause became the so-called "Theopaschite Trisagion," that is, the Hagios ho theos, hagios ischyros, hagios athanatos, to which had been appended ho staurotheis di'hemas—hence a formula, which meant nothing more, if the Trisagion itself was understood Christologically and not in a Trinitarian sense, which was possible both historically and formally, but which could not but lead to misunderstandings if it was employed as a substitute for the controversial mia physis tou theou logou sesarkomene.[25] Macedonius was sacrificed by the Emperor because of all the difficulties caused him and the calumnies alleged against him, and replaced by Timothy (511–18), who could not really please any faction. The Monophysites wanted Severus in his place; the Alexandrians demanded of him an anathema against Chalcedon and the Tome of Leo; in Syria Xenaia continued to agitate and procured the deposition of the Patriarch of Antioch, Flavian, who had tried to champion the Henoticon in an orthodox manner. Severus was elected to replace him in 512, and he thoroughly exploited his new position of power to destroy all further opposition to his own theologumena. He solemnly declared, of course, that he accepted the Henoticon, but soon interpreted it in a way that could leave no doubt about his hostility to the Synod of Chalcedon. The Patriarch of Jerusalem, Elias, also fell victim to Severus. His successor, John, was ready to make any concession to Severus, but the great superiors of the lauras and cenobiarchs, Sabas and Theodosius, thwarted him, and, flanked by the two monastic superiors, he was compelled solemnly to condemn not only Nestorius and Eutyches but now Severus also.[26] In the capital also an outspoken pro-Chalcedon opposition was constituted: it collected the adherents of the deposed Macedonius and even found powerful supporters in the imperial family. When in November 512 a procession of Severans once again marched through the streets with the "Theopaschite Trisagion," the opposition attacked, a revolt erupted, the statues of the Emperor were thrown down, and the rioters entrenched themselves in the Forum Constantini. Again the Emperor succeeded in restoring calm by prudent conduct, but now the opposition spread dangerously to the province. A Gothic officer in the imperial service, Vitalian,[27] exploited the dissatisfaction of the imperial foederati in the Balkan Peninsula and marched on Constantinople. To acquire friends in the capital, he made use of pro-Chalcedon catchwords. At first the Emperor thought he could overcome the danger by proceeding tactically. When this did not succeed, he saw himself compelled to appoint Vitalian as Magister Militum Per Thraciam and to promise to invite the Pope to a council at Herachea, at which the schism should be healed. A corresponding Sacra left for Rome. Pope Hormisdas, who had succeeded Symmachus in 514, took his time, evidently in order to consult Theodoric. And so the date of the council, set for 1 July 515, passed. In the meantime Vitalian appeared again before the walls of Constantinople. This time he was annihilated by the imperial troops and so the council, in which no one else had testified to a special interest, lost its raison d'être for the Emperor. The Pope twice sent legates, it is true, but they had to turn back without success. And so the Acacian Schism continued until the death of the Emperor Anastasius in April 518.

---

[21] L. Bréhier, "Anastase," DHGE II, 1447–1457.

[22] The letter is lost but is partly reconstructable from the Pope's reply in A. Thiel, op. cit., 312–321; E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, pp. 49–55.

[23] A. de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabboug (Louvain 1963).

---

[24] G. Bardy, "Sévère d'Antioche," DThC XIV 1988–2000; J. Lebon, Le monophysisme sévérien (Louvain 1909); id., "La christologie du monophysisme sévérien," Chalkedon I, 425–580. More literature in Beck, 387–390.

[25] On the Trisagion cf. E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, 242; V. S. Janeras, "Les byzantins et le trisagion christologique," Miscellanea in honorem G. Lercaro II (Rome 1967), 469–499; W. Elert, "Die theopaschitische Formel," ThLZ 75 (1950) 195–206.

---

[26] On the role of the Chalcedonian Palestinian monks cf. E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skythopolis (Leipzig 1939), 385f.; H. Bacht, "Die Rolle des orientalischen Mönchtums in den kirchen politischen Auseinandersetzungen um Chalkedon," Chalkedon II, 193–314, especially 285ff.

[27] Cf. on him E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire (Brussels 1949), 178–181; V. Schurr, Die Trinitätslehre des Boethius im Lichte der "Skythischen Kontroversen" (Paderborn 1935), 127–136.

If one looks back to the years since 482, the period has a unique important turning point in the pontificate of Pope Anastasius II. At that time appeared the hope and the possibility of again achieving unity on the basis of an orthodox interpretation of the Henoticon, to which Acacius had always held. The death of the Pope wrecked the hopes. Neither his predecessors nor his successors took into account the difficulty of the situation in the East. They saw their obedience in the Vicariate of Thessalonica imperiled; they did not know how to acquiesce in a linking of the conciliar definition of Chalcedon with the notorious canon 28, although the latter had brought scarcely anything new in respect to the First Council of Constantinople, and they built their policy on the only apparently stable foundation of Ostrogothic rule in Italy. The Popes failed to note that Constantinople and its Patriarch had to remain victorious, precisely because they appeared, vis-à-vis the Emperor, in an independence which they owed solely to the Ostrogoth and Arian Theodoric. The Henoticon united the Eastern Churches in the face of Rome, and Alexandria was no longer a point of departure for Rome. The first years of the next imperial dynasty only seemingly justified the papal policy. John II and Vigilius would soon have to pay for the policy of a Felix and a Gelasius.

CHAPTER 23

The Elaboration of the Church of the Byzantine Empire in the Age of the Emperor Justinian I

With the Emperors Justin I (518–527) and Justinian I (527–565) there began not only a new and important epoch of the secular history of the Eastern Roman Empire; just as important, not to say questionable, was their period of power for the history of the Christian Church. In this regard we may, probably from the start, regard Justinian as the spiritus rector of the policy of his uncle, Justin, also. Even if we do not unreservedly go along with the historian Procopius in his evaluation, on carefully weighed grounds, of the motive for the ecclesiastical policy of the later Emperor, there remains enough that is enigmatical for modern historians to speak now of a zigzag course pursued by the Emperor, now of his imperturbably consistent policy. Some points of departure can be fixed with certainty; which of them at any one time was decisive, to what extent they collaborated and in what proportion, can only rarely be stated. There was, first, the dream of the restoration of the ancient extent of the Imperium, of a world empire ruled from a glorious center—a dream which in the spiritual climate of the sixth century could not disregard the disunity of the Church. Second, there was a scarcely to be denied particular interest in ecclesiastical and religious matters, and this interest may in part have sprung from a genuine piety, but a zealous piety which, contrary to the Lord's word, wanted to burn every alleged weed long before the harvest. To this was added a special theological commitment of the Emperor, the bases of which were, naturally, judged in various ways: for some he was an experienced student of contemporary theology; for others, an amateur, an unlucky lover, who unfortunately was Emperor and hence disposed of the force to make his notions into law. There always remains the question of his own part in the creeds and formulas—a question which underlies the same criteria as the question of his role in the entire Justinianean legislation. And, finally, there was Theodora, the great and much maligned Empress, whose influence must surely be taken into account in the ecclesiastical policy of the age, even when its impact can be determined only with difficulty. One should hardly speak, with Procopius, of a conscious, even crafty, political sharing, according to which, for example, Justinian would have on occasion complied with the orthodox demands, whereas Theodora retained the freedom indirectly to assure to the Monophysites the ability to continue to live and to operate, so that no faction could complain. This smacks too much of sophistry. The hand-in-hand and the mutual opposition of the imperial pair seems more complicated, dependent on the circumstances, and could hardly have happened without clashes. That the system still functioned probably lay in the character of the Empress and was based on the Emperor's bond with her.

The fact that Justin and Justinian were at once prepared to put an end to the so-called Acacian Schism and to comply with Rome's demands is certainly explained not by any already planned clutching at Ostrogothic Italy. It could no longer be doubted that the Henoticon policy of Anastasius had been mismanaged in the capital itself. Every new Emperor, especially if he had reached the throne under such precarious circumstances as had Justin, had, in any case and first of all, to gain the capital for himself. The dangerous Vitalian was still in the Thracian countryside, waiting to see what the new Emperors would begin to do. It may be that Justinian was basically a convinced Chalcedonian. In any event, Theodora had only been his wife for a short time and apparently was at first preoccupied with assuring her position, which might not have been too easy, in view of her past.

If Justin and his nephew had at first been of another view, events soon after the coronation of the new Emperor could only undeceive them.[1] The pro-Chalcedon monks, the Acemetae at their head, organized a popular tumult at the Sunday liturgy of the Patriarch John II (518–520) and forced him and his synod solemnly to recognize Chalcedon, repudiate the Henoticon, excommunicate Severus, and resume relations with the Holy See. Justin was induced to ratify this decision by edict.[2] And now envoys went to Rome to begin negotiations for peace. Pope Hormisdas, who received not only a formal letter from the Emperor,[3] but also an extraordinarily promising one from Justinian,[4] was in the best position to negotiate and did not want to let this opportunity slip by. The dogmatic position had long ago been delineated by the celebrated Regula fidei Hormisdae, which the Pope had prepared as early as 515 for the union council that was supposed to meet that year.[5] This libellus proceeded from the Primate of the Roman See and condemned first Nestorius and Eutyches and then also Timothy the Cat, Peter Mongus, Peter the Fuller, and especially Acacius. For the rest, the decision of Chalcedon together with the Tome of Leo was imposed as the norm of faith. Now people even in Constantinople were ready for the damnatio memoriae of Acacius, and in a meekness required by the Emperor and vigorously demanded by the monks, the Patriarch saw himself induced to accept the Regula fidei without discussion and to consign posthumously to Satan not only Acacius but also his successors, Euphemius and Macedonius, who certainly had done their best. The same fate befell also the Emperors Zeno and Anastasius, without any protest from the court. This took place on the memorable 28 March 519, a day which seemed to seal the victory of the Pope over the self-willed and, in Rome's eyes, illegitimate Patriarchate of Constantinople—but it was still only a pyrrhic victory, as the following decade proved. Shortly before the concluding of the negotiations the papal legates of Hormisdas in Constantinople had had to deal with a remarkable group, the so-called "Scythian," but really probably Gothic, monks from the Dobrudsha, men of the Goth Vitalian, who belonged to those ingenious types that are always proposing for Orthodoxy new formulas from which they anticipated salvation.[6] Their formula read: Heis tes triados pathon, or "Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin, one of [or in] the Trinity." Presumably they intended by it to prevent any Nestorian interpretation of the formula of Chalcedon, but in reality they approached that appendage to the Trisagion, which had meanwhile long ago become the precious possession of the opponents of Chalcedon. The legates could not do anything with this contribution of Latin theology—Maxentius, leader of the "Scythians," had received a "Latin education"—but Justinian let himself be gained for the formula, presumably out of consideration for Vitalian. A sign of the future: In a letter to Hormisdas, in which he recommended to him the monks and their formula, he attested, on his own initiative, the Orthodoxy of this fad.[7] But Hormisdas, at the climax of his success, did not intend to give to the heir to the throne even this satisfaction, apart from the fact that the monks made themselves so unpopular in Rome that he had them removed from the city. Justinian could wait.

---

[1] The events are described by S. Salaville, "La fête du concile de Chalcedoine dans le rite byzantin," Chalkedon II, 677–695.

[2] Michael the Syrian reported on it, II, 180 (Chabot).

[3] Coll. Avell. no. 160.

[4] Coll. Avell. no. 162. The entire correspondence which at this period proceeded from and arrived at the papal chancery is in this Collectio, nos. 1–104.

[5] Text: Coll. Avell., no. 149. Mansi VIII, 441–442, gives the instructions for the legates. Cf. W. Haacke, Die Glaubensformel des Papstes Hormisdas im acacian. Schisma (Rome 1939).

The Emperor Justin, together with his nephew, may have pacified the capital by the Union of 519, but in not a few places it appeared that the Henoticon was still alive or, respectively, that the Emperor's surrender of the Henoticon now cleared the ground for the opponents of Chalcedon. The bishops, who were now supposed to renew communion with Rome, could not always make up their minds to condemn their predecessors or even Acacius. This was especially the problem in the European provinces of the Empire. An example was Thessalonica, the center of the Papal Vicariate in Illyricum, whose archbishops were plunged by the Acacian Schism into the greatest conflicts, since on the one hand they were to look after the papal interests and on the other hand they lived within direct range of the imperial city without Rome's being able to offer them effective aid. When the papal legates now journeyed through the city, they were actually assaulted and their host was murdered. At Ephesus the Synod of Chalcedon was vigorously condemned. At Antioch Severus had, of course, to leave his see and flee to Egypt, but wherever new bishops were installed in Syria, it was often possible to maintain them only with military aid. In addition, now the Nestorians sensed their advantage and began here and there publicly to celebrate as saints, in addition to Theodoret, also Theodore of Mopsuestia and Nestorius himself. But from Egypt Severus again held all the strings in his hand, admonished, warned, wrote treatises and sermons, and directed the resistance. Hormisdas, in a complete misreading of the situation, thought he could have one of his legates, who happened to be an Alexandrian, elevated to the See of St. Mark. But the situation was so tense that finally the election had to be left to the Alexandrians: it fell on the Monophysite Timothy III, who rejected Chalcedon and the Henoticon, without a hair on his head being harmed. With the Henoticon the last clamp of the Church of the Empire was smashed.

---

[6] V. Schurr, Die Trinitätslehre des Boethius im Lichte der "skythischen Kontroversen" (Paderborn 1935); B. Altaner, "Zum Schrifttum der 'skythischen' (Gotischen) Mönche," HJ 62 (1943), 261–273, 72 (1953), 568–581; W. Elert, "Die Thoepaschitische Formel," ThLZ 75 (1950), 195–206.

[7] Coll. Avell., no. 196, of 9 July 520.

The new alliance of the Pope with the Emperor could, however, only arouse mistrust in the Pope's ruler at Ravenna, King Theodoric. It is possible that the hypothesis that the Roman senatorial nobility began now to conspire with Constantinople was more than a suspicion. Perhaps the process against Boethius was related to it, and perhaps there was also a certain connection with it when Justin now, by an edict from the end of 524 ordered the closing of the Arian Gothic churches in Constantinople and excluded Arians from all offices and military positions.[8] Theodoric accepted the challenge and sent Pope John I himself, who was thereby put completely into his hand by way of diplomacy, as a messenger to Constantinople to demand of the Emperor the withdrawal of the edict. Pope John stayed in the capital from November 525 till Easter 526 and was received and treated with the greatest honor.[9] That Justin had himself crowned again by him is, of course, a mistaken interpretation of a simple "festive crown-wearing" in the sense of a constitutional act! A real success was not allowed to the Pope's mission. Most of the Arian Goths seem to have drawn the necessary conclusions from the imperial edict and to have converted so that the Emperor could with light heart promise the return of the churches. Apparently now the return to Arianism should also again be allowed. But here the Emperor remained firm, and Theodoric made his papal messenger pay for his lack of success by imprisoning him at Ravenna after his return.

Furthermore, Theodoric died soon after, in the fall of 526, and eleven months later the Emperor Justin followed him. Now Flavius Petrus Sabbatius Justinianus was sole ruler. There began an epoch of Church history which, like no other, bore the stamp of a single person. Its goal was unambiguously one Empire, one Church, outside which there were no salvation and no hope on earth, and one Emperor, whose principal care was precisely the welfare of this Church. In the pursuit of this goal Justinian knew no fatigue and with fanatical thoroughness he pursued what to him seemed false into the farthest hiding places, not of course without tactical skill and not without accommodation to the circumstances of the time and especially to the ratio of forces—likewise, not without the ability to close both eyes where there was question of men who actually should be subordinated to his will if they were not so extraordinarily useful. Finally, he had each and every thing in the Church also depend on his own decision, even when, in case of need, he treated the bishops so respectfully. For him the Pope of Rome was without doubt the Head of Christendom. He understood the primacy not only as a rank of honor, but also as the primacy of doctrine and faith, but the Primate was well advised to decide as seemed good to the Emperor.

---

[8] Theophanes the Chronicler on the Year 6016: p. 109 (de Boor).

[9] W. Ensslin, "Papst Johannes I. als Gesandter Theoderichs des Grossen bei Kaiser Justinos I.," ByZ 44 (1951), 127–134.

The one and only Church: to please it there must be no more pagans. The earlier legislation against paganism aimed at pagan worship and the legality of pagan meetings. Justinian decreed by law that every pagan must have himself and his family instructed and baptized under penalty of confiscation of his property.[10] The relapse of a Christian into paganism was punished by death.[11] The law was no empty threat. There were still pagans in the learned circles of the capital and at historical spots such as Athens; there was still a pagan rural population in the hills of Anatolia, for whose conversion a Monophysite, John of Asia, was good enough for even the Emperor; there were pagan shrines on the Upper Nile, in the oases, and in the Syrian Desert. The closing of the Neoplatonic School of Athens, a thiasos with slight philosophical appeal, probably was due to the imperial edict.[12] The philosophers found a cordial reception at the court of Chosroes of Persia, who was presumably not especially attracted by their muddled philosophy, since in the Peace of 532 he insisted on their unimpeded return to the Empire. This closing of the School of Athens was in no sense an event of importance in world history. In Constantinople also grammarians, sophists, and physicians of the highest circles were arrested as pagans and forcibly converted or flogged and, in individual cases, even executed. All this, however, did not stop the Emperor from taking into his service at court a Tribonian as Quaestor Sacri Palatii and a John of Cappadocia as Praefec-

---

[10] Codex I, 11, 9–10.

[11] Ibid.

[12] Cf. Malalas, 451 (Bonn).

tus Praetorio, whose paganism and pure atheism are vouched for by contemporary observers.[13]

The Jews had it "easier" than the pagans because their worship had long ranked as religio licita. To be sure, for a long time this license, which was alleged to be guilty of Christian doctrinal shadowboxing, had been surrounded by a crown of thorns of vexations, which Justinian unscrupulously increased with deeper spikes. He denied Jews the ability to testify in court in cases with Christians, forbade them to buy Church property and land concerning which there was question of building a church; true, he did not exempt them from the burden of curiales in their communities, but he forbade them any of the precarious honors which this burden could involve.[14] Finally, he even interfered in the synagogue worship and forced the permission to read the Torah in Greek or Latin but obliged the Jews in this case to use the Septuagint or at most Aquila's translation.[15] The Samaritans, on the other hand, were treated like pagans: their synagogues were closed,[16] leading to frightful rebellions of this Palestinian minority, which were put down with unprecedented severity—20,000 are said to have perished in the revolt of 529. Nevertheless, they rebelled again in 555, without any more success. It is noteworthy that in 551 even the Bishop of Caesarea stood up for them.

The remnant of heretics in the Empire was excluded by the Emperor from all offices and dignities and from teaching and the practice of law. These men hardly had any more rights in the courts. Their churches were to be closed.[17]

If the Emperor thus served the Church with his legislation against everything that was outside it, the Church was also expected to serve him. It would be false to assume that the Emperor made state officials out of the bishops, but he enveloped them in a whole series of discretionary duties in the service and for the benefit of the State.[18] The bishops were charged with the control of prisoners, they obtained the functions of arbiter if there was a circumventing of the law by a governor or if such was suspected and in disputes in the province to which the governor was a party. They had also, together with their economi, "to lend a hand" in the levying of the taxes of the community and, with a group of outstanding citizens, to examine the community's rendering of its accounts. They had also to make a discreet report on the governor's administration of his office to the Emperor. In other words: Justinian saw in the bishop a reliable representative of the municipal nobility without taking him into the imperial service in the real sense. He used him in order to play him off against the community as well as against the provincial administration. The bishop thereby obtained a position, the social consequences of which remained completely open. He could become the "feudal lord," like the notables of the city, with whom he was confused, but also the guardian of the interests of the people, covered by the protection of the central imperial authority. In order to make the bishops' position easier, the Emperor again and again had recourse to the expedient of guaranteeing the stability of the episcopal revenues through legislation.[19] Here there was question especially of assuring the endowments from which the ecclesiastical patrimony came for the most part. The church of a city received the right to legacies which were bequeathed by the testator in an unspecified manner to religious and charitable ends, for example, by designating Christ or a saint as heir; furthermore, the Emperor established brief terms within which legacies which had been set aside for charitable institutes had to be applied to their purpose. Church property could not in principle be alienated or otherwise impaired. No imperial law was to be valid according to which the support of troops was to be assured by Church property, no sacred utensils were to be employed for profane purposes—the single exception was constituted by the redemption of captives, for which no means could otherwise be raised. Gifts to the Church were exempted from the tax on profits. Outstanding gifts of money and endowments could be exacted at any time. Prescription took place only after 100 years. The leasing of Church property was limited—the terms were short, even when they differed—and it was possible only for the wealthy, who were in a position to pay the rent determined by the Emperor. But Byzantine legislation never knew a general exemption of Church property from taxation. There were, of course, exceptions, and the most important in Justinian's reign was undoubtedly the tax-exemption for the more than 1,000 farms (ergasteria) of the "Great Church" at Constantinople.[20] [13] Cf. J. Irmscher, "Die geistige Situation der Intelligenz im Zeitalter Justinians," F. Altheim–R. Stiehl, Die Araber in der alten Welt IV (Berlin 1967), 334–362; W. E. Kaegi, "The Fifth-Century Twilight of Byzantine Paganism," Classica et Mediaevalia 27 (1966), 243–275; D. J. Constantelos, "Paganism and the State in the Age of Justinian,"' CHR 50 (1964), 372–380.

---

[14] Novel 45.

[15] Novel 146.

[16] Codex I, 5, 17. Cf. S. Winkler, "Die Samaritaner in den Jahren 529/530," Klio 43–45 (1965), 434–457.

[17] Codex I, 5, 12.

[18] For what follows: H. G. Beck, "Kirche und Klerus im staatlichen Leben von Byzanz," RÉB 24 (1966), 1–24; there also the evidence.

---

[19] Evidence in A. Knecht, System des justinianeischen Kirchenvermögensrechtes (Stuttgart 1905); M. V. Levcenko, "Das Kirchengut im oströmischen Reiche während des 5. und 6. Jh." (in Russian); ViVr 2 (1949), 11–59.

Even if Justinian guaranteed to the Church in principle the free administration of its property, he still meddled vigorously in the methods of this administration. The number of administrative personnel in the provinces was exactly determined, the documentation in the administrative system was regulated in detail, even the dates of the rendering of accounts to the bishop and the amount of rent.

On the clergy themselves, especially the bishops, the legislation of Justinian used the finest phrases.[21] In order to assure this rank, it engaged in a thousand decrees on prerequisites for entry into the clergy, the behavior of clerics, their training, and so forth. Much of this was already contained in earlier ecclesiastical canons, but much also was due to the painstaking thought of the Emperor and was in some respects the expression of the mentality of Justinian and his age. Typical, for example, even if hardly new, was that it was now regulated by law that the share of the people in the election of the bishop was restricted to the outstanding men of the city,[22] and likewise that the one to be ordained had to sign an orthodox creed and swear that he had refrained from simony;[23] but it was also typical that the ordination fees were regulated in detail and that they were considerably high—for the patriarchs no less than twenty pounds in gold—and in this way, according to the Emperor's intention, an impoverishment of the churches should be prevented![24] Apparently the illegal charges were considerably higher. The Emperor emphatically inculcated the duty of residence and exerted himself especially to check the notorious Byzantine urge to travel to the imperial court. The bishop could be subjected to secular jurisdiction only with imperial permission.

With equal zeal the Emperor interested himself in synodal law, decided the dates for local and provincial synods, and regulated their modus procedendi.[25] In accord with tradition, he reserved to the Emperors the right to convoke an ecumenical synod.[26] And synodal canons were put on a footing of equality with the laws of the State.[27]

---

[20] Novel 43 (537). The Anastasis in Jerusalem also received certain privileges. Its economic burden had so increased because of the support given to the numerous pilgrims that it had to be given greater leeway in the use of its goods, if the ruinous financial position was not to last. Cf. W. Schubart, "Kaiser Justinian und die Anastasiskirche in Jerusalem," ZNW 37 (1938), 195–202.

[21] K. L. Noethlichs, "Materialien zum Bischofsbild aus den spätantiken Rechtsquellen," JbAC 16 (1973), 23–59.

[22] Novel 123; cf. Novel 137.

[23] Novel 137.

[24] Novel 123.

[25] Novels 123 and 137.

Significant for the complex of ideas of the legislator, not lacking in illusions, was the fact that he wanted to define Byzantine monasticism as far as possible according to cenobitic norms.[28] For anchorites and hesychasts within the monastery there were a couple of exceptional rules. But they too were to be subject to the abbot. The head of the monastery was the abbot elected by the community; the election was subject to the control and ratification of the bishop, who also possessed the supreme jurisdiction over the monastery. The law of Justinian knew no exemption. The monastery's property rights corresponded to the general ecclesiastical law of property.

The Universal Orthodox Church was divided, in the Emperor's view, into the five great patriarchates in order of precedence: Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In this, as already mentioned, an absolute precedence was allotted to the Roman Patriarchate.[29]

This brief summary of Justinian's regulations cannot include, even approximately, everything that Justinian decided to the tiniest details, and in fact he not rarely went far beyond the ecclesiastical canons. He did this out of his awareness of high-priestly power, not in the sense of a modern State Church, just as there was no question at all of State and Church, but of Church and Emperor. That he felt himself to be inspired and especially favored not only as organizer but also as theologian was in itself nothing new in the notions of the age: Pope Leo the Great himself had acknowledged such an inspiration in an Emperor like Marcian. New was only the degree to which Justinian made use of this inspiration for his ecclesiastical policy. He thereby became the one who completed the Constantinian Church system, in so far as he fixed in law what had had only a "numinous" character in Constantine or Theodosius and at the same time marked out the infinitely broad extent to which a Byzantine Emperor could go in the Church, even if not without the Church. A perfect example of this is the second phase of his union policy in regard to the Monophysites, which was only apparently concluded with the Agreement of 519—apparently all the more for Justinian, who in this first phase had to make only too many concessions to the self-consciousness of Rome.

---

[26] PG 86, 1035.

[27] Codex I, 3, 44.

[28] A. Tabera, "De ordinatione status monachalis in fontibus Justinianeis," Commentarii pro Religiosis 14 (1933), 87–95, 199–206, 15 (1934), 412–418; B. Granic, "Die Rechtsetellung und Organisation der griechischen Klöster," ByZ 29 (1928–29), 6–34. Especially important is Novel 133 (539).

[29] Cf. Codex I, 1, 7, and Novel 131.

CHAPTER 24

Justinian's Zigzag Course: The Origenist Troubles

No one could maintain that the Union of 519 was a complete success. But despite all the severity of the antiheretical legislation, the refractory Monophysites and opponents of Chalcedon never fully felt it. Justinian, who was certainly in no way connected with Manichaeans, Novatians, and Montanists, was probably of the opinion that he could come to terms theologically with the moderate Monophysites, especially those who followed Severus. In regard to them, it was also not a question of any dwindling minority but of considerable proportions of the population of whole imperial provinces. Furthermore, now the Empress Theodora self-assuredly moved into the foreground. At the period of her roving life, she had apparently found Christian understanding[1] only from Monophysite bishops, who were not rarely at loggerheads with the established society, and now, as Empress, she was prepared to forget this fact for their sake. During the dangerous Nika Riot in January 532 she had been the one who through her pluck thwarted the flight of the Emperor and thereby saved him his throne. It goes without saying that this especially put the Emperor under obligation to her. Still, the new policy cannot be termed simply a consequence of the Nika Riot, apart from the fact that this political event had little or nothing to do with denominational opposition. Instead, soon after he had begun his reign as sole Emperor, Justinian had recalled Monophysite monks and bishops from their exile, and in the summer of 531 he invited six of them to Constantinople. They guarded themselves against a surprise by imperial theologians by means of a forestalling dogmatic declaration[2] and then came to the city, where, soon after the Nika Riot, following rather lengthy preliminary negotiations, a religious discussion was staged, the so-called Collatio cum Severianis, conducted on the Orthodox side chiefly by Hypatius of Ephesus.[3] The outcome was jejune: the

---

[1] It is John of Nikiu who reports that Theodora had at this time made the acquaintance of the Patriarch Timothy III at Alexandria, who became her spiritual father.

[2] Individual examples in E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skythopolis, 389.

[3] On this we have an exhaustive report by a participant, Bishop Innocent of Maroneia, addressed to the Priest Thomas of Thessalonica, but it is extant only in Latin: ACO IV, 2, 167–184.

Severans acknowledged that Theodoret and Ibas of Edessa had rightly been rehabilitated by the Fathers of Chalcedon, and one bishop even let himself be induced to recognize Chalcedon. But that was all. The chief objection of the Monophysites against the decrees of Chalcedon was obviously the danger of a Nestorian interpretation of them, and this objection seems to have made a lasting impression on the Emperor, who participated only indirectly in the Collatio, and motivated him to undertake something in return. In any event, the Monophysites at first had a considerable breathing-space, and Justinian was ready to oblige them further. He published dogmatic letters[4] to the people of Constantinople and the cities of Asia and to the Patriarch of Constantinople, Epiphanius, and his synod, which once again represented a remarkable gliding over the decrees of Chalcedon. Instead, the Theopaschite Formula was now expressly accepted, which had deeply interested the Emperor since 520. It goes without saying that the Acematae monks were not pleased and, in keeping with their tradition, at once mounted a sharp attack against it, apparently without being clearly aware that the days of the Emperor Anastasius were past. They were said to have then gone so far in their "Nestorian" interpretation of Chalcedon that they even refused to Mary the title of Theotokos, which probably means no more than that the Acemetae did not want the communicatio idiomatum to be regarded as the ultima ratio of Christology. In keeping with their custom, they complained to the Pope. But Hormisdas was long since dead, and an imperial edict followed in their steps. Pope John II bowed to the imperial pressure and condemned the Acemetae on 23 December 534 and in so doing swallowed the Theopaschite Formula, which Hormisdas had loathed; in fact, in the letter to Emperor and Senate referring to this he even censured one of Cyril's Anathemas, in which the formula had been anticipated by way of suggestion.[5]

Now, at the Emperor's invitation, even Severus came to Constantinople and found lodging in the palace, where he remained until March 536. And with Severus there came to Constantinople, as they had already come on their own initiative under Anastasius, all the monks possible, openly and secretly, most of them living on the hospitality of the Empress Theodora and behaving in Constantinople as though it was the metropolis of the opponents of Chalcedon. When in 535 the patriarchal see became vacant, the Emperor nominated a certain Anthimus, who had previously been Bishop of Trebizond but had given up that see in order to live at Constantinople as an ascetic. Now he also appeared from one of Theodora's palaces, which aroused the suspicion that it had been she who had made him acceptable to the Emperor as a candidate. Apparently nothing could be objected against his orthodoxy; but, having become Patriarch, he accepted the communion of Severus and sent his announcement of enthronement not only to the bellicose Orthodox Patriarch Ephrem of Antioch but also to his Monophysite colleague in Alexandria. The total situation undoubtedly recalled that under the Henoticon, and the question may be raised whether it was not precisely toward this situation that Justinian was purposely steering.

---

[4] Cod. Just. I, 1, 6 and 7.

[5] Letters of the Emperor to the Pope: Coll. Avell. Ep. 84, 7–21, and Cod. Just. I, 1, 8. Letter of the Pope: Coll. Avell. ep. 84. Cf. also V. Grumel, "L'auteur et la date de la composition du tropaire Ὁ μονογενής," ÉO 22 (1923), 398–418.

The turning point came surpisingly fast, not indeed as the result of an organizational development, but, as it were, ex machina. For the second time since Justinian was in power, a Pope came to Constantinople in the spring of 536, Agapitus I, successor of John II. He came as envoy of the Ostrogothic King Theodhad. For, in the meantime, Justinian, using the assassination of Amalasuntha, daughter of Theodoric the Great, as his reason, had decided to roll back Ostrogothic rule in Italy from the south upward: Belisarius had already landed in Sicily. Reluctantly the Pope undertook the King's errand to induce the Emperor to withdraw. The Pope's mission had no political success. But Agapitus did not make his journey only as a royal envoy. Informed from all sides in regard to the remarkable proceedings in Constantinople, he had decided to utilize his stay in the capital to affirm his primatial rights, which indeed Justinian had frequently solemnly averred that he highly esteemed. From the very start Agapitus refused his communion to the Patriarch Anthimus, formally on the far-fetched pretext that, as a transfer from Trebizond, he could not be a valid Bishop of Constantinople, but de facto probably because he suspected him of Monophysitism. Justinian at once abandoned the submissive Anthimus, who disappeared to where he had come from, probably into one of Theodora's hiding places. Menas, from Alexandria, became the new Patriarch and was ordained by the Pope after he had signed an expanded Formula Hormisdae. A synod should decide the future fate of Anthimus: at least, such was Agapitus's plan. But he died at Constantinople on 22 April 536 before it could be realized. Nevertheless, the Emperor also fulfilled this wish of the Pope and on 2 May of that year the Synod met under the presidency of Menas and with the participation of a whole group of Latin bishops and Roman clerics who had come with the Pope, at their head the papal Deacon Pelagius, the future Pope. Antioch and Jerusalem were represented by apocrisiarii and delegations.[6] The formal charges against Anthimus were lodged by abbots from Constantinople. Since Anthimus did not appear, even though he had been summoned three times, and no one defended him, he was condemned in absentia and degraded. The Synod could have come to an end, but monks from Palestine also demanded the condemnation of Severus. Menas hesitated, but Justinian gave leave and so Severus also, together with his adherents, was anathematized. Hence the policy of Pope Agapitus bore fruit even after his death. The new Henoticon movement had ended.

---

[6] Acts: Collectio Sabbaitica, ACO III, 27–186; Mansi VIII, 873–1176.

What induced Justinian to this change of course is difficult to determine. It is certain that, for him, the Pope was always theoretically the highest court of the faith, but in practice the Emperor knew how to manipulate this court. It must not be overlooked that, after all, all his exertions to win back the Monophysites were without any particular success—even the Theopaschite Formula could not satisfy them. Perhaps the Emperor was content to leave the counteraction, which had to affect Theodora also, to the Pope, who was glad to undertake it. But presumably the situation in Italy also played a not unimportant role. We do not know how actively or carelessly Agapitus had represented the concerns of his King Theodahad. In any event, Belisarius was on the way to Rome, and perhaps the Pope was able to convince the Emperor how very much it would aid Belisarius's campaign, if, as representative of a blameless imperial Orthodoxy, he could confront the Ostrogoths, those heretics! It must not be excluded that at the time Italy was more important to Justinian than the recalcitrant Monophysites of the East. The success of Belisarius should not be jeopardized by an affront to the Roman Pope and his Catholic obedience in Italy.

After he had once made up his mind, Justinian drew the reins tight. Severus and the Severans were expelled from the capital, and Severus went again to Egypt as a refugee. Theodora did what she could to thwart these measures, but now her activity was solely defensive, no longer offensive. Pelagius, Agapitus's deacon, remained at Constantinople as papal apocrisiarius and seems to have played an important role as the Emperor's adviser. The Patriarch Ephrem of Antioch, a former general, occupied himself with the forcible conversion of Syria to Orthodoxy. In Egypt Monophysitism was already so much at home that it had split into factions, especially into that of the moderate Severans and that of the "Phantasiasts," the adherents of Julian of Halicarnassus,[7] who saw in Christ's body an aphtharton (Aphthartodocetists). The Patriarch Theodosius, a friend of Severus, had become Patriarch of Alexandria in 535 at Theodora's instigation, but he had had the greatest difficulties in establishing himself in opposition to the Julianists' man, Gainas. Now in 537 Theodosius was summoned to Constantinople; since he was unable to make up his mind to sign the horos of Chalcedon, he had to go into exile. After some time Theodora managed to have him come to Constantinople, where he enjoyed her protection and could do everything to govern his Egyptian Church from a distance. But, using his plenitude of power, the Emperor now named a certain Paul as Patriarch of Alexandria and supplied him with full authority, which corresponded to that of an imperial governor. Still, what the Emperor's theology had been unable to achieve, so also his policy of force could not do.

---

[7] R. Draguet, Julien d'Halicarnasse et sa controverse avec Sévère d'Antioche (Louvain 1924).

Precisely around this time the repertory of theologumena on which people could become alienated increased unnecessarily, but now concerning a new point which had been regarded as long dead—Origenism. After the first Origenist controversy around the turn of the fifth century,[8] there had been silence in regard to the doctrine of the great Alexandrian. Here and there someone took up his pen to refute him, but the Christological controversy troubled spirits to such a degree that there remained no more room for the esoteric questions which had preoccupied Origen. In monastic circles, however, Origen, now as before, could not but exercise a mysterious power of attraction, to which Evagrius had already succumbed. And when the confrontation gradually hardened again in the first half of the sixth century, the difficulty seems to have been the same as it was a century and a half earlier: an extreme spiritualization of the spiritual life, seized upon by the raptus of the ascent to God in order to lose itself in him even to the loss of identity, in order to find again in him all that had fallen in one final transfiguration. What the Origen-minded monks took, as regards individual points, from their master, or more directly from the writings of his devoted Evagrius Ponticus, whether they were more concerned about a cosmological interpretation of the occurrences within the soul or whether they made Origen their "private domain," cannot now be determined, for what was written against them was only too remote from spirituality.[9]

The starting point and center of the new movement was Palestine. Here, since the second half of the fifth century, monasticism in both its cenobitic as well as in its anchoretic (laura) form had known vast progress. One of the most important foundations was the laura of the monk Sabas from Cappadocia (d. 532), which was founded in 483—Mar Saba. In 494 Sabas became Archimandrite of all the anchorites of Palestine, that is, representative of the Patriarch for these monastic groups. He was a great organizer, an eager builder, and a loyal champion of a problem-free Orthodoxy, but not the man who would be able, on the basis of his education, to evoke an understanding for Origenist currents. This tendency was present also among his monks, and, because Sabas was as he was, he faced opposition. Finally there occurred the exodus of the "cranks," of those dissatisfied with him, who c. 507 gathered in a new foundation, the "New Laura." Their leader was a certain Nonnus. After some time, Sabas succeeded in getting the New Laura also under his control to some degree and in imposing his abbots on it. One of these abbots, Agapitus, finally expelled the strict Origenists from the new foundation. Only after his death in 519 did they return and follow the technique of silence and of the secret importing and cultivating of their doctrine. This apparently succeeded, especially when in 511 the aged Sabas, as deputy of the province, traveled to the imperial court with a petition for remission of taxes; he included in his retinue, from the monks of the New Laura, a certain Leontius,[10] a native of Constantinople, who was one of the most convinced Origenists. At Constantinople, his home, Leontius saw no further reason to adhere to the obligation to silence of the New Laura and carelessly preached his doctrines. Now Sabas's eyes were opened and he indignantly expelled Leontius from his escort and very imprudently returned to Palestine without him; there he died in 532. Leontius received reinforcements from the Palestinian Eremos, notably the monks Dometian and Theodore Askidas.[11] What they told the Emperor, to whom they gained access, and what he understood of it, we do not know. In any event, they gained him for their cause, and he made Theodore Metropolitan of Caesarea in Cappadocia and Dometian Metropolitan of Ancyra. But Theodore preferred to linger in proximity to the Emperor and left his bishopric to take care of itself.

---

[8] See supra, chap. 9.

[9] On the entire matter, cf. F. Diekamp, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im 6. Jh. und das fünfte allgemeine Concil (Münster 1899); E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skythopolis, 386ff.

Meanwhile, the Patriarch Paul of Alexandria had disappointed all the hopes which the Emperor had set on him. His acts of violence became intolerable, and even complicity in the murder of a deacon could be charged to him. Hence the Emperor had him banished to Gaza, where a Synod was supposed to depose him. The Synod did its duty, and the imperial delegates who had attended it were now confronted on the spot with Origenism. One of them, Papas Eusebius, influential at court, sought to finish with the problem by giving to the Abbot of the New Laura the order either to receive back the expelled Origenists or to drive the most determined anti-Origenists from the monastery. The [10] Whether this Leontius is identical with that Leontius of Byzantium who was so concerned for the history of dogma is disputed. E. Schwartz, op. cit., 388f., denies this; M. Richard, "Léonce de Byzance était-il origeniste?" RÉB, 5 (1947), 31–66, favors it; cf. the history of the controversy in S. Helmer, Neuchalkedonismus, 31ff.

---

[11] On Dometian and Theodore, cf. the literature in Beck, 384.

Abbot Gelasius decided for the latter course. Those expelled now turned to the Zealous Patriarch of Antioch, Ephrem, who at once anathematized the Origenists. Dometian and Theodore Askidas, who learned of this at Constantinople, sought to induce the Patriarch of Constantinople, Menas, to renounce Ephrem's communion. But in the meantime a detailed written complaint arrived from the anti-Origenists from Palestine, who spoke out against the intrigues of their opponents. The Patriarch sent it on to the Emperor Justinian, who soon issued a severe edict against the person and doctrine of Origen.[12]

If the question is asked, who at court was sufficiently influential to put through such a measure against Papas Eusebius, against Askidas and Dometian, the answer is hardly the Patriarch Menas; most probably we may see the initiator in the Deacon Pelagius, who as apocrisiarius had taken part in the Synod of Gaza. Whoever it may have been, once he had been called upon, the Emperor completely plucked the strings of his theological instrument. His edict was not only the proclamation of measures but a theological treatise in the form of a conciliar decree. It not only proposed to refute Origen but also to defame him: with quotations, chiefly from Peri Archon, it made fun of the doctrine, which it then summarized in ten anathemas, to which the obedient theologians and prelates had only to submit. The edict may be dated at the beginning of 542. The Patriarch Menas was instructed to have it signed by all the clergy of the capital and to send the report of it to all other bishops for their signature. Neither the Pope nor any other Patriarch declined to sign. Of course, the leading Origenists refused to accept this decision and preferred to leave the laura for good and look for a place of refuge elsewhere. Dometian seems likewise to have rejected the edict after some hesitation, whereas Theodore Askidas apparently was able to force himself to sign it.

Origenism seemed to have received a mortal blow. But the appearance was deceptive, for under an assumed name the great mystics of the Byzantine Church again came under Origen's spell.[13]

---

[12] Decree against the Origenists: PG 86, 1, 945–990; ACO III, 189–214.

[13] Cf. A. Guillaumont, Les "Kephalaia gnostika" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origenisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens (Paris 1962).

CHAPTER 25

The Controversy over the Three Chapters and the Fifth General Council. End of the Age of Justinian

By the "Three Chapters" are understood the person and the work of three theologians who played a certain role in the period between the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, and gradually, without the situation having required it, became a bone of contention between the different factions in ecclesiastical politics. In the first place was a letter of Ibas of Edessa from the period after the Union of 433, which by no means defended Nestorius but expressed other than friendly feelings toward Cyril of Alexandria. The letter recognized the Union of 433, but its author was not inclined to see in the great exegete, Theodore of Mopsuestia, the father of Nestorianism and hence to condemn him. Next, Theodore of Mopsuestia himself. People had long ago begun to characterize his theology as Nestorian, and now efforts were made to condemn him and his work posthumously, even though neither Ephesus nor Chalcedon had been prepared to do so. In the third place were some writings of Theodoret of Cyrrhus, which were directed against Cyril's Anathemas. As early as 431 Cyril himself had exerted himself in vain for the condemnation of Theodore. But he was opposed on the ground that in his lifetime Theodore had not been accused of a heresy and that he had died in peace with the Church. It would not do to insult such a man after his death. Ibas as well as Theodoret had, it is true, been deposed by the Robber Synod in 449, but Chalcedon had rehabilitated both. The latter Synod had as little to find fault with in Ibas's letter as in the anti-Cyrillan writings of Theodoret. In other words: an attack on these three kephalaia was basically an attack on the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. To be obstinate in regard to the letter of Ibas and then to argue that it was not from Ibas and in this way to respect the authority of the Council, which had thus rehabilitated someone other than the author of the letter, was clearly hairsplitting, since the Council had also implicitly recognized the content of the letter. The attack on Theodore revealed not only a complete lack of understanding of the development of ideas, but also simply a loss of decency in ecclesiastical politics. But Theodoret simply had to be sacrificed, because he had put his finger too well on Cyril's weaknesses. What could induce circles which pretended to stand for Chalcedon to make these Three Chapters the target of ruthless attacks and thereby shake confidence in the Council? Looked at as a whole, probably only the persistent anxiety of appearing in the eyes of the Monophysites as Nestorians, of abetting a Nestorian interpretation of Christological dogma with the formulas of Chalcedon, and of compromising the sincerity of the adherence to Orthodoxy with the just-mentioned personalities and their work. They might have been of the opinion that, if the Three Chapters were thrown overboard, the Severans could be induced to return. The backbiting of Church history, of course, gives more concrete motives.[1] It knows the name of the man who had systematically prepared the attack and it knows his motives: Theodore Askidas, in the role of adviser of the Emperor, was exposed to the gravest risks through the attacks on Origenism, which were not least of all aimed at him, and he was intent on revenge, which should be aimed at the strict Chalcedonians, who had denounced Origenism to the Emperor. In the attack on the Three Chapters he found the way, under the pretext of purging Chalcedon of disagreeable concomitants, of striking at the very heart of the Council and at the same time of involving the Emperor in a theological conflict of such magnitude that, for its sake, he would have to forget about Origenism and would be happy to retain Askidas as adviser.

However matters may have proceeded, Askidas was successful in convincing the imperial theologian of his ideas. Justinian was quickly prepared to compose a scholarly treatise in which he explained the Three Chapters in detail. To it were appended anathemas against Theodore of Mopsuestia and his writings, against the works which Theodoret had composed against Cyril, and against the letter of Ibas and all those who claimed that Ibas was its author—probably the first censure in Church history in the question of literary criticism! Justinian explicitly felt he had to make sure that these anathemas had no other purpose than to confirm the decrees of 451. The treatise has been lost.[2] It must have been composed and published in the period between 543 and 545. While one could acknowledge in the case of the imperial decree against the Origenists that a single one summarized the arguments of the first Origenist controversy and that therefore the condemnation produced nothing substantially new, in his decree against the Three Chapters—for the treatise claimed to be just that—Justinian acted in a totally authoritarian manner as master of the Church and of dogma, without the backing of a synod and even for a long time without envisaging a confirmation by a synod. The bishops received the formal command to sign the anathemas. But this time there were difficulties. The Patriarch

---

[1] Liberatus goes into detail on this in his Breviarium causae Nestorianorum et Eutychianorum, ACO II, 5, 140ff.

[2] Fragments in E. Schwartz, Zur Kirchenpolitik Justinians (Munich 1940), 73ff.

Menas of Constantinople finally signed, together with his synod, but obtained the promise that he could withdraw his signature if the Pope refused to sign. Alexandria caused hardly any difficulties, but the Patriarch Ephrem of Antioch probably did, although he likewise finally yielded. More trouble came from Palestine, where especially the pro-Chalcedon monks put pressure on the Patriarch. A great number of the bishops of the West maintained a decidedly negative attitude. The Pope's apocrisiarii at Constantinople refused the communion of the Patriarch Menas because he had signed; the African episcopate and most of the bishops of Italy and Gaul made the most vigorous opposition. And so it had to be the Emperor's chief task to gain the Pope. Pope Vigilius had succeeded to the See of Peter in Rome in 537; his role in the deposition of his predecessor Silverius by Belisarius had given occasion for suspicions,[3] and he seemed, in relation to the Byzantine government, to have always had a bad conscience. Now, for simplicity's sake, Justinian summoned him to Constantinople; only when he arrived there, in 547, was the new document officially presented to him for his signature. The conduct of the Pope now and in the sequel hardly requires commentary. To brand it as weak and purposeless is to make use of mild expressions. At first everything appeared quite promising. Like his apocrisiarii, he refused the communion of Menas, who apparently did not bother any longer to speak of the assurance that he could withdraw his signature. Menas got his revenge by no longer mentioning the Pope in the liturgy. But Justinian employed every possible means of pressure to induce the Pope to give in. Thus in the course of 547 Vigilius resumed communion with Menas and in April 548 he issued his famous Judicatum, in which he abandoned the Three Chapters, even if not without qualifications.[4] The agitation over this yielding by the Pope grew mightily and affected even his immediate entourage. Finally, Vigilius saw himself compelled to excommunicate even a group of deacons who had come with him from Rome to Constantinople, in order to defend himself from their disagreeable criticism. In return, he was himself excommunicated by a Synod of African bishops. The situation reached a dangerous climax for the Pope especially in the West, causing him to spread abroad that he had been induced by ignoble methods to publish the Judicatum. Justinian yielded for a moment and condescended to let the Pope abandon the Judicatum with the assurance that the matter should be decided at a synod. In return, he of course had the [3] Liberatus claims that, in order to become Pope, Vigilius had promised the Empress Theodora that he would abandon Chalcedon.

---

[4] It can be reconstructed from the Constitutum to be mentioned infra: cf. Coll. Avell., no. 83, 316–317.

Pope give a written and sworn assurance that he would cooperate with all his power for the condemnation of the Three Chapters and undertake nothing without coming to an understanding with Justinian—a complete surrender of the Pope, which naturally was kept secret. The Synod was a long time in coming: bishops on whose appearance the court set great store did not arrive, and it was desired to keep others as far as possible from the capital. Thus it was not difficult for Askidas to persuade the Emperor again solemnly to condemn the Three Chapters by a decree with thirteen anathemas in July 551.[5] Askidas himself undertook to deliver the decree to the Pope. But, now, probably under pressure from the western bishops, the Pope demanded the withdrawal of the edict and threatened Askidas and the Patriarch Menas with excommunication. At the same time he regarded it as necessary to seek security after this attack, and so he fled from his lodgings in the Domus Placidiae to seek asylum in the Church of St. Peter in the Palace of Hormisdas, where he then officially excommunicated Askidas.[6] Justinian tried by means of police power to drag the Pope from his asylum but Vigilius literally defended himself with hands and feet. Only when the Emperor gave him a guarantee of his personal freedom could he be induced to return to the Domus Placidiae. However, since Justinian did not keep his promise, but treated him like a prisoner, he fled a second time, now across the Propontis to the Council Church of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon. Again there were on the Emperor's part all possible assurances, broken by roughness and acts of violence. Even Belisarius could not move the Pope to return. Here Vigilius published an encyclical,[7] in which he sought to justify his behavior and declared the deposition of Askidas. The Pope's followers even succeeded in publicly posting in various places the bulls of excommunication against Menas and Askidas. A definitive break seemed to be in preparation, but Justinian did not want matters to go so far. He got Menas and Askidas to apologize to the Pope, who then returned to Constantinople. Soon after, in August 552, Menas died, and the new Patriarch Eutychius declared from the beginning his loyalty to the Pope. Now there was definitive agreement to entrust the final decision to a synod. There followed difficult negotiations on the make-up of the Council; the Emperor succeeded in imposing his own ideas, which aimed only at the condemnation of the Three Chapters, in such a way that there remained to the Pope slight prospect of letting the opposition of the West exercise its impact; he was de facto deprived of any power of decision and accordingly decided not to participate in the sessions of the Council. The Synod—the so-called Fifth Ecumenical Council—met on 5 May 553, with 166 bishops present, of whom only a dozen represented the West. For tactical reasons Justinian also stayed away, but he let the bishops know that they had already condemned the Three Chapters by their signatures on the imperial edict, that the Pope also had condemned them, and that now there was in principle only a question of a ratification of these decrees. The Council exerted itself to persuade the Pope to participate, but Vigilius was content with holding out the prospect of an official opinion. Now as earlier, he made his participation in the sessions dependent on a stronger representation of western bishops. The Council proceeded to the agenda and began with the preparation for the condemnation of the Three Chapters. At this moment, on 14 May, the Pope published a Constitutum,[8] which he signed together with nine Italian bishops, two from Africa, two from Illyricum, and three from Asia Minor. "By virtue of his apostolic authority," Vigilius condemned sixty propositions from the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia but strictly refrained from condemning this Church Father himself, just as he declined to anathematize Theodoret or the author of the Ibas letter, because thereby the decrees of Chalcedon would have been brought into question. The Constitutum forbade any polemic against the Three Chapters which went beyond this decree. True, the Emperor refused absolutely to receive the Constitutum, but nevertheless its content became known; causing the Emperor to pursue the route of publicity. He laid before the Council Fathers a packet of documents with letters of the Pope in which he defended his Judicatum and especially the minutes of his taking of his oath in 550. Thereupon the Fathers expunged the Pope's name from the diptychs, without excommunicating him. The authority of the Apostolic See as such was not to be impugned.

---

[5] E. Schwartz, Drei dogmatische Schriften Justinians, 72–111.

[6] Text in E. Schwartz, Vigiliusbriefe (Munich 1940), 10–15.

[7] E. Schwartz, op. cit., 1–10.

On 2 June 553, at the last session, the Synod finally accomplished, in fourteen anathemas taken from Justinian's decree, the condemnation of the Three Chapters in due form. Theodore Askidas seemed to have won all along the line: Justinian had indeed no longer spent any time in implementing his decree against the Origenists; they dominated in the monasteries and episcopal sees of Palestine. But in Abbot Conon of the Great Laura there now arose unexpectedly a dangerous opponent, who knew exactly that they had their protector in Askidas. In 551 he himself appeared at Constantinople and denounced their doings to the Emperor. Justinian awoke and decided by means of a letter to the bishops who had come to the Council to bring up the matter again. To facilitate the proceedings he garnished his treatise again, likewise with fifteen anathemas.[9] Although we do not know the course of the negotiations, it is certain that the bishops made no difficulties. Their sentence was directed not only and not first against Origen himself, but against the Origenists of Palestine and concomitantly now also against Evagrius Ponticus. The negotiations must, in all probability, have been concluded in March 553 before the beginning of the Council, and Vigilius seems to have assented without hesitation.

---

[8] Coll. Avell., no. 83, 230–320.

After everything had thus been "settled," the Emperor demanded all bishops who had not taken part in the Synod to sign its decrees. In the East there were only slight difficulties. The Origenists were expelled from the New Laura, and some bishops were removed from their sees. More important was the decision of the Pope. Rome, again firmly in Byzantine hands since 552, urgently called for the return of its Bishop. Justinian required as a preliminary that Vigilius recognize the condemnation of the Three Chapters. Once again the Pope yielded and on 8 December 553 uttered the condemnation.[10] On 23 March 554 a new Constitutum was published by the Pope, in which he denied the authenticity of the letter of Ibas and his vindication by the Council of Chalcedon.[11] Finally, in the spring of 555, the Pope was able to leave Constantinople. But en route he died at Syracuse. Thereby the opposition in the West obtained a still freer course and, despite severe police reprisals, stood firm. When finally the deacon Pelagius, who had again and again kept Vigilius on the path of the old convictions and hence had been imprisoned by the Emperor, also followed the route of recognition of the Council, this was now reason enough for the Emperor to impose him on the Romans as their Bishop in 556. The resistance which he encountered in Rome induced him, of course, to revise his attitude. But the schism between the Apostolic See and important portions of the western episcopate could not be prevented any longer.

As regards the Monophysites, the decrees of 553 left them completely unmoved. The Emperor's secret hope of still winning them back sadly miscarried, and Justinian seems never to have got over it. Perhaps this is the explanation of a renewed approach to a Monophysite faction, the final caprice of the imperial theologian. Allegedly it was a Palestinian bishop who made him more conversant with the doctrine of Julian of Halicarnassus,[12] the so-called Aphthartodocetism, according to which the body of Christ was an aphtharton, an incorruptible being, so that he could suffer on the Cross only because a special miracle made this possible. The representatives of this doctrine, also called Gaianites from one of their leaders, were especially widespread in Egypt, and perhaps once again the Emperor indulged in the hope of being able to gain, if not the Severans, at least this faction of Monophysites. He let himself be convinced of the correctness of Aphthartodocetism,[13] and, as was his custom, he then at once drew up a decree for a creed in favor of this doctrine, which was to be submitted to all bishops for their signature. The Patriarch Eutychius in the capital itself refused any sort of assent. But since the Emperor knew better, the Patriarch had to go into exile in 565. Whether the decree was really officially published is unknown. In any event, its content quickly became known and stirred up general displeasure, not only in the West but also in the East. Before the new conflict broke out fully, however, the Emperor died on 14 November 565, and no one was found who would accept and carry out his last idea.

---

[9] On the authenticity and dating, F. Diekamp, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten, 82ff. Text of the anathemas, 90–97.

[10] Mansi IX, 419f.

[11] Mansi IX, 457–488.

[12] R. Draguet, Julien d'Halicarnasse et sa controverse avec Sévère d'Antioche sur l'incorruptibilité du corps du Christ (Louvain 1924).

With Justinian an era in Church history came to an end. From his own political viewpoint, his work may have been conclusive in the sphere of the Church; for Church history itself it started out promisingly orthodox, then was modified by the Theopaschite Formula, only to act in direct loyalty to the Pope in the years around 536. But then the route led to the Three Chapters, and he sacrificed an old, sober, precious theological legacy on the altar of a policy which in itself was hopeless. That great portions of the Church followed him along these dangerous roads of dilettantism meant for the Church a theological impoverishment, which could not be balanced for a long time, entirely apart from the fact that it gave no good testimony to the theological firmness of the bishops. Especially noteworthy was the style with which the Emperor put over his ideas. As he changed dogma and faith without regard for the Church's doctrinal authority, so before him no Emperor had so acted, and scarcely any—apart perhaps from Manuel I in the twelfth century—followed him in this: a proof that such a behavior cannot be derived simply from the Byzantine imperial idea, from the imperial "priesthood," and so forth. It may surprise, but, thus seen, Justinian was not even typical of the Byzantine imperial office—he was almost a unique phenomenon. Of course, with this manner of his, he established limiting values, which always remained perilously visible in Byzantium.

---

[13] M. Jugie, "L'empereur Justinien a-t-il été aphthartodocète?" ÉO 35 (1932), 399–404. An attempt to vindicate Justinian: M. Anastos, "The Immutability of Christ and Justinian's Condemnation of Theodore of Mopsuestia," DOP 6 (1951), 123–160.

CHAPTER 26

Justinian's Successors: Monoenergism and Monothelitism

If it is pretty certain that the Empress Theodora decisively influenced Justinian's ecclesiastical policy and no less decisively impeded it, so too it is not improbable that her niece Sophia, wife of the new Emperor Justin II (565–578), who until shortly before his accession to the throne is said to have sided with the Monophysites, had a hand in the affair when the Emperor began, after the start of his reign, to steer a course of meeting the Monophysites halfway. Imprisoned and exiled Monophysite bishops were permitted to return, efforts were undertaken through the mediation of imperial emissaries to settle intra-Monophysite dissensions, and finally Jacob Baradai was invited, together with the leading members of his Church, to a union conference at Constantinople. The discussions lasted for months without, of course, producing any concrete results. And so Justin II tried, as had the Emperor Zeno earlier, a new Henoticon in 567,[1] which again imposed Zeno's formulas, condemned the Three Chapters, granted amnesty to the Monophysites, recommended the rehabilitation of Severus—and did not mention Chalcedon. But for the Monophysites this was not enough. An imperial agent was supposed to persuade bishops and monks to accept it at a conference held at Callinicum on the Euphrates. Jacob Baradai and his loyalists would have been inclined to agree with the document with a few clarifications, but the monks especially wanted to have nothing to do with an imperial effort at union, so that the meeting ended with a shrill dissonance within the faction. Now the Emperor prepared a new version of the edict,[2] which recognized "the one nature of the Logos-made-Man" and spoke of a mental distinction of the natures, again without mentioning Chalcedon, but also without returning to the rehabilitation of Severus. The decree was to be implemented by force, and the Patriarch John the Scholastic of Constantinople (565–577) did all he could to let compulsion run its course. There were arrests and deportations in all areas. The persecution did not cease until Justin II gradually lapsed into insanity, and Tiberius II in 574 assumed control of the government in his stead and, after Justin's death, mounted the throne (578–582). The Patriarchs, including Eutychius, who had been called back from exile after John's death in 577, sought to continue the persecution, but the Emperor did not care to have much to do with it, and Eutychius himself soon became implicated in a doctrine on the resurrection of all flesh, which made him suspect of heresy.[3] The policy of Tiberius was probably also influenced by the aim of not antagonizing the Monophysite Arabs on the important Persian frontier. He solemnly received their Phylarch, al-Mundir, at Constantinople and did much to oblige his demands for the release of persecuted Monophysites. If he later abandoned al-Mundir on the advice of Maurice, his successor, there were other reasons for this.[4] The religious policy of Tiberius was continued by Maurice (582–602), who without doubt was personally a Chalcedonian. Under Phocas (602–610) and in the early years of the reign of Heraclius (610–641) the great attack of the Persians, who occupied parts of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, made such demands on the policy of the Emperors that there remained little time for the old denominational quarrels. In addition, the Persian occupation withdrew especially the Monophysites more or less from the imperial power. The problems did not again appear until Heraclius in long campaigns had forced the Persians to their knees, even if the preliminaries lay further in the past. The Jews, who, even if they had not encouraged the Persian invasion, had warmly greeted it, could hardly hope for mercy. The imperial troops made short work of them, and the struggle against them culminated in the imperial edict of compulsory conversion.[5] How should the Monophysites be dealt with, that is, not a minority but the population of entire provinces? Some of them, such as the Ghassanid Arabs, whom Maurice had treated so shabbily because of military distrust, may have done little to oppose the Persians, and the latter seem to have repaid this attitude. Michael the Syrian reports from this period: "The memory of the Chalcedonians was wiped out from the Euphrates eastward." Could the imperial government further disregard the separatist tendencies of the heterodox Syrians and Copts? Heraclius reflected on a solution and again sought the remedy in ecclesiastical union. His loyal and outstanding assistant in this was the Patriarch Sergius (610–638),[6] who had not the slightest interest in fishing in the troubled waters of Church policy. To make him suffer for what people are unwilling to charge to Pope Honorius I is one of the indiscretions of Church history. If it is said to have been the weakness of the Chalcedonian Christology that it did not clearly enough elaborate the unity over the duality, and if on the other hand the duality of natures in Christ could no longer be sacrificed, but the idea of person was still somewhat colorless, one could then seek the unity in Christ's will and activity. Already in some neo-Chalcedonian theologians were found formulas which referred to the mia energeia, the unique divine principle of activity in Christ.[7] To the Patriarch this formula seemed promising, and very soon he worked on a patristic florilegium which could multiply the testimonies in favor of it. In this Sergius seems to have relied especially on Bishop Theodore of Pharan, about whose loyalty to Chalcedon there was no doubt; and also on Bishop Cyrus of Phasis,[8] who in 631 was appointed by the Emperor as Patriarch of the Church of the Empire in Alexandria. Cyrus was prepared to forge out of this stock of ideas those formulas which should be presented to the Christian public as the basis of the common faith. In nine propositions, which had as content the fruit of the neo-Chalcedonian theology, that is, the reconciliation between Cyril and 451, the "Pact" was solemnly proclaimed at Alexandria on 3 June 633:[9] its principal item was the doctrine of one and the same Christ, operating divinely and humanly, "with the one theandric energy" (theandrine energeia)—a term for which one could appeal to the "unquestionable" authority of the Pseudo-Areopagite. The Monophysites exulted: "Now we no longer need to come to the Council of Chalcedon: it comes to us!" But the opposition was not slow to appear. The monk Sophronius, who soon after became Patriarch of Jerusalem (634–38), protested against the Formula of Union. He held to the Aristotelian principle that energy flows from nature, that hence in Christ two energies were to be admitted. He journeyed to the Patriarch Sergius at Constantinople, and it was characteristic of the latter that he was prepared to negotiate. Agreement was reached that for the future it was proper not to speak of energies at all but of the one operating Christ (heis kai autos energon); in other words, the one Operator should be stressed, not the principle of operation or the agency. Sophronius apparently deviated from his two energies because he could not refer to any patristic passages for the use of this formula. In any case, he relied on the agreement with the Patriarch when he also in his encyclical[10] left no doubt that in theory two natures have two principles of operation as their consequence. But now the Patriarch Sergius published a Judicatum,[11] which likewise abandoned the abstract formula of the one energy in favor of the concrete personal energy of the one operating

---

[1] Evagrius, HE V, 4, reports on the Emperor's Henoticon.

[2] Evagrius, op. cit.

---

[3] Cf. Beck, 380.

[4] See infra, p. 466.

[5] F. Dölger, Regesten der byzantinischen Kaiserurkunden, no. 206.

[6] Grumel Reg, no. 279–292; J. L. van Dieten, Geschichte der Patriarchen von Sergius I. bis Johannes VI. (610–715) (Amsterdam 1972).

---

[7] See especially W. Elert, Der Ausgang der altchristlichen Christologie (Berlin 1957).

[8] Beck, 431.

[9] Hefele-Leclercq III, 1, 333–343.

[10] Mansi XI, 461–510.

[11] Insert: Mansi XI, 533 C-E. V. Grumel, ÉO 27 (1928), 13, presupposes 536 E–537A. Cf., however, id. Regest, 287.

Christ. Even Maximus Confessor later regarded the formula as a good solution. For the Monophysites, of course, it could only be boring, for with it the problem of whether there was one or two natures was again wiped off the table. Sergius described the content and trend of his doctrinal decision in a letter to Pope Honorius.[12] The Pope agreed that there should be no talk of two energies; that it had not happened up to now and could produce confusion in terminology. He accepted the Patriarch's formula and inferred from it that it is appropriate to speak of one will (una voluntas) in Christ.[13] The vindication of the Pope needs no sophisms: He quoted the words of Jesus: "I have come, not to do my own will, but the will of him who sent me" and "Not my will be done, but thine," and so he somehow accepted a basic human principle of willing in Christ. If he then spoke of una voluntas, he obviously did not mean this basic principle but the concrete act of the will at a given time, which is determined by the divine will and only by it. The misfortune was that now again, instead of one word, an unclarified substantive was employed, which could be interpreted both as the basic principle as well as, in the final analysis, a decisive arbitrium.

Sergius was delighted with the initial help which the Pope offered him. And if the Pope preferred the formula una voluntas, then the Patriarch was prepared to put it in place of the mia energeia, which had anyhow already been abandoned; it became hen thelema in Greek. He gained the Emperor for a decree and in 638, the very year of the deaths of both the Patriarch and the Pope, there appeared Heraclius's Ecthesis,[14] in which the prohibition was issued against speaking of one or two energies, and instead one will in Christ was decreed as the statement of faith, again with the reason that Christ in the flesh had never been separated from the will of the Logos or had willed anything against it; that is, thelema was not interpreted as a theoretical faculty but as the actual will. What was harmful here was not theology but terminology.

Maximus Confessor, who had once been in the service of Heraclius, had then become a monk, and had fled from the Persians to Africa, first revealed himself as the man who was competent to deal with the linguistic difficulties of a philosophical nature. After a long period of preparation, in which he did not pin himself down, around 640 he vigorously intervened in the controversy.[15] For him, thelema physikon was a basic principle which belonged to the nature, and, since he was an enthusiastic adherent of the Council of Chalcedon, he was thus a Dyothelite. He had to reject the formula of Pope Honorius and the Ecthesis; true, he interpreted the Pope in an orthodox manner, whereas he did not do likewise with the Greek term. Otherwise, there was a predicament with the "gnomic" thelema, which was identical with the arbitrium, a property of the person; in Christ there can be only one since he subsists in the divine Person. The wretchedness of the following discussions consisted in this, that too little regard was had for this saving distinction, and probably also in this that Maximus demanded too much; that is, in the case of each one who spoke of one thelema without distinction he suspected that he thereby meant the physical faculty in itself. Hence, while in the eastern part of the Empire here and there the desire for union on the basis of the Ecthesis appeared, there arose in Byzantine Africa a center of resistance to the imperial policy. In view of the situation, the Emperor Constans II (641–668) decided on a new decree. His Typus[16] of 648 forbade any discussion at all of one or two energies and of one or two wills and abrogated the Ecthesis. Naturally, this prohibition had not the slightest prospect of being observed. Finally, Maximus turned to Rome, where the new Pope, Martin I, showed a complete sympathy for his train of thought. And so in 649 there was held a Lateran Synod which was entirely under the influence of Maximus's ideology. The Council Fathers repudiated both the Ecthesis of Heraclius and the Typus of Constans. They defined the doctrine of the two wills in Christ and excommunicated Sergius, his successor Pyrrhus, and Cyrus of Phasis, as if the distinctions of Maximus had in their day been common property. That they excepted Honorius from censure can be understood then really only on the basis of the ideas of the papacy. The Emperor Constans reacted with extreme violence. In 653 he had Pope Martin taken from Rome to Constantinople, where he was tried for high treason, probably because the Exarch of Ravenna, who was supposed to have arrested him in 650, had let himself be acclaimed as anti-Emperor in Rome and had come to an agreement with Pope Martin, which certainly could not be thought of without a tacit recognition of the usurpation by the Pope. In any event, there was no further mention of the original reason for the arrest, and every effort of the Pope during the trial to bring the Typus and the Monothelite controversy into the discussion was rejected by the court. Finally, the Pope was condemned to death for high treason, and then reprieved with banishment, in which he died in 655. In 653 the imperial police were also able to take Maximus into custody and deport him to Constantinople, where he too underwent a trial for high treason. It seems that his friendship with the Byzantine

---

[12] Mansi XI, 529–537.

[13] Mansi XI, 537–544. Cf. P. Galtier, "La première lettre du pape Honorius," Gr 29 (1948), 42–61.

[14] Mansi X, 992–997; see the synodal decree, op. cit., 1000–1001 in fragmentary form.

[15] Cf. P. Sherwood, An Annotated Date-List of the Works of Maximus the Confessor (Rome 1952).

---

[16] Mansi X, 1029–1032.

Exarch Gregory of Carthage became his cause of doom, because this Exarch likewise had himself acclaimed as anti-Emperor. Mutilated in hands and tongue, Maximus died in exile in 662. With this the climax of the controversy was overstepped. Constans II still attempted personally to make his authority felt in the West, but he was assassinated in Sicily in 668.

Constans II was succeeded by Constantine IV (668–685). He had no interest in the continuation of the quarrel, which had reached a deadlock. The Monophysites could not be gained back. The greatest proportion of them had not been under Byzantine rule for a long time, and there was no hope that the Empire would recover the lost eastern provinces. Africa, which had been the center of the opposition for a considerable time, had lost its leader with Maximus and besides had now likewise come under the control of Islam. The new orientation of Byzantine policy, which allowed greater weight to Byzantine Italy, made it seem appropriate to draw the Pope away from an opposition that was not without danger to the Empire. In 680 Pope Agatho could hold a preparatory Synod with 125 bishops, which in the spirit of that of 649 condemned Monothelitism. Then in 680–81 the Sixth Ecumenical Council was held at Constantinople, with the Emperor himself presiding. A letter from the Pope[17] was submitted to the Council Fathers which indicated the route to be followed. Almost all the bishops accepted the papal decree. Only six constituted an exception, including the Patriarch Macarius of Antioch, who seems to have remained the sole representative of the doctrine of Sergius. All were anathematized, and this censure was later extended to Theodore of Pharan, Cyrus of Phasis, the Patriarchs Sergius and Pyrrhus, and finally even to Pope Honorius. What was thereby condemned was a terminology, which could meanwhile be regarded as out of date. Historically, the verdicts were hardly justified, as the explanation of the Patriarch Macarius at the Synod made clear. The definition of the Synod itself spoke of two physical faculties of will in Christ, whose goals were not directed against each other, because the human will was in everything subject to the divine, almighty will.[18] The condemnation of the unyielding bishops produced no schism. The act was over, and no one wanted to go back to it. A question was disposed of, which had long ago lost its ecclesiastical and political meaning. After the Monophysites on the whole no longer belonged to the Empire, all these controversies had lost their threatening background: Orthodoxy withdrew into itself—Byzantium had become smaller.

---

[17] MPG 87, 1161ff.

[18] Hefele-Leclercq III, 472–538; K. Hirsch, "Papst Honorius und das VI. allgemeine Konzil," Festschr. der 57. Vers. der Philol. in Salzburg 1929 (Baden 1929), 157–179; J. Rissberger, Das Glaubensbekenntnis des Patriarchen Makarius von Antiochien (Rome 1940; dissertation, partly printed).

There was one more episode when in 711–13 the Emperor Philippicus Bardanes in an imperial edict repudiated the decrees of the Sixth Ecumenical Council and declared Monothelitism to be the sole admissible ecclesiastical doctrine. With his overthrow, the phantom disappeared. And if later the Iconoclast Struggle was shoved into the Christological rut, intellectual connections cannot, it is true, be denied, but orthodox Christology in the precise meaning of the word was settled for all the Byzantine centuries by the Sixth Ecumenical Council. The victory was fragile, because all too much that was sound had been sacrificed, but an ever more schematized dogma did not in any case track down these losses, and some things that had earlier been regarded as Monophysite had meanwhile become orthodox through the work of the neo-Chalcedonians or had become the property of piety. Monophysitism and Monothelitism could be regarded as defeated, but they had long before brought a part of their religious concerns to safety in Orthodoxy.

CHAPTER 27

The Rise of National Churches on the Frontiers of the Byzantine Empire

The Church of the Nestorians

The theological problem of so-called Nestorianism was first decided at the Council of Ephesus in 431. But for the Orthodox world only the Fifth Ecumenical Council of 553 at Constantinople, with its condemnation of the Three Chapters, drew the final conclusions, in part unnecessary, but in any case dogmatically not without danger. The decision of Ephesus would perhaps not have led to a breaking away of a separate Church, if, together with Nestorius, there had not also been a target in the great theologian of the Syrian Church, Theodore of Mopsuestia, the head of a school of exegesis which possessed canonical recognition for the East Syrian region and whose doctrines had found their domicile in the theological school of Edessa, one of the most exemplary educational institutions of Christianity.[1] It is true that the Bishop of Edessa, Rabbula, sought by every means to enforce the decrees of Ephesus and the Union of 433, but Ibas, the head of the School of Edessa, continued in the opposition, so that the Bishop finally dismissed him from the school. But Rabbula died in 435, and the following of the expelled teacher was so large that Ibas could now be elected his successor. To call him a Nestorian presupposes some arbitrariness. What he did not want was that Alexandrian terminology of a Christological enthusiasm should simply drive Antiochene sobriety from the field. Ibas had quite a hard time during his episcopate. The Robber Synod of 449 deposed him, but Chalcedon restored him, and he died in 457. He was followed by a metropolitan who now sought strictly to enforce Chalcedon. The opposition of the school was a thorn in his side, and the head of the school, whom Ibas had appointed, Narses, had to quit the field. As early as 433, when the Formula of Union had come into existence, some bishops of the Antiochene patriarchate, who were unwilling to accept this compromise, had settled in Persia. Also condemned by the Robber Synod, a disciple of Ibas named Bar-Sauma (d. before 496) followed them and became Bishop of Nisibis. Narses now joined him and at Nisibis they established as an offshoot of the school of Edessa the "School of the Persians," in which Nestorianism found a new home.[2] It may be said that, with this flight of Narses, Nestorianism as a denomination with the ability to develop into a Church came to an end in the Byzantine Empire. Instead, it now found a home in the Persian Kingdom, where it grew into the Christian "territorial Church." The School of Nisibis was in great demand; the organization was exemplary, the resources abundant, so that here generations of theologians and clerics could be trained who gave the Persian Church its best framework and helped it overcome the dangers of its isolated position on the border of the Universal Church. Bar-Sauma himself was one of the most vigorous representatives of this territorial Church. He was a tireless missionary, opposed the spread of the Monophysites and Messalians,[3] maintained a good relationship with the Great King of Persia, and knew how to use every means that could serve his ideas. That Nestorianism found entry into the Persian Church so easily is certainly connected with the fact that the School of Edessa had already established a reputation as a school whose graduates had for a long time spread their ideas in Persia; but probably also with the fact that the Church of Persia, which must have expressed itself emphatically in a Synod of 424 for its autonomy, that is, for its independence of Antioch, could develop in Nestorianism something like a theological self-awareness as opposed to West Syria and the Byzantine Empire.

---

[1] E. R. Hayes, L'école d'Édesse (Paris 1930).

---

[2] A. Vööbus, "Un vestige d'une lettre de Narsai et son importance historique," OrSyr 9 (1964), 515–523, dates the founding in 471; the School of Edessa was closed in 489, and the opponents of Orthodoxy migrated to Nisibis. Cf. also J. B. Chabot, "L'école de Nisibe, son histoire, ses statuts," JA, ser. IX, 8 (1896), 43–93; A. Vööbus, The Statutes of the School of Nisibis (Stockholm 1962); id., "Abraham de Bet Rabban and his Rôle in the Hermeneutic Tradition of the School of Nisibis," HThR 58 (1965), 203–214.

[3] A. Vööbus, Les messaliens et les réformes de Barçauma de Nisibe dans l'église perse (Pinneberg 1947).

At the head of this Persian Church there stood, at the latest from the beginning of the fifth century, a "Great Metropolitan," also called Katholikos episkopos, with his see in the twin cities on the Tigris, Seleucia–Ctesiphon.[4] He soon had the position of a Patriarch: it was incumbent on him to determine the dates of the great festivities, to convoke synods, to summon the bishops to him every two years. On occasion, synods expanded his powers: then he intervened in the division of the bishoprics and probably also named the bishops himself, and at times an effort was made in important matters to supply him with a board by whose decisions he was to be bound. But in general he ruled monocratically, and not improperly the Synod of 424 designated him as "our Peter." Intrusions into this closed jurisdiction and hierarchy became noticeable in the sixth century, when in 540 the Persian King captured Antioch and deported a large part of the city's population to his kingdom. He settled them in a city of their own near Ctesiphon, called New Antioch or Romagyris (Rumagan). The new population must have been, if not Monophysite, in any event not Nestorian, and anti-Nestorian propaganda from these circles soon made itself apparent. But on the whole the Patriarchate of Antioch did not succeed in extending its jurisdiction over Persia by means of this base. The opportunity offered itself again only in the tenth to the eleventh centuries, but under entirely different historical presuppositions.

The Catholici gradually progressed into a position which was not unlike that of the Byzantine patriarchs. The Great King influenced their election and apparently also reserved to himself on occasion their confirmation and installation. In return the patriarchs had a high rank at court and were not rarely appointed to state functions, for example, for embassies to Byzantium and the like. Now and then the King lent them his bracchium saeculare when there was question of pursuing heretics or of energetically settling other internal ecclesiastical matters.

The most important Catholici of the fifth and sixth centuries were Babai II (d. 502) and Aba Mar I (d. 552). The former governed in a period of peace between Byzantium and Persia, and so the latent Monophysitism promoted by the Emperor Anastasius I was able to have a missionary effect in Persia. Babai tried to keep everything about his Church pure, but the influence of the Byzantine Emperor on the Great King was strong enough so that the persecution of Monophysites was not too serious. Aba Mar was a convert from Zoroastrianism, the Persian State religion, and as such especially suspect and exposed to persecution on the part of the State priesthood. Before his ordination he had made long journeys into the Byzantine Empire and he now tried to consolidate the canonical bases of his Church. For this purpose he did not hesitate to receive into the canonical collection of his Church even the canons of the Synod of Chalcedon in so far as they seemed pertinent to him. He founded new bishoprics and in addition to the School of Nisibis there now arose a special one at Seleucia, whose significance is clear from the fact that it could on occasion have a say in the election of the Catholicus. The activity of Aba Mar was all the more esteemed as it came in a period in which King Chosroes I imposed not inconsiderable restrictions on Christianity in Persia. Aba Mar himself finally fell victim to the persecution. He barely escaped death and had to go into exile, from which he tried to govern his Church with unbroken spirit. He died in 552, soon after having received amnesty. That Chosroe's personal physician was appointed as Aba Mar's successor was a singular expression of the circumstances. The position of the new Catholicus was for that reason substantially better than that of his predecessor, but he also misused it autocratically. Under King Chosroes II (590–628) the Christians long remained unmolested. He was under the influence of his Christian wife, Shirin, but probably more importantly, he owed his throne to the Byzantine Emperor Maurice. After the overthrow of this Emperor, he posed as his avenger against the Emperor Phocas, and there followed the great Persian–Byzantine war, which finally brought about the collapse of Sassanid rule. The more this war expanded, the more precarious became the situation of the Nestorian Christians. Apparently they were regarded as potential allies of the Greeks, and hence in 608 Chosroes forbade the election of a new Catholicus, and the Church remained without a head until 628. It was one of the most important theologians of the Church, Babai the Great, who, as a sort of abbot-general of the North Persian monasteries, found at this time the opportunity to assume the actual direction of the Church and to guard it against the worst. The difficulties increased, the more Byzantine territories came under Persian occupation. The population of Syria and Egypt was to a great extent Monophysite. Persecuted as Monophysites by the imperial central government, they apparently offered only slight resistance to the Persian occupation and hence won their sympathy. With this began a new wave of missionary propaganda of the Monophysites in regard to their opposites, the Nestorians, in Persia, and for a moment it even seemed that they would succeed in getting the Catholicate into their hands. In these circumstances the Persian bishops were glad to waive the election of a Catholicus, which would then have been possible. Not until 628, when Chosroes II was overthrown by his son with the help of a Nestorian Persian, was it again possible for the Nestorians to breathe freely, and a new Catholicus was elected. Babai, on whom the election deservedly fell, refused it. In his place was chosen Ishar Yahb (628–644 or 646). The years of his reign saw the collapse of Sassanid rule and the compulsory peace with Byzantium, in the concluding of which he took part as an official delegate. But they also saw the assault by Islam on the Persian Kingdom and thus the beginning of a new epoch for his Church.

---

[4] W. de Vries, "Antiochien und Seleucia–Ctesiphon, Patriarch und Katholikos?" Mélanges E. Tisserant III (Vatican City 1964), 429–450; W. M. Macomber, "The Authority of the Catholicos Patriarch of Seleucia–Ctesiphon," I patriarcati orientali nel primo millennio (Rome 1968), 179–200.

The inner life of this Church in the period described was to a great extent determined by the development of the canonical foundations and of the organization. A series of synods was occupied with this task and sought to accommodate the legal prescriptions to the times. Still more important was the confrontation with the advancing Monophysites, who not only succeeded in gaining a number of monasteries for themselves but also in establishing at Tagrit[5] an episcopal see, which became the center of their exertions. The Nestorians, who were not a State–Church in the sense that the Byzantine Church was, but a tolerated, not rarely encouraged, and occasionally also persecuted denomination alongside the Persian State–Church, saw themselves forced to the defensive. It could happen that they had to appear before the Zoroastrian Great King for religious discussions with the Monophysites, which, of course, like all such undertakings, yielded success to neither side. In the Nestorian Church there were even formed groups which reached the conviction that a certain union with Byzantine Orthodoxy, which for its part persecuted the Monophysites, could be practicable. Of course the factions soon fell between two fires, for the same Byzantine Orthodoxy had finally, under Justinian, just condemned the spiritual father of the Persian Church, Theodore of Mopsuestia. Thus all these exertions had no success, and finally at the Synod of 612 the Persian Church decided to make officially its own the Nestorian creed of Babai the Great.[6] In this there was question of a proposition, which, translated into Greek, could be rendered with the doctrine of two natures (physeis) and two hypostaseis in Christ, but one single prosopon. A concise interpretation will assume that here hypostasis meant the complete existence of all characteristics of a nature, the divine as well as the human, while by prosopon was to be understood the actual historical manner of the total phenomenon. In other words, a formula which was only approximately covered by the corresponding Greek terms with which it could be rendered, and so it remained free for interpretation; a formula which could be interpreted not only as strongly Nestorian but perhaps even as approximately Chalcedonian. After the defeat of the Persians by Heraclius, on the occasion of the concluding of peace, religious discussions were also organized with the aim of a union of the two Churches. Accordingly, the Catholicus submitted a profession of faith which the Orthodox partners regarded as orthodox. Hence the formula of the Nestorian Church was interpreted in the sense of the Council of Chalcedon. But neither the Emperor Heraclius nor the Catholicus could make his view of such an agreement in faith palatable and credible to his respective Church. A long and differently proceeding ecclesiastical and political development of 200 years had long before erected barriers that were all too high. The Nestorian bishops would not accept the condemnation of Theodore and swallow the term "Mother of God."

---

[5] J. M. Fiey, "Tagrit, esquisse d'histoire chrétienne," OrSyr 8 (1963), 289–342.

[6] W. de Vries, "Die syrisch-nestorianische Haltung zu Chalkedon," Chalkedon I, 603–635; F. W. Macomber, "The Christology of the Synod of Seleucia–Ctesiphon, A.D. 486," OrChrP 24 (1958), 142–154; V. Grumel, "Un théologien nestorien, Babai le Grand," ÉO 22 (1923), 153–181, 257–280.

And so the Nestorian Church was forced into a life of its own, which it kept closed against the entire West, hence against Europe and Asia Minor. For this reason the mighty missionary élan which especially characterized this Church in contradistinction to the Orthodox Church of the Early Byzantine period, pushed ever farther eastward.[7] Even at this period there began that grandiose missionary activity which achieved its climax in the Middle Ages. As early as the sixth century Nestorian missionaries reached the western frontiers of India in Malabar. Cosmas Indicopleustes discovered them on the island of Socotra between the South Arabian and the African coasts and on the island of Sri Lanka. Even in Tibet the Nestorian mission probably dates back to the middle of the seventh century, and the first traces of Nestorians in China likewise extended to this time. The representatives of this mission were first of all monks. The origins of Persian monasticism[8] are probably to be sought in the area of Nisibis, from which it spread powerfully. Abraham of Kashkar (d. 586) is regarded as its organizer.

If now, from the middle of the seventh century, this Church fell under Islamic domination, this fact produced no decisive changes. In fact, now Monophysites and Nestorians were again under one secular rule, the Caliphate. But this seems to have been the aim: to permit each denomination its status quo, so that the Nestorian Church could develop further relatively peacefully. If the Catholicus and some other Nestorian Christians enjoyed high dignities and offices under Persian rule, collectively the Nestorians were still second-class citizens in Persia, so that the Islamic system of government brought nothing new.

---

[7] F. Nau, L'expansion nestorienne en Asie (Paris 1914); A. Mingana, "The Early Spread of Christianity in Central Asia and the Far East," BJRL 9 (1925), 297–371; J. Stervart, Nestorian Missionary Enterprise (Cambridge 1928); J. Dauvillier, "L'expansion de l'église syrienne en Asia centrale et en extreme orient," OrSyr 1 (1956), 76–87; C. Hendriks, "L'activité apostolique du monachisme monophysite et nestorien," PrOrChr 10 (1960), 3–25, 97–113.

[8] A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, 2 vols. (Louvain 1958–1960), especially volume I.

The Coptic Church

If it is desired forcibly to assign a date of birth to the Coptic Church as an unorthodox Christian denomination in the sense of the later Byzantine Imperial Church, the year 536 could be designated, when the Emperor Justinian I, under the influence of the Pope and probably out of regard for his war plans in Italy, put an end to his policy of friendliness toward the Monophysites and allowed the Patriarch of the capital, Anthimus, to be deposed and expelled Severus of Antioch from Constantinople. Of course, the period of incubation began in 451 with the then incipient resistance to the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon. Timothy the Cat and to some extent Peter Mongus represented the most important stages, and the activity of a Severus, of a Julian of Halicarnassus, and of similar figures consolidated interiorly what the ecclesiastical leadership of Alexandria carried through or tried to accomplish in relation to Byzantium. Then in 536 Justinian summoned the Patriarch Theodosius of Alexandria to Constantinople to demand from him submission to the decrees of the Synod of 536—the condemnation of Severus and so forth. Theodosius refused to sign and was banished. Like so many other Monophysites, he touched down in a palace of the Empress Theodora, where, in the company of like-minded monks and clerics, he had full scope to supervise the Monophysite faith of his flock in Egypt by means of dogmatic treatises and pastoral letters until his death in 566. He could do this all the more effectively as the imperial central government had little luck with its Orthodox Patriarch, forcibly imposed on Alexandria: in 542 Paul had to be deposed by an imperial judgment at a Synod of Gaza; his successor Zoilus refused to conform to the imperial policy in the Three Chapters Controversy and hence lost his see in 551. John II (569–579) did not even obtain recognition from all his Orthodox colleagues. But this unhappiness did not in any way ease the lot of the persecuted Copts. In 551 the imperial Patriarch Apollinarius came to Alexandria with the full authority of governor and high commissary and ruled with unprecedented violence. He confiscated all Coptic, that is, Monophysite churches and prevented the Monophysite clerics from even entering the city. In addition, the Monophysites were at odds among themselves. There was the powerful faction of the adherents of Julian of Halicarnassus, usually called Gaianites[9] from one of their first champions; there were the partisans of the middle line of Severus; then the Tritheists,[10] for whom was claimed also the famous philosopher, John Philoponus; and there were others besides. If it could have been achieved, there would have been as many patriarchs as factions. Actually, the unity of the Church was based on the people and on monasticism, especially popular with the people. The really religious figures of monasticism were Monophysites because of the belief that only this confession guaranteed the Redemption through the Logos-made-Man, but they were more interested in the ardor of this faith and the purity of life corresponding to it than in the scholarly distinctions of the heads of the schools. The most important representative of this attitude was probably Abbot Schenute of Atripe,[11] the superior of the "White Monastery" in Upper Egypt, who however had died in 451.

After the death in 566 of the Patriarch Theodosius of Alexandria, who was residing at Constantinople and who, while not uncontested in Egypt, had been something of an Ecumenical Patriarch of the Monophysites, it was not possible for some time to find a successor for him in Egypt itself.[12] Jacob Baradai, the "Ecumenical" Metropolitan of the Syrian Monophysites, had sought during the lifetime of the Alexandrian to appoint a locum tenens for Egypt, without finding any requited love on the Nile. This meant that now also Jacobites and Copts were at one another's throats. When the Syrian Church believed it had to intervene and the Syrian Archimandrite Theodore was appointed as Egyptian Patriarch, he encountered decisive repudiation in Alexandria. Then the aged deacon Peter was elected as anti-Patriarch in 575. As his first act, he immediately ordained seventy bishops and thereby created not only a large obedience but also filled up the great gaps in the hierarchy that had been caused by the dissensions, and by this coup established a counterpoise to the Imperialists, the Melkites, against which the government could for a long time only exert itself in vain. However, because Peter was not the candidate of the Syrians, there were new discords. Finally Jacob Baradai himself arrived to see that everything was done properly, but he soon submitted to the majority which Peter had acquired. Peter died as early as 577. On the occasion of the election of his successor, which again was a long time in coming, something like a compromise with the Jacobites was apparent: the new Patriarch came from Syria but had been a monk in an Egyptian monastery. But he, Damian (578–605), also brought no definitive peace. After Jacob Baradai had died in the same year on a second journey to Egypt, Damian claimed supremacy over the entire Monophysite Church, but with the single result that the strife between Syria and Egypt flared up again. Occasionally even the Monophysite monks refused him obedience, perhaps only because he was not an Egyptian.

---

[9] M. Jugie, "La controverse gaianite," DThC IV, 1002–1023.

[10] J. Lebreton, "Le trithéisme" DThC XV, 1860ff.

[11] J. Leipoldt, Schenute von Atripe und die Entstehung des national-ägyptischen Christentums (Leipzig 1923).

[12] E. W. Brooks, "The Patriarch Paul of Antioch and the Alexandrine Schism of 575," ByZ 30 (1929–1930), 468–476.

But if the Monophysite Church of Egypt was still so often split, if it could really agree so seldom on a patriarch, still the opposition to the Council of Chalcedon and to the Chalcedonian patriarchs imposed by Byzantium again united it. In addition, it even happened that the imperial governors, the Augustales, inclined to this confession, contrary to their official mandate, so that the outlaws could defy the imperial policy time and again. In any case, for the future the succession of Coptic Patriarchs continued unbroken, and if the Orthodox Patriarch had his seat guaranteed by troops in Alexandria in the Caesarium part of the city with the Cathedral of St. Mark, the monastery of Enaton in the vicinity of the capital constituted a more secure place for the Coptic chief shepherds because it scarcely curtailed their freedom of action. In the figure of the Orthodox Patriarch John III the Almoner (610–19) the Imperial Church once again had a representative whose pastoral zeal, whose blameless life, and whose legendary charity did not fail to make an impression also on the Monophysite population. Nevertheless, no union was achieved even under him. Besides, in 619 the Persians invaded Egypt and occupied it for almost ten years. The blow affected Monophysites and Orthodox equally, but if in the course of the years a certain alleviation occurred, in any case the Orthodox Church could not rely on any State privileges so as to persecute the Copts. And when the Emperor Heraclius, after the defeat of the Persian armies, also relieved Egypt again, he brought along that new "Monoenergist" creed which both sides could face with a common optimism.[13] In 633 the Imperial Patriarch, Cyrus of Phasis, proclaimed this Formula of Union of the one divine energy in Christ. True, Cyrus reported a great success to Constantinople, but the Copts sneered, not that they had come to the Council of Chalcedon, but that it had come to them. In the long run this effort had no success, and soon Islam replaced the Byzantines. In 642 the same Patriarch Cyrus had to surrender Alexandria to the Muslim general Amr, and after a few years all Egypt was in Arab hands. The Patriarch Benjamin,[14] the Chief Shepherd of the Copts, soon understood how to come to an arrangement with the Arab conquerors and to obtain for his Church a guarantee of that freedom for which the Islamic law of the Koran was always prepared. The same status would have been given to the Orthodox Church, but it was characteristic of the different treatment of the confessions that Benjamin could soon proceed to the reorganization of his Church, whereas the Melkites could not fill the See of St. Mark again for a long time. When then, from the eighth century, new patriarchs of the Orthodox faith were named for the See of Alexandria, it is frequently unclear how they arrived at their office and see and how large was the part of the population for which they could declare themselves at all responsible. The Egyptian Church of the Middle Ages was the Coptic Church and no other.

---

[13] See supra, p. 459.

The formation of a special Coptic Church[15] can certainly be explained from the opposition to the decrees of the Synod of Chalcedon, in which people were convinced they had to see a condemnation of the theology and of the sacrosanct figure of the Patriarch Cyril of Alexandria. But even then this opposition was not of a purely dogmatic nature, but to a great extent the opposition of a proud self-awareness, residue of a time in which the Church of Alexandria, governed by its patriarch in a monarchical and autocratic manner, played the first role in the East, could always pride itself on the support of Rome, and had no serious competitors. But the Synod of Constantinople in 381 and, even more, canon 28 of Chalcedon had inflicted a blow on this position which the self-conscious patriarchs of Alexandria were not prepared to take. The people followed them blindly, for in the patriarch they saw not only the leader of the Church but also the representative of their Coptic individuality—a national individuality—in relation to which Byzantium and everything that came from Byzantium was regarded as foreign and inappropriate. This self-consciousness then led to a de-Hellenization of the ecclesiastical system, and it may be maintained that this de-Hellenization of the ecclesiastical system required a proper denomination in order to be able clearly to present itself, and Monophysitism was just the form for this. It led also to the development of a Coptic ecclesiastical literature.[16] This consisted for the most part of translations, since, where it is original, there is almost always question of a literary plane which corresponds rather to a scarcely differentiated religious consciousness than to dogmatic or juridical definitions, for example, hagiography,[17] which is devoted to Coptic saints, such as the patron of the desert, Menas, the saint of the camel-drivers and of the merchants on camel-back. Another example is the whole monastic literature, the literature of monastic rules and of monastic sayings, which was then translated into Greek, Syriac, and Arabic, and this authentic Egyptian institution, in so far as it deserves the name of institution at all, spread throughout the world. Schenute of Atripe was again one of the best representatives of this literature, which never sought to theorize but took its cue from occasion to occasion. Here belong also many sermons with a remarkable preference for angels and archangels, the vitae of monks and hermits, whose unconcealed Monophysitism bore the denominational opposition on the plane of the miraculous, but also serious catecheses and admonitions of provincial bishops and monastic superiors. Interest in "worldly" subjects was slight, and equally slight was the liking for history or chronicles.

---

[14] C. D. G. Müller, "Benjamin I," Muséon 69 (1956), 313–340; id., "Neues über Benjamin I," ibid. 72 (1959), 228–247.

[15] J. Leipoldt, "Zur Ideologie der frühen koptischen Kirche," Bulletin Soc. Arch. Copte 17 (1964), 101–110.

[16] S. Morenz, "Die koptische Literatur," HO 1, 2, 207–219; C. D. G. Müller, Die koptische Predigt (Heidelberg 1953).

Behind this literature there more and more stands monasticism.[18] This monasticism was Coptic in its origins and in Egypt remained Coptic to an eminent degree. It withdrew into the desert from the threatened economic world of Romanized Egypt of late antiquity, but the world pursued it, the entire contemporary world, and dragged it back into political publicity. The patriarchs of Alexandria, without regard for which dogmatic color they wore, saw in it their accomplice and used it unscrupulously. Not a few monks found pleasure in this role and gradually rose to positions of control over the religious and ecclesiastical life of the country, in fact not only of Egypt but far beyond. In any event, the Monophysite Church of Egypt can be understood not only from its ecclesiastical leaders, the self-conscious patriarchs. It was likewise a Church of a self-conscious monasticism. In connection with the state of consciousness of these monks, it has to be self-evident that strict denominational boundaries could not always be drawn. The fronts changed, but the self-consciousness—and that was what was enduring—a Coptic self-consciousness made it more and more the backbone of the Monophysite opposition.

Just as was the case with the Nestorian Church, so too a strong urge to mission to the outsider was characteristic of the Monophysite Church. For the Coptic Church the region south of Egypt—Nubia and

---

[17] P. Peeters, Le tréfonds oriental de l'hagiographie byzantine (Brussels 1950), 27–48.

[18] P. Cauwenbergh, Études sur les moines d'Egypt depuis le concile de Chalcédoine jusqu'à l'invasion arabe (Paris–Louvain 1914); M. Cramer–H. Bacht, "Der antichalkedonische Aspekt im historisch—biographischen Schrifttum der koptischen Monophysiten," Chalkedon II, 315–338; F. R. Farag, Sociological and Moral Studies in the Field of Coptic Monasticism (Leiden 1964).

Ethiopia—offered itself as a principal mission field. It seems that an intensive missionary activity among the Nubians could not begin until the middle of the sixth century.[19] Until then the Nubians, in so far as they belonged loosely to the Empire, enjoyed, in opposition to the otherwise current laws against pagans, the privilege of still honoring, undisturbed, their goddess in the shrines at Philai on the Upper Nile. In 541 Justinian ended this privilege, and the Empress Theodora sent the Monophysite Priest John, who succeeded, with the support of a likewise Monophysite Bishop of Philai, in converting parts of the Nubians to Christianity. But Orthodox missionaries could also point to some successes. In the long run, however, the Monophysite propaganda was victorious, and Nubian Christianity was oriented totally in its organization to the Coptic Patriarchate of Egypt.

For Ethiopia[20] this propaganda meant the second mission wave, following the first in the fourth century. But here too only this second wave seems to have included an intensive evangelization. That Monophysitism found a quite natural admission to Ethiopia was connected with the fact that since the fourth century the country had been ecclesiastically oriented to Alexandria. Now in the fifth century there were especially mentioned as missionaries the "Nine Roman Saints," that is, men from the Roman Byzantine Empire, among whom are probably to be understood Syrian Monophysite monks, to whom in all probability the founding of a group of Ethiopian monasteries goes back. But this mission was unable to end the connection with Alexandria. The doctrine of the Ethiopian Church from that time seems to have shown no special interest in the inner Monophysite controversies, but, considering the distances from the centers of the disputes, this is not surprising. In any event, people saw in the Coptic Patriarch of Egypt the supreme court, and from the seventh century they had their own supreme bishop, the Abuna, ordained by him.

---

[19] J. Kraus, Die Anfänge des Christentums in Nubien (Vienna 1931); U. Monneret de Villard, Storia della Nubia cristiana (Rome 1938); W. H. C. Frend, "Nubia as an Outpost of Byzantine Cultural Influence," Byzantinoslavica 29 (1968), 319–326; A. Audollont, "La diffusion du christianisme en Afrique au sud des territoires soumis à Rome après le Vs.," Comptes rendus Acad. Inscr. et Belles Lettres 1942, 202–216; K. Michalowski, "La Nubie chrétienne," Africana Bulletin 3 (Warsaw 1965), 9–26; J. Kraus, "Neues zur Geschichte des christlichen Nubiens," NZM 24 (1968), 241–257.

[20] C. Conti-Rossino, Storia dell'Etiopia (Milan 1928); H. M. Hyatt, The Church of Abyssinia (London 1928); E. Hammerschmidt, "Die Anfänge des Christentums in Äthiopien," ZMR 38 (1954), 281–294.

The Jacobite Church

If the policy of Justinian had made its own contribution to enable the Coptic Church to become consolidated as an autonomous denomination, it was the same policy which, not only through its pressure, but also through its leaving matters alone, occasioned the rise of a Monophysite Church in Syria. After the Council of 536, the Emperor, as reported above, had had the Patriarch Theodosius of Alexandria come to Constantinople in order to gain him to the Council of Chalcedon. He had no success; but instead of being sent into exile, the Patriarch found secure lodging with the Empress Theodora and governed his Church as well as he could from his hiding place, which was one only in name. In 542 the thoroughly Monophysite Client King of the Arabs, the Ghassanid bar Harith bar Gabala, in the Syrian Desert, urged upon Theodora the appointment of some bishops for his territory. The Empress induced the Alexandrian Patriarch to ordain as bishops two Monophysites, who had been staying for some time at Constantinople: Theodore "of Arabia" and Jacob Burdeana (Baradai).[21] Theodore was given as his bishopric "the camp of the Arabs," hence mainly the Syrian Desert and the Transjordan area. We do not know any details of his activity except the fact that the Ghassanid Arabs remained for the future unambiguous representatives of Monophysitism. Jacob Baradai (d. 578) was entrusted with the entire East on a vast scale, beginning with the Greek islands by way of Asia Minor to Syria and Armenia, with his seat at Edessa. With immense enthusiasm, among all imaginable dangers and privations, disguised as a beggar, he evangelized wide territories, ordained thousands of priests, not always applying the strictest standards, and finally proceeded to organize for these priests a special Monophysite counterhierarchy that no longer concerned itself with the existing Orthodox hierarchy. The ground had long been prepared. As early as the first half of the century most of the Syrian bishops, especially in Syria Prima, in Osrhoene, in Euphratesia, and in Mesopotamia, had been adherents of Severus of Antioch. Now Jacob ordained some thirty new bishops of his denomination for episcopal sees that were mostly in the hands of the bishops of the Imperial Church. In 557–58 he appointed for his hierarchy in Sergius of Tella also a Patriarch with his "seat" at Antioch. He apparently regarded him as the sole legitimate successor of Severus. The succession of patriarchs was thereafter hardly ever interrupted, except through inner Monophysite schisms and quarrels. From a vague Monophysitism there had now come a Church in its own right. That neither the Patriarch nor most of the bishops could live in their cities mattered little. There were enough monasteries to give them shelter, and the imperial policy favoring Chalcedon was unable to harm them at all.

---

[21] H. G. Kleyn, Jacobus Baradeua de stichter der syrische monophysietische kerk (Leiden 1882); E. Hammerschmidt, "Jakobos Baradai," LThK 2nd. ed., V, 836.

When Chosroes II, the Persian Great King, who had some votive offerings left over for the Christian churches,[22] conquered broad areas of the Byzantine Empire, especially those territories in which the Monophysites lived could expect relief. In fact, the King expelled some Melkite bishops, but he felt it safer to fill the vacant posts with clerics from the Persian Kingdom. We do not know, however, whether there was a question here of Nestorians. Nevertheless, the Jacobites now succeeded in establishing themselves more firmly in Persia also and even obtained possession of a church in Seleucia–Ctesiphon, the Nestorians' stronghold. This, however, ended with the assassination of Chosroes. Soon after the victory of the Emperor Heraclius over the Persian Kingdom, Monophysite Syria came again under Byzantine rule. Now, here and there, the Byzantines were perforce greeted as liberators, but it happened that, as in Edessa, the bishop, a Monophysite, denied the Orthodox Emperor participation in the liturgy, which naturally only evoked fresh reprisals. Still, it was precisely Heraclius who, with the so-called Monoenergistic doctrine, sought ecclesiastical union for the last time, and for this end even convoked a special Monophysite Synod in which he took part. Since this attempt also miscarried, the persecution of the Monophysites was begun again by the imperial officials, so that they welcomed as deliverers from the ecclesiastical yoke of Constantinople the Muslims who arrived soon thereafter. With this began also for the Syrian Church a period characterized by legal relations which Islam had developed vis-à-vis the "Peoples of the Book," partly complemented by agreements between the conquerors and the bishops, who in the period of distress, as "city lords," had arranged the capitulation to Islam, but also interrupted by occasional persecutions, which of course were not basically of a dogmatic nature.

The supreme head of this Syrian Church remained, now as earlier, the Patriarch of Antioch, even if he did not succeed until 720 in establishing his seat in this city and even then only for a brief time. Ordinarily, the patriarchs, like the bishops, lived in the monasteries, from which they had for the most part come.[23] What distinguished the new Church from the Imperial Church was certainly not in the areas of liturgy or canon law. Here no great break appeared. What really mattered was faith or, better put, dogma, and here not even so much a Christology which would have been essentially different from the orthodox, as rather the resistance to the Council of Chalcedon and its Christological formulas, a resistance which the Church shared with the father of its theology, Severus.[24] This resistance was the real shibboleth, to which of course was gradually added an even stronger and stifling rejection of everything that the Greek imperial central government and its agents had to offer in ecclesiastical political ideas, that is, an awareness which, to be sure, cannot be termed a Syrian national mind, but represented a sort of preliminary of such a mind, a form which was essentially characterized by the linguistic distinction from Greek and not merely by an antipathy to the positive elements in the Greek intellectual world. Severus had written only Greek and hardly understood Syriac. But the longer, the more decidedly, the language of the Jacobite theologians became Syriac, there developed a literature which produced a time of flowering of the Syriac language.[25] Here must be mentioned especially Xenaia of Mabbug (d. c. 523), then James of Sarug (d. 521): the former was a classic author of Syriac literature, a dogmatician, a polemicist, a preacher, and an exegete at the same time, the latter was a representative of that metrical sermon literature which in similar form found admission even into the Byzantine world. No less important was the famous John of Edessa (d. c. 586), whom Justinian in his time for obscure reasons had appointed as missionary of the pagan remnant in Asia Minor and who, until his expulsion from Constantinople by the Emperor Justin II, had governed the Monophysites there. We are indebted to him not only for a Syriac Church history but also for the History of the Eastern Blessed, that hagiographical collection which became at least as important for the self-evaluation of his Church as all the dogmatic treatises. As regards the history of the Church, he obtained an important successor in Cyrus of Batna. For the seventh century there must be mentioned preferably Paul of Tella, the collaborator on the Syro-Hexaplaris of the Old Testament, and Thomas of Harqel, to whom the same credit may be attributed for the Syriac New Testament. One of the most important representatives of extensive scholarly interests was James of Edessa (d. 708). His educational road led him by way of Alexandria, he then became Bishop of Edessa, lost this see again, and taught in the monastery of Qennesrin, which was perhaps the outstanding Jacobite educational center of the time. He left a rich literary legacy.

---

[22] Cf. on the situation P. Peeters, "Les ex-voto de Khosrau Aparwez à Saint-Serge de Rosapha," Mémoires Acad. Inscr. et Belles Lettres 54 (1951), 23ff.

[23] The residences changed frequently, even though the "title" remained with Antioch. As cities of residence Aleppo, Edessa, Amida, Harran, etc., alternated.

---

[24] J. Lebon, "La christologie du monophysisme syrien," Chalkedon I, 425–580.

[25] Summarizing this literature, cf. A. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922); I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia syriaca (Rome 1958).

He gave lessons in Greek over the opposition of those who now chose to despise not only the Imperial Church but everything else Greek; he is said to have known Hebrew also. Many translations from Greek can be traced back to him. His Chronography was much read and he was probably the author of the oldest Syriac grammar. Finally, he attempted a harmony of profane and biblical knowledge of the origin of the world in an uncompleted Hexaemeron. It should be mentioned only in passing that, as in the area of Greek speech, there were compiled dogmatic catenae, collections of spiritual talks of monastic superiors, that ecclesiastical poetry flowered, and that finally there was thereby supplied the presuppositions for a development of the liturgical texts.[26] All this led to that grand-scale Syriac mediating activity in the eighth century which passed on to Arabic Islam the union with the intellectual life of the Mediterranean world.[27]

In this world of the Jacobite Church monasticism played a significant role.[28] It was multiform, as elsewhere in the East. There were many hermits in cells and mountain caves, on pillars, and in huts. But there was also a whole multitude of well-populated cenobia, where meditation was cultivated, where asceticism was, just as in Egypt, intensified to virtuosity, and where economic activities were to some extent regarded with very mixed feelings. Above all, the monastic settlements in the desert developed styles of life purely in relation to the environment; these were suited to those of the Bedouins and were not without an affinity to ascetical forms of Islam. Theoretically, each monastery was subject to the bishop, without whom there was no blessing of the abbot, no founding of a monastery, and no external activity. But it remains noteworthy that the community in the Jacobite Church never lost its influence: it was always in a position to oppose its own weight to an exaggerated hierarchization of the Church.

This Monophysite Church, frequently called "Jacobite" from its great missionary, became not only a Church of the Syrians but also of the Arabs. That it had its champions in the Ghassanid Princes in the Syrian Desert has already been mentioned. And this form of Christianity pressed forward along the caravan routes into northern and central Arabia, but these Arabian territories did not constitute a separate ecclesial body of their own. Their Christianity remained loosely united to that of the Syriac Church. On the other hand, the Arabs had long pressed forward from the heart of their country into the Syrian area, and indeed not only into the Syrian Desert, but also as settlers inside the walls of the cities in the country east of the Jordan. The centers of Arabian Monophysitism were the episcopal city of Bosra and the great Sergius Pilgrimage in Rusafa, the headquarters of the Ghassanids (Sergiopolis). The Byzantine Emperors of the second half of the sixth century were not always successful in their treatment of the nomadic masses of Arabs on the frontiers of their Empire. They especially all too readily accused the Ghassanid Princes of treason, and so it happened that Islam, storming forward, found allies in these Christian Arabs who very soon submitted to the new religion, whose styles of life and worship in some respects were not all too different from their own. This interaction between Christian and previously pagan Arabs was probably responsible for the fact that there are Christian elements in the Koran, which have been designated, with some probability, as substantially Monophysite.

---

[26] A. Baumstark, Festbrevier und Kirchenjahr der syrischen Jakobiten (Paderborn 1910).

[27] G. Klinge, "Die Bedeutung der syrischen Theologen als Vermittler der griechischen Philosophie an den Islam," ZKG 58 (1939), 346–386; R. Paret, Der Islam und das griechische Bildungsgut (Tübingen 1950).

[28] E. Honigmann, "Nordsyrische Klöster in vorarabischer Zeit," ZS 1 (1922), 15–33; P. Krüger, Das syrischmonophysitische Mönchtum im Tur-Ab(h)din I (dissertation, Münster 1937), II: OrChrP 4 (1938), 5–46.

Concerning Christianity in South Arabia,[29] the time and starting point of evangelization are uncertain. In any event, we encounter this Christianity around the turn of the sixth century, especially in the Nedshran under rulers who were probably of the Jewish faith. In 573 a persecution broke out here also, which gave this young Christianity the first martyrs, especially Saint Arethas (Harith), who was then honored by the Monophysites of Syria as one of their own. The persecution evoked an action, supported by Byzantium, on the part of the Axumite Kings, who brought the Arabian Kingdom under vassalage to themselves until they in turn had to relinquish the area to the Persians, who were then replaced by Islam.

The Church of the Armenians

In the Armenian Church may be seen a Jacobite denomination so far as the basic interests of the doctrine are concerned. Of course, the historical origins were different. They reflected in a special way the vicissitudes of this people between Byzantine and Persian domination on the one hand and their own peculiar political system on the other. The Armenian Church became as it is, less on the basis of dogmatic and ecclesiastical political succession of imperial synods than on the basis of just these historical dangers. If Nerses the Great,[30] the chief Armenian

---

[29] J. Ryckmans, "Le christianisme en Arabie du sud préislamique," L'oriente cristiano nella storia della civiltà (Rome 1964), 413–453, with citations of the literature.

[30] V. Inglisian, LThK 2nd. ed., VII, 882–883.

Bishop (d. c. 373), the alleged great-grandson of the evangelizer of Armenia, Gregory the Illuminator, has rightly been called the organizer of the Armenian Church, this was an organization along the lines of the Greek Church, specifically the Church of Cappadocia, just as Nerses himself had been educated and ordained a bishop in Caesarea. In his organization was reflected the relation of respect of Armenian Christianity toward the point of departure of the Armenian mission, Cappadocia. Already his successor, a bishop of the King, had to have himself ordained, to the great annoyance of Caesarea, in the rival metropolitan see of Tyana, until finally the King definitively renounced the ecclesiastical connection with Cappadocia. The period of this separation cannot be exactly pinpointed; there were many connections back and forth which existed then as previously, but the beginning of the ecclesiastical independence of Armenia had been made, even if not the beginning of a new Church of a different denomination. Soon after, the intellectual self-consciousness of the Armenians was also consolidated. Mesrop[31] (d. 440) gave the nation its own handwriting, and this achievement very soon led to an independent Armenian literature. It is self-evident that at first this was a matter of translations from Greek and Syriac, and in this borrowing the orientation to the intellectual center of the Byzantine Empire acquired a new importance. Of course, ecclesiastically it was now no longer Caesarea that played the great role, but Constantinople, which meanwhile had acquired the supremacy over Cappadocia, to which the Armenians turned.

From 429, however, Persian pressure on Armenia was especially strongly evident, and the connection with the Byzantine Empire to a great extent ended. No Persarmenian bishops could take part in the Synod of Ephesus, and only by means of Nestorian missionaries was it learned what had been done there. In 435 there went to Byzantium an inquiry from the Catholicus, which was answered with the Tomus of Prochus. Chalcedon too took place without any Armenian representation worthy of mention, and the events of the second half of the fifth century brought no improvement of the situation.[32] Meanwhile, in the Armenian Church people held fast to the doctrine of the unity in Christ. But Chalcedon had rendered decisions which, to Armenian ears, seemingly introduced scarcely familiar distinctions into this unity. The Armenians came in time to know of the Tome of Leo, but in a translation which was misleading. It was monks from the School of Severus who finally acquainted the Armenians with the Henoticon of the Emperor Zeno and interpreted it contrary to the Synod of Chalcedon. When in 505 and 506 the Emperor Anastasius could force the Persians to an armistice which again brought the Armenian Church a certain freedom, since the Byzantine Church was strongly oriented by this very Emperor to a Monophysite interpretation of the Henoticon, this interpretation was now also adopted by the Armenian Church. The Catholicus Babgen (490–516) in 506 convoked a Synod at Dvin with Armenian and Iberian bishops, who accepted the Henoticon, less, it is true, as a rejection of Chalcedon, which they scarcely knew, than to repudiate Nestorianism, which under Persian rule had evangelized powerfully in Armenia. Under the domination of Justinian there was no change in this position of the Armenian Church. In 554 a Synod again met at Dvin, which completed the break with the Imperial Church—an important decision, especially in view of the ever present threat from the Persians and the Persian Nestorian Church standing behind it; but also in so far as the self-consciousness of the Church vis-à-vis Byzantium was consolidated and new impulses were supplied to the Armenian striving for independence and a new latitude in the confrontation between the two great Churches.

---

[31] Ibid., 319.

[32] Id., "Chalkedon und die armenische Kirche," Chalkedon II, 361–417.

It was the Byzantine Emperor Maurice who sought to put an end to this autonomy of the Armenian Church, as well as to the political freedom and exerted the strongest pressure to convert the Armenians to the Synod of Chalcedon. This produced a schism. The Catholicus Moses II refused to take part in a Synod at Constantinople, whereupon the Emperor in 590 appointed an anti-Catholicus for the Armenians under direct Byzantine rule. Only a new attack on Byzantine Armenia by the Persians settled the matter in 610 in favor of the Monophysite Armenians. At this time also the Iberian Catholicus, Kiurion, forced himself, as an adherent of the Greeks and thereby of Orthodoxy, out of the close connection with and dependence on the Armenian Church.[33]

The great Persian–Byzantine war under the Emperor Heraclius again led to Byzantine domination of Armenia. The Peace of 629, which the Persians had to conclude after their defeat, relinquished the greatest part of the country to the Byzantines. On the whole, the Armenians were on the side of the Byzantine Emperor in these serious conflicts. But now the clergy of Armenia were again called upon to declare their adherence to the formulas of Chalcedon: if they would not, the Emperor would appoint an anti-Catholicus. The Catholicus Yezr yielded, and the Greek clergy offered a weak formula which culminated in the condemnation of Nestorianism, while Chalcedon was passed over in silence, apparently in order to gain the Armenians more easily. True, there was also resistance to this formula, but there can be no question of a real schism. That soon after, in the Monoenergist formula, Heraclius moved near to the ideas of the opponents of Chalcedon made the rallying easier. But from as early as 640 the Muslims were steadily advancing against Armenia, and with this the connection with the Byzantine Church was ended, even before the Arabs were definitively masters of the country. A Synod of Dvin under the Patriarch Nerses III in 648–49 completely rejected the formulas of Chalcedon, and the nation's leader at that time, Theodore Rechtuni, surrendered his country to the Caliph, who granted the Armenians a status of extensive autonomy. In 654 the Byzantine Emperor Constans II made an energetic effort, it is true, to recover Armenia politically and ecclesiastically, but in the long run he had no success.

---

[33] N. Akinian, Kiurion the Catholicus of Georgia (Vienna 1910; in Armenian); see P. Peeters, AnBoll 30 (1911), 106–109.

The direction of the Armenian Church lay in the hands of a supreme bishop,[34] a "Great Archbishop" or Catholicus, as he was frequently called—the title Patriarch gained the upper hand only relatively late. These Catholici were very firmly rooted in the feudalism of the country, and the ups and downs of their history is in some respects comprehensible only because of the rivalries of the tribes and tribal princes, the kings and sub-kings. Even the ecclesiastical organization, the erecting of honorary metropolises, and so forth, was not rarely determined by these political circumstances. The special way of life of the Church was expressed most purely in the literature, which to a great extent was restricted to the religious sphere. With Mesrop, already mentioned, began the so-called Golden Age of Armenian literature.[35] From Mesrop himself we know religious writings, talks, and circulars. What in individual cases is to be assigned to his pupils—biblical commentaries, homilies, sermons, and the like—can today be decided only with difficulty. Of special importance for the fifth century are Eznik of Kolb, who not only shared in the Armenian translation of the Bible but also turned against heresies in a polemic and published writings of a religious nature, and also John Mandakuni, the author of sermons and of hymns which were adopted into the liturgy. It was also in the fifth century that Mesrop found his biographer in his pupil Korium and that a man who called himself Agathangelus wrote a history of the evangelization of Armenia and of the missionary Gregory—the classic legend of the early Church history of the country.

The Church history of Armenia in Islamic times hardly differed from the history of any other Church under the domination of the Arabs. Noteworthy, to be sure, is the fact that many Armenians, under the pressure of the Arabs or because of the inner political situation of the country, migrated to the Byzantine Empire and there often achieved the greatest importance, so that the separation of the Armenian Church, despite the dogmatic differences, never meant that deep abyss between Byzantium and Armenia, such as had developed between the Jacobite Church and Byzantium or the Coptic Church and Byzantium.

---

[34] G. Amadouni, "L'autocéphalie du katholikat arménien," I patriarcati orientali nel primo millennio (Rome 1968), 137–178.

[35] B. Sargisean, Dei tesori patristici e biblici conservati nella letteratura armena (Venice 1897); H. Thorossian, Histoire de la littérature arménienne (Paris 1951).

CHAPTER 28

Early Byzantine Monasticism

The explosive growth of monasticism in the fourth and early fifth centuries was, it is true, accompanied by crises and setbacks, but its further expansion could not be halted by them. Egypt remained the mother country, goal of pilgrimages to the famed sites of the first enthusiasm, but gradually other imperial provinces also pushed themselves more powerfully into the foreground. Especially noteworthy was the power of attraction which Palestine exerted from the early fifth century. The stream of pilgrims from the whole world which hastened to the Holy Places brought along many a one who finally settled in Palestine for a life pleasing to God. Thus there arose here a monasticism which was less self-contained than in Egypt, more receptive in what concerned geographical provenance as well as social status.[1]

The most important founders of the period were without doubt Euthymius the Great, Theodosius the "Cenobiarch," and Sabas. Euthymius (d. 473)[2] founded a laura, whose church Juvenal dedicated in 429. Its very beginnings reflected "internationalism." Euthymius himself came from Melitene on the Euphrates, some of his first monks from the Sinai Peninsula, others were Cappadocians and Syrians, a "Roman" was mentioned, and finally a single Palestinian. The founder's life did not move only in the framework of monastic aims; no great abbot of the day could avoid the ecclesiastical political strife centering on the Patriarch Juvenal and ignore Chalcedon. The desert of Palestine was too near Jerusalem. Euthymius did not take part in the revolt of the monks around Theodosius in 452, and finally his exertions succeeded in inducing the ex-Empress Eudocia, who preferred to hatch her plots in Jerusalem if in this way she could thwart the Orthodox course of the Court of Constantinople, to become reconciled with Juvenal and abandon the propaganda against Chalcedon. The "Cenobiarch" Theodosius (d. 529)[3] laid out his foundation east of Bethlehem as a monastery of cenobites from the start. His home was Cappadocia and he had early entered the service of the Church as a psalmist. This circumstance and his familiarity with the writings and aims of his great countryman, Basil, were probably the reason why, against the trend of the age, he established a strict cenobium. It was apparently regarded in Palestine as a model of its type, and finally the Patriarch appointed Theodosius as Abbot-General, or Archimandrite, over all cenobia. Abbot-General of the archorites and lauras, that is, of the isolated or loosely associated monastic settlements, was Saint Sabas (d. 532)[4] son of a high official from Cappadocia. After some vicissitudes in various monasteries of the Holy Land, he withdrew into a hermitage in the vicinity of the west bank of the Dead Sea. Around 483 he made it into a laura, which soon attracted 150 monks—a "City in the desert," as it was called. Despite his gifts as an organizer, he had many difficulties, apparently because higher questions of spirituality did not interest him. When the controversy over the evaluation of Origen's doctrines flared up again, it led to a succession of a whole group of monks and the founding of the New Laura in 508, the center of the Origenist movement, and Sabas and his successors were able only gradually to assert their authority over it.

---

[1] Cf. S. Vailhé, "Les monastères de la Palestine," Bessarione 3 (1897–98), 39–58, 209–225, 334–356, 4 (1898–99), 193–210.

[2] Id., Saint Euthyme le Grand, special reprint from ROC 12–14 (1907–9); R. Génier, Vie de saint Euthyme le Grand (Paris 1909).

On the whole it can be said that, despite all difficulties, the three great founders contributed much to make Palestine gradually a refuge of Chalcedonian Orthodoxy. The two named as archimandrites by the Patriarch found it difficult, of course, to exercise their authority in the southwest of the country also: here arose centers of Monophysite propaganda, which were oriented rather to Coptic Egypt than to Jerusalem. The Georgian Prince Nabarnugi, who became a monk in Palestine under the name Peter—Peter the Iberian[5]—had founded a monastery of Iberians at Jerusalem but had then withdrawn because of Juvenal and moved to this area. During the monks' revolt of 452 he was made Bishop of Gaza. He was able to occupy his see only temporarily, but through his activity he made the coastal strip of the country a refuge for Monophysites. It is significant that Severus, the later Patriarch of Antioch, was his pupil and finally settled near Gaza as a monk before he began his career in Constantinople.

---

[3] E. Weigand, "Das Theodosioskloster," ByZ 23 (1914–19), 167–216; H. Usener, Der hl. Theodosios (Leipzig 1890).

[4] A. Ehrhard, "Das griechische Kloster Mar Saba in Palästina," RO 7 (1893), 32–79.

[5] F. Honigmann, "Pierre l'Ibérien et les écrits du Pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite," Bulletin Acad. Belge 47, 3 (1952); D. M. Lang, "Peter the Iberian and his Biographers," JEH 2 (1951), 158–168; R. Raabe, Petrus der Iberer (Leipzig 1895).

The flowering of Palestinian monasticism left its mark also on the literature of the age. Whereas the spiritual content of Egyptian monasticism found expression in the collections of Apophthegmata of the great monastic fathers, Palestine gave to monastic literature a great biographer in the person of Cyril of Scythopolis[6] in the sixth century. He devoted great biographies to Euthymius and Sabas and also treated other monastic founders. He was certainly not entirely detached in regard to the ecclesiastical political procedures of the monks of his time. But he was still able to describe the monks and their life "from within" and to show how, despite all the politics, the great enthusiasm of the past again and again found new life. A half-century later the monastic life found in John Moschus,[7] whom the desire for travel took to all countries, the kind, enthusiastic miniaturist of anecdotes and stories of miracles, who in his spiritual "meadow" captured the charm of the final days before the onslaught of the Persians and Arabs.

At this period the Sinai Peninsula also moved into the full light of the history of the monastic life. In the vicinity of the episcopal city of Pharan on the east bank of the Gulf of Suez the monastic settlement of Raithu (el Tor) is attested from c. 400. On Sinai itself rose the Brier Monastery, later called the Monastery of St. Catherine, which Justinian had surrounded with a fortified wall and for which he built the church.[8]

In Syria around this time the village of Telnesin became a great pilgrimage spot of Christianity, for here there arose around the column on which Simeon the Stylite had led his ascetical life (d. 459) a mighty complex of churches, monasteries, and pilgrims' hostels, which of course the Monophysites soon claimed for themselves, just as they claimed the saint himself.[9] The Orthodox attached themselves instead to the younger Simeon the Stylite (d. 596), who had had his pillar on the Mons Admirabilis near Antioch.[10]

---

[6] E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skythopolis (Leipzig 1939).

[7] Bardenhewer, V, 131–135; E. Amann, DThC X, 2510–2513; Beck, 412–413; E. Mioni, "Jean Moschus, moine," DSAM VIII (1973), 622–640; H. Chadwick, "John Moschus and His Friend Sophronius the Sophist," JThS 25 (1974), 41–74.

[8] R. Devreesse, "Le christianisme dans la péninsule sinaïtique des origines à l'année des musulmans," RB 49 (1940), 205–223; K. Amantos, Σύντομος ἱστορία τῆς ἱερᾶς μονῆς τοῦ Σινᾶ (Thessalonica 1953); G. F. Forsyth, "The Monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai," DOP 22 (1968), 1–19.

[9] D. Krencker–R. Naumann, AAB 1939, H. 4; B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa (Münster 1950), 69ff.

[10] J. Gouillard, DThC XIV, 2, 2974–2976; P. Peeters, Le tréfonds oriental de l'hagiographie byzantine (Brussels 1950), 160–162, 134–136.

In the capital, Constantinople, monasticism made only slow progress. First, it was established in Bithynia and in the Asiatic suburbs, and almost always it was foreigners, especially Syrians, who appeared as founders: the hermit Auxentius (d. c. 473), for example, who settled on Mount Scopus and organized other colonies of monks around himself. The area around Prusa seems not to have become a country of monks until the seventh century. In Constantinople itself, despite all the legends, there were no monasteries from the time of Constantine the Great.[11] Foundations from the period of Constantius II are a part of the history of the heresies of the age. For "Orthodox" Constantinople the history of monasticism began with the foundation of the Syrian Isaac, later called Dalmatus. The most famous and, for the ecclesiastical political events of the capital, most significant foundation was that of the Monastery of the Acemetae by the Syrian Alexander, who had already been active as a founder on the Euphrates and came to Constantinople c. 405. The Studium Monastery was founded in 463, however, it did not experience its flowering until the early Middle Byzantine period. In the sixth century there suddenly appeared in Constantinople not a few "national monasteries" of Egyptians, Syrians, Bessi, Sicilians, "Romans," and so forth, which were perhaps no more than temporary lodgings of the groups mentioned, administered by some monks. They disappeared from the monastic history of Constantinople as quickly as they had appeared.[12]

It is possible that there was a monastery in the neighborhood of Thessalonica as early as the sixth century; what else we know of monasteries in Greece proper from this period is almost all legend.

The decades around and after the Council of Chalcedon saw monasticism at a climax of its activity in Church politics and for this reason at the height of the danger to its ideas and the ideals of the age of foundation. The peril was so obvious that people were concerned for a remedy.[13] Characteristically, it was the Emperor who produced a corresponding proposal, which was then enacted by the Council Fathers of Chalcedon with slight modifications as canons 3 and 4. Canon 4 denounced those monks who, relying on the esteem for their state among the public, created disturbances in Church and State, moved from place to place without fixed dwelling places, and founded "monasteries" where they pleased. The canon prescribed that no one must establish a monastery or oratory without the permission of the local bishop, that every monk was subject to the bishop's supervision and had to stay in his monastery in quiet (hesychia); further, that no slave might be accepted into a monastery without the consent of his master. For the first time also marriage was forbidden to the monk by canon law (canon 7).

---

[11] J. Pargoire, "Les débuts du monachisme à Constantinople," RQH 65 (1899), 67–143; G. Dragon, "Les moines et la ville," Travaux et mémoires 4 (1970), 229–276.

[12] R. Janin, "Les monastères nationaux et provinciaux à Byzance," ÉO 32 (1933), 429–438.

[13] L. Ueding, "Die Kanones von Chalkedon in ihrer Bedeutung für Mönchtum und Klerus," Chalkedon II, 569–676.

It may be that in this way, for the first time, monasteries and monasticism were recognized at all in canon law or, respectively, were regarded as an institution of public law. However, the purpose which the imperial proposers had in mind was hardly achieved. At first it was often bishops themselves who misused monks for their own ecclesiastical political ends. After canon 4 granted them a power of dispensation, they continued unhindered in these activities. On the other hand, I believe that the monastic character in its details remained so undefined in regard to its external appearance as well as its legal description that it was always an easy thing to evade the prescriptions of the Council. And, third, the hierarchy itself was undecided in the midst of the struggles over the faith to the extent that "for the sake of the higher good" very religious but also fanatical and fanaticized monks again and again found reason to conduct themselves as saviors of the faith against the bishops. In any case, Church history after Chalcedon shows that the success of canons 3 and 4 was only meager. The monastic system of the Eastern Church was from the very beginning—if one excepts such as Pachomius and Basil, who, however, had only slight aftereffects as organizers—a movement rather than an institution. One was a monk by his own will, and an abbot by his own will. The action of the hierarchy had always to lag behind, since juridical concepts remained foreign to the essence of this movement. Without doubt, many educated men also found the way to the monastery. But to the great mass of monks, who rejected all culture, the enthusiastic awareness of a mission could always become a danger. Of course, it pertained to the essence of spirituality that historically it rarely moved into the light of day. Hence in Byzantium the history of monasticism easily became the history of its scandals. But the Apophthegmata Patrum, those precious collections of monastic epigrammatic sayings,[14] the great monastic vitae of the sixth century, the spiritual letters of a Barsanuphius in the sixth century, the conferences of the Palestinian Abbot Dorotheus, and the Spiritual Ladder of John Climacus of the seventh century say more on the heart of the movement than all the scandalous reports of fanaticism and squabblers in monasticism. In Maximus Confessor monastic mysticism found that height of synthesis which would never again be achieved in later Byzantium.

The legislation of the Emperor Justinian also tried to bring this monasticism under definitive control. It was due to him that more precise rules defined the details of vocation, of the reception, period of trial, and profession, and facilitated ecclesiastical control. But if he made the effort to make the strict vita communis generally obligatory, this was a failure, which disregarded the very nature of the "movement."

---

[14] Cf. W. Bousset, Apophthegmata (Tübingen 1923).

If one speaks of a total "monasticization" of Byzantine culture since the sixth century, this is false. There can be absolutely no word of such. Monasticism was strong, numerically and in its ideas, but it was not in the process of changing the rhythm of the life of late antiquity and of the Early Byzantine period, especially that of the cities. Many educated persons continued to be skeptical in regard to this state and took it to be rather a threat than something positive. Of course, the episcopal sees were occupied by monks, all the more frequently those of long duration, but it remained important that—as I see it—for example, the patriarchal see of Constantinople was never occupied by a monk between 450 and 650, unless Eutychius may be seen as an exception! The importance of monasticism for Byzantine life was that of a limiting value, not that of an integrating factor of daily life.

CHAPTER 29

Theological and Religious Literature

Mighty as may have been the dogmatic struggles which convulsed the Imperial Church from the mid-fifth century until the onslaught of Islam—this period by no means belongs to the great periods of classical theology. The formula of Chalcedon imposed on its champions rather the task of the masterly distinction than that of a synthesis, and the distinction had to keep separate what could be presented for religious experience only as a unity. Where there was question of unity, it found expression in a terminology which was not yet the common property of the age and in adjectives and adverbs—adiairetos, achoristos—which asserted the privative rather than the positive. An outstanding theologian would have been needed to make these necessarily colorless statements susceptible of religious experience. But for a long time the Chalcedonian theology had no such representative. And so philosophemes were sought with which to do justice to the distinctions. For the most part they lived on the vocabulary of the Aristotelian school, but no one who made use of them could without more ado be called an Aristotelian. In the Tome of Pope Leo I, this theology still had the powerful appeal with which the language of Latin rhetoric knew how to construct its antitheses in monumental precision. In the Greek syntax, more adept at modulation, it revealed its indigence very much more easily. Thus the strict Chalcedonian theology languished to some extent; it longed—to express it differently—for that Formula of Cyril, discriminated against at Chalcedon, of the one incarnate physis of the Logos or of the one physis of the Logos-made-Man.

That is not intended to mean that the history of theology of the age can supply no names. Perhaps Leontius of Byzantium may be mentioned here, even though his position in the framework of the totality of the theology of the epoch remains disputed.[1] Of course, the majority of the theologians very soon began to give way to their yearning for Cyril. The occasion was provided by the so-called communicatio idiomatum, that is, the possibility of uniting the divine and the human in one single statement in regard to the Person of Christ, that is, with the hen prosopon of Christ as the real bearer of the predicates. In this manner of speaking, one could no longer join the "qua hen prosopon," presuppose it as self-evident, or consciously pass over it in silence. What then appeared was the desire for "Baroque formulations," impressive antitheses, and a fascinating inexactitude. The tendency went farther. Partly in conscious, partly in unconscious approximation of the standpoint of the opponents of Chalcedon, persons insisted on these formulations as a shibboleth of Orthodoxy, whereby they were plunged into serious internal confrontations, such as that over the Three Chapters. Many theologians of the time followed this trend, the Scythian monks as well as John the Grammarian of Caesarea in Palestine[2] or the Patriarch Ephrem of Antioch,[3] and in the Emperor Justinian I they all found their powerful helper, who assisted their theology to its break-through in the Imperial Church. Purest in its point of departure and most exact in its formulation was probably the doctrine of Bishop John of Scythopolis, who characteristically was also preoccupied in detail with the writings of the pseudo-Areopagite.[4] Furthermore, soon thereafter the champions of Monoenergism would derive precisely from the writings of the so-called Neo-Chalcedonians—the most recent representatives of this faction were so called—a part of their arguments, especially from Theodore of

---

[1] See Beck, 373–374; St. Otto, Person und Subsistenz (Munich 1968); S. Helmer, op. cit., 31–41; D. B. Evans, Leontius of Byzantium, an Origenist Christology (Washington 1970); S. Rees, "The Literary Activity of Leontius of Byzantium," JThS 19 (1968), 229–242.

[2] Beck, 377; S. Helmer, op. cit., 160–175.

[3] Beck, 378; S. Helmer, op. cit., 185–195.

[4] Beck, 376–377; S. Helmer, op. cit., 176–182.

Raithu, in so far as he is not identical with the initiator of Monoenergism, Theodore of Pharan.[5]

The attempted approximation to the standpoint of the Monophysites had, of course, no ecclesiastical political success. For these possessed in Severus of Antioch the greatest theologian of the day, to whom the Chalcedonian faction could oppose nothing of equal weight.[6] Based above all on a biblical-patristic culture, without involving himself overly in the uncertainty of philosophical terminology, he again took hold of the theology of Cyril of Alexandria. He always kept in view the concrete, historical appearance of Christ, and, proceeding directly from this concrete idea, he identified physis, hypostasis, and prosopon to a great extent. The idea of unity was the predominating one; in relation to the unity, the concrete unity in Christ, there cannot be two natures—unio deletrix dualitatis. The Synod of Chalcedon had entangled itself precisely in this contradiction and so, despite all appeasing interpretations, no recognition could be given to its decrees. The terminus of the unity in Christ could always be only the one divine nature.

But what made Severus the undisputed Church Father of the Monophysites was not only his consistent dogmatic system, the fact that he had an answer ready for every attack on the part of the Orthodox theology, but also the circumstance that his comprehensive literary work was concerned with all aspects of religious life. An extensive correspondence, festive homilies and sermons, liturgical poetry, and so forth enriched the life of a Church which found with him its route to independence.

There were, to be sure, also in the Monophysite Church deviations from this classical doctrine; but, beside Severus, Julian of Halicarnassus, the father of the Aphthartodocetists, and the representatives of the Theodosianists, Aktists, and Agnoites, and whatever else they may have been called, were all poor examples. Only John, nicknamed Philoponus, could stand beside Severus for the period of origin.[7] His work was intended as the balance between philosophy and dogma, and in it he of course fell into a sort of tritheism in the eyes of those who distrusted him—an interpretation which in its justification is dependent on how his notion of the Trinitarian nature and essence is interpreted. The

---

[5] Cf. W. Elert, "Theodor von Pharan und Theodor von Raithu," ThLZ 76 (1951), 67–76.

[6] Still the best is J. Lebon, Le monophysisme sévérien (Louvain 1919). For the literature: Beck, 387–390.

[7] H. D. Saffrey, "Le chrétien Jean Philopon et la survivance de l'école d'Alexandrie au VI siècle," REG 67 (1954), 396–410; B. Schleissheimer, "Zum Problem Glauben und Wissenschaft im sechsten Jahrundert," Polychordia, Festschr. F. Dölger, Byz. Forschungen 2 (1967), 318–344.

Monophysites themselves, in the long run, did not admit the reproach but set him alongside Severus, whom he had himself always defended. His work is still too little investigated and evaluated. Apparently he was one of the most important representatives of that philosophical and scientific viewpoint which so advantageously distinguished the higher schools of Alexandria from the teaching profession at Athens. Significant was his commentary on the biblical account of creation, which was based partly on the exegesis of the great Basil and, through his method of taking hold of problems, profitably contrasted to that Topography of Cosmas Indicopleustes,[8] which was really only an effort to explain the work of the six days, of course, in an awfully old-fashioned manner. The importance of the work lies in some interesting reports from the travel experiences of the author, not at all in the theological content.

Outside the framework of the dogma and polemics of the age stands the figure of the obscure pseudo-Areopagite, an author with an indestructible preference for mystification and doubtless also with the talent for it. If he is not identical with Peter the Fuller,[9] then the latter must be postulated as his twin-brother! Compared with the turbulent career of the Fuller, rarely blessed with success, his literary activity can be regarded as an attempt to construct an unreal view of life and to favor it with an indisputable authority—a cosmos which was ideally set off to advantage from the environment with which the author never got along, together with its everyday authority. And he succeeded to the extent that his centuries-long respectful acceptance cannot be explained by the pseudonym alone. The pseudo-Areopagite, with his treatises on the heavenly and earthly hierarchies, created a polished system of analogies which not only came halfway to meet the demands of the bishops of his own and later times but also gave to the liturgical achievement an in depth focus which became very important for the liturgical theology, as well as for the liturgical art of the Byzantines of the future. With his work on the divine names, of course, he made the attempt, condemned to founder in its innermost essence, to create a system of negative theology. And if his terminology on the via supereminentiae in the statements on God caused him to become lost in linguistic impossibilities, nevertheless he thereby set a standard for the necessary breakdown of all talk about God. In other respects it spoke for his mystic instinct that, in addition to a system of illumination, which proceeded in a strictly hierarchical manner and separated the simple man from God by a protracted series of degrees rather than united him with him, he stressed again and again the notion of the "nearness" of God, compared to which the distances in his "hierarchies" became irrelevant.

---

[8] W. Wolska, La topographie chrétienne de Cosmas Indicopleustès (Paris).

[9] U. Riedinger, "Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagites, Pseudo-Kaisarios und die Akoimeten," ByZ 52 (1959), 276–296; id., "Petros der Walker von Antiocheia als Verfasser der pseudo-dionysischen Schriften," Salzburger Jb. der Philos. 5–6 (1961–62), 135–156; R. Roques, L'univers dionysien (Paris 1954).

In any case, the pseudo-Areopagite stands outside his age; and if Severus is disregarded, it can be said that only the Monoenergist Controversy of the seventh century again gave Byzantium a theologian of his rank—Maximus Confessor,[10] who, of course, even less than Severus, can be restricted to dogma and polemics. It was certainly to his merit to have created, in the confusion over the definition of the energies and will in Christ, by means of a clear-sighted terminology, the presuppositions which were necessary in order to grasp the heart of the problem at all. Maximus was a Dyothelite as regards the physical faculty of willing in Christ, but in thelema gnomikon he saw a property of the hypostasis—a distinction which would have been suited to prepare a speedy end to the confrontation if attention had really been paid to it. But this was only one aspect of the importance belonging to the Confessor. It was probably decisive that in him exact dogma and mysticism achieved an insoluble connection. He hardly showed the importance of any new elements in the mysticism of the Byzantine Church: he was linked to Evagrius and through him to Origen, whereas pseudo-Dionysius, on whom, however, he wrote a commentary, remained rather on the fringes; he had incorporated Christology, which in my opinion Evagrius was little concerned for, into this system, and out of the dialectics of the Christological formulas, which had hitherto been handled all too abstractly, not to say negatively, he constructed a mystical theology of the Cross, on which a suffering and glorified Christ collected all antitheses into an ultimate unity. He was the greatest master of the mysticism of Christ in the Byzantine sphere—never again equalled, and, sadly, in the course of the centuries, if not forgotten, at least all too little regarded.

Besides Maximus there must be named the Patriarch of Jerusalem, Sophronius,[11] one of the first champions of the two energies in Christ as opposed to the Alexandrian Union of 633; he must be mentioned also as preacher, hagiographer, and religious poet; then also Anastasius of Sinai,[12] whose work and personality are still not sufficiently delineated, a sort of summist of anti-Monophysite polemics, but one who with some of his sermons determined the homiletics of the entire Byzantine period.

---

[10] H. U. v. Balthasar, Kosmische Liturgie. Das Weltbild Maximus' des Bekenners (Einsiedeln, 2nd. ed., 1961); W. Völker, Maximos Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens (Wiesbaden 1965).

[11] Beck 434–436; Chr. v. Schönborn, Sophrone de Jérusalem (Paris 1972).

[12] S. N. Sakkos, Περὶ Ἀναστασίων Σιναϊτῶν (Thessalonica 1964).

It is curious to establish that, alongside the great Christological controversies of the age, the newly popular Origenism of the same age—if one disregards official notifications and, perhaps, Maximus Confessor—found hardly a literary expression. The presumption is natural that the pateres pneumatikoi in the monastic settlements of Palestine and elsewhere could hardly extract much from the system of the great Alexandrian to the extent that they could understand it at all, and that there were probably only individuals among the Palestinian monks who were conversant with more than single basic elements of Origenism, while the mass of the "Origenists" were only their followers. Individual traces of Origenism can be discovered here and there, but they are of no great importance. On the other hand, we know some collections of simple instructions for the spiritual life of the monks, especially in community, who, far removed from losing themselves in speculations, displayed an astonishing knowledge of the deep psychological processes of life in seclusion from the world and from it drew their concrete conclusions for the guidance of hermits and still more of cenobites. The collection of questions and answers of, for example, the recluse Barsanuphius,[13] who lived in Palestine in the mid-sixth century, with its very discreet method of direction of souls, the spiritual conferences of the Abbot Dorotheus,[14] from the same period and the same environment, which later enjoyed a great repute in the monastery of Studium, to name only some, especially happily represent this trend. If there was danger, then Origenism was not the only answer for the spiritual life of the time. Messalianism, with its dualistic world view, at least in praxi, its exclusive concern for the "pure," and its longing for a physical experience of the state of grace, gave much trouble to the guardians of Orthodox monasticism. Of course, in the spiritual instructions of Diadochus of Photice[15] they had a manual which came to meet the legitimate wishes as far as it staked out firm boundaries. Here a spiritual organ was discovered, the aisthesis noera, which should guide to the sure distinction between physically perceptible mystical phenomena and demoniacal delusions—a work of amazing psychological insight.

The classical Evagrian mysticism, here and there thoroughly indebted to Origenism, found only in the seventh century its revival in a form which made it acceptable to Orthodoxy. In addition to Maximus there must be mentioned here especially the Libyan monk Thalassius.[16] Probably also under obligation to this system was that treatise of the seventh century which had the widest impact, the Klimax (Ladder of Paradise) of John of Sinai,[17] even if in him the final stages of the union with God are rather hinted at than worked out. Interesting is the confirmation that in this work the famous Jesus-Prayer, the mneme Iesou more precisely, whose method goes much farther back, already appears as an integrating ingredient incorporated into the system of ascent, without the entrance into the spiritual behavior which this mneme presupposes as having already been simplified and rendered less demanding. It is proved that from this "Sinaitic" mysticism the route goes directly to Late Byzantine mysticism.[18]

---

[13] Beck, 395–396; M. Viller–K. Rahner, op. cit., 149.

[14] Beck, 396; M. Viller–K. Rahner, 150–151.

[15] F. Dörr, Diadochus von Photike und die Messalianer (Freiburg 1937).

[16] M. T. Disdier, RÉB 2 (1944), 79–118.

If the later Byzantine biblical exegesis again and again had recourse to the sixth century, this is so not because the explanation of Scripture at this period had been especially deep, but rather because in the sixth century the basis for those catenae was laid, which at the same time presented material and form in an outstanding way for the exegesis of long generations. Thus, as the dogmaticians collected ever more frequently anthologies of patristic passages for specific themes that interested them, finally to argue only from such florilegia, so now also the biblical exegetes began to assemble and arrange for every verse of a scriptural book the commenting texts of the most varied older authors. It remains noteworthy that these florilegists, consciously or unconsciously, in this always remained most strongly influenced by the great Antiochene exegetes even when these had fallen under the anathema of ecclesiastical synods as theologians, but this still speaks for the exegetical taste of the collectors.

One of the first compilers of catenae was apparently Procopius of Gaza[19] in the sixth century, famed as head of a school of Christian sophists in the Palestinian city. His catena of the Octateuch became the model for all later ones. He also commented in this manner on other books of the Old Testament. The homiletics of the sixth and seventh centuries did not occupy in the whole of theological literature anything resembling the place it had had at the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries. In the epoch of controversial dogmatic nomenclature rhetorical emphasis and amplification were apparently more dangerous than a collection of definitions! Only isolated oratorical talent appears—for example, in Severus or in Sophronius of Jerusalem and in Anastasius of Sinai. Then in the seventh century there emerged numerous preachers, whose more precise determination as to time and place still offers difficulties, for example, a Leontius of Jerusalem, who is perhaps identical with a Leontius of Constantinople, a Pantaleon, and others.[20] Important for the future was also the homiletic legacy of the Cypriote Bishop Leontius of Neapolis,[21] who was at the same time the most important hagiographer of the century. With his Life of the Alexandrian Patriarch John the Compassionate he created a monument of the ecclesiastical life of Egypt before Islam[22] and, with the presentation of the "Fool in Christ," Simeon of Emesa, a precious document of bizarre popular religious life in the Middle East.[23]

---

[17] I. Hausherr, "La methode d'oraison hesychaste," OrChrA IX, 2 (Rome 1927), 134–137; A. Saudreau, "Doctrine spirituelle de s. Jean Climaque," La Vie spirituelle 9 (1924), 353–370; G. Couilleau, "Jean Climaque," DSAM VIII (1972), 369–389; D. Bogdanovic, Jovan Lestvicnik u vizantijskoj i staroj srpskoj knjizevnosti (Belgrade 1968); W. Völker, Scala Paradisi. Eine Studie zu Johannes Climacus (Wiesbaden 1968).

[18] Cf. I. Hausherr, "Les grands courants de la spiritualité orientale," OrChrP 1 (1935), 114–138.

[19] Beck, 414–422.

If the totality is surveyed, it may perhaps be said that the systematic theology of the age, apart from a few exceptions, lacked the trend toward the creative. Quotes and prayers were repeated mechanically; it was a period in which the so-called patristic proof, handled schematically, supplanted the creative interpretation of the Bible; the fact that some of the dogmaticians were at the same time impassioned and often unscrupulous ecclesiastical politicans does not make the picture more appealing. On the other hand, a Peter the Fuller, identified with the pseudo-Areopagite, reveals what these querulous people were spiritually capable of and thereby discloses something of the disunited breadth of the talents of these men of late antiquity. And if the monasticism of the time was in general no better than the hierarchy, it must not be forgotten that here too for the most part only the hotheads of history have been preserved. The above-mentioned ascetical writers from the desert spoke another language. Here the theology of spirituality made its supreme achievement.

---

[20] Beck, 456–458.

[21] Beck, 455–456.

[22] Edited by H. Gelzer (Freiburg–Leipzig 1893).

[23] Cf. H. Lietzmann, Byzantinische Legenden (Jena 1911).

CHAPTER 30

Organization and Inner Life of the Eastern Imperial Church

The Council of Chalcedon—and no end. Even for the organization of the Imperial Church the Synod constituted a decisive date. The famous canon 28,[1] to be sure, took up the decisions of the Synod of 381, but to a primacy of honor were now added jurisdictional privileges: the right of ordination in the ancient, hitherto autonomous great metropolitan areas of the provinces of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace, and beyond them a sort of missionary primacy for the frontier areas of the Empire that were until now subject to no metropolis. And if in 381 there was mention of a primacy of honor "after that of Rome," in 451 one spoke of an equal rank with Rome. But, basically there was no question of a novelty in this canon. We must not forget that at the latest from 421 we have to reckon with the political equalization between Constantinople and Rome. Moreover, earlier John Chrysostom, as Archbishop of Constantinople, had made an energetic effort to deduce from canon 3 of 381 substantial rights of his see in regard to the ecclesiastical provinces of Asia Minor. Finally in 421 the Emperors Honorius and Theodosius II had already attempted to establish the authority of the bishop of their capital in Illyricum. Hence it is not unlikely that Chalcedon with its canon only consolidated what had already begun promisingly as a development. In a decree of 477[2] the Emperor Zeno took a further step. When, on the occasion of the restoration of Orthodoxy in Constantinople in opposition to Arianism, the Emperor Theodosius I had decreed as the norm the faith of Rome and Alexandria, so Zeno called the Church of Constantinople "mater nostrae pietatis et christianorum orthodoxae religionis omnium." Nothing was said of Rome. Of course, the Emperor Justinian I again very strongly stressed the Roman primacy and in a critical situation took it into account de facto. But soon Rome's freedom of action was for political reasons no longer all too great, and the East quickly became used, not indeed to writing Rome off, but to exerting itself only when no alternative remained. Rome's primacy was in no sense denied, but apparently it was believed that the claims of this primacy were satisfied with "honorable mention." That the old patriarchates and metropolitan sees of the East had submitted with pleasure to the new Primate in Constantinople is by no means true. But the more the chief bishops of the Imperial Church in Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt had to do to maintain themselves and prevail against the Monophysites, the more they were dependent on the protectorate of the Bishop of the capital. Then the occupation of broad areas of Christian territory by Islam only furthered this development. What canons and imperial laws prepared, what the activity of the Patriarch of Constantinople emphasized, was confirmed by the development of protocol, especially of the title of "Ecumenical Patriarch."[3] The Patriarch Dioscorus of Alexandria had already tried, of course unsuccessfully, to adopt this title, and in other bishoprics there are also traces of its employment. From the Acacian Schism at the latest this designation was tendered to the Byzantine Patriarch, probably at first rhetorically rather than officially. Apparently no one took it amiss. Only Pope Pelagius II, to whose ears it came that now even the synod officially used this title for the Patriarch, entered a protest against it with the Patriarch John the Faster (582–595). Gregory the Great, who in other respects, contrary to Leo the Great, in practice recognized canon 28, took up this protest. The Emperor Maurice thought he must urge peace, but Gregory argued that by his protest he was defending the rights of the other bishops, which were curtailed by such a title. He had no success. Of course, the title can be translated by a colorless "Patriarch of the Empire." But the Patriarchs of Constantinople themselves proved that it was susceptible of a weighty interpretation. It is significant that Photius was the first to introduce the title into the protocol of the patriarchal charters, that Cerularius was the first to adopt it on his seal, and that the patriarchs included it in their signature only from the thirteenth century. In other words: the stages in the development of the title occur together with the stages of the strained relations between Rome and Constantinople.[4]

---

[1] T. O. Martin, "The Twenty-Eighth Canon of Chalcedon: a Background Note," Chalkedon II, 433–458.

[2] Cod. Just. I, 2, 16.

Since the patriarchs of Constantinople were not content with the right of ordination in their new sphere, but exercised in it that jurisdictional and doctrinal authority which earlier the patriarchs of Alexandria called their own in Egypt and Libya, the development of their primacy was accompanied by a weakening of the old metropolitan organization. The entire life of the Imperial Church gradually concentrated on Constantinople, and it is significant that in the seventh century we obtain ever more sparse information on the individual life of great metropolises and great metropolitans, such as in Cappadocia or Pontus. Even at Chalcedon the Fathers complained that the organization of provincial synods had gradually fallen into oblivion and inculcated the holding of such meetings. The weaker the attendance at these synods in the province became, the more popular became the synod which assembled around the patriarch, the so-called Synodus Endemusa,[5] which can be traced back to the fourth century and where all metropolitans met who were staying in the capital for any reason. The ancient structure of the metropolitan organization was upset also by the ever more frequent creation of autocephalous archbishoprics, that is, by the elevation of simple bishoprics to the rank of archbishoprics, which however obtained no suffragans.[6] This exemption was mostly the outcome of political or personal rivalries. Basically, the most recent patriarch, that of Jerusalem, owed its origin to such an exemption. And the same is true of the autocephalous Archbishopric of Cyprus, and also for such ephemeral foundations as the city of Justiniana Prima by the Emperor Justinian.

---

[3] Cf. S. Vailhé, ÉO 11 (1908), 161–171; E. Caspar, Geschichte der Päpste II (Stuttgart 1933), 847; E. H. Fischer, "Gregor der Grosse und Byzanz." ZSavRGkan 36 (1950), 15–144.

[4] V. Laurent, RÉB 6 (1948), 5–26; id., MiscMercati III, 373–396.

[5] J. Hajjar, Le synode permanente dans l'église byzantine des origines au XI^e siècle (Rome 1962).

Again and again the effort was made to fix the status of the individual churches also in writing, and to these efforts we owe the so-called Notitiae episcopatuum,[7] which present the rank of the individual sees among themselves. Such a list for the Patriarchate of Constantinople may have come to a certain completion under the Emperor Justinian. Perhaps it was revised under the dynasty of the Emperor Heraclius. At that time it gave a number of thirty-three metropolises and now already thirty-four autocephalous archbishoprics. The Notitia Antiochena may have originated in the second half of the sixth century. Whether such lists were prepared for Jerusalem and Alexandria in this early period is doubtful.

All these problems strongly interfered with the legal status of the Church. If the Bible and the tradition of the Fathers were regarded as the primary sources of the canonical life of the Church, in the course of the generations the need arose for individual statements of norms and decisions, and soon the Imperial Church, like the Empire itself, saw itself faced with the problem of codifying the material as a whole.[8] At Antioch there occurred the first extant attempt at a systematic collection of the valid canon law. The redactor was one John the Scholastic, who later became the Patriarch John III of Constantinople (565–577). He divided the matter into fifty categories (titloi), under which he arranged the pertinent canons or parts of canons of the synods held up to then and regarded as binding and material from the canonistic writings of the Fathers. In this John relied on an unknown predecessor, who c. 545 had made a collection of canons in sixty titles and had added to it an appendix of twenty-one imperial laws on canonical matters. In addition to his collection of canons, John now also arranged a collection of civil law enactments on ecclesiastical material by excerpting the most important Novels of Justinian. Today this collection is known as the Collectio 78

---

[6] E. Chrysos, "Zur Enstehung der Institution der autokephalen Erzbistümer," ByZ 62 (1969), 263–286.

[7] Beck, 148–232.

[8] Ibid., 140–147.

capitum. John was not alone in this zeal to excerpt canonical matters from the Novels. From there it was then only one step to collections which took into account also the canon and nomos, the so-called nomocanones, that is, collections which brought into a single system canon law as well as imperial law—the latter in so far as it affected the Church. The oldest nomocanon, the so-called Nomocanon of Fifty Titles, likewise perhaps originated at Antioch. A second nomocanon, called the Nomocanon of Fourteen Titles, may belong to the age of the Emperor Heraclius. From it then proceeded later the so-called Photian Nomocamon.

If the life of the Byzantine Church is gauged by the pitiless dogmatic struggles, the harsh personal rivalries of the bishops and patriarchs, the blood that flowed, and the hatred that produced this bloodletting, the question arises where was the Christianity of this Church. Perhaps this impression, which the external events convey, is to some extent softened if one turns to the liturgy of the period. How this is of significance to the origins of the so-called Liturgy of St. Basil and the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom will long remain a puzzle. In all likelihood, both liturgies came from the Syrian area. But it was precisely our centuries in which they found at Constantinople their completion and a noteworthy enrichment. It is not useless to mention here a few small elements in the construction which were at that time inserted into the liturgy and which greatly account for its fascination. The fifth century enriched the liturgical formularies with the Trisagion,[9] over whose Trinitarian or Christological interpretation there was so much wrangling, but which, as an element of liturgical rhythmization and intensification vigorously prepared for the scriptural reading. Again, without the dogmatically disputed background of the time, that hymn, perhaps composed by Justinian himself, with the opening words Ho monogenes huios,[10] is unthinkable; it is one of the best examples of how in liturgical dress dogmatic strife could find the way back to its religious origin. The Emperor Justin II (565–578) is said to have introduced two hymns into the liturgy, which are probably older but in their new place incomparably reproduce briefly and deeply all that pertains to the essence of the Byzantine liturgy: first, the so-called Cherubikon, which presents all liturgical action in the Church as a duplication of the liturgy of the cherubim before the throne of the Most High, and then the communion song Tou deipnou sou tou mystikou, in which is expressed something of the humility of orthodox piety, which again and again, unobserved, cuts the ground from under the pageantry of the ecclesiastical organization. Probably the elaboration of those processions, which, as "the great" and "the little entrance," represent the dramatic climax of the Byzantine Foremass, may also be placed in the fifth to the sixth centuries. Also in this period the festal calendar acquired an important enrichment. The introduction of one of the chief Marian feasts, that of the evangelismos[11]—the Annunciation—may have occurred in the age of Justinian. The Emperor Maurice decreed the celebration of the Koimesis (Mary's Assumption),[12] and the feast of the Triumph of the Cross[13] on 14 September may indeed go back to earlier days, perhaps as a feast accompanying the dedication of the Anastasis at Jerusalem, but only the recovery of the relic of the Cross by the Emperor Heraclius after his victory over the Persians gave it its special brilliance for all succeeding ages. The sixth century also gave to the Byzantine Church its greatest liturgical poet, Romanus the Melode, the creator of the Kontakion.[14] This form of liturgical hymn is, one may say, rhythmic prose, and, as rhythmic prose, nothing other than a sermon. But this literary definition cannot obscure the high poetic gifts of Romanus, in whom the stylized antithetical dogmatic statement is joined in a special manner with an almost picturesque talent of typical viewpoint. Never again in Byzantine literature were the limits between speech and the art of poetry so fundamentally laid down as here. And what the Byzantine Church later produced in liturgical poetry lived on the not always sound amplification of this early creation.

---

[9] C. S. Tsogas, Ὁ τρισάγιος ὕμνς:Χαριστήριον Π. Κ. Χρήστου (Thessalonica 1967), 275–287.

[10] V. Grumel, "L'auteur et la date de composition du tropaire Ὁ μονογενής," ÉO 22 (1923), 398–418.

Perhaps it is somewhat daring to designate another branch of the devout life of the Byzantine Church, which developed especially in this period, as a turning from the logomachy of the theologians of the time: the cult of icons. It can be pinpointed that the ancient Christian hostility to images came to an end precisely in the sixth century and that indifference in regard to icons could no longer be maintained.[15] The people seized upon icons not as a Biblia pauperum but honored them with the fervor which belonged to the bearers of grace, and the icons came to meet the people by dispensing grace, doing signs and wonders, consoling, and helping wherever the trust of the faithful demanded this. If it has been said that the cult of icons was an expression of Orthodoxy as such, this is correct certainly at the earliest only from the seventh century, but from then on all the more emphatically. As escape from the dogmatic misery it was a religiously intelligible process, which of course introduced in a fatal manner the dichotomy which gradually would determine the Byzantine ecclesiastical system ever more strongly. But perhaps one may go a step farther. There is question not only of escape but probably also of a religious event which in a remarkable manner decided the dogmatic struggle in its own favor. Without using the slogan, "Monophysitism of the Byzantine icon of Christ," the notion cannot be rejected that that vacuum which the formula of Chalcedon left unresolved was again filled in the icon, in an icon which, although artistically it could represent only nature, went beyond this nature to a degree and deified it, so that if it is desired to add a postscript to the Byzantine icon of Christ, the Cyrillan formula would be more adapted to this than the Chalcedonian.

---

[11] S. Vailhé, ÉO 9 (1906), 138–145.

[12] A. Raes, "Aux origines de la fête de l'assomption en Orient," OrChrP 12 (1946), 262–274.

[13] E. Honigman, "La date de l'homélie du prêtre Pantoléon sur la fête de l'exaltation de la croix," Bulletin Acad. Belge V (1950), 547–559.

[14] Beck, 425–427.

[15] N. H. Baynes, "The Icons Before Iconoclasm," HThR 44 (1951), 93–106; E. Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," DOP 8 (1954), 83–150.

The religious life of the people was reflected also in the "life" of their saints. Mention has been made elsewhere of monastic vitae. But it is interesting that the hagiographer Romanus[16] made noticeable in this period that accumulating of legendary and not rarely piquant traits which occasionally even evoked the mistrust of the ecclesiastical authorities but apparently satisfied the taste of the people better than some of the labored expositions of hagiographical rhetoric. Certain products of this sort, such as the martyrium and the miracles of Saint Conon,[17] probably formed a kind of pilgrimage guide, which was on sale at the saint's cult center. The same may have been the case with the great reports of miracles, such as those about the two physicians, Cosmas and Damian,[18] who characteristically obtained the nickname Anargyroi, who cured without payment, and who were especially venerated at Constantinople, or about Cyrus and John,[19] the pair of healers, who became the successors of Menuthis in Egypt. Other romances were related to contemporary events. Thus the report of the miracles on the death of Mary may probably be connected with the introduction of the feast of the Assumption toward the end of the sixth century,[20] and the appearance of miracle-working saints from Persian territory—for example, we may mention Golinduch,[21] who "remained a martyr during life"—with the effort to stir up enthusiasm for the war against the fireworshipers. Of noteworthy edification is also the life of the economus Theophilus of the Church of Adana, in which has been seen a precursor of the Faust saga,[22] and still more remarkable the leap which Saint George made from the pagan myth to the sphere of the Christian slayer of dragons;[23] both reports, as also the first records in the long series of stories about Saint Nicholas of Myra[24] and the Greek version of the romance of Alexius,[25] are products of the seventh century. In regard to this fictitious hagiography a "political" treatment of the saints must not be forgotten. Testimonies are probably the incipient collecting of the miracles of Demetrius, the city patron of Thessalonica,[26] whose deeds reflected the fortunes of this city; other testimonies are texts, such as the report on the martyrdom of Arethas,[27] the bishop in southernmost Arabia, or the gradual introduction of the legend of the Apostle Andrew on the soil of the imperial capital, which would lead to the according of apostolic rank to the episcopal see of this city.[28]

---

[16] H. Delehaye, Les légendes hagiographiques (Brussels 1905).

[17] BHG 2077.

[18] Ibid. 373ff.

[19] Ibid. 469ff.

[20] M. Jugie, La mort et l'assomption de la sainte vierge (Vatican City 1944), 117–126.

[21] P. Peeters, "Sainte Golindouch, martyre perse," AnBoll 62 (1944), 74–125.

If canonical decrees on discipline and order among clergy and laity are at all capable of giving information on the inner life of the community, this applies to the canons of the Synod of 691–92, which, because of the meeting-place in the imperial palace at Constantinople, is called the Synod "in Trullo" and regarded itself as an ecumenical completion of the Fifth and Sixth Synods, both of which had issued no disciplinary canons.[29] Without any systematic arrangement, these canons, 102 in number, presented a comprehensive and very instructive collection of prescriptions on the inner life of the Church of the period—at the same time a reflection of the difficult situation into which the Byzantine Church had fallen through the invasions of numerous barbarian tribes, through imperial measures of resettlement, and through new heresies. It was in accord with the negative type of canons that almost only the shady sides of ecclesiastical life were mentioned. Behind them stood an inner ecclesiastical development, to which far too little thought has been given, in view of the denominational and dogmatic struggles that claimed all the interest. The life which is visible here, in part clearly, in part in a shadowy way, was of variegated profusion. Jewish and pagan elements take up much room, developments in the direction of entirely specific contracting of the total view are under way, features of pre-Christian custom and non-Christian piety make their way. We meet clerics with virgines subintroductae, clerics as tax collectors and pawnbrokers, as frequenters of circus games and horse races, and some who join in conspiracies against their bishops; then types of asceticism or apparent asceticism which recall the doings of the so-called Saloi, the fools in Christ, Jews as the most popular physicians of the time, carnival performances with the wild antics of law students, common baths for men and women, false martyrologies, offensive rites, and so forth. Without doubt the Synod intended to legislate for the Universal Christ, but it is also certain that it had in mind the specifically Byzantine canon law and in a series of canons took a stand expressis verbis against the usages of the Western Church, for example in canon 13 on clerical marriage, canon 55 against fasting on the Saturdays of Lent, and in canon 67 with its prohibition of the use of kosher meat, quite apart from the repetition of the anathema against Pope Honorius I in canon 1.

---

[22] L. Radermacher, "Griechische Quellen zur Faustsage," SAW 206, 4 (Vienna 1927).

[23] K. Krumbacher, Der heilige Georg (Munich 1911).

[24] G. Anrich, Hagois Nikolaos, vol. II (Leipzig–Berlin 1917).

[25] BHG 56c.

[26] P. Lemerle, "La composition et la chronologie des deux premiers livres des Miracula S. Demetrii," ByZ 46 (1953), 349–361.

[27] P. Peeters, Le tréfonds oriental de l'hagiographie byzantine (Brussels 1950), 88.

[28] F. Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew (Cambridge, Mass. 1958).

[29] Edition of the canons in Mansi XI, 921–1006. Cf. also V. Laurent, "L'oeuvre canonique du concile in Trullo (691–692), source primaire du droit de l'église orientale," RÉB 23 (1965), 7–41.

The Emperor Justinian II sought to compel Pope Sergius I (687–701) to sign, but his emissaries were frustrated by the Italian militia, and the Emperor himself soon had to go into exile. But in 705 he recovered the throne and now tried by peaceful means; finally in 711 Pope Constantine went personally to the East, and everything indicates that he agreed orally with the Emperor on the recognition of the canons while expunging those that were expressly directed against Rome. The tradition of the canons in the Eastern Church did not take this reconciliation into account, but in the West people were gradually content.

If the picture in these synodal decrees is not without spot and wrinkle, these shady sides were brilliantly covered over in the ecclesiastical art of the time. The age of Justinian represents in this respect a climax of secular importance. The most excellent expression is the ecclesiastical architecture, to which Justinian devoted enormous sums. Here we cannot go into the abundance of the individual achievements. But in Hagia Sophia not only was a unique result achieved technically, but at the same time the mystical unity of God's Kingdom, Church, and Empire was expressed at one time. It was not only the Church which could do this. To architecture belonged the liturgy, and indeed ecclesiastical and imperial liturgy together in one interlacing, which means a sublimation of all that was called Byzantium—a sublimation which the Empire needed all the more, the more unfermented the juridical and canonical bases of just this interlacing were. Hagia Sophia is the expression of the Byzantine illusion of an Imperial Church, whose historical becoming and growing never measured up to the dream in stone. This flight from reality is, regarded from the viewpoint of Church history and not from that of art history, in my opinion also a movens within the Byzantine painting of the period, which more and more went in the direction of the icon, and in fact of the icon understood as a picture which bears grace and imports graces. The revolutionary change of the times after the break-through of the Justinianean restoration policy in the sixth century—barbarians and war on all frontiers and into the heartland of the Empire—awakened a great longing for the visible and tangible Savior, and what had begun as painting technique emptied under the eyes of the believer into a sort of real presence of the thing represented, brusque echo of the idea of a "hypostatic union" in the dress of art. The theologians, in so far as there were any, resigned or tried, themselves carried away, to lag behind with likewise clumsy formulas of the development of popular piety.

CHAPTER 31

Missionary Activity of the Early Byzantine Imperial Church

A good portion of the missionary activity of Eastern Christianity from the middle of the fifth century, both toward the South and the East, benefited the gradually growing independent denominations of the Nestorians and Monophysites. This has been dealt with in another chapter. The Imperial Church itself had taken a long time, after its liberation by the first Christian Emperors, until it again remembered its missionary commission.[1] At first little incentive can be detected in regard to bringing Christianity to the barbarians dwelling beyond the imperial frontiers. Perhaps this was connected with the incipient identification of Orbis Romanus and Christian Ecumene. If there was evangelization, then it was rarely an action which was organized by the hierarchy residing in the Empire, but for the most part the effort of individuals, who as merchants, slaves, or prisoners of war were taken to a remote area and here came upon pagans; in this again their first concern was only for those pagans who, like themselves, came from the Empire and were likewise war-prisoners or slaves. Then only from this nucleus of a "foreign congregation" did the work go farther and embrace the indigenous "barbarians." A second mission field was provided by those foreign tribes which gradually infiltrated the Empire or procured admission by force. Partly they themselves pressed for baptism, because they had recognized that with it they could more easily demand acceptance into the imperial community than without it, and because they identified or confused the blessings of the culture of the Empire with those of Christianity. Thus in the Byzantine mission the Christian idea entered into a symbiosis with the imperial idea, which basically only put the concept of Eusebius of Caesarea into practice.[2]

---

[1] E. A. Thompson, "Christianity and Northern Barbarians," A. Momigliano, The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century (Oxford 1963), 56–78.

Especially interesting from this point of view was the mission to the Bedouins in the hinterland of Syria and in Palestine. Cyril of Scythopolis tells us about it in the vita of the monastic father Euthymius.[3] A Bedouin sheik from the area of Persian domination migrated with his tribe to imperial territory. The Comes Orientis Anatolius received him and now entrusted him with the border patrol opposite the Persian Kingdom. But he had a son who was ill. Hence he went, together with his tribe and property, to Euthymius in the Palestinian Desert, and Euthymius performed on the little Arab a miraculous cure, which moved the sheik to have himself and his family baptized. After some time the recent convert returned with crowds of Bedouins to the vicinity of Euthymius's monastic colony. Euthymius assigned them places for pitching camp and grazing, instructed them, baptized them, and built them a church in their camp. But this was not enough: he persuaded the Patriarch Juvenal to give these Bedouins their own bishop of Arabian blood, and Juvenal ordained the Bedouin sheik, who since his baptism was called Peter, as bishop of his people with his seat in the Parembolai, that is, the Bedouin camp. The tribal prince became also the bishop, and, in accord with the life habits of the Bedouins, no episcopal city was assigned to him: his seat was his own tent. The bishopric was not an ephemeral phenomenon: it played a role in the ecclesiastical life of Palestine, and the bishops themselves soon accommodated themselves to the ways of their colleagues in the cities. Around the middle of the fifth century we know a second tent-bishopric in Phoenicia Secunda, as the conversion of the Arabs seems generally to have made no insignificant progress deep into the interior of the country. A remote and yet important point of this mission was, for example, the island of Iotabe in the Gulf of Aqaba, where c. 470 there was organized an almost independent client state of the Empire, consisting of Arabs, who also had their own bishop; but we do not know where the missionaries came from. In 498 the "kingdom" again came under Roman rule, but the bishopric continued. All together, the lists of those attending the Council of Chalcedon enumerate no less than twenty Arabian bishops.

---

[2] H. G. Beck, "Christliche Mission und politische Propaganda im byzantinischen Reich," La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'alto medioevo (Spoleto 1967), 649–694.

[3] E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skythopolis (Leipzig 1939), 18ff.

It is self-evident that, under the Emperors Justin I and Justinian I and their political and ecclesiastical concept, the imperial mission acquired stronger political tones than ever before.[4] The Persian policy, for example, played no insignificant role in this, in which a great importance was attributed to the Caucasian frontier area, a boundary of both Empires. It was Persian pressure on Caucasian Lazica that induced the local King Tzat to flee to Byzantium. This meant that he had to have himself baptized. The christening gifts of Justin I brought to the refugee an imperial patrician as wife and, in addition, the insignia of the royal dignity: the neophyte only had to become a vassal of the Empire.[5] Depending on the importance which policy had in a missionary enterprise, it could happen that Justin I, as later Justinian, knew exactly how to disregard the "denomination" of the missionaries, even if it did not correspond to the Emperor's denominational policy. Among the Himyarites in South Arabia a Jewish King, Dhu Nuwas, had seized power and begun to impede the expansion of Christianity and to persecute the native Christians. A combined action of the Byzantines and of the King of Ethiopia, who was friendly to them, was intended to restore order.[6] The operation was successful, Dhu Nuwas was defeated and killed, and the freedom of Christianity was renewed. People throughout the Empire were interested in the jeopardized situation of Christianity under Dhu Nuwas, especially the Monophysites, even when the Orthodox Emperor took charge of the settlement. And the Ethiopians, who carried out the occupation of South Arabia, must likewise have been closer to the Monophysite confession than to Orthodoxy. But besides the freedom of Christianity, the Emperor was concerned with something more. The territory of South Arabia may have interested the Empire relatively little, but again and again the Persians tried to establish themselves there so they could control Byzantine commerce through the Red Sea and probably also over the so-called Frankincense Route, which the Empire could not possibly allow. Even in the Passio of Saint Arethas, a report on the martyrdom of one el-Harith under Dhu Nuwas, the political background is pretty clear.

The Emperor Justinian adhered to the same line in his mission policy—only thus can it rightly be called. He sent missionaries to the Heruli, who had settled south of the Danube and were living in constant conflict with the native population. The Emperor expected to "tame" them through their christianization, and, so to say, to make them "devoted to the Empire." The historian Procopius, a witness of a conservative Romanism, was of the opinion that it would hardly be worth the trouble to convert inferior barbarians of such a type. But Justinian saw farther. His missionaries were successful: even the King had himself baptized, and Justinian was his sponsor. Finally even Procopius himself had to recognize that the situation on the Danube had substantially improved.[7]

---

[4] I. Engelhardt, Mission und Politik in Byzanz. Ein Beitrag zur Strukturanalyse byzantinischer Mission zur Zeit Justins und Justinians (Munich 1974).

[5] See A. A. Vasiliev, Justin the First (Cambridge, Mass. 1950), 259ff.

[6] Criticism of the sources and presentation of this controverted episode in A. A. Vasiliev, op. cit., 15–17, 283ff.; I. Engelhardt, op. cit., 171ff.; J. Ryckmans, La persécution des chrétiens himyarites au VI^e siècle (Istanbul 1956); I. Shahid, The Martyrs of Najrân (Brussels 1971).

Justinian devoted the same care as his uncle to the Caucasian lands, and here again in connection with the Christian mission. He was especially interested in the Abasgi, to whom he sent priests as missionaries, and these discharged their commission so thoroughly that the Abasgi expelled their pagan prince and oriented their policy entirely according to instructions from Byzantium.[8] Grand-scale planning is revealed also in the evangelization of the Tzanes in the vicinity of Lazica. Here christianization was at the same time "colonization;" Procopius reports that Justinian had insinuated that the conditions of life of the country must be changed if people did not want to risk a relapse into paganism. Thus he had the forests cleared and routes laid out for new roads; pastures for horse breeding were established; and commerce with the neighboring tribes was fostered. The prehistory of this progress toward civilization is found, of course, not in the desire of the Tzanes for baptism but in the fact that, protected and inaccessible through their geographical position, they had resisted the political wooing of the Byzantines, but under Justinian they had been defeated by the General Tzittas.[9] With the missionaries came also Roman officers, who laid out forts and staffed them with Roman garrisons. Evangelization was intended to bind the Lazi as well as the Tzanes "ideologically" with the Empire and thereby turn them away from Persia.

The great reconquest in the West also posed new missionary tasks for the Empire. Not in Italy, for the conversion of the Arian Ostrogoths constituted no problem for Justinian, since they only remained isolated in the Emperor's sphere of control. But the conquest of Africa required a securing of the frontiers in the direction of the Sahara, and here the mission was instituted. How much success it had is difficult to estimate. In any case, Christian communities existed in this area after the occupation by Islam—in contradistinction to Egypt and Syria—only in decreasing numbers. Under Byzantine rule we hear, so far as can be seen, only once that an entire Berber tribe asked missionaries from the Emperor Justin II.

---

[7] Procopius, Bella VI, 14, 33–35.

[8] Ibid. VIII, 3, 21.

[9] Procopius, De aedificiis III, 6, 9ff.

It has already been briefly mentioned that Justinian also had planned the mission to the pagans. For Asia Minor he entrusted the task to a monk of Amida, John, who later was nicknamed John of Asia, a Monophysite by origin, who apparently knew how to accommodate himself to the requirements of the Imperial Church. He has himself told us about his work, and he did not belittle his achievement. In any event, it is interesting for the evaluation of the religious circumstances in the heartland of the Empire that in the hill country east of Smyrna and Ephesus it was possible to evangelize pagans systematically. John boasts of having converted a hundred thousand of them. For them he built about 100 churches and approximately a dozen monasteries. The money came from Justinian's till; he also donated the white baptismal robes.[10] In other respects, the qualitatively important remnant of paganism was to be sought not in remote hilly areas but in the great cities among the intellectuals. And it would probably be a euphemism to speak of a mission to the pagans there. They were simply persecuted. An intellectual confrontation with paganism, such as had been attempted as late as the first half of the fifth century by, for example, Theodoret of Cyrrhus on a broad apologetic basis, occurred in this epoch only in inadequate starts, except in the sphere of philosophical doctrines, where, for example, John Philoponus and others took up the struggle against the pagan Neoplatonism of Proclus and his followers.

It would also be misleading to speak of a mission to the Jews. As religio licita, their faith was under the protection of the law, although no preacher failed to follow in the tracks of the great opponent of the Jews, John Chrysostom, by condemning them as the plague of mankind. One could only speak of mission if one could call vexation a mission. It occurred to the Emperors at the beginning of the seventh century to seek to convert them forcibly and to make the obligation of conversion a law. This must scarcely have influenced larger masses of Jews. Instead, the number of polemics against the Jews increased powerfully from the beginning of the seventh century. Especially to be mentioned is Leontius of Neapolis. The writings reveal rather clearly here and there that the Christian polemicist did not have an easy time in dealing with the arguments of the Jews, for example, in regard to the cult of icons.

We know scarcely anything about efforts at conversion directed to those new hordes of barbarians, the Bulgars and Slavs, who were pouring into the Empire from the North since the sixth century. Planned and centrally directed actions cannot be proved and are hardly imaginable. For the most part, the mission first began when the political situation had become a little clearer. This is true especially also of Islam. We have no information that shortly after the invasion of Islam into the ancient Byzantine provinces noteworthy efforts had been made to gain the conquerors for the Christian faith. In the intoxication of victory this would probably have been asking dangerously much of the conquerors. The intellectual confrontation with the new faith on the former imperial soil could be undertaken on literary grounds only several generations later, a discussion of which does not belong to the period here under consideration.

---

[10] ROC 2 (1897), 482ff.

CHAPTER 32

The Assault of Islam

In less than one generation Islam inundated great parts of Eastern Christendom and ended many quarrels simply by cutting them off from the capital of the Roman Empire. This storm did not arise by accident, and the permanence of its success lies to a considerable degree in the fact that large portions of the Christianity conquered by it were Arabic or already strongly infiltrated by Arabs. Along the commercial route which led from Damascus to southern Arabia, the so-called Frankincense Route, the city-system had considerably developed in the sixth century, due to the active traffic in goods in contrast to other provinces of the Empire.[1] These cities played their role as stopping places and commodity depots for the caravans from Mecca, which at that time became the center of Arabian commerce. Outside the walls of the cities arose caravanseries with Arab personnel. These centers of Arabic life more and more attracted seminomads from the nearby desert; and finally whole tribes, if they were not already urbanized, were still drawn into the city's sphere of influence. This development became all the stronger, the more frequently the other commercial routes of the Byzantine Empire to the East were closed by the wars with Persia.

But also the great desert around the Dead Sea beyond the Jordan and south from Damascus to the Persian Gulf had long ago become the exercise-ground of Arabian tribes. They could only partly be kept under control by the great powers, Byzantium and Persia. To the extent that this succeeded, they served their respective overlord as vanguard against the other great power. Thus in the East, at the mouth of the Euphrates, the Arabs under the leadership of their sheiks of the Lakhmid family[2] were again and again won by the Persians for service against the Byzantines. Their chief place was al-Hira, and from Persia they were partly gained for Nestorianism, even if the Lakhmids themselves accepted the Christian religion later than many of their followers. The "Byzantine" Arabs in the Syrian Desert had their chief place at Rusafa, east of Homs. Their leaders were the sheiks of the Ghassanid house,[3] who had early been won for Monophysitism. Much depended for both Empires on their careful handling of these desert tribes. The great Persian wars in the sixth century made great demands on this skill. It is probably not incorrect to assume that the denominational character of the Christianity of both tribal groups, on the one hand Monophysitism, on the other Nestorianism, was not any too deep. Monophysitism bound the Ghassanids to a denomination in which a self-consciousness in regard to the imperial central government could maintain itself more strongly than in Orthodoxy, and the Nestorianism of the Lakhmids was not the result of dogmatic considerations but of the mission of the Church of that country in whose direction the political ambitions of these Arabs moved. In addition, both denominations were united in the struggle against the ancient Arabian paganism, and the balance seemed to have been discovered especially happily in the monastic foundations in the desert.[4] These monasteries became, presumably independently of their confessional denomination, popular halting places for all Arabs. The harsh life in the desert must not have differed substantially from the asceticism of the Christian monks. Simple cult forms, frequent genuflection, fasting, religious invocations arranged in litany form, and so forth, easily impressed the Arabs, and the famed formula Heis theos, which had found wide diffusion in the Syrian areas as a Christian religious invocation,[5] placed on the believer no excessive demands. Many Arabs, drawn either by this religiosity or weary of their severe life as Bedouins, became monks in these monasteries, where people were prepared to accommodate their individuality. The best example without doubt was the treatment which very early in the fifth and sixth centuries Arabs who were devoted to the solitary life in the caves and lauras of Palestine found with the great monastic fathers, Euthymius and Sabas. Here, probably for the first time, the Arabs received a bishop of their blood, who was furnished no stable seat but, as Bishop of the Camps, was responsible for the evangelization of other tribes.[6] And here also must be sought the beginnings of the further progress of a thus modified Christianity toward the South to the oases of North Arabia via the caravan routes to Mecca and Medina.

---

[1] R. Paret, "Les villes de Syrie du sud et les routes commerciales d'Arabie à la fin du VI^{e} siècle," Akten des XI. Intern. Byzantinistenkongresses (Munich 1960), 438–444; R. Dussaud, Les Arabes en Syrie avant l'Islam (Paris 1907).

---

[2] G. Rothstein, Die Dynastie der Lahmiden in al-Hira (Berlin 1889); R. Devreesse, "Arabes-Perses et Arabes-Romains, Lakhmides et Ghassanides," Vivre et Penser, ser. 2 (1942), 263–307.

[3] H. Charles, Le christianisme des Arabes nomades sur le limes et dans le désert syromésopotamien aux alentours de l'hégire (Paris 1936); id., "Christianisme et Islam des nomades syro-arabes aux alentours de l'hégire," En Terre d'Islam 21 (1946), 71–90; id., "Les nomades de Syro-Mésopotamie et leur islamisation," ibid. 22 (1947), 172–189.

[4] See especially F. Nau, Les Arabes chrétiens de Mésopotamie et de Syrie du VII^e au VIII^e siècle (Paris 1933).

[5] Cf. E. Peterson, Εἷς θεός (Göttingen 1926).

Thus for Muhammad at the time when he had his religious experiences and wrote them down, Christianity was just as well known as was Judaism, regardless of whether or not he himself had come to Syria as a commercial traveler. Christian elements have frequently been identified in the Koran, and an exact analysis of these elements probably indicates specifically Monophysite features, by which the Christiantity which was familiar to Muhammad was affected.[7] That Muhammad at first saw his confederates in Judaism and Christianity is well known. This was not only naïveté but based on the common possession of a basic monotheistic attitude and on the strong doctrine of unity of the Monophysites, even if there cannot be denied what in my view is much too little emphasized; that the position which the Koran assigns to Jesus, if it should be traced to Christian influencss, looks to Nestorianism rather than to Monophysitism. Of course, in the long run both the Jews as well as the Christians refused adherence to the Prophet. They thereby fell under the verdict of persecution, but without the aim of compulsory conversion. As "Peoples of the Book," that is, possessors of revealed scriptures, they could, to the extent that they submitted and paid tribute, count on toleration and free exercise of their religion.

Nevertheless, the question remains whether this policy of toleration is sufficient to explain the enormous successes of Islam in the Christian area. One must certainly reckon with the unhappy treatment of the Christian Arabs by the Persians and the Byzantine Emperors.[8] In the twenty-years' war between Persia and Byzantium in the second half of the sixth century the attitude of the Arabs on the frontier obtained especially great importance. The Byzantine commander and later Emperor Maurice (582–602), who was especially hostile to Monophysitism, suspected the Ghassanid client-king al-Mundir of treason, finally went so far as to entice him into a trap, arranged with the Emperor his deportation to Sicily, and cut off from the Ghassanid Arabs the annona, the provision of the means of livelihood, to which they had a claim as foederati of the Empire. Naturally, revolt broke out. The Arabs fell on the Byzantine garrisons and plundered their supply camps, at first not in order thereby to prove their defection from Byzantium, but simply to assure their basic material existence. When Maurice had become Emperor, they exerted themselves for a new link with the Empire, but Maurice made the demand, absurd in the political situation, that they should renounce Monophysitism. Noman, a son of al-Mundir, is said to have retorted: "All Arabian tribes are Jacobites, and if they learn that I have accepted your communion they will kill me." The negotiations came to nothing; Noman followed his father into exile, although previously a safe-conduct had been promised him. Maurice divided up the Arabian Kingdom among a dozen sheiks, who had enough to do to deal with their inner conflicts and with the dream and the restoration of their Kingdom so that they again sided powerfully with Maurice's policy directed against Persia.

---

[6] See supra, p. 505.

[7] H. Grégoire, "Mahomet et le monophysisme," Mélanges Ch. Diehl I (Paris 1930), 107–119; J. Henninger, "L'influence du christianisme oriental sur l'Islam naissant," L'oriente cristiano nella storia della civiltà (Rome 1964), 379–411; Tor Andrae, Les originies de l'Islam et le christianisme (Paris 1955).

[8] See in detail P. Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam I (Paris 1951).

Meanwhile, matters were no better for the Lakhmid Arabs. King Chosroes II was afraid that these Arabs would become too powerful and so he too enticed their sheik, also named Noman, into a trap and had him murdered. The results were the same as in the sphere of interest of the Byzantines: revolts and raids. The Persian governor, who should have dealt with them, could maintain himself in only one fortress, and domination over the country at large was lost. Thereby the loyalty of the Arabs toward their former overlords was seriously harmed; a dangerous vacuum appeared, and Islam was prepared to fill it.

It is unlikely that Muhammad himself had planned the great predatory raids of Islam. But his looting expeditions reached ever wider circles, and in the struggle with the oases in the North he came for the first time into hostile contact with united Christian Arab tribes. Shortly before his death he risked the first attack on imperial territory and at the same time sought contact with the Ghassanids, but without success. Finally there occurred a defeat of Islam near Mu'ta east of the Dead Sea. An expedition for revenge did not take place, since the Prophet died in 632 before carrying out his plans. The relations between the Arabs and the new Emperor Heraclius (610–641) had meanwhile improved again, and this was probably the reason for the first successes of the Empire against the Prophet's forces. However, unfortunately the Empire now again failed to supply the confederated Arabs with the means of livelihood. The reasons are difficult to discover, but it is not unlikely that the Patriarch of Antioch, who hitherto had turned over the tax payment of his Church in regard to the Empire entirely or partly as annona to the Arabs, stopped these deliveries, because the Emperor had taken enormous sums from the Church for the preceding Persian war, with the payment of interest for which he was now in arrears. In any case, in this critical situation the Empire could hardly count any longer on the loyalty of the Arabs. And so, after the Prophet's death, there began a mighty victorious advance. That these wars were begun is probably connected also with the fact that after Muhammad's departure the religious development in Islam was not yet concluded and hence his followers had to be kept at this task by every means. All too many of the Prophet's promises of booty were still unfulfilled, and the claims to leadership among his successors were still unclear. A diversion was necessary, and the weak flank of both the great Empires showed the direction. In the battle on the Yarmuk, a tributary of the Jordan, on 20 August 636, the fate of Byzantine Syria was decided, and it was not least of all the Ghassanids who turned the scales in favor of Islam. Jerusalem fell in 638, Mesopotamia was conquered in 639–640, from 640 the Arabs were in Armenia; Alexandria, the gate to Egypt, fell in 640, in 643 the Pentapolis, and as early as 647 began the raids into Cappadocia.

What was the situation of Christianity under the new rule? It was by no means without legal bases.[9] The conquerors proceeded, apart from the inevitable cases of harshness under such circumstances, in accord with treaties of capitulation, and the besieged Christian cities seem to have known this well enough. The precedent for the Arabs was apparently the treaty with the Christians of South Arabia, which assured them the free exercise of religion and a certain self-government, while on the other hand it required the payment of tribute, provisions for the support of the troops, and, as needed, the supplying of auxiliary contingents. The basic lines of this treaty were employed also in the Syrian and Mesopotamian cities. The situation of the Christians was also eased by the circumstance that at first the conquest scarcely affected the administrative system. True, Muslim governors were installed, but the administration itself remained, after as before, in the hands of native powers, hence mostly of Christians. The same taxes had to be paid, and ecclesiastical life was not substantially upset. Of course, it not rarely happened that the chief church of a city was transformed into a mosque, but in principle churches and monasteries enjoyed a relative freedom. In individual cases, naturally, much depended on the attitude of the governors. Occasionally, churches were destroyed, and the building of new ones forbidden; occasionally there were compulsory conversions or even martyrdoms, and the election of bishops and patriarchs could be impeded and postponed. But by and large these were exceptional phenomena. Only under the Caliph Abd-al Malik (685–705) did the situation deteriorate. Christians were dismissed from the administration, the poll tax was introduced for them, a distinctive dress was prescribed, and so forth.

---

[9] A. S. Tritton, Nasara. Handwörterbuch des Islam (Leiden 1941), 577–580; id., The Caliphs and their non-Muslim Subjects (1930).

Seen in its totality, of course, the Arab conquest meant an enormous loss of territory for the Imperial Church. Provinces in which Christianity had spent its earliest youth, great patriarchal sees of the Early Church, intellectually vigorous centers, such as Edessa, Antioch, and Alexandria, pilgrimage sites such as Jerusalem were forever lost to the Imperial Church. The fiction of the identification of Empire and Christian Ecumene was destroyed, just as the dream of one Emperor and one Church. This high price, however, brought to the Imperial Church a greater unity, for in so far as the denominations could then be kept apart geographically, the conquered territory to a great extent coincided with the country of the Monophysites and Nestorians, whereas the remaining imperial territory could in the main be claimed as orthodox. On the other hand, the Islamic law in the occupied territories brought in principle an equalization of the denominations and hence ended the ecclesiastical strife. The Melkites were no longer in a position to persecute the Monophysites. Conversely, there existed the possibility, because it could not be entirely disregarded, that precisely the "imperial" Christians still kept an eye on Byzantium, even politically, probably because of the fact that Monophysite resistance at the time of the conquest was apparently less than was that of the Orthodox, even if it might be difficult to cite much evidence for this thesis.

In the course of time the Islamic rulers, each in accord with the situation, employed the Christians of their lands as agents in their political game with Byzantium and not seldom recognized the Byzantine Emperor as the born protector of these Christians. The Byzantine Church profited from this, for since the Melkite patriarchs of Syria and Egypt disposed of only slight means of power, the patriarchs of Constantinople in the retinue of their Emperors would likewise appear as protectors of these patriarchates and from this position unhesitatingly deduce papal claims.

PART FIVE

The Latin Church in the Transition to the Early Middle Ages

SECTION ONE

The Missionary Work of the Latin Church

CHAPTER 33

The Origins of Christianity in Ireland and Scotland

Around the middle of the fifth century a new note was heard in the ancient praise of the City of Rome. "Ut gens sancta, populus electus, civitas sacerdotalis et regia latius praesideres religione divina quam dominatione terrena," said Leo the Great (440–461) in his sermon for the feast of the Princes of the Apostles, Peter and Paul. When the Emperors transferred their residence to Milan and Ravenna, Rome became the City of the Apostles. When the Empire reeled on its foundations, the Church carried the gospel outside the Graeco-Roman Ecumene to the barbarians. A new Western Ecumene arose on the foundation of the Christian faith and of Latin culture. According to the great Pope, this was the historical and theological mission of the Empire:

> ut autem inenarrabilis gratiae [incarnationis] per totum mundum diffunderetur effectus, Romanum regnum divina providentia praeparavit; cuius ad eos limites incrementa perducta sunt, quibus cunctarim undique gentium vicina et contigua esset universitas. Dispositio namque divinitus operi maxime congruebat, ut multa regna confoederarentur imperio, ut cito pervios haberet populos praedicatio generalis, quos unius teneret regimen civitatis.[1]

Since the Church of the East had the advantage in time over that of the West, it is not surprising that it also radiated first into the barbarian world. In other respects, however, the Celtic mission of the West offers a genuine analogy to the Gothic mission of the East. As in the East it was Cappadocian, so in the Hesperides it was British war-prisoners who were the first messengers of the gospel, which took root in Ireland in the fifth century. The Aquitanian, Prosper Tiro, a friend of Leo the Great, noted in his Chronicle for the year 431: Ad Scottos in Christum credentes ordinatus a papa Caelestino Palladius primus episcopus mittitur. "Scots" was the ancient name of the Irish. The notice assumes the existence of Iro-Scottish groups of Christians, who were, however, without a bishop.

---

[1] "That you, as a holy and chosen people, as a priestly and royal city, preside by God's religion over a wider circle than through earthly rule. —But that the operation of this ineffable grace could spread over the whole world, the Roman Empire was prepared in the divine foresight, and the Empire grew to frontiers which made it everywhere the closest neighbour of all peoples. For this plan was mostly adapted by the divine decree to the work of redemption: that through the uniting of many lands with one Imperium the universal proclamation had access to the peoples which stood under the direction of one city": Sermo 82 (80), PL 54, 423.

The first Bishop of the Irish, Palladius, appears as early as 429 as a deacon: ad insinuationem Palladii diaconi papa Caelestinus Germanum Autisidorensem episcopum vice sua mittit et deturbatis haereticis Britannos ad catholicam fidem dirigit.[2] There may have been a connection between the mission of the Bishop Germanus of Auxerre to Britain and that of Palladius to Ireland. The mission of Germanus was intended for the fight against Pelagianism, which had numerous followers in Britain and from there may also have influenced the small groups of Irish Christians. Hence care for the orthodoxy of the Irish Christians may have been included in Palladius's commission.

Nevertheless, not Palladius but Patrick has gone down in history as Apostle of the Emerald Isle. Magonus Sucatus Patricius—this must have been Saint Patrick's full name—described his fate as a youth in the Confessio, composed by him probably toward the end of his life. He came from a Britanno-Roman curial family, which possessed a "villula" in the vicus Bannavemtabernae, a place not yet identified with certainty.[3] Although his father, Calpornius, had been a decurio and deacon, and his grandfather, Potitus, a priest, the religious atmosphere in the paternal home was not of the best. Patrick was sixteen years old when Iro-Scots on a plundering raid kidnapped him and took him as a slave to Ireland, probably to Tirawley, Connaught. Here he found the way to God. After six years he succeeded in escaping and returning to his parents. A vision admonished him to proclaim to the Irish the Good Tidings. And so he finally went back to Ireland as a missionary bishop.

Unfortunately, the Confessio contains no chronologically fixed points. Later Irish annals, whose origin and trustworthiness have recently been strongly controverted, unanimously record the arrival of the apostle in the year 432 but his death in 461 or 491–492. The problem is further complicated by the fact that in these sources sometimes two Patricks with different dates of death are listed. It will probably have to be held that there was only one Patrick, who was apparently born c. 390, came to Ireland as bishop c. 432 or soon after, and died c. 460.[4]

---

[2] Palladius was sent in 431 by Pope Celestine after his ordination as first Bishop to the Scots (=Irish) believing in Christ. —At the suggestion of the deacon Palladius, Pope Celestine sent Bishop Germanus of Auxerre in his place and led the Britons back to Catholicism after the expulsion of the heretics (429): MGAuc. ant. IX, 472ff.

[3] Summary of the proposed identifications in R. P. C. Hanson, St. Patrick, 113–116. Hanson thinks of one place in Somerset, Dorset, or Devon.

The most obscure part of Saint Patrick's life is the period between his escape from his Irish captivity and his return to Ireland as bishop. According to the likewise controversial Dicta Patricii, Patrick journeyed per Gallias ad Italiam, and he also visited the islands in the Tyrrhenian Sea. Patrick's biographers from the late seventh and the eighth centuries connect the saint with Bishop Germanus of Auxerre and hence also with Palladius, who after a brief and unsuccessful activity had died on his homeward journey or had been martyred by the Irish. It is also said, explicitly or implicitly, that Patrick also proceeded from the school of Germanus and entered upon the succession to Palladius. On the other hand, Hanson has recently defended the opinion that Patrick remained in Britain during the entire time, became a monk there, and was sent by the British Church as missionary bishop to the Irish. Patrick's missionary work can, in fact, also be understood from British postulates, since it has a parallel in the activity of the British Bishop Ninian, who in the early fifth century founded the episcopal church of Candida Casa (Whithorn, Galloway) beyond the frontiers of Roman Britain and worked among the southern Picts.[5] Still, it will not do to reject wholesale the sources of the seventh and eighth centuries on the history of the Apostle of the Irish without producing a convincing explanation for the origin of their statements.[6] Rebus sic stantibus, it must be maintained that Patrick toured Gaul and Italy before his elevation to the episcopate, and at this time became acquainted with the Mediterranean Provençal monasticism. His being sent by Germanus of Auxerre may be subject to stronger doubts.

The remembrance of the perhaps only brief activity of Palladius soon faded in Ireland. A note on three churches founded by him leads to the conclusion that Palladius was active chiefly in South Ireland and had perhaps established his chief seat at Cellfine (County Wicklow, Leinster).[7] Patrick, on the contrary, seems to have worked chiefly in North Ireland from Armagh. The Bishops Auxilius, Secundinus, and Iserninus, mentioned in early Irish tradition, may have come to Ireland as companions of Palladius.[8] But they must also have entered into contact with Saint Patrick;[9] there seem to have been ritual connections between Cellfine and Armagh.[10]

---

[4] Thus R. P. C. Hanson, ibid., 188.

[5] Ibid., 56–63 (detailed discussion of the pertinent literature) and pp.146ff.

[6] The view that the connection between Patrick and Germanus was based on oral tradition in the "form of folk-lore stories connecting Patrick with some great person who had left an impression on the popular mind—Amator or Germanus or Pope Celestine or Loeghaire" (Hanson, op. cit., 94), is not a satisfying explanation. One could rather consider a fusion of the Palladius tradition with that of Patrick, as seems to exist in the allegations on the two Patricks. But the statements in regard to Patrick's journeys in Gaul, Italy, and on the Tyrrhenian Sea would not thereby be explained. These statements are well suited to the fifth century but no longer to the seventh, since in the seventh century the very fame of Lérins had faded. In other respects, a sharp line of demarcation cannot be drawn between the British and the Gallic Church. Even the activity of Ninian had Gallo-Roman presuppositions, namely the work of Martin of Tours and of the Metropolitan Victricius of Rouen, as Hanson himself has stated.

The oldest Christian groups in Ireland seem likewise, just as the first Christians among the Goths, to have belonged to the lower class.[11] Patrick addressed all classes of the people, but naturally he also sought to win the toleration or the support of the dominant groups, whom he gained through gifts. The Irish mission, again like the Gothic mission, must have made use of the political and social structure of the people to be converted, and this differed considerably from that of the Empire. In Ireland there was a multiplicity of small tribal kingdoms (Tuathas), which were grouped into five areas—Connaught, Ulster, Meath, Leinster, Munster. In the fifth century there was not yet a central High King.[12] The Tuathas constituted the basis for the diocesan organization, which was brought from the continent to the Emerald Isle. Armagh lay in the vicinity of Emain Maechae, the royal seat of the Ulaid in Ulster, with whom Patrick probably entered into intimate relations. The Irish bishoprics of the fifth and early sixth centuries did not differ in other respects essentially from those of the mainland. Not until the sixth century did the monastic element become ever more prominent in the ecclesiastical centers, while at the same time the aristocratic notion of kinship influenced the ecclesiastical organization.

---

[7] L. Bieler, Conversione, 565.

[8] Hanson, op. cit., 196.

[9] Hanson's view that after the death of Palladius Patrick was active in Ireland as the sole missionary bishop rests on a problematic argumentum e silentio from the Confessio. On the other hand, the canons speak of the names of Patrick, Auxilius, and Iserninus, who are probably to be dated in the sixth century (Hughes, op. cit., 49).

[10] The Church of Armagh possessed in the eighth century relics of the Princes of the Apostles, Peter and Paul, as well as of the chief martyrs, Stephen and Lawrence. These relics bear a Roman character. Bieler would like to identify them with the relics which Palladius had received from Pope Celestine, and assumes their translation from Cellfine to Armagh (L. Bieler, Conversione, 565, 570ff.). Thereby an indication would be given that Patrick in due form entered upon the succession of Palladius. A powerful testimony for the Roman mandate for the Irish mission is also the letter of Abbot Columban to Pope Boniface IV of 612–15 (Ep. Columbani, no. 5, MGEp III, 170ff.). If this commission was offered only to Palladius, then the memory of Palladius must have been more vivid in the Irish Church at the beginning of the seventh century than in later times.

[11] L. Bieler, op. cit., 562.

[12] Hanson, op. cit., 225ff. (Appendix II).

The indicated transformation of the Church organization was noticeable also among the Celts of Britain, where it stood in close connection with the de-Romanization of the Britons. The de-Romanization of Britain was not based on a revolutionary repudiation of Rome. It was the consequence of the loss of the, for the most part, Romanized areas to the invading Angles and Saxons and of the isolation of Britain from the continent, caused by the wandering of the peoples. The Roman structures continued to operate for a while after the actual abandonment of the island by the imperial central government c. 408–410—the sub-Roman period. The decisive turning point came c. 457.[13] The great cities of London and York, attested as episcopal sees as early as 314, fell into the hands of the invading Germans, and the foundations of Roman Britain tottered. Latin, which hitherto had been the colloquial tongue of the urban population, was confined to the ecclesiastical sphere. The civitates were transformed into tribal kingdoms, which did not differ essentially from those of the Irish and the Picts. In this crisis the British population clung the more strongly to the Christian religion, which for Patrick had already become the sign of Romanitas[14] and was now assimilated with the incipient Celtic culture. The fusion was completed in the symbol of monasticism, which was then in the process of establishing itself in Western Christianity, but appealed in a special way to the self-willed Celts. The details of this process elude our view. In the eighth century Illtud, Abbot of the monastic island of Calday (Ynys Pyr) on the south coast of Wales, was regarded as Magister Britannorum. He was the teacher of the next generation—the second third of the sixth century—of which David of Menevia–St. David's (Wales), Samson of Dol (Brittany), and Gildas must be mentioned. Here was clearly apparent the development in which the monasteries became the chief center of ecclesiastical life. St. David's, like other foundations of its kind, was at the same time both monastery and cathedral under the direction of an abbot-bishop.

The monastic transformation of the Irish Church followed, according to a tradition now questioned, under the influence of the British monastic culture, even under the direct influence of men like David and

---

[13] An essential circumstance for this dating results from the ancient Celtic computing of the date of Easter, which corresponded to the older Easter cycle of the West that was modified in 342. As Hanson (op. cit., 67ff.) has shown, the instructions of Leo the Great of 454, based on this cycle, were familiar to the Celts, but not the Cycle of Victorius, accepted by Rome in 457.

[14] R. H. Hodgkin, A History of the Anglo-Saxons I (3rd ed. 1952), 65; Hanson, op. cit., 185ff.

Gildas. In any case, it was the work of the great abbots of the sixth century, the saints of the second and third stages (after the first stage of the missionaries), among whom must here be mentioned Finnian, Comgall, Brendan, and Columcille (Columba the Older). The series of great monasteries was begun c. 540 by Clonard in Meath, a foundation of the Abbot-Bishop Finnian, and other abbeys, such as Bangor (Ulster), Clonmacnoise (Connaught), Clonfert, Lismore (Munster), Moville, and Kildare (Leinster), followed. The Irish princes and kings supported these institutions, in which the abbatial dignity was usually reserved to the kin of the founder. The abbeys became centers of their own pastoral spheres (parochiae), which were grouped around the motherhouse and its daughter-foundations, but thereby broke up the territorial framework and grew beyond the older dioceses based on the small kingdoms.

Several old bishoprics, including Armagh, "reorganized themselves on a monastic basis" (Bieter), that is, under the direction of abbot-bishops; others were absorbed by the monasteries and monastic precincts. There were many abbeys, including those of the older Columba, whose abbots did not themselves receive episcopal ordination but had it conferred on one of their monks. The director of the ecclesiastical district in this case was not the bishop but the abbot. In these monastic parochiae jurisdiction and power of orders were separated: this contradicted the customary organization and from the viewpoint of the continent was an anomaly. Other anomalies are explained partly by the preservation of older customs—the method by which the Celts determined the date of Easter, which differed from the usage on the continent[13]—and partly probably also by the acceptance of national customs—such as the Irish tonsure, extending from ear to ear.

The rules of the Irish monastic fathers were based on the tradition of monasticism up to John Cassian. Ascetical-moral instruction occupied much space in them. The penitential system was based in other respects on the practice of oriental and Provençal monasticism. In the area of worship the Irish showed a special preference for litanies and apotropaic prayers (loricae). The cult of all the saints had one of its roots in Ireland.[15]

Instruction in the Irish monasteries served first of all the lectio divina: the reading of the pagan classics seems to have been not much pursued until the end of the eighth century. On the other hand, the Irish of the seventh and eighth centuries were masters in the fields of exegesis, grammar, and the computus.[16] Despite the inner monastic orientation to the religious and ascetical life, the Irish monasteries were not only religious but also intellectual, professional, and economic centers. Their schools were open to children and youths from the laity, who, if their parents expressed no other desire, took part in the monastic life.[17] From this often resulted lasting connections between monasteries and laity, which again were to the advantage of the monks' pastoral tasks. Thus the Irish stamped the spiritual life of the laity through the introduction of auricular confession and a graduated penitential system, which were adopted from monastic practice for the general care of souls.[18] Finally, not to be forgotten are the monks' charitable duties. To the circle of people that gathered around a monastery belonged also a not small number of the needy, who had to be cared for. All in all, it can be said that the great Irish monasteries were comparable to the little cities of the Early Middle Ages. Excavations have shown that they were fortified by stone walls.

---

[15] Bieler, op. cit., 577.

[16] B. Bischoff, Monachesimo irlandese, passim.

If, up to the middle of the sixth century, the Irish had learned from the Britons, they outstripped their teachers in the second half of the century. The most important personalities among the Old Irish abbots were the older and the younger Columba. Columcille (Dove of the Church) or Columba the Older (521–597) came of the royal house of the O'Neill of Connaught and became the Apostle of the Picts in modern Scotland (Caledonia). He entered Clonard as a monk and then founded the monastery of Derry in Ulster. After the battle of Culdranna (c. 561), which Columba had contributed to because of a quarrel over a biblical manuscript, he is said to have vowed to win again for Christ as many men as had fallen in the battle. Thus he devoted himself to the mission to the Picts, which had been started c. 400 by the Briton Ninian but had not advanced beyond the land of the southern Picts. In Caledonia toward the end of the fifth century Iro-Scottish princes had founded the little Kingdom of Dalriada or Argyle (Eastern Gael). A Pictish prince not far from Dalriada gave Columba the island of Iona in 563, on which the Irish Abbot founded a great monastery. From Iona the Picts and "Scots" of Caledonia were gained for the Church. At Columba's death in 597 the work had been completed. Iona remained the ecclesiastical metropolis of the newly won territory, although its abbots did not receive episcopal ordination.

The younger Columba, or Columban (530/540–615), was not related to his older namesake. He came from Leinster, became a monk of St. Comgall's Abbey of Bangor (Ulster), and in 592 with twelve companions set out for Gaul. He inaugurated the series of Iro-Scottish peregrini on the continent, and through his foundations of Luxeuil and Bobbio he belongs as much to Frankish and Lombard as to Irish history.

---

[17] A. Lorcin, Vie scolaire, passim.

[18] B. Poschmann, Die abendländische Kirchenbusse im frühen Mittelalter (Breslau 1930).

CHAPTER 34

The Conversion of the Franks and Burgundians. Origin and Organization of the Merovingian National Church

The conversion of the Irish and the Picts was without a parallel on the continent in the fifth and sixth centuries: the mission to the Germans did not at this time go beyond the frontiers of the Empire but concerned only the peoples who had invaded the Empire. Thus it appeared as an especially important and partial occurrence in the general process of the German-Roman assimilation on the soil of the Roman Empire. The leading classes—first the Germans bearing imperial titles of dignity, then the kings and their magnates—took the lead in this. The old pagan faith displayed little power of resistance and asserted itself only in residual elements. But we observe that Gothic prestige at times competed with Roman in the barbarian world. As noted earlier, the Goths succeeded in bringing the Burgundians, who had already gone over to Catholicism, and the Spanish Sueves to their own profession of Arianism around the middle of the fifth century. This statement underlines the historical change which Clovis produced in the history of the West.

The country of the encounter between the pagan Germans and Catholic Christianity was Gaul, and the representative of the German mission in the fifth and sixth centuries was especially the Gallic episcopate, in whom the spirit of the great bishops, Martin of Tours, Germanus of Auxerre, and Lupus of Troyes, was not extinguished. As early as 428–29 Rhenish Burgundians requested baptism from a bishop of Gaul. Hardly twenty years later Severus of Trier is said to have preached the gospel to unnamed peoples of Germania Prima. From the beginning of his reign, Clovis was in contact with Remigius of Reims, whose name remains forever bound to his through his baptism.

Contemporary sources threw little light on the origin of the conversion of the Merovingian Kingdom and of Clovis.[1] Gregory of Tours, the historian of the Franks, belonged to the generation of Clovis's grandsons. Nevertheless, his account of the age of Clovis must be correct in its basic features. Northern Gaul had since the death of Aëtius in 454 gone its own way to a great degree, and the Frankish-North Gallic symbiosis had been prepared long before Clovis. On the other hand, the Franks had little contact with the Gothic Arian world of the Mediterranean and Danube Germans. Not until the consolidation of Clovis's Kingdom between the Meuse and the Loire did Goths appear at the court of Soissons: Theodoric the Great sought to incorporate the Franks into his political system and in 494 married Clovis's sister, Audofleda.

---

[1] Basic is W. v. den Steinen, "Chlodwigs Übergang zum Christentum," MIÖG Erg-Bd 12 (1932–33), 417–501. I cannot accept the new chronology of the reign of Clovis, defended by A. van de Vijger [VIJGER] in several articles (Revue Belge de phil. et d'hist. 15 [1936], 859–914, 17 [1938], 63–69, 793–813; MA 53 [1947], 177–196. Tessier also follows v. d. Steinen essentially, which of course means that in the question of the conversion of Clovis one cannot avoid a more or less high degree of probability. Misleading is Rolf Weiss, "Chlodwigs Taufe: Reims 508," Geist und Werk der Zeiten. Arbeiten aus dem Hist. Seminar der Univ. Zurich, no. 29 (1971). Finally, Lippold and Schäferdiek, op. cit.; cf. also K. Schäferdiek, "Ein neues Bild der Geschichte Chlodwigs?" ZKG 84 (1973), 270–277.

Clovis now stood at the crossroads. It was very difficult for him to separate politics and religion. The connection with Theodoric meant for him acceptance into the circle of the great German Kings at the price of the recognition of the status quo, that is, of the leading position of the two Gothic peoples. A political option for Theodoric's system suggested the religious decision for Arianism, for which Theodoric was recruiting, not entirely without success. Clovis's sister, Lantechild, went over to the "Gothic religion," and his oldest son received at that time the name Theodoric, perhaps after the Ostrogothic King. However, the Frankish King did not commit himself: he married a Catholic princess of the Burgundian royal house and himself remained a pagan. But soon after his political decision was taken against the Goths: in 496 Clovis began war against the Visigothic King Alaric II.

At the same time a previous decision had thereby been made in favor of Catholicism. At the wish of Queen Clotilda, their first two children, Ingomer and Chlodomer, were baptized Catholics. Still, the die had not yet been cast. The account of Gregory of Tours makes known that religious tremendum was by no means unknown to Clovis. The death of Clotilda's first son immediately after baptism made the King doubtful. Si in nomine deorum meorum puer fuisset decatus, vixisset utique.[2] An illness of Chlodomer after his baptism aroused strong doubts in regard to the Christian God: Non potest aliud, nisi et de hoc sicut et de fratre eius contingat, ut baptizatus in nomine Christi vestri protinus moriatur.[3] Chlodomer recovered. Thereby the clarity of the sign against Christ was put in question, but a positive sign for Christ was still not at hand.

Clovis obtained the sign in the battle with the Alemanni. Even during the war with the Visigoths, there also occurred in 497, under circumstances unknown in their details, a war between Franks and Alemanni. The battle went against the Franks. Then Clovis appealed to the God of the Christians: Jesu Christe, quem Chrotchildis praedicat esse filium Dei vivi, . . . tuae opis gloriam devotus efflagito, ut, si mihi victuriam super hos hostes indulseris . . . credam tibi et in nomine tuo baptizer.[4] Christ granted victory to the Franks.

---

[2] "If the boy had been dedicated in the name of my gods, he would still be alive" (Gregory, Hist. Fr. II, 29).

[3] "It cannot be otherwise than it happened to him as to his brother: that, baptized in the name of your Christ, he will die" (ibid.)

Despite the Christian scriptural mode of composition of Gregory's account, there is present here a German ritual exercise, as is attested similarly among the Lombards also, who in a battle against the Vandals passed to the worship of the Asen by appealing to Wodan.[5] The Frankish victory over the Alemanni was regarded as a sign from God. The extant letter of the Metropolitan Avitus of Vienne to Clovis clearly alludes to this miracle: Numquid fidem perfecto praedicabimus, quam ante perfectionem sine praedicatore vidistis?[6] In the like manner, Eusebius had earlier interpreted the vision of Constantine and the victory at the Milvian Bridge as a miraculous revelation of Christ to the Emperor and connected it with Paul's call at Damascus ouk ex anthropon, oude di' anthropon.[7]

The further course of events has been convincingly reconstructed by Steinen out of the sources and baptismal customs of the day: After the consensus of the Franks had been obtained, in 498 Clovis promised at Tours to be baptized and before the baptism sent a "declaration of competence" to the Gallic episcopate, to which Avitus replied in the letter just quoted. Remigius officiated at the baptism at Christmas of 498 or 499 in Reims. The solemnity of the historical moment has continued until today in the famous statement of his address that was apparently correctly transmitted: Mitis depone colla, Sigamber; adora quod incendisti, incende quod adorasti.[8]

The passage of the Franks to Catholicism immediately appears in retrospect to the observer as a necessary consequence of the political decision against the Goths. The historical reality is thereby excessively simplified. Gregory's report shows clearly that the acceptance of the Catholic religion was first deferred by negative signs and was then decided only by a positive sign. Hence the conversion of Clovis was also a religious decision—not, it is true, from a deeper religious and moral insight but from belief in the power of the God to whom the Queen and the Bishop of Reims adhered. That the instruction of Remigius was geared only to this argument must not be deduced from this. The Gallic episcopate in its polemic against Arianism had also appealed to the Petrine apostolic tradition, which was understood in the sixth century through the impressive image of Peter as Gatekeeper of Heaven. Clovis, who built a church dedicated to Peter and the Apostles—Sainte-Geneviève near Paris—and at his death sent a crown to the Pope, must have known this argument.[9] Besides, the letter of Bishop Remigius on Clovis's accession to power, which had a strong ethical accent, allows the assumption that in the preaching of Remigius to the Franks moral instruction also had a place.[10] That Christian moral principles were still alive in the Gallo-Roman episcopate of the period is shown, among other places, by the vita of Bishop Nicetius of Trier, composed in the sixth century.[11] [4] "Jesus Christ, whom Clotilda declares to be the Son of the living God . . . I implore your glory, your power: grant me victory over these enemies . . . and I will believe in you and have myself baptized in your name" (ibid. II, 30).

---

[5] K. Hauck, "Lebensnormen und Kultmythen in germanischen Stammes-und Herrschergenealogien," Saeculum 6 (1955), 186–223.

[6] "How should we still preach the faith to you, who have come to the faith which you already glimpsed before your conversion without a preacher?" (Avitus, Ep. 46, MGAuctant VI, 1).

[7] E. Ewig, "Das Bild Constantins d. Gr. in den ersten Jahrhunderten des abendländischen Mittelalters," HJ 75 (1956), 4, note 17.

[8] "Humbly bend your neck, Sigamber; adore what you have burned, and burn what you have adored!" (Hist. Fr. II, 31).

Clovis's conversion to Catholicism operated in two directions: on the German Kings and on the Gallic episcopate. The Metropolitan Avitus of Vienne wrote, in regard to the baptism of the Frankish King, the celebrated but long misunderstood sentence: Vestra fides nostra victoria est.[12] It contained no concealed appeal to Frankish weapons against the Burgundians—Avitus sought to divert Clovis's feverish activity to the Alemanni who were also threatening Burgundy—but expressed the hope that the Burgundians might soon follow the Frankish example. In fact, Clovis's conversion broke the spell whereby a German King could be only a pagan or an Arian. The Burgundian sub-king Sigismund of Geneva passed to Catholicism in the first years of the sixth century. He had the Cathedral of St. Peter of Geneva rebuilt and was the first German King to go on pilgrimage to the tombs of the Apostles at Rome.[13] When in 515 he succeeded his father Gundobad in the government of the entire kingdom, a second Catholic dynasty took its place beside the Merovingian in Gaul. However, it was not to last long, since [9] E. Ewig, "Der Petrus—und Apostelkult im spätrömischen und fränkischen Gallien," ZKG 71 (1960), 215–251; id., "Die Kathedralpatrozinien im römischen und fränkischen Gallien," HJ 79 (1960), 1–61.

---

[10] Epp. Austrasicae, no. 2, MGEp. III, 113. Further testimonies from the sphere of royal ethics: E. Ewig, "Zum christlichen Königsgedanken im Frühmittelalter," Vorträge und Forschungen III, ed. T. Mayer (Lindau–Constance 1956), 19ff.

[11] Nicetius took an interest in the peasants and stood up against the arrogance of the Frankish lords (Gregory of Tours, De gloria confessorum 9).

[12] "Your faith is our victory" (Avitus, Ep. 46). On the interpretation of the passage cf. v. d. Steinen, op. cit.

[13] M. Burckhardt, Die Briefsammlung des Bischofs Avitus von Vienne (1938), pp. 76–85; L. Schmidt, Die Ostgermanen I (Munich 1941), 158.

Clovis's descendants conquered the Burgundian Kingdom in 534 and divided it up.

The situation in the Visigothic Kingdom of Toulouse differed from that in Burgundy. The expansionist policy of King Euric (466–484), who had extended the boundaries of his dominion to the Loire, had opened a gulf between Arians and Catholics, which was still not entirely bridged c. 500. Clovis knew that he could count on the sympathies of wide circles of the episcopate and of a great part of the Roman population, although there were also circles which preferred the partly assimilated Goths to the uncivilized Franks.[14] Like a flourish of trumpets resounded the proclamation with which the King of the Franks, according to Gregory, began the war against the Visigoths in 507: Valde molestum fero, quod hi Arriani partem teneant Galliarum. Eamus cum Dei adiutorium, et superatis redegamus terram in ditione nostra.[15] Martin of Tours and Hilary of Poitiers, the patrons of the Gallo-Roman episcopate in the area of Gothic rule, showed themselves favorable to the Franks. At Vouillé in Poitou occurred the battle in which the Visigothic Kingdom of Toulouse was crushed. Now Theodoric the Great with his Ostrogoths entered the lists. He successfully shielded the Mediterranean lands against the Franks and the Burgundians allied with them, but could not prevent the two Aquitanian provinces and the royal city of Toulouse from coming under Frankish rule. Narbonensis (Septimania) was retained by the Visigoths, but after Theodoric's death Gascony and Provence were also occupied by the Franks.

The Frankish-Visigothic war of 507–511 became no less significant for Church history than for profane history. The North Gallic churches, which had suffered severely during the wanderings of the peoples, now found a firm support in Catholic Romania of Aquitania. Out of the collaboration of the Gallo-Frankish episcopate sprang the Frankish "national Church." In July 511, at the instigation of Clovis, the bishops of the Frankish territory met in Orléans for the first Council of the Merovingian Kingdom. The Council, whose agenda was decided by Clovis, laid down, under the King's influence, the fundamental law of the Merovingian Church and introduced ecclesiastical reorganization into the Regnum Francorum.

Synods at which a quite large number of bishops met to establish principles in doctrine, law, and liturgy, were nothing new in Church history. But up to the beginning of the sixth century the Empire had provided the framework for these gatherings of the episcopate. The bishops assembled on the level of the provinces, the civil dioceses, and the Empire. What was new was that now they met also on the plane of a Regnum. The German Kings, who occasioned and permitted these "national councils,"—as the first among them, even for the Catholic Church, must be named the Arian Visigothic King Alaric II[16]—thus in some respect took the place of the Emperor. They attached importance to the fact that the frontiers of their regna did not conflict with the ecclesiastical boundaries. Bishoprics which were separated from their former metropolises through new political boundaries were attached to the nearest metropolises of the particular sphere of power; fragments of bishoprics were newly constituted as autonomous sees. In these changes were expressed the collapse of the Imperium and the vitality of the new Regna.

---

[14] On this most recently K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Suewen bis zur Errichtung der westgotischen katholischen Staatskirche (Berlin 1967), 32ff.

[15] "I find it difficult to endure that these Arians occupy a part of Gaul. Let us with God's help set out, defeat them, and subject their land to our rule:" (Hist. Fr. II, 37).

The Germano-Roman national Churches naturally developed their own forms of religious life. But they still remained on the ground of tradition: they clearly regarded themselves as keepers of the tradition vis-à-vis the Emperor and the imperial synods convoked by him, which furthermore claimed general validity as ecumenical councils. Thus in the controversy over the Three Chapters, they assumed a conservative attitude and at first declined to accept the decrees of the Fifth Ecumenical Council of Constantinople. For a time the quarrel over the Three Chapters overshadowed their relations with Rome. This did not lead to a break, however, for the traditional authority of the Sedes Apostolica as custodian of the tradition in faith and law was not questioned. When the opposition between Rome and Constantinople became worse in the seventh century, the Popes could throughout count on the Germano-Roman national Churches.

In the sixth century there was no lack of testimonies for pilgrimages from Gaul to Rome, for relations between the Popes and the Frankish Kings and bishops, which, it is true, depended also on the political relations with the Emperor. The echo of the Three Chapters Controversy was relatively weak in the Frankish Kingdom, but this was probably connected with the decline of theological training in the Merovingian Church.[17] The Papal Vicariate of the Metropolitan of [16] K. Schäferdiek, op. cit., 42ff.

---

[17] As early as 549 the Gallic bishops protested at Orléans against Justinian's edict and Pope Vigilius's Judicatum in the affair of the Three Chapters. Bishop Nicetius of Trier wrote in the same vein to Justinian, probably after the Second Council of Constantinople of 553 (Epp. Austr., no. 7, MGEp. III, 118). Then the polemic ceased. Not until 626 did a Synod of the Franco-Burgundian subkingdom at Mâcon again take up this question. Agrestius, a former monk of Luxeuil, had joined the schismatics of Aquileia and also attacked the Rule of Columban and Abbot Eustasius of Luxeuil. After his repudiation by the Burgundian episcopate, Agrestius went to Amatus and Romaric in Arles continued after the incorporation of Provence into the Frankish Kingdom, and up to the time of Gregory the Great (590–604) it still had a certain practical importance. In the conciliar acts of the sixth century papal decretals were occasionally cited. It is surely due to the failure of the sources if after Gregory's death we hear nothing more of Frankish-Roman relations. The pilgrimages to the tombs of the Apostles did not come entirely to an end. Around the middle of the seventh century the darkness grows a bit less. Pope Martin I in his struggle against Monothelitism also mobilized the Frankish Church and wrote in this sense to King Sigebert III in 649.[18] He was in contact with the influential missionary Bishop Amandus, the "Apostle of the Flemings," who worked on the Meuse and the Scheldt.[19] The elevation of Theodore of Tarsus to be Archbishop of Canterbury in 668 marked an epoch not only in the history of the Anglo-Saxon Church but also in Frankish-Roman relations, which were now gradually intensified indirectly by way of Britain, although still hindered by the inner crisis of the Merovingian Kingdom.

The Merovingian national Church was not a closely knit unity, since in the Frankish Kingdom the principle of partition prevailed.[20] Although the Frankish Regnum constituted a unity in regard to constitutional law, in the subkingdoms tendencies toward autonomous development asserted themselves, and these operated also on the ecclesiastical plane. To be sure, the demarcation of boundaries among the subkingdoms led in the earliest period only to the founding of new bishoprics, and the ecclesiastical provinces were not at all affected by it. But councils of the entire Kingdom could, of course, meet only when the Frankish Kings were united among themselves or the Kingdom was under an undivided government. Two phases of stronger unity are clear: 511–555 and 613–638. In the first phase the councils of the Kingdom were sponsored chiefly by the Kings of Paris and Reims, while the Austrasian monastery of Remiremont, where he was at first received (Vita Columbani II, 9 and 10, MGSS rer. Mer. VI). At his death Amatus of Remiremont solemnly professed the Tomus Leonis (Vita Amati 12, MGSS rer. Mer. IV, 220), that is, the Council of Chalcedon, but probably in taking a stand against the Second Council of Constantinople. The first canon of the Synod of Chalon (647–654) contains a profession of the faith of Nicaea and Chalcedon. The Synod of Saint-Jean-de-Losne (673–75) first formally professed the five ecumenical councils, hence also the Second of Constantinople, at which the Three Chapters were condemned.

---

[18] Vita Eligii II, 33, MGSS rer. Mer. IV, 689ff.; Jaffé, 2058–2059.

[19] P. E. de Moreau, St-Amand, apôtre de la Belgique et du Nord de la France (Museum Lessianum, Section missiologique, 7, 1927). W. H. Fritze, "Universalis gentium confessio," op. cit.

[20] E. Ewig, "Die fränkischen Teilungen und Teilreiche 511–613," AAMz 9 (1952); id., "Die fränkischen Teilreiche im 7. Jh," Trierer Zschr. 22 (1954), 85–144.

the Kingdom of Soissons occasionally held itself aloof. The second phase, the "Golden Age" of the Merovingians, was marked by the unified Kingdom of Chlotar II and Dagobert I.

There was no dearth of synods at which the episcopate of the individual subkingdoms met. They began in the Austrasian Kingdom of Reims with the Council of Clermont in 535; the first in Neustria was the Synod of Paris in 577. Most important were the Synods of the Burgundian subkingdom under Guntram (561–593) and Theodoric II (596–612), which were continued in the Neustrian-Burgundian councils after 638. Finally, the political chaos brought an end to the synodal activity in the late Merovingian period. Nothing is known of synods of the Austrasian subkingdom of the seventh century; the last council of the Neustrian-Burgundian subkingdom met c. 680. Bishops of the western Frankish Kingdom met once more in 696.[21] Then, together with the Kingdom, the metropolitan organization, which had been restored in the sixth century, also dissolved.

Instructive for the crucial points of ecclesiastical life in the Merovingian Kingdom were the meeting places of the councils. In the first phase, Orléans, situated on the boundary of Francia and Aquitania, was completely in the foreground. In the second half of the sixth century Paris stood forth more prominently; under Chlotar II and Dagobert I it became the center of political and ecclesiastical life. But, in addition to Paris, the Burgundian area around Lyon held its own as an ecclesiastical radiation center, and in the second half of the seventh century the synods of the western kingdom usually met in the Franco-Burgundian border area. Within the Burgundian subkingdom the Bishop of Lyon acquired a super-metropolitan precedence in the sixth century.[22] But this nucleus of a Burgundian national primacy did not develop, since in 613 the Burgundian subkingdom lost its independence. The fact that a primacy of the entire Frankish Kingdom could not develop is explained by the breaking up of the Regnum into subkingdoms.

The councils of the Kingdom and of the subkingdoms assembled at the command or at least with the assent of the Kings. But they were not under royal direction and issued their decrees independently in connection with the existing canon law, even if not without contact with the ruler. Their canons needed no royal ratification. Probably the Kings occasionally accepted individual decrees into their capitularies and thereby promoted their implementation. They were also not prevented from legislating on their own in ecclesiastical matters; however, the Merovingians made little use of this right to issue decrees. Councils and meetings of the magnates were strictly separate in the sixth century; only from Clothar II did the boundaries begin to become blurred. The understanding of the separation of the two spheres—a legacy of antiquity—gradually became dulled. It was surely no accident that just at this time began the Germanization of the episcopate, which until then had consisted mostly of Romans.[23] From now on we also encounter canons which forbade the bishops to participate in the hunt and to bear arms.

---

[21] W. Levison, England and the Continent in the Eighth Century (Oxford 1946), 47; E. Ewig, "Beobachtungen zu den Bischofslisten der merowingischen Konzilien und Bischofsprivilegien," Festschr. Franz Petri (1970), 171–193.

[22] L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux I, 2nd. ed., 140–141; also my article quoted in the previous footnote.

Perhaps Clovis established a higher wergeld for the clergy: for the priest and bishop, the rate of the free Frank in the royal service; for the deacon, that of the Romance Conviva Regis. For civil cases within the clergy the ecclesiastical court was competent in accord with Roman law, which also in criminal cases against bishops took cognizance of their guilt and deprived of his office the one found guilty. The Merovingians recognized the juridical autonomy of the Church. In 614 Clothar II added the decision that criminous priests were also to be degraded by the bishop before the pronouncing of the punishment by the secular court.

On the other hand, another principle of the ancient ecclesiastical organization appears to have been impaired since Clovis: the election of the bishop by the clergy and people of the see, with or without the participation of the metropolitan and the bishops of the same province.[24] The councils inculcated this principle time and again, but as early as 549 we find the compromise formula: cum voluntate regis iuxta electionem cleri ac plebis. At least an effort was made to prevent one-sided and simonical nominations by the King. But in his edict of 614 Clothar II retained the right of rejecting and of examining the worthiness of the candidate for the episcopacy. The episcopal office was greatly desired, since the bishops took precedence in rank and esteem over all other holders of offices and dignities in the cities and provinces. Add to this that the wealth of the Church increased considerably in the sixth and seventh centuries through donations, and the privileges of immunity, which excluded the royal officials from owning Church property, and also the external power of the Church grew, especially in the episcopal cities.[25] Under this aspect is explained also the interest of the Kings in the filling of the episcopal sees. If in the early sixth century the episcopal function was still a domain of the established senatorial families, it soon became more and more the concluding of a career of the Germano-Roman magnates in the royal service.

---

[23] H. Wieruszowski, "Die Zusammensetzung des gallischen und fränkischen Episkopats bis zum Vertrag von Verdun," Bonner Jbb 127 (1922), 1–74.

[24] A. Hauck, Die Bischofswahlen unter den Merowingern (Erlangen 1883); E. Vacandard, "Les élections épiscopales sous les Mérovingiens," Études de critique et d'histoire religieuse 1 (Paris 1915), 123–187; P. Cloché, "Les élections épiscopales sous les Mérovingiens," MA 35 (2^e série, tome 26) (1924–25), 203–254; D. Claude, "Die Bestellung der Bischofe im merovingischen Reich," ZSavRGkan 80 (1963), 1–75; F. Lotter, "Designation und angebliches Kooptationsrecht bei Bischofserhebungen," ZRG kan 59 (1973), 112–150.

One must not, of course, fail to recognize that the extensive episcopal official power under the Merovingians was in some respects also impaired and infringed. The First Council of Orléans had, it is true, reestablished the monarchical power of the bishop over the members of the clergy and of the monastic order, and the succeeding synods issued decrees also on the metropolitan order and the competency of the clergy before the ecclesiastical courts. However, the episcopal organization of the Early Church was soon destroyed by the Proprietary Church System.[26] The principle that all churches founded by laymen should be conveyed to the bishop could not be maintained. Even the clerics appointed to the proprietary churches of magnates escaped the episcopate. The bishops tried to assure a minimum existence to the clergy of the proprietary churches of the magnates and reserved to themselves the right to examine them. They made the granting of benefices to clerics, the entry of clerics into patronage, and their summons to public business dependent on their consent. The episcopate sought in this way to keep the influence of the magnates as well as of the Kings over the clergy within defined bounds: without lasting success, since the proprietary church system prevailed more powerfully in the seventh century. Whether this process must be understood as a germanization of the ecclesiastical constitution is uncertain. It is certainly not to be evaluated only negatively, since the many proprietary churches, despite their defects, also promoted the christianization of the rural areas.

The relations between bishop and monasticism[27] were of a different sort from those between bishop and clergy: in its origin monasticism was a lay movement. After some initial difficulties it was incorporated into the old episcopal system. The monasteries enjoyed an internal autonomy under the direction of their abbots, but they were subject to the supervision of the local bishop, who performed all functions connected with holy orders within the monastic property. The abbots were supposed to govern only one monastery at a given time and were bound to attend the diocesan synod. Without the bishop's permission they might not leave their monastery, alienate any property, accept any benefices, enter into any relationship of patronage. The bishop's assent had to be obtained for new foundations. These rules applied in the sixth century also to the monasteries erected by the Kings and magnates. The papal privileges occasionally obtained for episcopal and royal foundations only thwarted the tendency discernible in the Frankish Kingdom toward an all too wide extension of episcopal power over the monasteries. They guaranteed especially the free election of the abbot, the autonomous administration of the monastic property, and the freedom of the monastery from the taxes customarily paid by other churches to the bishop. Royal and private proprietary monasteries in the strict sense are hardly demonstrable in Gaul in the sixth century, but Frankish Kings may have issued letters of protection for their foundations. If there existed a right of possession of the founder over the monastery, it probably ended with his death.

---

[25] L. Levillain, "Notes sur l'immunité franque," Revue de droit français et étranger, 4^e^ série, 6 (1927), 203–254; F. L. Ganshof, "L'immunité dans la monarchie franque," Recueils de la Soc. J. Bodin 1, 2nd. ed.: Les liens de vassalité et les immunités (Brussels 1958), 171–216.

[26] U. Stulz, Die Eigenkirche als Element des mittelalterlichen germanischen Kirchenrechts (1895), is fundamental; Feine, RG I, 131ff. (with copious literature).

[27] Summary of the various trends in monasticism: F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich (Munich–Vienna 1965). Sixth century: L. Ueding, Gesch. der Klostergründungen der frühen Merowingerzeit (Eberings Hist. Studien 261, 1935); C. Courtois, "L'évolution du monachisme en Gaule de St. Martin à St. Columban," Settimane di studio . . . IV. Il monachesimo nell'alto medioevo . . . (Spoleto 1957), 47–72. Development of privileges: E. Ewig, "Beobachtungen zu den Klosterprivilegien des 7. und frühen 8. Jh.," Adel und Kirche, Gerd Tellenbach zum 65. Geburtstag (Freiburg–Basel–Vienna 1968), 52–65.

A radical change, however, occurred when in 592 Columban appeared in the Frankish Kingdom with his twelve companions and on the southwestern edge of the Vosges founded Annegray, Luxeuil, and Fontaine, the first continental monasteries of the Irish type.[28] From Columban proceeded religious and moral impulses of the strongest sort, but the great saint completely disregarded the existing Gallo-Frankish monastic law. He ruled his foundations in an authoritarian manner, traveled at will, had ordinations performed by a bishop other than the local one, recognized no episcopal right to the monastic property, to taxes, or lodging, and performed pastoral functions beyond the monastery's territory. When he finally even refused to appear at synods and arbitrarily threatened King Theodoric II with excommunication, he was expelled from the Burgundian subkingdom in 610 and died in 615 in his Italian foundation of Bobbio. Nevertheless, Luxeuil remained a monastic center of the first rank, which radiated far to northern, eastern, and central Gaul. Columban's severe Rule, in which to a great extent organizational regulations were lacking, was united, soon after the departure of the monastic father, with the Regula Benedicti infiltrating from Italy to form the Regula Mixta. The Irish rites did not long maintain themselves, and monastic unions of the Celtic type were unable to establish themselves on the continent. But the monastic strivings for autonomy found extensive recognition among the Kings and the spiritual and temporal magnates who were affected by the spirit of Luxeuil. The monasteries obtained episcopal privileges which accorded them not only internal autonomy under the Rule, the free election of the abbot, and the inviolability of their property, but often even freedom from any authority of the local bishop. These episcopal privileges were often complemented by royal charters, which granted to monasteries of the type of Luxeuil their individual immunity over and above protection, withdrew them thereby from the general immunity pertaining to episcopal property, and constituted them as independent churches also in secular law. The route thus trod was not without perils. Like the proprietary church system, the monastic system of the new kind could not but lead, in the chaos of the late Merovingian epoch, to a far-reaching dissolution of the ecclesiastical organization. Now monk-bishops and itinerant bishops of the Irish type appeared also in the Frankish Kingdom.[29] The sources of religious energy became mountain torrents—of course, as such they preserved their importance for the christianization of the Merovingian Kingdom, which moved into a new stage with the monasticism of Luxeuil.

---

[28] The chief source is the Vita Columbani, MGSS rer. Mer. VI, 1–152. Briefer, more basic survey: W. Levison, "Die Iren und die fränkische Kirche," Aus rheinischer und fränkischer Frühzeit (Düsseldorf 1948), pp. 247–263. More recent studies on Columban and his impact on the continent: Mélanges colombaniens (Paris 1950). Last monograph on Columban: M. M. Dubois, Un pionnier de la civilisation occidentale: St. Colomban (Paris 1950). Further literature in F. Prinz, op. cit. More recently the contributions of Johannes Dufo ("Irische Einflüsse auf St. Gallen u. Alemannien"), Friedrich Prinz ("Frühes Mönchtum in Südwestdeutschland und die Anfänge der Reichenau"), K. U. Jäschke ("Kolumban von Luxeuil u. sein Wirken im alemann. Raum"), and Frantisek Graus ("Die Viten der Heiligen des südalemann. Raums u. die sogenannten Adelsheiligen"), in Vorträge und Forschungen 20 (1974).

The spread of Christianity is an essential chapter in the history of the Merovingian national Church. In the north and east of Gaul was a broad border zone, which extended from the province of Besançon (Maxima Sequanorum) via the provinces of Mainz (Germania I), Cologne (Germania II), and Reims (Belgica II) to the Province of Rouen (Lugdunensis II) and had been powerfully affected by the upheavals of the fifth century.[30] In the north of Germania II the cities of Nijmegen and Xanten had already been ruined before the end of the Roman period; thereafter sees were not reestablished in them. Also in parts of Belgica II Christian penetration remained weak. The immigration of the Salian Franks led in the fifth century to the collapse of the ecclesiastical organization in the districts of Tournai, Thérouanne (=Boulogne), and Arras, as well as to a strengthening of the rural paganism in the civitates of Cambrai, Vermand (Saint-Quentin—Noyon), Amiens, Beauvais, and Rouen. The episcopal see of Vermand was transferred to Noyon, that of Tongres to Maastricht. In the sphere of settlement and influence of the Alemanni on the Upper Rhine and Aar the Church was also affected by the collapse of the Empire. The see of Augst (=Basel) completely disappeared, the Bishop of the Helvetians withdrew from Windisch and Avenches to Lausanne, and German colonists reinforced the pagan rural population in the district of Besançon. The see of Chur (Raetia I) suffered losses in its northern areas.[31] Farther east in Raetia II (Augsburg) and in Noricum Ripense (Lorch) the episcopal organization was totally wrecked, even if Christian congregations continued at Augsburg and Salzburg. The Bishop of Augsburg seems to have fled to Säben (=Brixen). Noricum Mediterraneum (East Tirol, Carinthia, Styria) was first affected by the catastrophe when the Slovene Carinthians settled there at the end of the sixth century.

---

[29] H. Frank, "Die Klosterbischöfe des Frankenreichs," Beiträge zur Gesch. des alten Mönchtums 17 (1932).

[30] Cf. in addition to the general literature for the chapter (especially H. Büttner, G. Tessier, E. de Moreau, W. Neusse–F. W. Oediger), also E. Ewig, "Das Fortleben römischer Institutionen in Gallien und Germanien," X Congresso internazionale di scienze storiche (Rome 1955), Relazioni VI (Florence s. d.), 599ff. For Belgica II: J. Lestocquoy, "L'origine des évêchés de la Belgique Seconde," RHEF 32 (1946), 43–52.

Between the two invaded areas on the Lower and the Upper Rhine lay a zone of stronger continuity, which included the civitates of Cologne, Mainz, Worms, Speyer, and Strasbourg. In this zone the continuance of Christian communities can be demonstrated not only in the cities but to a great extent also in the more important castra. Whether gaps in the episcopal lists indicate a temporary interruption of the episcopal organization is an open question. In any event, the Germans in these districts early came into closer contact with Christianity, and there also a favorable opportunity was offered for an ecclesiastical restoration: Here, of course, Clovis could not yet make the attempt, since he only incorporated the Rhineland into his enlarged Kingdom shortly before his death.

Gregory of Tours reports that more than 3,000 Franks were baptized with Clovis: probably the royal retinue and the groups which settled especially in the later subkingdoms of Paris and Orléans. But the first great Merovingian King set about the ecclesiastical reorganization in the [31] H. Büttner, Gesch. des Elsass (Berlin 1939); id. "Die Entstehung der Konstanzer Diözesangrenzen," ZSKG 48 (1954), 225–274; id., "Zur frühen Gesch. des Bistums Octodurum-Sitten und des Bistums Avenches-Lausanne," ibid. 53 (1959), 241–266; id., "Die Entstehung der Churer Bistumsgrenzen" ibid., 81–104, 191–212; id., "Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer im Alpenraum zwischen Grossem St. Bernhard und Brennerpass," HJ 84 (1964), 1–33.

---

Salian Frankish territories north of Reims, though without the desired success; for the initial steps taken by him at Arras and Tournai (?) soon atrophied.[32] The Merovingians of Soissons, to whom these territories fell after Clovis's death, apart from Chilperic I (561–584), had little contact with the churches of southern Gaul, which could supply their surplus among the clergy. For finally Arras was united with the see of Cambrai, and the area of Tournai was assigned as a mission sphere to the see of Noyon (=Saint-Quentin).

The Austrasian Merovingians of Reims had greater success. Their Aquitanian enclaves constituted an intact recruiting ground for the clergy of Austrasian Francia.[33] Theodoric I (511–534) had clerics come from Auvergne to Trier, and Aquitanians are also demonstrable in the area of Reims, although both churches were not so severely affected by the convulsions of the fifth century. Around the middle of the sixth century the episcopal lists of Maastricht, Cologne, Mainz, and Strasbourg began anew with Gallo-Roman names, whose bearers must have been at least partly Aquitanians.[34] At the end of the sixth century the first Germans are encountered on these episcopal lists, and at the beginning of the seventh century bishops of Worms and Speyer with German names also appear.[35] Accordingly, a second stage of the restoration must have been reached c. 550, and the work itself must have been concluded c. 600. Probably at the latest in the sixth century the territories of Xanten and Nijmegen were added to the bishopric of Cologne, and the see of Strasbourg expanded to the former civitas of Augst (=Basel). The mission did not yet extend to the area on the right bank of the Rhine. Paganism must have disappeared from the cities first.[36] In the Trier Ardennes it came to an end toward the close of the sixth century.[37] It seems to have maintained itself longer only in the Liége Ardennes and in Toxandria.[38]

---

[32] For Arras: Vita s. Vedasti, MGSS rer. Mer. III, 399–422 (Remigius with Clovis's cooperation). For Tournai: L. Duchesne, Fastes III (1915), 114ff. It is striking that the list of Arras breaks off at the time of Gaugerich, who moved his see from Arras to Cambrai.

[33] E. Ewig, "L'Aquitaine et des pays rhénans au haut moyen âge," Cahiers de civilisation medièvale 1 (1958), 37–54.

[34] L. Duchesne, Fastes III, 157 (Mainz: Sidonius), 171 (Strasbourg: Solarius), 179 (Cologne: Carentinus). Tongres–Maastricht represents a special case in so far as here two or three bishops of the late fifth and early sixth centuries are known (Monulfus, Falco, Domitian), but then there is a gap between Domitian, last attested in 535, and Bettulfus, first noted in 614 (L. Duchesne, Fastes III, 189). On Cologne cf. now also F. W. Oediger, Die Regesten der Erzbischöfe von Köln I (Bonn 1954), and W. Neuss–F. W. Oediger, Gesch. des Erzbistums Köln I (Cologne 1964). Aquitanian origin is attested for none of the bishops named, but at least for Sidonius of Mainz it is to be assumed because of his name.

[35] German names begin at the end of the sixth century in Trier with Magnerich, in Cologne with Ebergisel, in Mainz with Sigimund, in Strasbourg (probably somewhat earlier) with Arbogast. In Maastricht there appears Bettulfus in 614; in Worms and Speyer in the same year the episcopal list is resumed with men of German names. Maastricht represents a special case in so far as here German names began as early as c. 500 (Monulfus, Falco). As is well known, German names do not permit a sure conclusion as to German origin. Bishops with Roman names still appear after those named in the lists of Trier, Cologne, and Strasbourg. Only from the second or third decade of the seventh century are only German names encountered in these lists. From this time on, one may speak with greater certainty of a germanization of the episcopate in the cities mentioned.

This first phase of the Frankish mission entirely took the form of an interior ecclesiastical restoration, which could make use of the existing congregations and probably be borne substantially by the clergy, even if monks and especially hermits were not entirely absent from it.[39] The hermits seem to have worked especially among the rural folk. The ecclesiastical restoration was promoted by the Kings in regard to organization and probably also materially, but there was no compulsory conversion of pagans. Only the sanctification of Sundays and holy days was imposed under penalty at the end of the sixth century[40]—a sign of the cultic and ritual view of Christianity. The prohibition of pagan worship, which Childebert I issued soon after 550, affected only the subkingdom of Paris, in which there must at that time have been hardly any pagans.[41]

---

[36] The sole witness of paganism in the Rhine cities concerns a Frankish fanum in Cologne (Gregory of Tours, Vitae patrum 6, 2, MGSS rer. Mer. 1, 681, before 525). The reports on the churches in the Rhenish cities confirm the assumption that paganism died out in them early.

[37] Gregory, Hist. Fr. VIII, 15, MGSS rer. Mer. 1, 380ff.

[38] The lives of the Bishops Lambert and Hubert of Maastricht/Liége speak still of the combating of paganism in the Ardennes and in Toxandria. Cf. E. de Moreau, op. cit., 95ff. 101ff.

[39] The churches of almost all the Roman castra in the area of the Cologne diocese were later in the bishop's hands (W. Neuss–F. W. Oediger, Gesch. des Erzbistums Köln, 293ff.). The same is true for the territory of the diocese of Trier, and, cum grano salis, also for Mainz. From this one may conclude that the mission was directed by the bishop and carried out by the diocesan clergy. Also known are the names of a series of ascetics, who founded, not great monasteries, but smaller cells or churches in the country, such as Wulfilaich, Goar, Fridolin, Ingobert, Wendelin, Disibod, Beatus, and Bantus. More exact reports are extant only on Wulfilaich, who first lived as a hermit and after an intervention by Magnerich of Trier became leader of a missionary or pastoral station. The work of the other saints mentioned may be made known in a similar way. An Aquitanian origin is attested by later sources for Goar and Fridolin.

[40] Decrees of the Frankish-Burgundian King Guntram and of his Austrasian nephew, Childebert II (MGCap I, 11, 17), as well as numerous passages in conciliar acts and vitae.

[41] MGCap I, 21. The praeceptum was issued soon after 550, and hence came from the later part of the reign. The Franks of Childebert appear still in the 670s as a closed,

The second phase of the interior ecclesiastical restoration began under Chlotar II (584/613–629) and Dagobert I (623/629–639). It was carried out predominantly by circles which belonged to or were friendly with the monasticism of Luxeuil—in the broadest sense. Strong Aquitanian forces also poured into this monasticism. The chief points of departure lay in the Neustrian territory and the Alemannian–Burgundian–Raetian frontier area.

The first missionary of this phase in the North Gallic-Frankish territories[42] seems to have been Walaric, who worked in the dioceses of Rouen and Amiens and gave his name to the abbey of Saint-Valéry-sur-Somme in the diocese of Amiens. He is said to have been sent forth by Columban, that is, before 610 or at the latest between 610 and 612. His successor, Blitmund, became the real founder of the abbey of Saint-Valéry in 615–628.[43] Richarius, patron of the abbey of Centula,[44] began his activity in the diocese of Amiens under Dagobert I. Dagobert founded the bishopric of Thérouanne (=Boulogne), whose first bishop was Audomar, a member of the Luxeuil circle, and to him the origins of the abbey of Sithiu (Saint-Omer–Saint-Bertin) went back.[45] Still under Clothar II, c. 625, began the activity of the Aquitanian Amandus, which extended chiefly to the see of Tournai, united with Noyon, even if for a time Amandus had been Bishop of Tongres–Maastricht (c. 649). The abbey of Elno–Saint-Amand, the chief base of the "Apostle of the Flemings," was founded under Dagobert I and richly endowed by him. The Vita s. Amandi tells, among other things, of an episode of conversion from the Beauvaisis. But the saint's real mission-field was the areas on the Scheldt and the Scarpe, the pagus of Ghent and the country of Antwerp—this of course probably only in the last years of Amandus, who died at an advanced age in 676. Among the younger companions and collaborators of Amandus was Bavo, who worked in Ghent and gave his name to the famous abbey there.[46] politically active group. There must not have been pagans in this leading group—probably still among the lesser folk in the northern frontier areas of Rouen, Amiens, and Beauvais.

---

[42] On the mission in these areas: E. de Moreau, op. cit.; also, E. Vancandard, "L'idolâtrie en Gaule aux 6e et 7e siècles," RQH 65 (1899). Synopsis of the testimonies from the vitae: E. Ewig, "Die fränkischen Teilungen und Teilreiche im 7. Jh.," Trierer Zschr. 22 (1954), 99, no. 61.

[43] Vita Walarici 11, 22, 35, 36: MGSS rer. Mer. IV, 164, 168ff., 174ff. On paganism in the see of Amiens, also the Vita Lupi ep. Senonici 11, 12, ibid. IV, 182.

[44] Vita Richarii 2, 4, ibid. VII, 445ff.

[45] Vita Audomari 1–5, ibid. V, 754–756. H. von Werveke, "Het bisdom Terwaan," Université de Gand, Recueil de Travaux publ. par la Fac. des Lettres, 52e fasc. (Ghent–Paris 1924).

[46] Vita s. Amandi 13, 24, MGSS rer. Mer. V, 436ff., 447. Vita s. Bavonis 3, ibid. IV, 537.

Closely united with Dagobert I were the two great Bishops Eligius of Noyon (641–690) and Audoin of Rouen (641–684), but they obtained these episcopal sees only after the King's death. Audion worked closely with Wandregisil, a Frank of the Moselle country, founder of the abbey of Saint-Wandrille c. 645, while his relations with the Aquitanian Philibert, founder of Jumièges, were for a time strained. The last traces of paganism disappeared at that time from the diocese of Rouen.[47] The missionary activity of Saint Eligius was concentrated on what was then the diocese of Tournai, especially the areas of Kortrijk (Suebi), Bruges (pagus Flandrensis), and Ghent.[48] Around the same time Burgundofaro of Meaux must have sent the Irishman Kilian (Chillena) to Artois,[49] where Bishop Audebert of Cambrai (645/652–667) at that time raised the remains of the first bishop, Vedast, and founded the abbey of Saint-Vaast of Arras.[50] In Toxandria Lambert (671/675–before 706) and Hubert of Tongres–Maastricht (before 706–727) baptized the last pagans.

Progress can be clearly recognized from the absorption of more or less large pagan minorities in the territories of Rouen, Beauvais, Amiens, and Arras into the mission in the territories with an overwhelmingly pagan population—Thérouanne, Tournaisis, Toxandria, Kortrijk, Bruges, Ghent, Antwerp—which perhaps spread as early as the 680s from the Frankish-Frisian frontier territory to the Frisians.[51] The missionaries or mission directors were always monks or at least were in friendly relations with the Luxeuil circle, to which also belonged the Aquitanians, Amandus, Remaclus, and Philibert. Hence monasteries often grew out of mission stations, and in a newly founded diocese, such as Thérouanne, could have even a greater importance than the cathedral. Many new monastic foundations assisted them, so that the boundaries between mission and monastic organization often became blurred.

E. de Moreau, St.-Amand, apôtre de la Belgique et du Nord de la France (Louvain 1927); A. Verhulst, Over de stichting en de vroegate geschiedenis van de St. Pietersen de St. Baafsabdijen te Gent (Ghent 1953).

[47] Vita Audoeni 4, MGSS rer. Mer. V, 556. Vita Wandregisili 16, ibid. V, 26ff. E. Vacandard, Vie de St. Ouen, évêque de Rouen (Paris 1902), 641–684.

[48] Vita Eligii II, 2, MGSS rer. Mer. IV, 695.

[49] Vita Faronis 100, ibid. V, 194.

[50] A. B. Hoxie, "Translatis civitatis Atrebatensis," Revue Belge de phil. et d'hist. 16 (1937), 591–598.

[51] Vita Wulframni ep. Senonici 3, MGSS rer. Mer. V, 663. The value of this vita is very controversial. But I would accept a missionary activity of Wulfram in Friesland or in the Frankish-Frisian frontier zone where Willibrord was still working.

A detailed description of mission methods is found only in the Vita s. Amandi, composed c. 725. From this it follows that the preaching of the gospel in the predominantly or entirely pagan countryside was not free of dangers to life and limb and hence demanded an entirely personal effort. And so the missionary needed the royal protection. Perhaps such a royal letter of protection was the point of departure for the claim of the Vita s. Amandi that King Dagobert had issued a command for the forcible baptism of the pagans. Otherwise no trace of compulsion is found. Amandus created a first step for a missionary station by purchasing slaves and having them baptized. The Vita refers the break-through of the mission in Ghent to a raising from the dead by the saint. A direct connection of the mission with economic and social changes was not hitherto demonstrated, although the origin of large and rich monasteries in the final stage or after the completion of the conversion may have fostered the formation or consolidation of a land-owning upper class and the development of commercial places such as Quentovic and Dorestad.

The impetus proceeding from Luxeuil for the christianization of the North Gallic-Frankish areas occurred just as early but was still directly operative also in the Burgundian–Alemannian–Raetian frontier zone, where the mission to the Alemanni grew out of the ecclesiastical restoration in an entirely analogous manner to that of the North Gallic-Frankish lands.

The ecclesiastical organization had, as already said, completely collapsed in the old civitas of Augst (=Basel). The sees of Windisch–Avenches (Helvetia) and Chur (Raetia I) had been for their part powerfully effected by the immigration of the pagan Alemanni in the second half of the fifth and in the sixth centuries.[52] The Alemanni had poured into the area of the Aar, modern central Switzerland, as far as Lake Thun and the Lake of Lucerne, and in the east as far as the Lake of Zurich and the Upper Rhine. Some ancient Christian centers—Zurich (Felix-Regula), Bregenz (Aurelia), Zurzach (Verena)—were inundated, although the memory of the old religion maintained itself in them. In other castra or vici Christian communities continued, such as in Constance, Arbon, Grabs and Gams, in Solothurn and Grenchen. Here the ecclesiastical restoration and organization could begin. The episcopal cities of Strasbourg, Lausanne (=Avenches), and Chur offered support, but their capabilities had not yet been developed in the sixth century. The Alemannian dukes could also provide help: as members of the Austrasian and Burgundian aristocracies they had become Christians in the later sixth century.

---

[52] The following statements should be compared with the works of Büttner cited in the survey of the literature and in footnote 31, from which all particular details have been taken. In Büttner also the other literature. The discussion of the identity of Columban's disciple Gall with the founder of Sankt Gallen has recently been resumed. On this see now the contributions of Dufo, Prinz, and Jäschke in Vorträge und Forschungen 20, 1974 (see footnote 28).

The springtime of the mission in the country inundated by the Alemanni is connected with the name of Columban, to whom the Austrasian King Theodebert II assigned there in 610–11 a new field of operation after his expulsion from Luxeuil. Columban began in the Germano-Romance zone of penetration at Tuggen on the Lake of Zurich and at Bregenz on Lake Constance, but was unable to accomplish much, since after the defeat and death of Theodebert II in 612 he had to withdraw to Italy. More enduring was the cella founded by his pupil Gall (d. after 629), whose later rise to a great abbey could not, of course, have been foreseen in the seventh century. For a long time yet, Sankt Gallen was only one Christian station among others.

There was already a bishop at Constance in the time of Saint Gall. The Christians of Constance, Arbon, and Grabs were oriented to Chur, in whose sphere of influence Sankt Gallen was also erected. The origins of the see of Constance, to which was later assigned the land inundated by the Alemanni south of the Rhine, are unknown. Important for the separation from Chur was the fact that for a while the country south of the Rhine belonged to the Franco-Burgundian subkingdom (595–609/610, 612ff.). The original endowment of the see and its separation from Chur go back to Dagobert I (629–639), who at Constance itself was later regarded as founder of the bishopric. Burgundian influence was proclaimed by the patronage of Benignus over the church of Pfäffikon, which, with the newly founded churches of Saint Martin at Olten and Windisch, probably belonged to the first period of consolidation. The bishopric included the Aargau and the Thurgau, hence areas which had previously belonged to Helvetia and Raetia. But it soon extended also to the country of the Alemanni north of the Rhine, so that it became simply the "Aleman bishopric" with a territory unusually large even for medieval conditions. The conclusion must be drawn that this could not have happened without lasting support of the dukes of the Alemanni, if in the present state of research more detailed statements on the course and the bearers of the mission are not available. In any event there occasionally occurs a mere name, such as that of Saint Trudpert in the Breisgau.[53] Archeologically the Alemannian mission province north of the Rhine was marked by the appearance of the "Lombard" gold-leaf crosses, which point to influences from Italy, but thus far cannot be satisfactorily interpreted.[54] Lombard influences by way of Chur are conceivable. A ducal donation to Gall's Cella in the territory of Cannstatt from 708 may belong in the great period of the mission, which at that time was probably drawing to a close. The abbey of Reichenau, founded in 724, and Pirmin's circle may hardly have played a role in the conversion of the Alemanni, but they probably did in the consolidating and deepening of their Christianity.[55] The possessions of Reichenau and of the monastery of Sankt Gallen, whose rise began under Abbot Othmar (719/720–759/760), later marked the northern limits of the see of Constance.

---

[53] In addition, T. Mayer, Beiträge zur Gesch. von St. Trudpert (Freiburg 1937); H. Büttner, "Franken und Alemannen in Breisgau und Ortenau," ZGObrh, NF, 52 (1938), 323–359; id., "Christentum und fränkischer Staat in Alemannien und Raetien während des 8. Jh." ZSKG 43 (1949), 1–16.

Around the time when the bishopric of Constance was founded in the area south of the Rhine, there first appeared also a Bishop of Augst (=Basel), Ragnachar, a former monk of Luxeuil and disciple of Columban's successor, Eustasius (610–629). He may have collaborated in the founding of Luxeuil's daughter-monastery of Moutier-Grandval in the Jura, which Abbot Waldebert (629–670) put, together with the perhaps somewhat older cells of Saint-Ursanne and Vermes, under the authority of the Luxeuil monk Germanus of Trier. The new foundation of the see of Basel had, it is true, no long existence, since the diocese was attached to the see of Strasbourg in connection with the southern expansion of the dukes of Alsace. From Strasbourg mission influences seem to have proceeded early to the Upper Rhine. Strasbourg and Chur appear as stations in the life of Fridolin, who in the late sixth or in the seventh century came from Poitou to the Rhine and founded the cella of Säckingen. In the Thurgau the patronage of Arbogast over Oberwinterthur was proclaimed by Strasbourg influence. The Alsatian see acquired property, probably in the seventh century, at Solothurn and on Lake Thun. Thus Strasbourg appears to have shared at the side of Lausanne,

---

[54] On the gold-leaf crosses, most recent is J. Werner, "Fernhandel und Naturalwirtschaft im östlichen Merowingerreich nach archäologischen und numismatischen Zeugnissen," Settimane di studio . . . VIII. Moneta e scambi nell' alto medioevo (Spoleto 1961), 577: "In their quantity they may be native imitations, which indicated the basis of the Alpine commerce, the extension of a Lombard burial site to South Germany." O. v. Hessen, "Die Goldblattkreuze aus der Zone nördlich der Alpen," Problemi della civiltà e dell' economia longobarda. Scritti in memoria di G. P. Bognetti (Milan 1964), 199–226.

[55] On Pirmin, now see H. Löwe, "Pirmin, Willibrord und Bonifatius. Ihre Bedeutung für die Missionsgeschichte ihrer Zeit," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al cristianesimo nell' Europa dell' alto medioevo (Spoleto 1967), 217–261; A. E. Angenendt, Monachi peregrini. Studien zu Pirmin und den monastischen Vorstellungen des frühen Mittelalters (Theol. diss., Münster 1969); id., "Pirmin und Bonifatius. Ihr Verhältnis zu Mönchtum, Bischofsamt und Adel," Voträge und Forschungen 20 (1974), 251–304.

Chur, and Luxeuil, in the ecclesiastical reorganization and mission in the Burgundian–Alemannian–Raetian frontier area.

The new beginnings of the see of Augsburg also extended back to the seventh century.[56] The reorganization seems to have begun at Saint Afra, where a Christian community had maintained itself. At the abbey, which celebrated the memory of Dagobert I, rich graves from the period around or before 700 were recently uncovered, among them perhaps also tombs of older bishops. The representatives of the mission on the Lech remain anonymous. Influences from Italy could have been noted in the late sixth century. That on the Frankish side Amandus then also worked in Augsburg remains only a weakly supported conjecture. Not until the eighth century does some light begin to dissipate the darkness. Beside Augsburg there appear as ecclesiastical centers Neuburg on the Staffel Lake, Epfach on the Lech, and the stations of Füssen and Kempten in the Allgäu, founded with the aid of the Sankt Gallen monks Magnus and Theodore. If Magnus was said to have really evangelized in the Allgäu, then paganism must have maintained itself there unusually long—into the 740s. Hence one should think rather of the organizational construction of the diocese, especially since right at this time the mayors of the palace established the Iller frontier between Augsburg and Constance.

Around the turn from the seventh to the eighth century Augsburg probably belonged to the territory of the dukes of Bavaria, which included the old province of Raetia II and parts of Noricum. Just as in the Raetian capital of Augsburg, so also apparently in the large Roman camp of Regensburg a Roman Christian community had maintained itself, grouped around the local basilica of Saint George.[57] The continuity of the cult of Saint Florian indicated similar circumstances at Lorch, and a Roman Christian congregation can have continued also at Passau.[58] Larger groups of free and wealthy Romans clearly continued around Salzburg–Reichenhall, whose ecclesiastical center may have been Saint Peter of Salzburg. Here even in the countryside at Bischofshofen the continuity of an early Christian cult, that of Maximilian, can be demonstrated.[59] In the North Tirol the immigrating Bajuwares came upon the tribe of the Breones, in which Christian influences had as yet scarcely established themselves.

---

[56] On Bavaria in general: R. Bauerreiss (see the survey of the literature). On Augsburg, Kempten, and Füssen: F. Zoepfl, Das Bistum Augsburg und seine Bischöfe im Mittelalter (Augsburg 1956); E. Klebel, "Zur Gesch. der christlichen Mission im schwäbischen Stammesgebiet," Zschr. für württ. Landesgesch. 17 (1958), 145–218; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum, 334–336, 359–364, 406, 434; H. Büttner, Konstanzer Diözesangrenzen, 265–268, id., Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer, pp. 7, 9, 26; H. Hübener, "Zum römischen und frühmittelalterlichen Augsburg," Jb. des RG Zentralmuseums Mainz 5 (1958), 154–238; J. Werner, "Studien zu Abodiacum-Epfach," Münchener Beiträge zur Vor-und Frügesch. 7 (1964; in it, especially K. Schmid, "Bischof Wikterp in Epfach. Eine Studie über Bischof und Bischofssitz im 8. Jh."); K. Reindel, "Die Bistumsorganisation im Alpen-Donau-Raum in der Spätantike und im Frühmittelalter," MIÖG 72 (1964), 277–310.

[57] F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum, 319, 332, 337, 380, footnote 171; J. Sydow, "Untersuchungen über die frühen Kirchenbauten in Regensburg," RivAC 31 (1955), 75–96; E. Klebel, "Regensburg," Vorträge und Forschungen, ed. T. Mayer, IV (Lindau-Constance 1958), 87–104; M. Piendl, "Probleme der frühen Baugeschichte von St. Emmeram in Regensburg," ZBLG 28 (1965) (Festgabe M. Spindler), 32–46; H. Büttner, Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer, 9 and 14.

The Raetian–Norican Christians in the Duchy of Bavaria were traditionally oriented to Aquileia. The connection with the ecclesiastical province of Aquileia had probably continued into the early seventh century.[60] However, the impulses proceeding from there grew weak as a consequence of the political and ecclesiastical isolation of the ancient metropolis of northeast Italy in the seventh century. Thereby the Roman-Christian island communities in Bavaria lost the support of the great ecclesiastical centers of the untouched Christian interior. Of the bishoprics of the province of Aquileia only the little refuge-see of Säben (=Brixen) in the Eisack Valley belonged to the territory of the Bavarian

---

[58] R. Noll, Frühes Christentum in Österreich von den Anfängen bis um 600 (Vienna 1954). On Lorch and St. Florian: F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum, 330ff. and 435. Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La Conversione al cristianesimo (Spoleto 1967), 539–540 (More on the cult of Florian in Lombard Austria: Friuli, Vicenza, Treviso, Verona); F. Lotter, "Lauriacum—Lorch zwischen Antike u. MA," Mitt. des oberösterreichischen Landesarchivs 11 (1974), 31–49. On Linz: H. Koller, "Der Donauraum zwischen Linz und Wien. Kulturkontinuität und Kulturverlust des Romanentums nördlich der Alpen," Hist. Jb. der Stadt Linz (1960), 1–53. On Passau: M. Heuwiesser, Gesch. des Bistums Passau I (Passau 1939). F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum, 325, 329ff., 413; id., "Salzburg zwischen Antike und MA," Frühma. St. 5 (1974).

[59] F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum, 338, 395–404, 423ff.

[60] The more recent research on the Christian connections of Bavaria with the south and southeast began with E. Klebel, "Zur Gesch. des Christentums in Bayern vor Bonifatius," St. Bonifatius. Gedenkgabe zum 1200. Todestag (Fulda 1954), 288–411, to which Klebel himself added some supplementary material regarding Augsburg in his article cited in note 56. Klebel investigated the relations on the basis of patrons, of archaeology, of liturgy, and of ecclesiastical language. In his view patronage yielded little, whereas the early Christian buildings as well as the liturgy and ecclesiastical vocabulary clearly revealed relations. Klebel thought in this connection of Gothic Arian influences, and, like I. Zibermayr, Noricum, Bayern und Österreich (1956), of old connections with Sirmium. He did not greatly value the influences on the part of the Alpine Romans, who belonged to the province of Aquileia and like it adhered to the Schism of the Three Chapters. But the most recent research, which Prinz synopsizes in various places in his book, strongly emphasizes the connections with Italy, especially with Aquileia. Prinz accepted a more or less strong Roman continuity, not only in the Salzburg area but also around Regensburg and Passau. He thought he saw an opposition between these Roman Christian groups of the Aquileia observance and the Merovingian clerics and monks, who came into the country with Frankish rule (F. Prinz, op. cit., 354, 383, note 181). The conversion of the Bavarians who had immigrated into Raetia and Noricum was essentially the work of Merovingian missionaries. The ecclesiastical integration of the two groups of peoples was definitively "completed probably only with Boniface's organization of the Church." The following picture results: Arian influences may have been active among the Bajuwares but they are not really evident (F. Prinz, op. cit., 337, note 48, 358, note 100). The special nature of the South German ecclesiastical vocabulary is unclarified (F. Prinz, op. cit., 345ff.). Influences from Milan have left traces in the liturgy and perhaps also in the cult of Ambrose at Augsburg (F. Prinz, op. cit., 334; E. Klebel, Mission im schwäbischen Stammesgebiet, 211). In the diocese of Augsburg Italian patronages are found: Valentine of Mais (near Meran), Zeno of Verona, Justina of Padua, Christina (Klebel, op. cit.). The Early Christian architecture of Noricum stood in the closest relations to Aquileia (R. Noll, Frühes Christentum, 127ff.). Also in the sequel the connection of the ecclesiastical architecture of Bavaria was maintained with now Lombard Italy (F. Prinz, op. cit., 444). Elements of the liturgy of Aquileia maintained themselves at Salzburg (F. Prinz, op. cit., 326, 398, 401); in Salzburg's Bischofshofen Maximilian of Celeia probably had an old shrine (E. Klebel, Christentum in Bayern, 395). Churches in the dioceses of Salzburg (E. Klebel, op. cit.), Regensburg (chapel: E. Klebel, op. cit.), and Freising (E. Klebel, op. cit., F. Prinz, 340, 344) were dedicated to Zeno of Verona. Vigilius of Trent was honored in the diocese of Freising and at Regensburg (E. Klebel, op. cit.). Cassian of Imola was patron of a Regensburg church (E. Klebel, op. cit., F. Prinz, op. cit., p. 338; J. Sydow, "Fragen um die Cassianskirche in Regensburg," Der Schlern 29 [1955], 452–457). The patronage of Saint George in Regensburg (St. Emmeram) and perhaps also elsewhere may have been transmitted from late antiquity or related to Italy or eastern connections (F. Prinz, op. cit., 337ff., 355; E. Klebel, Mission in Bayern, 399). Eastern influences (from Sirmium?) are detectable in the Passau liturgy (E. Klebel, Mission in Bayern, 403ff.). Byzantine jewelry is found in graves of Bavarian nobles (F. Prinz, op. cit., 355). Gold-leaf crosses are found on the Lower Inn and the central Salzach (J. Werner, op. cit., 54; H. Büttner, Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer, 21). The evidence cited is not all of the same cogency and probably not always chronologically exactly determined. Most of the Italian cults, especially the patronage of Cassian and the relatively widespread patronage of Zeno, must hardly have been adopted before the eighth century. Here the Lombard stratum appears surely more clearly than the Late Roman and Early Christian, which is more tangible in archeology and perhaps in liturgy. That Saint Florian of Noricum appears much more frequently in Lombard Austria as an ecclesiastical patron (cf. note 58) than in old Bavaria, that Saint Afra "already found admission into the Upper Italian preliminary forms of the Martyrologium Hieronymianum" (F. Prinz, op. cit., 345, note 75) but was only rarely a patron in Swabia, are paradoxes which still await clarification. From this one cannot without more ado infer an atrophying of the Late Roman Christian tradition in Raetia and Noricum, since the continuity of the shrine of Saint Afra is attested in the sixth century by Venantius Fortunatus, and the wandering route of the Luxeuil monk Agrestius permits no doubt for the early seventh century in connections existing between Bavaria and Aquileia (H. Büttner, Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer, 22). Also, Bishop Marcianus, who probably died in 608 and was buried at Grado, and who for forty years "peregrinatus est pro causa fidei," has his place here. His activity extended, according to H. Büttner (Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer, 21) "at the earliest to the Alpine region in the vicinity of the Brenner Pass and the northern approaches to the Alps."

dukes. Although Säben apparently carried on the tradition of Early Christian Augsburg, no initiative could proceed from it for the ecclesiastical reorganization and mission of the wider area occupied by the Bajuwares. The personnel of the little see was absorbed by the mission of the Breon country (North Tirol) and invaded by the Bajuwares, but in any event ecclesiastical radiations became noticeable in the approaches to the Alps as far as Augsburg.[61]

The decisive initiatives for the Bavarian mission came, not from the South, but from the West. At the very establishing of the Bavarian Duchy by Theodebert I (534–548) Gallo-Roman bishops (Galliarum episcopi) were installed, who tried to extend their influence also to Noricum Mediterraneum (Carinthia).[62] But their activity was without lasting effect. However, the Agilulfing Dukes, who made their appearance in the second half of the sixth century, professed the Catholic faith, causing the still mostly pagan Bajuwares to receive a Christian head. If the dukes came from Burgundy, as has recently been assumed by most,[63] they could have participated directly in the missionary initiative proceeding from Eustasius of Luxeuil (610–629). In fact, Tassilo I (529–after 610) seems to have supported Eustasius and his companion Agilus in the founding of a mission-station near Regensburg, from which resulted the abbey of Weltenburg.[64] From Luxeuil, also under Eustasius, went the monk Agrestius as missionary to Bavaria and from there to Aquileia, where he joined the schismatics of the Three Chapters.

On his journey to the Slavs, Amandus must also have crossed Bavaria, but there are no reports of a mission of the Apostle of the Flemings among the Bajuwares. Meanwhile, the christianization of the people must have been in full swing, when Emmeram (Haimchramm) came to Regensburg c. 665 (or 685–690), where he met death in an obscure conflict with the ducal family. The stops on Emmeram's route from Poitiers to Regensburg are unfortunately unknown. In view of the early relations of Columban's monasticism with Bourges and Poitiers, the supposition is natural that Emmeram also came from the Luxeuil circle. He could have taken the route of his probably somewhat older countryman, Fridolin of Säckingen, to the Rhine, on which Strasbourg may have been an intermediate station.[65] The monk-Bishop Erhard (of Narbonne?), who worked at Regensburg in the early eighth century, was, according to his biographer, in contact with the ducal house of Alsace.[66] In regard to Emmeram it does not go beyond a guess. However, the ducal residence of Regensburg clearly emerges as a chief point of departure of the Bavarian mission, both in the case of Eustasius and in that of Emmeram and Erhard. Also Bishop Rupert (Hrodbert), who probably left his diocese of Worms in 695 for political reasons in order to work in Bavaria, apparently went first to Regensburg and received from Duke Theodo the country of Salzburg as his field of activity, with supervision of the mission among the Slavonic Carinthians.[67] [61] Säben as place of refuge of the Bishop of Augsburg: R. Heuberger, Raetien im Altertum und im Frühmittelalter (1932), 172; H. Büttner, Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer, 18–20 (Bavarian since c. 600), 23, 28. E. Klebel called attention to the old possessions of the sees of Regensburg, Freising, and especially Augsburg in the sphere of the see of Säben (Mission im schwäbischen Stammesgebiet, 186ff.). Whether references to mission connections are supplied with this remains still an open question.

---

[62] MGEp I, 1, 20; F. Prinz, op. cit., 352ff.

[63] E. Zöllner, "Die Herkunft der Agilulfinger," MIÖG 59 (1951), 245ff.

[64] F. Prinz, op. cit., 356–358. Prinz dates the Bavarian mission of Eustasius to the period c. 610, following Barrault; Büttner, on the other hand, c. 626–27 (Frühmittelalterliche Bistümer, 22).

The last in the series of "Apostles of Bavaria" was Corbinian, who came from Melun (province of Sens) and worked in Freising soon after 716.[68] Meanwhile, the Bavarian Duchy had been divided, and so Corbinian did not go via Regensburg, but perhaps was presented by Rome to the Duke of Freising. The deceased Duke Theodo had contacted Rome in 716 about erecting a Bavarian ecclesiastical province. This initiative of Theodo shows that the Bavarian mission was externally completed. Since Emmeram, Rupert, and Corbinian there were in the ducal capitals of Regensburg, Salzburg, and Freising, to which Passau was also added, "monk-bishops with fixed sees" (Schieffer).[69] However, it characterizes the position of the three churchmen that none of what became cathedral monasteries had been founded by them: the three patrons of Bavaria do not stand at the beginning of the history of the conversion of the country.

---

[65] Vita Haimhrammi, MGSS rer. Mer. IV, 452–526; F. Prinz, op. cit., 380ff., returns with Löwe and against Klebel and Zibermayr to the old dating of Krusch at c. 660–670. In regard to Emmeram's intermediate stops, only assumptions can, of course, be made. In this it should be noted that, of the Merovingian missionaries, according to tradition, besides Emmeram also Fridolin of Säckingen and Amandus came from Poitou. Well known is the role of Bishop Dido of Poitiers as the chief ally of the Pippinids in Grimoald's coup d'état of 656. Nevertheless, Prinz properly stresses that in the sources there is found no trace of support of Emmeram by the Franks.

[66] Vita Erhardi, MGSS rer. Mer. VI, 1–21; F. Prinz, op. cit., 385–387. Of the three statements of origin in the vita, the origin from Narboanensis (Septimania) has the greatest likelihood. Intermediate stops could have been Moyenmoutier and Alsatian monasteries. The period of activity was probably the first third of the eighth century.

[67] Gesta Hrodberti, MGSS rer. Mer. VI, 157–162; F. Prinz, op. cit., 394–403. Herwig Wolfram, "Der heilige Rupert und die antikarolingische Adelsopposition," MSÖG 80 (1972), 4–34; H. Baumann, "Zur Textgeschichte der Vita Ruperti," Festschrift für H. Heimpel 3 (1972), 166–196.

[68] Vita Corbiniani, MGSS rer. Mer. VI, 497–635; F. Prinz, op. cit., 388–394; H. Löwe, "Corbinians Romreisen," ZBLG 16 (1951–52), 409–420.

[69] T. Schieffer, Winfrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Freiburg 1954), 139. Cf. also the statements of F. Prinz, op. cit., 381–382, 386 (Regensburg), 390ff., 393ff. (Freising), 399, 401, 407 (Salzburg), 412 (Passau), on the cathedral monasteries in the later Bavarian episcopal seats.

On the whole, the picture of the mission among the Bavarians is somewhat clearer than that among the Alemanni. King Theudebert I probably gave the people a Christian leadership and sent Gallo-Roman bishops, who perhaps busied themselves in the reorganizing of the surviving Roman-Christian communities. No missionary impulse could go out from these, since their support in the Christian hinterland of Aquileia that had remained intact had been interrupted by the political frontiers and had finally failed entirely. The initiative for the Bavarian mission came from Luxeuil, in which perhaps the blood relationship of the monk Agilus with the Agilulfing ducal house played a role. And later missionaries may have been in contact with the monasticism of Luxeuil in the broader sense. Both the persisting Romance communities and the residences of the Agilulfings offered points of departure for the mission to the Bajuwares. In the seventh century there is no further word of a collaboration of the Merovingians.[70] Not until Charles Martel did the influence of the Frankish central power again assert itself. The conversion of the Bavarians to Christianity appears, then, like that of the Alemanni, as a process which was indeed represented by Frankish or Irish-Frankish elements, but took place within the tribe without a discernible exterior pressure.

While Christianity was being established among the Alemanni and the Bavarians, it was also carried to the neighboring lands to the right of the Rhine by the Rhenish episcopal cities. Dagobert I subjected the first church at Utrecht to the bishopric of Cologne; according to a later source, Soest is said at that time to have been assigned also to the see of Cologne.[71] If the orientation of the graves of the seventh century in Westphalia south of the Lippe may indicate that they were Christian, the mission would have already extended at that time to the entire part of the later diocese of Cologne to the right of the Rhine.[72] However, this interpretation is disputed. The first churches of Utrecht and Soest may have served a Frankish garrison in a still greatly pagan milieu. The advance of the Frisians and Saxons put an end also to these advance-stations: a new beginning had to be made in the eighth century. The areas that remained Frankish in the strip of Cologne, Bonn, and Koblenz on the right bank of the Rhine must have been Christian up to the early eighth century, since they were no longer mission territory in the Carolingian epoch. There are no direct written statements, but thus far only archeological testimonies for the Rhenish towns of Niederdollendorf and Leutesdorf.[73]

---

[70] In any event, Dagobert I could still have intervened, but in this matter one cannot go beyond assumptions.

[71] F. W. Oediger, Regesten, nos. 32, 35. See H. Büttner, Mission und Kirchenorganisation des Frankenreiches, 457.

[72] S. Gollub, "Zur Frage ältester christlicher Bestattungen in Westfalen," Westfal. Forschungen 11 (1958), 10–16.

The progress of the mission in the sector of Mainz, Worms, and Speyer stands out somewhat clearer. Here too the first testimonies come from Rhenish places. In Kastel and Wiesbaden Christianity persisted from Roman times; a Christian tombstone from Goddelau in the Ried (south of Trebur) is dated from the fifth or early sixth century. Other tombstones of the seventh and eighth centuries show an advance on the Lower Main as far as the Niddagau. An inscription of 711–717 from Nilkheim near Aschaffenburg confirms that the see of Mainz had at that time reached the Spessart frontier. Inferences permit the statement that the Wetterau had also been christianized at that time from Mainz. Advance-posts, but, in contrast to Utrecht and Soest, firmly in Frankish hands, were Büraburg (near Fritzlar), Amöneburg, Glauberg (near Büdingen), and the Kesterburg (Christenberg near Wetter). The Church of Saint Martin at Christenberg and the Church of Saint Bridget of Büraburg were probably built in the first or second decade of the eighth century.[74]

---

[73] J. Dietrich, "Die frühe kirchliche und politische Erschliessung des unteren Lahngebiets im Spiegel der konradinischen Besitzgeschichte," AMrhKG 5 (1953), 157–194; E. Ewig, "Das Bistum Köln im Frühmittelalter," AHVNrh 155–156 (1954), 205–243; H. Büttner, "Siegerland und Westerwald im frühen Mittelalter," Hess. Jb. für Landesgesch. 5 (1955), 27; id., "Die politische Erfassung des Lahn-und Dillgebiets im Früh-und Hochmittelalter," ibid. 8 (1958), 1–21. The tombstones mentioned belong to the seventh century. The mission in the areas situated farther east must be dated in the early eighth century, the ecclesiastical organization in the later eighth and in the ninth centuries. The Trier mission center of Diekirchen on the Lahn must have been founded c. 700.

[74] H. Büttner "Frühes Christentum in Wetterau und Niddagau," Jb. für das Bistum Mainz (1948), 138–150; id., "Frühes fränkisches Christentum am Mittelrhein," AMrhKG 3 (1951), 16, 18, 39 (Kastel, Wiesbaden, Goddelau), 40 (Gimbach, Hochheim, Nilkheim), 38ff. (Büraburg, Amöneburg, Glauburg near Büdingen), 52 (Wetterau, Niddagau, Untermain); id., "Die Mainlande um Aschaffenburg im frühen Mittelalter," Aschaffenburger Jb. 4 (1957), 109–128; id., Mission und Kirchenorganisation des Frankenreiches, 457ff. On Kesterburg and the other Hessian fortifications cf. also W. Schlesinger, "Die Franken im Gebiet östlich des mittleren Rheins," Hess. Jb. für Landesgesch. 15 (1965), 18ff.; also K. Weidemann, R. Gensen, and N. Wand in Althessen im Frankenreich (Nationes II) W. Schlesinger 3rd. ed., (1975). Büttner dates the evangelization of Wetterau, Niddagau, and Untermain in the late seventh and early eighth centuries. The first, still wide-meshed net of churches of the Wetterau arose in the first half of the eighth century in connection with the Frankish fiscal area. Later Irish influence around Giessen: M. Gockel and M. Werner, "Die Urkunde des Beatus von Honau von

From Worms in the seventh century the Lower Neckar from Ladenburg to Wimpfen was opened up and at the end of the century the Wingarteiba with the Bauland had been reached. The abbey of Amorbach was erected in the early eighth century in the eastern Odenwald. From Speyer the Kraichgau and the central Neckarland were evangelized in the late seventh and early eighth centuries, and in this the abbey of Weissenburg, founded c. 660, played a special role.[75] Presumably around the same time influences proceeded from Strasbourg to the Ortenau and the Breisgau. The first monasteries in the Ortenau arose under the influence of Pirmin, of course only after the Frankish conquest of Alemannia in the decade 740–750.[76]

From Worms ancient roads ran to Würzburg, which in the seventh and early eighth centuries was the seat of the ducal house of the "Hedene" in the Main area. Christian influences were active here after the first third of the seventh century. The Irish Kilian, who is regarded as the Apostle of the country, and his companions Colman and Totnan lost their lives c. 689 in a conflict with the already Christian Duke Gozbert. Gozbert's son, Duke Heden II, who c. 700 extended his rule also to Thuringia, is said in a late tradition to have founded the Church of Our Lady of Würzburg on the Marienberg. In fact, Heden II exerted himself for the ecclesiastical structure in his lands. He tried to gain the Anglo-Saxon Willibrord for this task, giving him in 704 properties at Arnstadt, Mühlberg near Gotha, and Grossmonra in Thuringia and in 716 his family property of Hammelburg in the Saalegau of the Main area for the purpose of founding a monastery. Apparently Willibrord deputed some Anglo-Saxon helpers to go to Thuringia in 715–719, when the Frisian mission-field was closed to him by the Frisian Duke Radbod. However the monastery at Hammelburg did not materialize—a part of the property given there to the Anglo-Saxon was 778," W. Küther, Die Wüstung Hausen (1971), 136–166. Cf. also the contributions of Schlesinger, Wand, and Schwind in Althessen im Frankenreich, loc. cit.

---

[75] H. Büttner, "Amorbach und die Pirminlegende," AMrhKG 5 (1953), 102–107; id., "Christentum und Kirche zwischen Neckar und Main im 7. und frühen 8. Jh.," St. Bonifatius (Fulda 1954), 363–387; id., "Fränkische Herrschaft und frühes Christentum im mittleren Neckargebiet," 22. Veröffentlichung des Hist. Vereins Heilbronn (1957), 7–15; id., Die Mainlande um Aschaffenburg, 111–112; id., "Das Bistum Worms und der Neckarraum während des Früh- und Hochmittelalters," AMrhKG 10 (1958), 9–38; id., Mission und Kirchenorganisation des Frankenreiches, p. 458. Büttner stresses that the earliest church organization on the Rhine, Neckar, and Main was very closely connected with the Frankish fisci.

[76] The beginnings of Gengenbach are said to extend back to c. 727: H. Jaenichen, "Warin, Ruthard und Scrot," Zschr. für Württemberg. Landesgesch. 14 (1955), 327–384. In the period of the powerful Alemannian duchy influences from Alsace were not, in my opinion, of very great importance.

turned over to the abbey of Echternach. In the March of Hammelburg and in Schweinfurt the abbey of Weissenburg also had possessions, which are first attested by the Weissenburg land record, drawn up after the middle of the ninth century. Whether these properties were presented by Heden II to the South Frankish abbey and were included in a missionary effort of Weissenburg is doubtful, according to the more recent studies. The tradition of the founding of the monastery of Saint Peter at Erfurt by Weissenburg is to be rejected as a fabrication.[77] On the contrary, there seem to have been relations between Heden II and Mainz. The legendary tradition that Bilichild, the foundress of a convent of Altmünster, established at Mainz around or shortly before 700, was a blood relative of the Würzburg ducal family is supported by the endowment of the abbey in the vicinity of Würzburg.[78] The oldest network of churches in the Main area was closely connected with the fiscal organization, as the endowment of the bishopric founded by Boniface through the agency of the Mayor Carloman shows. It was probably completed under Charles Martel after the breakup of the Main-Thuringian Duchy c. 719.

When Winfrid-Boniface took up his activity in Hesse and Thuringia on the other side of the forest, there were already old bases of the mission in these two districts and on the Main. The evangelization of the Frankish strip on the right bank of the Rhine, Alemannia, and Bavaria was completed. The German mission had grown out of the ecclesiastical restoration, which had achieved its first successes on the Rhine in the sixth century, then in the Burgundian–Alemannian–Raetian frontier zone at the end of the sixth and beginning of the seventh centuries, and finally in the North Gallic-Frankish territory in the first and second thirds of the seventh century. But its great triumphs are due extensively to the Luxeuil monasticism, which renewed the missionary impulse and was active both on the North Gallic-Frankish front and in the sphere of the South German tribes.

---

[77] H. Büttner, Frühes fränkisches Christentum am Mittelrhein, 43–49 (there also influences from Reims); id., Christentum und Kirche zwischen Neckar und Main, 373–375; id., Die Mainlande um Aschaffenburg, pp. 111ff.; id., Fränkische Herrschaft, 9ff.; id., Mission und Kirchenorganisation des Frankenreiches, pp. 458ff.; F. Prinz, op. cit., 234–236, 238–241; J. Dienemann, Der Kult des hl. Kilian im 8. und 9. Jh. (Würzburg 1955). Patze–Schlesinger, Gesch. Thüringens I, 338–344; M. Werner, "Die Gründungstradition des Erfurter Petersklosters," Vorträge und Forschungen, Sonderband 12 (1973).

[78] H. Büttner, Frühes fränkisches Christentum am Mittelrhein. 50; id., Die Mainlande um Aschaffenburg, 113; E. Ewig, "Die ältesten Mainzer Bischofsgräber," Universitas 2, Festschrift Bischof A. Stohr (1960), 23; id., "Die ältesten Mainzer Patrozinien und die Frühgeschichte des Bistums Mainz," Das erste Jahrtausend. Kunst und Kultur im werdenden Abendland an Rhein und Ruhr I (Düsseldorf 1962); 125–127; F. Prinz, op. cit., 188ff.

The Merovingian Kings did not employ compulsion for the mission, but probably encouraged the ecclesiastical restoration and mission directly and indirectly. Thus Theuderic I brought Aquitanians to Austrasian Francia in order again to fill up the thinned ranks of the clergy there. Thus Theudebert II established Columban and his companions on the Lakes of Zurich and Constance, and Dagobert I summoned monks of Luxeuil to the North Gallic-Frankish country. The clerics and monks active in the mission obtained the royal protection and a material support that was occasionally very considerable, as the founding of the abbey of Saint-Amand shows. The distant possessions on the Rhine of the churches within Gaul hence probably go back in part to the use of these churches in restoration and mission. From it one can infer with the necessary caution to a sharing by the churches of Reims and Châlons, of Trier, Metz, and Verdun, in the work of rebuilding on the Rhine.

The royal encouragement operated indirectly in such a way that the mission could begin, and usually had begun, near the center of royal government: near the royal residences, the Roman and Merovingian fortifications, and the great fiscal manors, where churches were erected early for the needs of the court and of the Frankish garrisons and administration, and where the protection of the Merovingian officials was most effective. The decay of the Merovingian royal authority since the second third of the seventh century fundamentally changed nothing in this situation, since the dukes were Christian and in many respects could assume the functions of the crown in regard to Christianity and Church. True, they did not have the right to found new bishoprics.[79] In practice conflicts often resulted when the missionaries were regarded at the same time as political emissaries of the Franks or when they intransigently upheld canon law and ecclesiastical morality vis-à-vis a still rudis christianitas. To what extent the mission work suffered wrongs from case to case is difficult to determine.

In the city residences of kings and dukes and the fortresses there were still Romance Christian groups both on the Rhine and east of the Iller and south of the Danube, which had survived the wanderings of the peoples. On the Rhine, where the ecclesiastical restoration began as early as the sixth century, they supplied a powerful support for the work of construction, especially since the Aquitanian Gallic clerics were not seen by them as foreigners. But occasionally reactions against the helpers from the West and South appeared among the German Frankish population. The Raetian and Norican Romance peoples seem to have taken a more reserved stand toward the episcopi Galliarum and their helpers, perhaps also toward the Luxeuil monks of the seventh century, even if the opposition may have been at times overstressed by Prinz. Finally, at Regensburg and Salzburg the churches for which a Roman continuity is assumed became the germ cells of the new bishopric. As Prinz himself emphasizes, the Bavarian dukes in general must have maintained good relations with the indigenous Romania. The symbiosis, present from the beginning in the areas to the left of the Rhine and south of the Danube must, in any event, on the whole have facilitated the conversion of the Franks, Alemanni, and Bavarians who settled there.

---

[79] After the death of Dagobert I (638) no more bishoprics were established in the Merovingian Kingdom up to Boniface. On the other hand, the dukes of Alsace in the extending of their domination to the Swiss Jura, had the bishopric of Basel, only recently founded, given up and united the territory of Basel with Strasbourg. Constance developed in the period of the de facto vacancy of the throne into a national Alemannian see, by absorbing the entire Alemannian mission area and thereby became one of the largest dioceses of the Middle Ages. A plan of the Bavarian Duke Theodo of 716 for the ecclesiastical organization of his country could, characteristically, not be implemented. It remains historically significant in so far as then, for the first time, the effort was made in the Frankish sphere of influence to call upon the Pope for the founding of bishoprics.

On the Rhine line from Cologne to Worms the work of construction must always have lain in the hands of the bishops, where the episcopal organization, despite gaps in the lists of Rhenish bishops, had not entirely collapsed or could soon be rebuilt with the aid of Aquitanian and inner Gallic clergy. In this connection it was surely of importance that the outside helpers themselves were either clerics or, as monks of the older type, could be the more readily incorporated into the episcopal organization. The oldest churches were always subject to the bishop or to the abbots of the old basilicas dependent on the bishop, and in a few cases also to the King. The proprietary churches of the landowners only joined the others in the phase of completion. Monasteries of the Luxeuil type were likewise founded only in this second phase and developed especially in the arable areas of the Ardennes (=Eifel) and Vosges (=Hardt). They acquired a greater importance for the structure of the dioceses only in the sphere of the sees of Maastricht–Liège, Speyer, and Strasbourg, where they had a greater share in the real work of conversion.

In clear contrast to the Rhine zone in this respect were the North Gallic-Frankish and the Alemannian mission areas, where the sees of Thérouanne and Constance appeared for a long time as "poor relatives" as compared with abbeys such as Saint-Omer (Sithiu) and Sankt Gallen or Reichenau respectively, or the abbey of Saint-Vaast of Arras which formed a powerful opposite pole to the episcopal city of Cambrai. Finally, Bavaria represented a third zone, where the episcopal churches themselves first developed out of monastic beginnings. On the other hand, it can hardly be misunderstood that the stronger missionary dynamism in the seventh century lay in districts dominated by or at least strongly stamped by monasticism.

Thus it is implicitly said that the spread of Christianity is to be understood not only as an ecclesiastical-political-organization procedure, even if the organizational procedures can be seen the best. Of the motives of the conversion, of the spirit and methods of the mission, which were at least partly aimed at it, the sources unfortunately give only a very inadequate picture.[80] In the foreground often stood the tests of the power of the Christian God and of his preachers. Procédés simples et violents, such as the destruction of pagan sanctuaries and cult objects, sprang in general not from sheer fanaticism but were intended to display the powerlessness of the gods ad oculos. The positive counterpart to this was the miracles of the saints. But the prouesses ascétiques not only of the monks of Columban but also of the older hermits, such as Wulfilaich, also made a great impression. Also in keeping with the genuine Christian spirit were the works of mercy, including the redemption of captives. Spiritual instruction was apparently very strongly required by Caesarius of Arles.

In the conversion doubtless faith (profession) and cult stood in the foreground, if the two cannot be so sharply distinguished in the Christian sphere from ethics and morals, as Kuhn does this.[81] In the language of the Fathers pietas was, however, very strongly related to clementia and misericordia. In the Merovingian Frankish Kingdom there was no total absence of striking testimonies of genuine love of neighbor and of enemies. Furthermore, the Church also considered the protection of the defenseless and oppressed, of underage children and of foreigners, as its special task. But on the whole there still prevailed a formal understanding of the Christian religion, which led to an overemphasis of cult and rite as opposed to moral principles. Nothing is perhaps more characteristic of this religious formalism than the indulgence which the Merovingians allotted without exception to their godchildren in the family feuds that otherwise could have led to complete annihilation. The cultic bond woven by sponsorships was inviolable, stronger than all bonds of blood. In the same context belongs the careful regard for the ecclesiastical right of asylum, which could be circumvented only by stratagem. On the other hand, the vital religious impulses of this piety must also not be overlooked. In the strict observance of cultic-ritual prescriptions was expressed a genuine fear of God, but in this way one might occasionally try to outwit God. For the expiation of crimes committed, people were prepared for great physical exertions and material sacrifices. Numerous pilgrimages, foundations of new churches, and donations attest to this readiness. The often extravagant adornment of altars, saints' tombs, and churches is an eloquent expression of the religious sentiment of this age.

---

[80] Cf. on this F. Graus, Volk, Herrscher und Heiliger im Reich der Merowinger (Prague 1965); id., Sozialgesch. Aspekte (as in footnote 52); especially G. Tessien, Conversion de Clovis, 183–187 (see survey of literature for this chapter).

[81] H. Kuhn, "Das Fortleben germanischen Heidentums nach der Christianisierung," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La Conversione al cristianesimo, 743–757.

To men of this type of mind the saints had to appear as helpers rather than as models.[82] A change of this sort was under way from the end of the fourth century: since the cult of relics gradually covered up the cult of the saints as understood more symbolically and theologically in the early period. German ideas expedited this process. Among the oldest saints honored in Gaul were Mary, the Apostles or the Princes of the Apostles, the Ambrosian martyrs, the protomartyr Stephen, Maurice (Gaul), Vincent (Spain), and Lawrence (Rome), as well as the great Gallic Bishops Hilary of Poitiers, Martin of Tours, Germanus of Auxerre, and Lupus of Troyes. In the early sixth century Peter was regarded as the foundation of the Catholic Church and symbol of its unity. But Peter was buried in Rome. Martin and Hilary acted more directly on Clovis: they were favorable to him in the Gothic war and he himself rescued their sanctuaries from the Goths. They remained the patrons of the Merovingians, of their Kingdom and their Church. Alongside them came in the sixth and seventh centuries the saints of the royal cities: Remigius of Reims, Médard of Soissons, Denis of Paris, and finally probably also Gereon of Cologne. Decisive weight was carried by the presence of the holy corpse in the royal city, in the royal burial basilica, or in one of the great episcopal cities of Francia. In Neustria and Burgundy the basilicas of celebrated saints—ubi ipse sanctus corpore requiescit—obtained from Queen Bathildis soon after the middle of the seventh century special privileges with their proper immunity. The individualization of the cult of the saints affected also the cult of Mary, although it was not connected with relics. Mary, who in the Early Church had been regarded as a symbol of the Church, became in the seventh century the patroness of many newly founded convents of nuns. The cult of Peter and of the other Apostles remained alive in the episcopate in the sixth century; in the seventh century it was borne to wider circles, not least of all by monks of Luxeuil.

It was in accord with the thinking of early medieval society that the canon law that was in a closer relationship to ritus became earlier and more frequently prominent than the Christian moral law. In the course of the sixth century the Kings gradually also accepted ecclesiastical rules into their capitularies. To be mentioned would be, among others, the already referred to prohibition of idolatry and sacrificial meals by Childebert I (c. 533), the prescription of fasting by Guntram, the command to sanctify Sunday by Guntram (588) and Childebert II (596), the prohibition of marriage between close relatives by Childebert II and of the marriage of nuns by Clothar II (614), as well as enactments on the law of asylum. The Lex Salica, compiled under Clovis, was still hardly touched by a Christian spirit, but the case was different with the Lex Ribuaria, drawn up in the first half of the seventh century. In it is found for the first time the later often quoted legal proposition, "Ecclesia vivit lege Romana," with which was expressed the recognition of a special ecclesiastical body of law. The Lex Ribuaria also received the legislation of Clothar II and Dagobert I, including the prescriptions which extensively subordinated to the Church's patronage freed men who had not belonged to the crown. Still stronger was the ecclesiastical influence in the Lex Alamannorum and the Lex Baiuvariorum, whose traditional compilations go back to the 720s and 740s. A great part of the royal decrees—wergeld of clerics, sanctification of Sunday, marriage of blood relatives, law of asylum, ecclesiastical patronage of freedmen—was accepted into these laws.[83] In them the bishop is contrasted with the clergy by a special wergeld, the oath is partially christianized, excommunication is added to the secular penalty for especially heinous crimes, such as parricide. It is difficult to determine the Christian influence on the spirit of the legal norms in the popular laws.[84] Christian legal thought is manifested in general only in an already formally Christian environment, that is, after the conclusion of the conversion in the stricter sense. In this later phase people were more energetic in abolishing pagan customs. This is more clearly expressed in the late seventh and early eighth centuries in the change of burial rites: in the giving up of depositing objects in graves and of interment in rows of graves, in the transfer of the cemetery to the parish church.

---

[82] On what follows: E. Ewig, "Die Kathedralpatroninien im römischen und fränkischen Gallien," HJ 79 (1960), 1–61; id., "Der Petrus-und Apostelkult im spätrömischen und fränkischen Gallien," ZKG 71 (1960), 215–251; id., "Le culte de St. Martin à l'époque franque," RHEF (1962), 1–32.

The christianization of State and society, running parallel to evangelization, began at the earliest and most clearly with the kingship.[85] Clovis at his baptism had had to renounce the divine origin of his family—sola nobilitate contentus, as Avitus of Vienne put it. The German ideas of a special royal healing power were not thereby lost. And the ancient forms of lifting up and installing the King did not change. The change began in the view of the ruler's calling: here a constant influence of Christian moral principles is first to be recognized. Already Remigius of Reims had impressed on Clovis the protection of the unarmed and the oppressed, of widows and orphans, in a simple transfer of episcopal duties to the King. He inaugurated the series of bishops who admonished the Kings to maintain iustitia in the sense of aequitas, to cultivate pietas in the sense of the personal fear of God as care for the Church and protection of the needy. In the liturgy of the seventh century the King took the place of the Emperor, the Frankish took the place of the Roman name. As special task of the ruler appeared here the maintenance of external peace, especially in regard to pagans. In the seventh century the King was represented as God's vicar in the government of the world, and to him was even attributed the function of conferring the episcopal function. Already there occurred references to the Old Testament kingship. Clothar II was the first Frankish King to be compared to David. In the early eighth century Dagobert I was designated in retrospect as Solomon, King of Peace.

---

[83] Many a conflict still flared up over the ecclesiastical law of marriage between missionaries of the seventh and early eighth centuries (Kilian, Corbinian) and the already converted dukes on the right side of the Rhine.

[84] J. Imbart, "L'influence du christianisme sur la legislation des peuples francs et germains," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al cristianesimo, 365–396; G. Vismara, "Cristianesimo e legislazione germaniche. Leggi langobarde, alamanne e bavare," ibid., 397–467.

[85] E. Ewig, "Zum christlichen Königsgedanken im Frühmittelalter," Vorträge und Forschungen, ed. T. Mayer, III (Lindau–Constance 1956), 19–24.

Thereby was struck a new note, which was attentively listened to. Many clues show that in the period from c. 585 to 638 a new stage had been reached in the christianization of State and society: the boundaries between national councils and assemblies of magnates became blurred, Germans entered the episcopate in greater numbers, the Luxeuil monasticism radiated to the kingship and aristocracy of Francia, ecclesiastical decrees gradually found entry into royal and popular law. The development as such did not stop, but the organizing power of the Kingdom disappeared as a consequence of the hopeless decadence of the Merovingian Dynasty, which since 680 was clear to the whole world. Only the Carolingians took up the threads and tied them again.

CHAPTER 35

The East Germans and Catholicism:

The Conversion of the Sueves and Visigoths of Spain to Catholicism and the Second Flowering of Christian Antiquity in the Spanish Visigothic National Church

The West stood under the aegis of the East Germans, especially the Goths, for scarcely a century—from the extinction of the Theodosian Dynasty in 455 to the beginning of Justinian's wars of reconquest in

533. In the dissolution of the Imperium in the West the Vandals under Gaiseric (428–477), who probably was the first ruler to found a sovereign regnum, played a significant but ephemeral role. In contrast to the Vandals, the Goths gradually grew into the Imperium, although as Arians they remained separate from the Romans. Their kings took over the legacy of the great army commanders who had governed the Hesperium Regnum since the death of Theodosius I. Visigoths and Ostrogoths collaborated in this. The Visigoths had been settled, after they had broken out of the Balkans, as foederati in southwest Gaul (Aquitania II, province of Bordeaux) in 418 and there they established the Kingdom of Toulouse, which expanded over southern Gaul and northern Spain. The Ostrogoths invaded Italy in 489. From the Visigoth Euric (466–484), the great King in Gaul and Spain, hegemony passed to the Ostrogoth Theodoric (488/493–526), the imperial patricius and great King in Italy.

Politically and in Church history the Kingdom of the Vandals, whose Kings from Gaiseric to Thrasamund engaged in an active arianization, occupied a special position. Among the Vandals there occurred a real persecution of Catholics, which it is true did not lead to the ruin of the Afro-Roman Church but considerably impaired the importance and significance of that Church within the whole of Christianity.[1] In the two Gothic Kingdoms and that of the Sueves in Spain which was under Gothic influence and that of the Burgundians in Gaul, the Catholic Church was spared trials of this severity. The structure of these regna was arranged in a double pattern. The dual construction was based on the Late Roman separation of military and civilian and made possible an on the whole peaceful and at times even friendly coexistence of Arian Germans (military) and Catholic Romans (civilian). Of course, it constituted an impediment for the German-Roman symbiosis, although the Goths opened themselves in a greater degree to Graeco-Roman culture than did the Franks. For the most powerful bond of community was not education but faith.

So long as the Arian Germans lived as foederati inside the Imperium, their relations to the Catholic Church were not problematic, since the Church, as an imperial institution, was withdrawn from their competence.[2] True, there could be encroachments and plundering but not to the extent of a conflict of fundamental importance. Such a conflict first occurred when Euric dissociated the Visigothic Kingdom from the Imperium, by which the connection of the Catholic Church of his dominions with Rome and the Church of the Empire was severed, and the making of new appointments to vacant sees in his kingdom was thwarted. These restrictive measures crippled ecclesiastical life and naturally were felt as persecution, but they sprang from a new situation and had at bottom only a political, not a religious-ecclesiastical background. Euric's son and successor, Alaric II, replaced them with a positive policy of integration. The Lex Romana Visigothorum, also called Breviarium Alaricianum, which was published under him in 506, contained the essential decisions of imperial law which regulated the life of the Church in the Imperium and were now sanctioned as Gothic royal law for the Romans. The Synod of Agde, which met in the same year under the presidency of Bishop Caesarius of Arles, inaugurated, five years before the Franco-Gallic Synod of Orléans and eleven years before the Burgundo-Gallic Synod of Yenne (Epaon), the series of early medieval "national councils," which were to meet in the future on the basis of a regnum at the order or at least with the assent of the German king of the moment. Ecclesiastical affairs in the Visigothic Kingdom became normal, and the Catholic Romans put up with a general, but in extent not more carefully defined, supremacy of the Arian King over the Church.

---

[1] Cf. chap. 38. Here let us refer once more to the two basic works on the history of the Vandals: L. Schmidt, Gesch. der Wandalen (Munich 1942), and especially C. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique (Paris 1950).

[2] For the statements on Euric and Alaric II, cf. K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Sueven, 27ff. (new view with justified correction of views hitherto current).

Alaric's solution was not at first effective in the Gothic area, since the Frankish war of 507–511 put the bases of life of the Visigoths in question. The Kingdom of Toulouse perished and the strongholds of the nation in western Aquitania were lost to the Franks along with the capital. The great Ostrogothic King Theodoric saved his Visigothic kinsfolk from destruction, but annexed Provence to the area under direct Ostrogothic rule and at the same time claimed the government in the interest of his Visigothic grandson, Amalaric, son of Alaric II. Under Ostrogothic protection the Visigothic capital was first transferred to Narbonne.

Not only as King of the Ostrogoths but also at the same time as patricius in the service of the Emperor, Theodoric was ruler of Italy. His position in relation to the Roman Church as well as to the Catholic Church of the West in general was therefore not comprehensible in the national-church categories. Even if the Amal was said to have exercised an influence over the Roman Church in far broader measure than was previously believed, in fact his domination was to the advantage of the ecclesiastical autonomy of Rome vis-à-vis the Emperor.[3] In the entire

---

[3] Basic for the prevailing view is G. Pfeilschifter, Der Ostgotenkönig Theoderich der Grosse und die katholische Kirche (Münster 1896). Correcting details in W. Ensslin, Theoderich

Gothic area the relations of the Gallic-Spanish churches to Rome were again established, as the special mandate of Pope Hormisdas to the Bishop of Elne (province of Baetica) and the grant of papal vicariates to Arles for Gaul and Spain in 514 and to Seville for Baetica and Lusitania in 521 show. In Spain under Gothic rule the Church resumed its synodal activity of the old type: in the form of provincial, not of national councils.[4]

Thus the rule of Theodoric the Great in the Gothic Kingdoms of the West meant for the Church basically a return to the situation of late Roman times. There was at first no change in this in the Visigothic sphere even after Theodoric's death. For when the restoration policy of Justinian spread to Italy, the intermedio ostrogodo in the Visigothic Kingdom still continued under Kings Theudis (531–548) and Theudegisil (548–49). Theudis was able to stop new Frankish attacks in 531 and 541. Gothic rule was maintained in Narbonensis I (Septimania without Toulouse) and in Spain. In Spain, the Goths could gradually spread beyond Tarraconensis and Carthaginiensis into Baetica (province of Seville).

The future of the Visigoths was threatened less by external dangers than by inner conflicts since Theudis and Theudegisil did not succeed in establishing a new dynastic legitimacy. The power struggles of the great noble factions threatened at the end of the intermedio ostrogodo to lead to total chaos. Against King Agila who had been elevated to the throne in 459, a revolt was led by Athanagild, who sought help from the Emperor. Athanagild established himself in place of Agila, but he had to put up with the fact that the Byzantines, who had landed in southern Spain in 552, occupied parts of Baetica and Carthaginiensis and organized them as an imperial province. Nevertheless, the reign of Athanagild (551/554–567) meant a new start in the history of the Visigoths. Under this ruler Toledo, situated on the southern edge of the Gothic area of settlement in Spain (Castile–León), which had been the royal residence under Theudis, became clearly more prominent as the capital. The real refounder of the Spanish Visigothic Kingdom of Toledo, however, was Athanagild's successor, Leovigild (568/572–586).

---

der Grosse (Munich 1947). New but not yet thoroughly discussed view: G. P. Picotti, "Osservazioni su alcuni punti della politica religiosa di Teoderico," Settimane di studio . . . III. I Goti in Occidente (Spoleto 1956), 173–226; cf. also the survey of the literature in Haendler, Literaturübersicht 13, 3. Even if Theodoric had interfered far more strongly in the business of the Church than has thus far been held, there still remained a considerable distinction between the Ostrogothic and the East Roman Byzantine domination.

[4] On the impact of Theodoric's rule on the ecclesiastical situation in the Visigothic Kingdom, cf. K. Schäferdiek, op. cit., 68ff.

Beside the Visigothic Kingdom there existed in Spain a second German Kingdom of the Sueves, which embraced the weakly romanized province of Gallaecia (Braga) and parts of northern Lusitania.[5] The Sueves had become Arians in the fifth century under Gothic influence, but almost no reports concerning the history of their kingdom are extant for the last third of the fifth and the first half of the sixth centuries. The "sole genuine document" from this period, a letter of Pope Vigilius to the Metropolitan of Braga from 538, makes known that the Catholic Church was not then substantially impeded under Suevic rule, but opposed not only Suevic Arianism but also the Priscillianism which had been disseminated in wide circles of the province. From later sources it must be inferred that even paganism was not yet ended among the rural population of Galicia. A change in the Church history of the Suevic Kingdom began when King Chararic c. 550–555, under the influence of miracles at the tomb of Martin of Tours, passed over to Catholicism and around the same time the Pannonian monk Martin, who had traveled to Spain, established the new mission center of Dumio near Braga. Martin of Dumio, who soon became Metropolitan of Braga (after 561–580), successfully united with the Suevic mission the fight against Priscillianism and pagan remains. He established the Catholic national Church of the Suevic Kingdom. Rightly was he celebrated even in his own day as the Apostle of the Sueves, even if at his death Arianism had not yet been completely extirpated.

Martin of Dumio's work of conversion did not radiate directly to the Visigoths. But the dualist structure of State and society, which had been the characteristic mark of the Arian German Kingdoms, had also already become an anachronism among the Visigoths. The cultural romanization of the Goths had already begun in the Kingdom of Toulouse. Marriages occurred among the magnates of both groups of people, although they were forbidden by law. King Theudis himself married a lady of the Hispano-Roman senatorial aristocracy. Although Goths and Romans still lived according to different laws, Theudis enacted laws which were valid for both peoples. Gothic aristocrats and military men, especially in the southern parts of the kingdom, came into intimate contact with Roman magnates, who adhered politically to the Gothic Kingdom.[6] Ecclesiastical and cultural contacts with Latin Africa seem to have simulated Catholic controversial theology in the southern province around the mid-century and thereby released a missionary impulse which had an impact on the Spanish Gothic upper class.[7] Important Goths were converted to Catholicism and rose in the Catholic hierarchy.[8] Thereby new problems were created for the kings.

---

[5] On the history of the Spanish Sueves now see K. Schäferdiek, op. cit., 120ff. and 247ff. (there also the sources and literature). Schäferdiek's presentation retains its value even in comparison with Thompson (Goths in Spain).

[6] To these circles belonged the family of Leander and Isidore of Seville, whose father Severian left his native city of Cartagena when it was occupied by the imperial forces and migrated to the area that remained Gothic.

In the first decade of his reign Leovigild had to consolidate his kingdom and his own authority against internal and external enemies. He suppressed the unruly aristocracy in northern Spain and gained successes against Sueves and Byzantines. He assured the future of the dynasty as early as 573 by elevating his sons Hermenegild and Recared to consortes regni, probably following the imperial model. He gave the kingship new prestige by receiving imperial insignia and by his own coinage. Probably in 478–580 he tackled the interior reconstruction of the Kingdom. The prohibition of marriage between Goths and Romans, already much violated in practice, was abolished. In addition, Leovigild took the decisive step toward the unity of the Kingdom: he had the Gothic law of Euric revised and made the Codex revisus the law of the Kingdom.[9]

If the imitatio imperii was the signum of Leovigild's reign, it benefited the reputation of the Goths, whose kingdom he enlarged, whose law he made the basis of the beginnings of Gothic Spanish unity. In the course of this work there was posed also the question of the ecclesiastical and religious unity of the Kingdom of Toledo, but it seems only to have been raised by a tragedy in the royal family.

In 579 Leovigild made his oldest son Hermenegild regent of the Gothic territories of Baetica with his seat at Seville. Hermenegild had as his wife the Frankish Princess Ingundis, who, despite her very young age, had clung at the court of Toledo to the Catholic faith of the Franks in opposition to the powerful pressure of Queen Goswintha, her own grandmother.[10] In Seville Hermenegild himself now converted to

---

[7] J. Fontaine, Conversion et culture, 96ff. cf. also S. A. Thompson Goths in Spain, 37–38.

[8] Known by name are Masona of Mérida and John of Biclar, both of whom came from Gothic Lusitania.

[9] Thus Stroheker (Leovigild) and, following him, Schäferdiek. Thompson (Goths in Spain) and Sánchez-Albornoz (Pervivencia y crisis) think otherwise, holding to the traditional view that the unity of the kingdom was first established by Chindaswinth and Recceswinth. According to Thompson, Recared introduced the development of unity of law. The discussion is complicated by the opposing thesis of García Gallo, again taken up in modified form by Alvaro d'Ors, that the Codex Euricianus and the Breviarium Alaricianum were already national laws. Cf. also K. Schäferdiek, op. cit., 15, note 35, and C. Sánchez-Albornoz, op. cit., 137ff.; finally, D. Claude, Gentile und territoriale Staatsideen, 29.

[10] Ingundis was the daughter of the Austrasian King Sigibert I and of his wife Brunhildis; through her mother Brunhildis was a granddaughter of the Visigothic King Athanagild and of his wife Goswintha, whom Leovigild married after the death of Catholicism under the influence of the Metropolitan Leander. The young prince thereby brought on a conflict with his father, who at this time certainly had an entirely different idea about the solution of the religious question.[11] A quarrel broke out. Hermenegild sought help from the Byzantines and Sueves but he could not hold out against his father. Leovigild conquered Seville and Córdoba in 584, and the son fell into his hands. Hermenegild could not be induced to recant. He was killed in Tarragona on Easter of 585 and the perpetrator remained unpunished.

It was in accord with the policy followed by him that Leovigild sought to realize ecclesiastical unity also on the basis of the "Gothic religion," but in doing so he made certain accommodations to Catholic views. In 580 the King convoked an Arian national Council to Toledo, which facilitated the conversion of Catholics by the abolition of the rebaptism hitherto practiced in conversions, something regarded as especially scandalous by the Catholics. Furthermore, Leovigild tried to efface the differences between Arianism and Orthodoxy by the accepting of the cult of Spanish saints and by his saying that he recognized the identity of substance of Christ with the Father, even if this expression must not be understood as an official formula of mediation. In an effort to achieve his goal, the King was not sparing in rewards but he also did not renounce external methods of pressure, such as exile and confiscation. However, there is no word of a bloody persecution. Naturally, the Goths who had accepted the Catholic faith and had obtained positions of leadership in the Catholic Church were exposed in a special degree to the King's pressure, such as the Metropolitan Masona of Mérida and Abbot John of Biclar. Also among the Sueves, whose kingdom he conquered in 585, Leovigild carried out an Arian reaction. The measures of compulsion, however, were by no means restricted to Catholic Germans. The goal of the ecclesiastical religious policy was also and especially the transductio Romanorum ad haeresim Arianam.[12]

Despite temporary successes, Leovigild did not achieve this goal. His

---

Athanagild in a second marriage. Goswintha was the stepmother of Hermenigild and Recared, who were born of Leovigild's first marriage.

[11] Intrigues of the grandmother Goswintha may have played a role but can hardly have been the sole cause of the conflict. That Leovigild's reforms were a homogeneous work is suggested by the parallels of his procedure in the implementation of the unity of law and faith. In both cases Gothic law and Gothic faith provided the bases of the policy of unity even if the King was prepared to include individual Roman elements. If Leovigild began with his reform of the law in 578, then he must have had definite ideas about his ecclesiastical policy as early as 578–580.

[12] Council of Toledo III, PL 84, 347. This definite witness of the sources speaks clearly against Thompson's hypothesis that Leovigild's ecclesiastical union was restricted only to German circles (Goths and Sueves).

son and successor, Recared (586–601), embraced the Catholic religion in 587, ten months after his accession, and thereby at the same time inaugurated the conversion of the Visigothic nation, which was solemnly proclaimed in 589 at the Third Council of Toledo, the first national Council of the Spanish Gothic Church. Here Recared appeared as a ruler in the succession of the Emperors Constantine and Marcian: renovans temporibus nostris antiquum principem Constantinum magnum sanctam synodum Nicaenam sua illustrasse praesentia, necnon et Marcianum christianissimum imperatorem, cuius instantia Chalcedonensis synodi decreta firmata sunt.[13] Thus did the assembled bishops acclaim him in accord with the imperial style and at the same time in actual insinuation as Apostle of the Goths: Cui a Deo aeternum meritum nisi vero catholico Reccaredo regi? . . . Ipse mereatur veraciter apostolicum meritum qui apostolicum implevit officium.[14]

The King eased the passage of the Goths to Catholicism by the fact that he accomplished the acceptance of the Arian clergy, including the bishops, into the Catholic clergy. Nevertheless, there was some resistance. Conspiracies of Arian groups in Lusitania, at court, and in Septimania were suppressed in 587–89. Whether an Arian reaction occurred later is uncertain.[15] But it has been noted that, of the eight Arian bishops who in 589 signed the acts of Toledo, four belonged to the Suevic area (Viséu, Porto, Tuy, Lugo) and, of the four Arian bishops of the Gothic area (Valencia, Tortosa, Barcelona, Palencia), only one (Palencia) had his seat in the heartland of Gothic settlement.[16] Accordingly, a part of the Gothic Arian clergy right in the Gothic heartland must have still held itself aloof in 589 and been gained only in the future. But even here there was no serious opposition. The Goths of the Castilian meseta gave up their burial customs in the early seventh century: along with Arianism there disappeared the last remnants of paganism.[17] In the Spanish literature of the early seventh century the

---

[13] "In our time renewing the ancient and revered Prince, Constantine the Great, as he enlightened the holy Synod of Nicaea by his presence, and also the most Christian Emperor Marcian, through whose stubborn exertions the decrees of Chalcedon were established" (Council of Toledo III, PL 84, 345).

[14] "To whom belongs eternal merit with God, if not to the truly Catholic King Recared? . . . He truly deserves the reward of an apostle who has fulfilled an apostolic function" (ibid.). Cf. E. Ewig, "Zum christlichen Königsgedanken," Vorträge und Forschungen 3, Das Königtum. Seine geistigen und rechtlichen Grundlagen (Lindau–Constance 1956), 29ff.

[15] The reign of King Witterich (603–610) would, according to the communis opinio, have stood under this sign. For the contrary: S. A. Thompson, Goths in Spain, 157ff.

[16] J. Fontaine, Conversion et culture, 123ff.; K. Schäferdiek, op. cit., 215ff. Schäferdiek is responsible for determining that Murila was Bishop of Palencia.

[17] There is still mention later of pagan customs. (Toledo XII of 681, Egica's decree of 693), but the geographical reference in these is not clear. Pagan customs could have

Arian controversy no longer played a role. From 633 the episcopate was recruited from the circles of the Gothic aristocracy.[18]

No source informs us about the motives for Recared's conversion. Hence the historian cannot throw light into the heart of the King and his Goths but only point to the concomitant circumstances and people: to the family tragedy of the royal house, which is said to have deeply affected Recared as mediator between father and brother,[19] to the probably superior theological formation of the Catholic episcopate, to the impressive personality of Leander of Seville and other prelates. For the rest, religious and political motives may have been inseparably joined in Recared, as in Clovis, but at the same time the conversion was the decisive step to the unification of Spain under Gothic leadership. In this perspective Recared completed not the religious but probably the political testament of his father in the ecclesiastical sphere. The work of unification was continued after Recared's death by Sisebut (612–621) and Swinthila (621–632), who expelled the last of the Byzantines from the peninsula, by Chindaswinth (642–652) and Reccesswinth (649/652–672), who, following Justinian's model, again stamped the Lex Visigothorum in a Christian sense and thereby created the most important legal work of their time in the Latin West. The anti-Jewish legislation of the kings was supposed also to serve the idea of unity but the episcopate partly opposed it and partly took a reserved stand. It cast a deep shadow over the Spanish Gothic Kingdom and ultimately only exacerbated the political crisis of the late seventh century. It had a parallel only in the Empire.

In his civitas regia of Toledo the orthodox King of the Visigoths could appear as successor of the Western Emperors[20]—a west, of course, which was restricted to the Iberian Peninsula and its Gallic appendage of Septimania. Toledo was the single royal city of the West which, like Constantinople, was also the ecclesiastical capital. In it from 589 met all the Spanish Gothic national councils. Like the imperial city on the Bosmaintained themselves in the Meseta, settled by the Goths, in connection with the Gothic customary law. The question whether a German customary law of the Gothic rural population continued into the Spanish Middle Ages is still controverted. Most recently Sánchez-Albornoz (Pervivencia y crisis) answers in the affirmative.

---

[18] S. A. Thompson, Goths in Spain, 289–292.

[19] According to Gregory of Tours (Hist. Fr. V, 38), Recared had assured his brother that he would not be "humiliated" if he surrendered to their father. The constraint to return to Arianism, which finally led to Hermenegild's violent death, was a violation of this promise. Recared apparently took this very hard and after his accession had the murderer of his brother executed also.

[20] J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville, 872; E. Ewig, "Zum christlichen Königsgedanken," Vorträge und Forschungen 3. Das Königtum. Seine geistigen und rechtlichen Grundlagen (Lindau–Constance 1956), 27ff., J. Lacarra, Iglesia visigoda, 358 and 376ff.

porus, Toledo had originally been only a simple episcopal city. Signs of an emancipaton from the older Metropolis, Cartagena (Carthago Nova), are first noticeable in 531. The Church of Toledo definitively gained metropolitan rank at the time when Cartagena was in the hands of the Byzantines. As the royal city, Toledo would in time outstrip the other metropolises of the kingdom, including Seville with its rich tradition. As early as 646 it was decreed that the neighboring bishops should annually make a visit ad limina to Toledo pro reverentia principis et regiae sedis honore vel metropolitani civitatis ipsius consolatione. From 656 the Metropolitan of Toledo directed the national councils, over which previously the metropolitans had presided alternately, according to the date of ordination or reputation. In 681 he obtained the right to approve candidates designated by the King in episcopal vacancies in the entire Kingdom, and in 683 it was enacted that King and Metropolitan of Toledo could summon, under pain of excommunication, every bishop to prescribed liturgical or judicial actions at Toledo.[21]

However, not the Metropolitan of Toledo but the King occupied the dominant position in the Spanish Gothic Church.[22] Recared had already claimed the right to fill episcopal sees, which his successors apparently exercised in a much broader scope than the other kings of the time—even before it was expressly fixed in 681 and was easily restricted by the participation of the Metropolitan of Toledo. Recared not only convoked the first national council, but he directed it, decided the agenda, and signed the acts. In 681 it was set down as a custom that the kings opened the council, made known in the Tomus regius the agenda they wanted, and then withdrew. If the decrees of the synod were to obtain validity in the national law, they needed sanction by a royal law in confirmatione concilii.

From the beginning the bishops were also involved in secular matters, but strictly in the framework of the program laid down by the ruler in the Tomus regius. As early as 589 secular magnates also attended the consultations; the presence of royal dignitaries became in the future the rule, and in 653 they acquired the right of participation in the discussions and of signing the acts. Finally the Councils of Toledo became in this way also national assemblies. They decisively stamped the Visigothic constitutional law, issued decrees on the election of the king, the rights of the crown, on high treason, on the legal status of the magnates. The bishops created a political ethics determined by the virtues of iustitia and pietas of late antiquity, objectified the royal domination into a royal function, and introduced the anointing of the king to strengthen the ruler's authority—first attested in 672. From 633 the episcopate took part, alongside the seniores Gothorum in the election of the king. Around the middle of the seventh century there appeared mixed ecclesiastical and secular commissions, which had to be consulted for the pardoning of rebels and in the publication of laws, and finally they became competent as a forum for political trials relating to the episcopate and the nobility. "Medieval" changes were thereby anticipated in the Gothic Kingdom of Toledo, otherwise still so strongly stamped by late antiquity.

---

[21] K. Schäferdiek, op. cit., 85; J. Lacarra, Iglesia visigoda, 376–378, S. A. Thompson, Goths in Spain, 196, 275–277, 288.

[22] S. A. Thompson, op. cit., 275ff.; J. Lacarra, op. cit., 355ff., 358, 364–366, 369ff. On the development of the conciliar custom, H. H. Anton. König und Reichskonzilien, 259ff. Objectification of the function and ethics of the ruler, ibid. 269ff.

The Spanish Gothic national Church was in itself much more compact and more strongly centralized than the Merovingian. The Itio in partes, which is characteristic of the entire western development in the sixth and seventh centuries, was apparent in Spain before the passage of the Goths to Catholicism—at the death of Theodoric the Great in 526, at which the vicariate for Gaul and Spain, granted in 514 to Caesarius of Arles, de facto ended. The canonical collections, which constituted the basis for the development of canon law in Gothic Spain make this break clear.[23] The relations with Gaul came to a close, those with Africa moved to the foreground. As in the other countries of the West, Justinian's ecclesiastical policy aroused lively opposition in Spain also, but the Spanish attitude in the controversy over the Three Chapters was more strongly determined by the African polemic than elsewhere. The Spanish Church never recognized the Fifth Ecumenical Council, Constantinople II of 553.[24] The connection with Rome lost in intensity on the basis of the general historical development, but the tensions between the Visigothic Kingdom and the Empire also reacted unfavorably on the relations of the Gothic national Church with the papacy. Add to this that the Spanish Gothic episcopate no longer attributed great importance to the support of Rome after the conversion of the Goths to Catholicism.

In 589 and 633 the Spanish Church acknowledged that papal synodal letters had the same authority as the ecumenical councils.[25] Isidore of Seville saw in the Roman Bishop the head of the Universal Church, whom everyone is bound to obey, independently of the personal qualities of the successor of Peter: . . . in nullo laeditur obsedientia nostra,

---

[23] K. Schäferdiek, 69–75; Fournier–Le Bras, 67–69.

[24] J. Madoz, Concilio de Calcedonia, 197ff.

[25] J. Lacarra, op. cit., 360ff., Lacarra offers the best survey of Roman-Spanish relations. Thompson's presentation is more schematic, Goths in Spain, 184ff., 240ff., 250, 279.

nisi praeceperit contra fidem.[26] The relations between Spain and Rome had, after a long suspension, been strengthened again under Gregory the Great, who was a personal friend of Leander of Seville and had also sent him the pallium, without however renewing the Vicariate of Seville. Recared had made known his conversion and that of his nation to Catholicism to Gregory as head of all the bishops. King Chintila (636–39) sent a votive offering to Saint Peter. True, Recared did not really hurry with his communication to the Pope: the delay may have been attributable to a mistrust on the King's part in regard to the Roman Bishop as a subject of the Emperor. Real ill-feeling resulted when in 638 Honorius I in a letter of reprimand sharply reproached the Spanish episcopate's all too great complaisance toward the perfidi, that is, probably the Jews. Braulio of Zaragoza replied in the name of the Spanish Gothic Church. He recognized the sollicitudo for the Universal Church as the prerogative and task of the Roman Bishop, but made it clearly understood that the Roman intervention had already been dealt with, since God had correspondingly enlightened King Chintila. Braulio, not without irony, joined with this the hint that the Pope must exercise supervision over other churches not frivolously but only after a thorough examination of the matter.

In the future the connection between Rome and Spain seems to have been almost completely broken. In the period after Isidore papal decretals were no longer found in Gothic Spanish canon law. The Popes, for their part, apparently did not induce the Spanish episcopate to support their position vis-à-vis Constantinople in the Monothelite Controversy. Contact was not renewed until Leo II communicated to the Gothic Spanish Church the decrees of the Sixth Ecumenical Council (Constantinople III of 680–81). Julian of Toledo, under whom the national primacy of the Church of Toledo was fully established, had the acts examined at provincial synods together with an Apologeticum fidei, which he had composed on his own. The decrees of Constantinople were received by the Spanish Church. However, Julian reacted in an unusually violent manner to a criticism of his Apologeticum, expressed only orally by Pope Benedict II, and had his answer, composed in a challenging form, read and approved at the Fifteenth Council of Toledo in 688. No break followed, because at Rome, where Benedict II had meanwhile died, no one took up the matter. The increasing gravity of the situation was to a great extent Julian's work, but the support which Julian found in the episcopate of the Visigothic Kingdom makes clear an estrangement between Spain and Rome. How far this estrangement went is difficult to say. The older view that the Church of Peter was the fundamental center of Christendom must not have been totally lost. For when the Muslims conquered the Visigothic Kingdom, the Primate Sindered of Toledo fled to Rome, where in 721 he signed the acts of a synod.[27]

---

[26] ". . . our duty of obedience is affected on no point except that he order something directly against the faith" (Ep. 6, 2 and 3: PL 83, 903). The obligation of obedience to the Pope as head of all members in the body of Christ is stressed by Isidore also in a letter to Bishop Eugene of Egara (Ep. 8, 2 and 3: PL 83, 908). The authenticity of this passage is of course disputed; cf. J. Lacarra, who accepts the authenticity (Iglesia visigoda, 361ff. and 362, footnote 19), as well as Y. Congar, who doubts it (L'ecclésiologie du haut moyen-âge [Paris 1968], 152, footnote 81). The letter to Eugene of Egara, however, contains no statement that would not also be covered by other witnesses from the period 589–638.

The inner structure of the Gothic Spanish Church was marked by an, on the whole, uninterrupted development on an Early Christian basis. Ecclesiastical immunity, the right of asylum, the jurisdiction and legal status of the clergy were more strongly determined by late antiquity than elsewhere. The economic independence of the parish churches and monasteries was in accord with the time. The proprietary church system spread to the Iberian Peninsula and included also the monasteries, but the foundations of the episcopal organization of the Early Church were only loosened by it, not convulsed. At the conversion of the Goths to Catholicism, the liturgy was enriched by the admission of the creed into the Mass iuxta orientalium partium morem at the order of King Recared. It received its characteristic formation in the seventh century through the collaboration of great bishops and abbots, who displayed an important literary activity and thereby also increased the self-consciousness of the Gothic Spanish Church. In the Pactum of Saint Fructuosus of Braga Gothic legal thought seems to have affected the relations between abbot and monk.

An early sign of the ties with home was the pride in the native saints, who from the late fourth century appeared beside Mary and the Apostles: Prudentius had celebrated the martyrs of Mérida, Córdoba, Tarragona, Barcelona, Gerona, Zaragoza, Alcalá, and Calahorra.[28] With Vincent of Zaragoza, who as the chief Spanish martyr found universal veneration even outside the Visigothic Kingdom alongside the Roman Lawrence and the Gallic Maurice, with Eulalia of Mérida, Justus and Pastor of Alcalá, Felix of Gerona, and many others, was later associated

---

[27] S. A. Thompson, op. cit., 250. Lacarra has overlooked this fact, which is not unessential for the evaluation of the attitude of the Gothic Church to Rome at the end of the Visigothic period.

[28] H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs (Brussels, 2nd ed. 1933), 364–365.

Leocadia, a saint of the royal city of Toledo.[29] Foreign cults were also admitted, especially that of Martin of Tours, the patron of the Apostles of the Sueves, Martin of Braga.[30]

Late Roman Spain was not rich in important ecclesiastical teachers, bishops, and abbots, but Visigothic Spain took the lead over other countries. After the confusion of the migrations, new life burst forth in the sixth century, often simulated by the influx of foreigners, especially of Easterners and Africans. In the first half of the sixth century Mérida had three eastern metropolitans. Justinian's restoration strengthened the Greek influence in the south of Lusitania, in Baetica, and in the territory of Cartagena, and it there survived the collapse of imperial rule. Very old relations existed between Spain and Africa. They were strengthened by two waves of immigration in the days of the Vandal King Hunneric (477–484) and the Moorish expansion toward the imperial province of Africa c. 570, which also brought abbots and their communities to Spain. Episcopal and monastic schools replaced from c. 500 the rhetorical schools that had disappeared. The oldest monastic school is demonstrable at Valencia. Justus of Urgel, who had come out of it, signed the acts of the Second Council of Toledo in 531, at which decrees were issued on the education of clerics. The school of San Martín de Asán was founded in 522 by the Italian Victorian. C. 560 arose a new intellectual center at Dumio in Galicia. Soon after, the African Donatus established the Monasterium Servitanum in the province of Cartagena; the Goth John, the abbey of Biclar in Tarraconesis. C. 600 there existed at Zaragoza the abbey of Santa Engracia; at Toledo, Agalí. Many bishops came from these monasteries. In the last fourth of the sixth century Leander of Seville, Severus of Málaga, Eutropius of Valencia, Maximus of Zaragoza, and John of Gerona (Biclar) represented the intellectual life of Spain. From Leander's school proceeded Isidore of Seville, the country's Doctor of the Church.

Isidore stands beside Augustine and Gregory as one of the great teachers of the Western Middle Ages. He was born soon after 550 and succeeded his brother Leander as Metropolitan of Seville (599–636). His importance does not lie in the originality of his thought but in his encyclopedic scholarship, which he displayed especially in his masterpiece, the Origines or Etymologiae. The Middle Ages derived from it, among other things, the system of the septem artes liberales. A number of other treatises dealt with individual fields of knowledge, such as grammar (Differentiae) and astronomy (De natura rerum). In the succession to Jerome and Rufinus, Isidore wrote a history of Christian literature (De viris illustribus) and a world chronicle, which he completed by a history of the Goths, Vandals, and Sueves. Not a few of his writings are devoted to exegesis. In the Synonyma Isidore appears as the father of the mystical theology of the Middle Ages. The Sentences, a manual of Christian doctrine involving also the lay world inaugurated the medieval Sentence-literature. The treatise De ecclesiasticis officiis and the Regula monachorum deal with ecclesiastical life; the apologetical work, De fide catholica, with the Jewish question, so acute in the Visigothic Kingdom.

---

[29] The Church of Saint Leocadia at Toledo was built by King Sisebut (612–621): S. A. Thompson, op. cit., 162ff.

[30] P. David, Études historiques, 225–242.

The work of the Bishop of Seville was strongly engraved by antiquity—but of course by an already benumbed antiquity. Hellenistic natural science was known to Isidore only in fragments, philosophy only in condensations in the form of manuals. Thus, for Isidore, grammar with its methods (Differentiae, Synonyma, Etymolograe) became the basis not only of the trivium but also of the quadrivium, in fact of philosophy and theology. For him the "ancients" were no longer the classical writers but their late commentators who stood like a filter between him and the great authors of antiquity. Of course, through this filter Isidore also received the spirit of antiquity and made it so much his own that many regarded him as the last representative of the dying world. Through the Spanish Doctor of the Church Baetica became the "Conservatoire de l'érudition grammaticale antique" (Fontaine) and in this function replaced Roman Africa, on which Isidore's scholarship was essentially based, which probably supplied him with no slight number of Greek works in Latin translation. Next to Africa, only Italy can be mentioned as mediator, but at a great distance. By means of Rome, which under Gregory the Great maintained lively relations with Spain, some codices may have reached Spain, among them the later writings of Cassiodorus, Isidore's kindred-spirit, which the Bishop of Seville included in his work.

With his copious work, Isidore intended to serve not only scholarship. In the Synonyma he speaks to us as the mystic; in the Historia Gothorum, as the Spanish patriot. As Metropolitan of Seville Isidore was also preoccupied with the great questions of Church and Regnum. The Fourth Council of Toledo in 633 and the definitions of kingship and law in the Lex Visigothorum bear the mark of his spirit. Apparently the Hispana, the best general collection of canons of the age which became so important for the canon law development of the entire West through the Carolingian Renaissance, goes back ultimately to Isidore. It originated soon after 633 on the basis of a Spanish epitome, which in turn was based on collections from Provence and Tarraconensis. Thus in the origin of the Hispana is reflected the history of the Visigothic Kingdom since the reorganization by Theodoric the Great. Beside Isidore's Summa of divine and human knowledge stands the canonical Summa as an equally important achievement.

After the death of the Doctor egregius the cultural centers moved from the Mediterranean zone to the interior of Spain. Málaga, Seville, Cartagena, and Valencia receded. Mérida and Zaragoza asserted their rank, while Toledo under the two Eugenes, Ildefonse, and Julian flowered anew. The Goth Fructuosus, who had grown up in Palencia, became in the years 640–650 the father of the monks of Spain. He wrote his Rule for the church in Bierzo, the hill country of Alcalá, where, after him, his biographer, Valerius of Astorga, also lived. King Recceswinth made Fructuosus Bishop of Dumio and finally Metropolitan of Braga. The leading churchmen of the time elaborated, as mentioned, the "Mozarabic" Liturgy. The Liber de virginitate s. Mariae of Ildefonse of Toledo constituted a landmark in the history of the cult of Mary.

The importance of the geographical shifting of the cultural centers in the seventh century becomes clear from archeological investigation, which has established a Gothic province of settlement north of the Tajo in Castile and León, to which in the west was added the Suevic settlement in Galicia. The Spanish lands north of the Tajo took little part in the cultural development of the Mediterranean zone in the sixth century. Goths and Sueves were Arians, under the Romans of Galicia Priscillianism was not yet dead, and in the Cantabrian Basque mountains there were still pagans. The northern advance bastions of the south were Mérida and Toledo, which lay in the radiation sphere of Córdoba. The Goths preserved, according to the evidence of the finds, their national customs until the turn from the sixth to the seventh century. At this time the Christian art of Baetica, dependent on Africa, lost its force. A new style of architecture and art arose at Mérida and Toledo, which had built the bridge from the south to the north. It spread via the Gothic area of colonization into Tarraconensis and to Septimania. This last epoch of Gothic Spanish culture no longer bore an African stamp, but was dependent on that of the Empire through its relations with Byzantine Italy. In it was reflected the Gothic Spanish national consciousness of the time of King Recceswinth (652–672) and his successors. Only quite small churches of Gothia are extant from this phase: the imposing buildings of Toledo have perished. But with the colorful luster of the crowns of Guarrazar and the treasure of Torredojimeno a light still shines to our days from the time of the kings and metropolitans of Toledo, the Father of Monks Fructuosus of Braga, the Hispana, and the Lex Visigothorum.

CHAPTER 36

The Lombards and Italy

Late arrivals of the migration of the peoples, late also in embracing Arianism, were the Lombards, who, shortly before 490, under the supremacy of the Heruls, entered "Rugiland" (Lower Austria), occupied the country between the Enns, Danube, and March and in 508 threw off the yoke of the Heruls. C. 526 they moved into the first Pannonian province between the Danube and the Drave, long ago evacuated by the Romans, and thereby became the immediate neighbors of the Ostrogoths. Under their King Wacho (c. 510–540) they entered into friendly relations with the Gepids, who lived between the Theiss and the Carpathians, and with the Franks, both of whom were opponents of the Ostrogoths. A change occurred in Lombard policy when, after Wacho's death, Audoin (c. 540–560) assumed control, first as guardian of the heir to the throne, Walthari, then from c. 547–48 as King himself. Audoin fell out with the Franks and Gepids and c. 548 sided with Justinian, who granted to the Lombards for settlement the country between the Danube and the Save as well as eastern Inner Noricum—hitherto Ostrogothic provinces.

According to Procopius, the Lombards had declared in 548 that they were of one faith with the Emperor.[1] Although this was certainly a declaration of intention of the Lombard envoys, it must not have been taken entirely right out of the air. For, through the Franks, Catholic influence can have been at work, even if it would also have crossed with an Arian influence from the Gepid side. In the first years of King Alboin (c. 560–573) the religious decision was still undecided, as a letter of Bishop Nicetius of Trier to Alboin's first wife, the Frankish Princess Clodoswintha, shows. Only after the victory over the Gepids, immediately before the invasion of Italy in 568, did Alboin decide for Arianism, perhaps with a view to the assimilation of the Danubian remnants of Germanic peoples into the Lombard nation. Also the desire to gain the Ostrogoths still remaining in Italy may have played a role. This recently accepted Arianism did not go very deep. Portions of the people even continued as pagans.

The Lombards entered Italy, in contrast to the Ostrogoths, not as foederati but as conquerors.[2] Alboin occupied the provinces of Aquileia

---

[1] Bellum Gothicum III, 34.

[2] The Byzantines only carried out resistance when the Lombards took Milan and besieged Pavia. Following Bognetti, Mor and Fasoli have expressed the supposition that (Venetia) and Milan (Liguria), except for the coastal districts, and then had a part of his troops advance via the La Cisa Pass into Tuscany in the direction of Benevento. After his death and the brief reign of his successor Cleph there ensued an interregnum (573–585), in which the Lombards lived only under dukes.[3] At this time the Emperor succeeded in attracting no small part of the Lombard duces into his service. Even after the renewal of the monarchy in 584, the restoration of political unity was at first a program rather than a reality. A Frankish-Byzantine coalition brought King Authari (584–590) to the edge of the abyss. The imperialists, who still possessed strong bridgeheads north of the Po, won back Reggio, Parma, and Piacenza and thereby drove a dangerous wedge between Lombard North Italy and the Lombard groups in Tuscany, Spoleto, and Benevento. Savior of the Kingdom was Agilulf (590–615), who subjugated the hostile dukes, eliminated the Byzantine wedge in western Aemilia, and conquered Cremona, Mantua, and Padua north of the Po (602–3). King Rothari (636–652) carried out a further break-through against the imperial positions by gaining Oderzo in Venetia, Modena in Aemilia, and in Liguria the entire coastal strip with Genoa. Now the Lombards possessed the entire province of Milan, the province of Aquileia except for Istria and the Venetian lagoon, the western half of Aemilia (Piacenza, Parma, Reggio, Modena), the greater part of Tuscany (Lucca–Pisa, Fiesole–Florence, Arezzo, Siena, Volterra, Chiusi, Volsinii), southern Umbria (Spoleto) with parts of Sabina, Samnium (Benevento), and parts of Campania (Capua). The duchies of Spoleto and Benevento, separated by the Exarchate of Ravenna and the Roman Duchy from the Regnum, stood in only a loose dependence on the crown. Benevento went into its own way and after 663 expanded over Apulia and Lucania.

The vicissitudes of the Church in the Lombard Kingdom become understandable only against the background of the political history. Paul the Deacon reports that, in contrast to the territories occupied under the rule of Alboin, the civitates conquered by the Lombard dukes were treated very harshly.[4] Modern research is inclined to trust this the Lombards had occupied Italy north of the Po in 568–69 in an understanding with the Emperor Justin II, who had been concerned to shield Italy from the Austrasian Franks by means of the Lombards. This assumption cannot be verified.

---

[3] Mor raised the question whether the Interregnum was not in reality only a period of regency for Cleph's son, Authari. But this is no more than a guess.

[4] Through these Lombard dukes, . . . churches were despoiled, priests were killed, cities were overwhelmed, and peoples . . . were wiped out, except in those regions which Alboin had taken, Italy was for the most part captured and subjected by the Lombards (Hist. Lang. 32). Basic for the more recent research is G. P. Bognetti, Continuità. Of the older investigations, the following should be mentioned: A. Crivelucci, "Les évêchés d' Italie et l'invasion lombarde," Studi storici 15 (1904–6); L. Duchesne, statement of the historian of the Lombards. In an effort to arrive at a correct judgment, it has taken into account the devastations of earlier wars, whose wounds were in no way healed at the entry of the Lombards. Thus, Venetia (Northeast Italy) was severely affected by the expedition of Attila's Huns in 452 while Central and Lower Italy, and also Milan, had suffered heavily in Justinian's Gothic war.

Although the two Metropolitans of Aquileia and Milan fled to imperial territory in 568–69—the former to Grado, the latter to Genoa—for the most part their suffragans remained in the two provinces occupied by the Lombards. On the basis of the privilege which Alboin granted to the Bishop of Treviso right after the occupation of the city, it may probably be assumed that also the other bishops who came to terms with the new situation obtained legal guarantees from the King. No vacancies can be proved at all in Venetia.[5] It is clear that in Liguria only Como was orphaned until the beginning of the seventh century, but the clergy stayed in the city. The picture is confusing in Tuscany, where long vacancies occurred in some episcopal cities (Lucca and especially Siena), whereas in others (Arezzo and Pistoia) the continuity was not disturbed.[6] At Spoleto disturbances cannot be established, but in any event the local dukes were occasionally federated. On the other hand, the bishoprics in the sphere of Benevento were entirely destroyed: Paul the Deacon may have been thinking of them especially when he spoke of the devastations of the dukes. The Lombards of Benevento were noted for special ferocity, and among them there were also still pagans. Finally also the cities and sees in the frontier zone disputed between the Lombard Kings and the imperialists were more severely affected: e.g., the civitates of Aemilia reconquered by Agilulf and the only recently conquered Venetian districts of Padua, Oderzo, and Altino, whose bishops withdrew to the Venetian lagoons. In retrospect one reaches the conclusion that greater disturbances occurred in the areas which

---

"Les évêchés d' Italie . . . ," MAH 25 and 26 (1905–6); Atti del congresso internazionale di scienze storiche III (Rome 1903).

[5] For the year 590–91 ten suffragans of Aquileia in Lombard territory are attested: Säben, Julium Carnicum, Belluno, Concordia, Trent, Asolo, Verona, Feltre, Treviso, and Vicenza (Settimane di studio . . . VII, 496). Six of them–Säben, Julium Carnicum, Concordia, Trent, Verona, and Feltre—were represented in 579 at a Synod in Grado (ibid., 499).

[6] Siena was already vacant from the end of the Gothic War. Bognetti has indicated that Lombard exercitales in Siena probably took the place of Italo-Roman cives. Similarly, this could have been the situation in Lucca, where apparently also a group of Ostrogoths had remained.

were too remote from the power of the King, and in those which were conquered late, disputed or after severe struggles.[7]

Before the eyes of the Lombard Kings stood the model of the Amals. Alboin chose Verona as the royal seat and thereby gave notice that he intended to follow Theodoric—"Dietrich of Bern." In 584 Authari was elevated to the throne at Verona and there in 589 married Theodelinda, daughter of the Duke of Bavaria; through her mother she came from the old Lombard royal house of Wacho, the tradition of which she introduced to the renewed Lombard kingship. Authari assumed the nickname Flavius, which the Amals had borne, as had also the Visigothic Kings since Theudis and Athanagild. Thus was a program of government imitated which promised to guarantee legal security also to the Italian population. The King was, of course, concerned strictly to maintain the separation between Lombards and Romans. At Easter 590 he issued a prohibition for Lombards to have their children baptized as Catholics.

That individual Lombards were converted to Catholicism in Authari's time is attested by Gregory the Great. The prohibition of Catholic baptism raises the suspicion that conversions were no longer limited to the smallest circles. The hopes of the Catholics of Venetia and Liguria may have been especially turned on Queen Theodelinda, who was likewise a Catholic and who, like them, did not recognize the Council of Constantinople of 553. The condemnation of the Three Chapters at this Council had led to schism in the provinces of Milan and Aquileia. The ecclesiastical alienation from Rome and the Imperial Church concealed from the start the danger of a political estrangement from the Empire. At first Narses had exorcised it by treating the Three Chapters with respect in North Italy, probably with an eye on the Franks, who also inclined to the schism and appeared still threatening even after their exclusion from the peninsula. The Emperor Maurice (582–602) adhered to this policy of Narses, but thereby encountered the opposition of the Popes, for whom naturally ecclesiastical unity had preference. The Roman influence operated more powerfully on the Metropolitan of Milan, a refugee at Genoa. The bishop-in-exile of Milan, Lawrence, secretly abandoned his opposition in 573, and his successor, [7] The struggles led also to the dismantling (Brescello, Mantua) or even the destruction of the cities (Cremona, Padua), that is, to measures of an exceptional nature. In place of Padua, Monselice became the center of Lombard rule, and parts of the territory of the civitas came to the Lombard duchies of Vicenza and Treviso. The territory of Oderzo was divided among the duchies of Treviso, Friuli, and Ceneda, and a new see was erected in the Lombard ducal seat of Ceneda. Padua did not again become the seat of a bishop until c. 800 (G. P. Bognetti, Continuità, 445, 447).

---

Constantius, chosen in 593, was orthodox. But the suffragans of Milan in the Lombard Kingdom did not go along with this change. They adopted a position against Constantius at Lombard Brescia. The Metropolitan-in-exile, Deusdedit, elevated to succeed Constantius c. 600, was recognized at Milan, but the union of the province was still quite far off. Como, which c. 606 obtained a new bishop in Agrippinus, even joined the clearly schismatic province of Aquileia. For Aquileia the situation was only altered when, after the change of the imperial religious policy under Phocas (602–610), an orthodox Metropolitan was also installed at Grado in 607. The suffragans of Lombard Venetia, in contrast to the bishops of Lombard Liguria, consummated the break and elected their own Metropolitan, who took his seat at Cormons. The old province of Venetia was thus split into a Lombard metropolitan unit of Aquileia, with its seat at Cormons, later Cividale (Forum Julii), and an imperial metropolitan unit of Grado.

The clever policy of Narses and of the Emperor Maurice delayed the estrangement of the schismatics from the Empire but could not in the end prevent it, as the events of 607 show. The rapprochement of the schismatic Catholics in the Lombard Kingdom to the Lombard kingship became clear from the split of 593 in the province of Milan. It would hardly have been consummated so quickly if Queen Theodelinda herself had not been a Catholic and had found in her second husband, Agilulf, whom she had married after Authari's death, complete sympathy for the new policy, probably first conceived by her, of a close collaboration with the Romans of North Italy. Agilulf remained personally an Arian, but he transferred his residence from the "Gothic royal city" of Verona to imperial Milan, took Milanese Romans into his council, encouraged the restoration of the Milanese churches, and finally in 603 even had his son Adalwald baptised as a schismatic Catholic—totally contrary to the baptismal decree of his predecessor Authari. The office of godfather of Adalwald was assumed by Abbot Secundus of Nano in the diocese of Trent, the long-time confidant of the Queen and historian of the court. The schismatic mission that began c. 600 among the Lombards of the Regnum took place under the aegis of Saint Euphemia of Chalcedon. Its route was reflected also in the dedication of churches to the martyrs of the Val di Non (Nano) among the Lombard settlements of the west and to the Norican martyr Florian, whose cult the church of Aquileia spread farther, among the Lombard fortresses of the east.[8] The royal couple were also able to interest in their aims the Abbot Columban, who had fled to Italy in 612. They made over to him the Church of Saint Peter of Bobbio as the basis of his mission in the diocese of Tortona and tried through him to gain influence over the Pope at the same time.

---

[8] For the patrons of the schismatic mission cf. G. P. Bognetti (Castelseprio, Milano longobarda) and Mor (Settimane di studio . . . XIV, 539ff.).

The first phase of Agilulf's reign coincided with the pontificate of Gregory the Great, the initiator of the mission to the Anglo-Saxons, who at his accession was confronted also with the question of the conversion of the Lombards because of Authari's baptismal decree that had only just appeared. But Gregory saw in the liquidation of the Schism of the Three Chapters and in peace between the Lombard King and the Emperor the unalterable presuppositions for a corresponding Roman initiative. He staked all his energy on realizing these preliminaries, and in this sense especially tried to influence Queen Theodelinda. Complete success was denied him. After his death the Lombard royal pair even turned the tables by suggesting to Pope Boniface IV through Columban a new examination of the question raised by the Three Chapters.

Gregory's religious and peace policy, meanwhile, seemed to bear fruit when, after Agilulf's death, the imperial Exarch at Ravenna for his part adopted friendly relations with the Lombard court in view of the serious threat to the Empire from the Persians.[9] Church union thereby again became urgent. The Queen-Mother and the young King Adaloald apparently let themselves be convinced that the Council of Chalcedon had not been jeopardized by the Second Council of Constantinople, and the exertions for the liquidation of the schism led c. 625 to the reunion of the metropolitan territories of Aquileia and Grado. But the negotiations had apparently been carried out over the heads of the Lombard magnates and the schismatic episcopate. Both groups united against the court. Adaloald was overthrown in 625, Arian kings again ascended the throne, the residence was transferred to national Lombard Pavia, and the schism flared up again.

The wheel of history, nevertheless, did not let itself be turned back. Hence there cannot be any word of an Arian reaction worthy of mention, because the new ruler, Arioald, was also supported by the schismatic Catholics. Add to this that his wife, Gundeperga, daughter of Agilulf and Theodelinda, continued the Catholic tradition at court and in fact also under the next King, Rothari, whom she married as her second husband. Gundeperga, however, belonged not to the schismatic but to the orthodox faction. Still more important was the fact that the abbey of Bobbio under Abbot Attala, after Columban's death and indeed before 625, had clearly taken a stand on the side of Roman Orthodoxy and thereby became the first center of an orthodox mission among the Lombards. At the urging of its abbots, Bobbio was exempted from the jurisdiction of the local Bishop of Tortona by privileges of Popes Honorius I of 628 and Theodore I of 643 and directly subjected to Rome. The abbey still remained closely bound to the royal family, and its aspirations vis-à-vis Tortona were supported by Ariwald as well as Rothari and Gundeperga.

---

[9] After Agilulf's death (c. 616) the Visigothic King Sisebut sent a letter to the Lombard court, in which he called upon the young King and his mother to convert the Lombards to Catholicism. The backgrounds of this Visigothic initiative are still unclear.

The actual state of peace between Regnum and Imperium under Adaloald and Arioald, which lasted into the first years of Rothari (636–652), facilitated the throwing of a bridge from the Lombard court by way of Bobbio to Rome. But then in 643 Rothari again moved to the offensive against the Imperium: relations between Old and New Rome had fundamentally changed because of the Monothelite quarrel that erupted in 640. This explains why the ecclesiastical cooperation between Rome and Pavia, established by means of Bobbio, was not interrupted by Rothari's war. In Tuscany the bishopric of Siena was restored—this could now happen only with the active collaboration of Rome, since Tuscany belonged to the Roman ecclesiastical province. The Catholic mission was reinvigorated by clerics and monks who had fled from the East of the Empire. It then spread to the Tuscan Lombards, who had not yet been affected by the schismatic mission. Rothari also permitted the bishops of Lombard Tuscany to take part in the Lateran Synod of 649, at which the Metropolitan of Milan and his suffragan of Tortona immediately appeared. Perhaps after the conquest of Genoa by Rothari the Metropolitan of Milan returned to his old provincial capital during this King's reign; in this way, beside Bobbio and Siena, there had been created a third starting point for the Lombard mission of the Roman observance. However, this cannot be regarded as certain.

Hence, paradoxically, the Catholic orthodox mission in the Lombard Kingdom gained its first bases under the two Arian Kings Ariwald and Rothari. The representative of the dynastic and Catholic community at court had been Queen Gundeperga. After Rothari's death and the brief reign of his son Rodoald, in 653, when the crisis between Emperor and Pope had reached its climax, a cousin of the Queen was made ruler of the Lombards: Aripert I, a nephew of Theodelinda. Aripert (652–661) was an orthodox Catholic. He annulled the position of Arianism as the State religion and close to the older parish church of Saint John the Baptist at Monza he founded Saint Savior at Pavia.[10] But he did not exploit the political opportunities present in the conflict between Emperor and Pope; hence he did not fulfill the hopes which the Lombards had probably placed in him. Thus, after Aripert's death, Duke Grimoald of Benevento was able to use a contest over the throne between the King's sons, Perctarit and Godepert, to gain the crown for himself with the aid of an Arian group, which probably supported Godepert.

---

[10] Saint Savior was not the first Catholic royal church at Pavia; Queen Gundeperga had already had a Church of Saint John built there.

It is significant that the Arian Lombards of the Regnum, from whom had probably come the initiative for the coup d'état, no longer felt strong enough to raise a king from their own ranks but turned to the Duke of Benevento. The Beneventan Lombards, just as those of Spoleto, had not been touched by the Catholic mission of North Italy, and the great questions of the Regnum had remained foreign to them. Their Arianism bore the marks of a strong, unreflecting popular faith, which did not exclude pagan and Catholic elements. Grimoald (662–671) was devoted to the Archangel Michael, whose sanctuary lay on Monte Gargano in the Duchy of Benevento. He ascribed to the Archangel a victory over the Byzantines and spread his cult to Pavia, where his Catholic followers took it up. Michael pushed the older cult of John the Baptist into the background and became patron of the kingdom and nation of the Lombards—strange to say, through the initiative of an Arian ruler, who had even allied with the Arabs against the Emperor.

Grimoald's reign was basically an anachronism, which ran counter to an historical development introduced long before. Perhaps the King in his last years even returned to the course of his predecessors. When he died, the Lombards called back Perctarit.

Under Perctarit (661/671–688) and his son Cunincpert (678/688–700), made coruler as early as 678, decisions finally matured which had been so long in preparation. Bishop Mansuetus of Milan (672–681) was the first Metropolitan of Liguria—of Lombard "Neustria"—who can be proved to have resided again in the old capital of Northwest Italy. King, Pope and Metropolitan took in hand the reorganization of the ecclesiastical province. Anastasius, the last Arian Bishop of Pavia, converted to Catholicism. The days of the schism were numbered in the province of Milan. Ecclesiastical union was apparently achieved without friction, since the common position in the Monothelite question made the old controversy over the Three Chapters pointless. When the Emperor Constantine IV yielded in the Monothelite quarrel, and Pope Agatho in 679 called upon the national churches of the West for a great demonstration of faith, a Synod of the province of Milan again met for the first time and placed itself behind the Pope. The peace of the Church, which the Sixth Ecumenical Council ratified at Constantinople in 680–81, also brought about the first official conclusion of peace between the Lombards and the Emperor. On this occasion the obligation of loyalty to the res publica and the Emperor, which the Roman suffragans assumed in their oath of obedience to the Pope as their Metropolitan, was changed for the Roman suffragans in the Lombard Kingdom into the obligation to work for the maintenance of peace between the res publica, that is, the Imperium, and the gens Langobardorum.

The acts of the Synod of Milan were drawn up by the deacon Damian, who soon after, following the death of Anastasius, who had converted to Catholicism, was made Bishop of Pavia and missionary Bishop for the Lombards. Under Damian the royal city of Pavia became the real center in the last phase of the Lombard mission under Roman auspices, and as such, in an analogy to Bobbio, was withdrawn from the ecclesiastical province of Milan and directly subordinated to Rome.[11] Damian had studied in Greece and was probably himself Greek, as indeed his helpers, according to the testimony of their names and those of the patrons of the mission stations, were mostly also Greek or orientals and were probably sent to Damian directly from Rome. Thus there existed between the last phase of the Lombard mission and the last phase of the Anglo-Saxon mission under Theodore of Tarsus and Hadrian of Naples a "parallelismo cronologico e metodico."[12] The wave of immigration from Greece, the East, and Africa to Italy, which the Monothelite controversy and the Arab invasion had produced, worked to the advantage of the conversion of the Germans. Among the Lombards of North Italy, the cult of Donatus enables one to infer also an impact from Tuscany (Arezzo).[13]

At the same time the Roman-oriental mission made progress also in the sphere of Spoleto and—in keeping with the reconciliation of the royal family with the dukes of Benevento—in Lombard Lower Italy. Duke Romuald I of Benevento (662–687) was converted by Saint Barbatus. Near his residence arose a church of Saint Peter, and the bishoprics of Benevento and Siponto were reestablished. Not Benevento, but Lombard "Austria," the province of Aquileia, the chief bastion of the schismatics, was the last support of the opposition to the Catholic monarchy—an opposition, it is true, in which Arianism no longer played any role, and political motives were at least a match for ecclesiastical ones. Spokesman of the rebels was Duke Alahis of Trent, to whom

---

[11] G. P. Bognetti, "Le origini della consacrazione del vescovo di Pavia da parte del pontefice romano e la fine dell'arianesimo presso i Longobardi," Atti e memorie del IV congresso storico lombardo (Milan 1940). Bognetti's view is not undisputed, but with certain modifications it was also accepted by Bertolini. The presentation given in the text follows Bertolini.

[12] G. Fasoli, Longobardi, 140ff.

[13] G. P. Bognetti, Continuità, 424. Bognetti traces the cult of Donatus among the Lombard centers of North Italy not, of course, to missionaries, but to settled royal Arimanni from the vicinity of Arezzo.

Perctarit had had to yield also the Duchy of Brescia. Alahis revolted at the change on the throne in 688. Battle occurred on the Campus Coronate on the Adda, and in it the Archangel Michael appeared as patron of the Regnum. Alahis was defeated. Cunincpert had a church dedicated to Saint George built on the battlefield, for he was venerated at Byzantium as the patron of the army. A decade later a Lombard Council at Pavia sealed the return of the last schismatics of the province of Aquileia to Orthodoxy. The King sent the acts of the Synod of 698–99 to the Pope for confirmation. The separation of the ecclesiastical provinces of Aquileia and Grado, long ago hardened by the political boundaries between Regnum and Imperium, continued.

At Cunincpert's death the development begun under Agilulf and Theodelinda was essentially complete, but had been again and again thwarted not least by political vicissitudes. True, it must be taken into account that the political background was especially prominent in historical retrospect. For the jejune tradition hardly lets one perceive the personal motives of the evangelizers and the converts, the individual effort and the methods of the missionaries.[14] As elsewhere in history, here too one must avoid seeing in the result only the consequence of a necessary development. Certainly the weight of the Catholic Roman tradition was great in Italy, and Arianism was very much weaker among the Lombard people than among the Goths. However, the frequent ups and downs, the seemingly strangely chaotic course of Lombard mission history in comparison to the other German peoples, shows that the religious confrontation cannot be reduced to a scheme.

The Catholic monarchy gained stature among the Lombards only under King Liutprand (712–744) in consequence of a dynastic crisis, which again suspended the development for a full decade. However, essential outlines had already been fixed under Perctarit and Cunincpert. The Synod of Pavia can be compared, mutatis mutandis, with the national Council of Toledo of 589. It was convoked by the King and, in keeping with the imperial model, met in the hall of the royal palace. Union was solemnly sworn in the Church of Saint Michael, patron of the Kingdom. Since Perctarit or Cunincpert the bishops of Pavia were exempt and seem in the eighth century to have occupied a mediating position between Rome and the Regnum.[15] King Liutprand founded the court chapel near the Church of Saint Saviour and built

---

[14] It is clear that also in the history of the conversion of the Lombards the miracle played no small role (cf. O. Bertolini, I papi, 347, note 50), and Gregory the Great may have thought of an impact on the Lombards while composing his Dialogues. But of course, thereby only one aspect is brought forward.

[15] O. Bertolini, Le chiese longobarde, 475ff.

Saint Peter in Caelo Aureo.[16] Like the Frankish and Visigothic Kings, he exerted influence on the nomination to bishoprics and in his capitularies gave validity to ecclesiastical principles, once even expressly by appeal to the Pope as caput ecclesiarum Dei et sacerdotum [in omni mundo].[17] Many boundary disputes between sees of the Regnum during the ecclesiastical reorganization of the Regnum were carried to his forum. The episcopate was even bound to military service in the late period of the Regnum.[18]

Meanwhile, Pavia, in contrast to Toledo, did not achieve primatial status, and in the Lombard Kingdom, also in contrast to Visigothic Spain, no national councils can be proved.[19] The ancient metropolitan organization in Italy—differing from that in Gaul and Spain—thwarted the full construction of the national Church. For only two ecclesiastical metropolises—Milan and Aquileia (Cividale)—lay within the Regnum. The Lombard sees of Aemilia belonged to Ravenna; those of Tuscany, Spoleto, and Benevento, to the ecclesiastical province of Rome.

The Visigothic Kings had "wedded" Spain, as Isidore of Seville said. The conversion of the Lombards and the liquidation of the schism seemed to offer the Lombard Kings the possibility of making Italy their "bride." As legend has it, Authari is said to have marked the frontier of the Lombard Kingdom on the shore of Reggio di Calabria with his spear.[20] In the inscription of a Crown donated by him Agilulf was designated as rex totius Italiae.[21] Cunincpert's epitaph at Saint Savior of Pavia ended with the verses: Quem dominum Italiae patrem atque pastorem / Inde flebile maritum iam viduata gemet.[22] After the reconstruction of the Regnum Liutprand set himself the goal of making his sovereignty really effective over Spoleto and Benevento and of including the Exarchate of Ravenna with the Pentapolis in the Kingdom of the a Deo dilecta et catholica gens Langobardorum.[23] In regard to Rome he was satisfied with a defensio. But these ideas found no echo in Imperial Italy. The frontiers between Regnum and Imperium were too powerfully consolidated in minds, and Rome clung to the political status quo, although precisely at that time Iconoclasm had led to a new ecclesiastical conflict with the Emperor. The political conflict between Pope and King became thereby inevitable. The Popes had long clung to the Late Roman idea of the Empire, in which the welfare of the Universal Church was inextricably bound with that of the Imperium; now they felt themselves ever more clearly to be the protectors of Imperial Italy, indeed in a certain way even as the guarantors of the autonomy of Spoleto and Benevento. The sworn obligation of working for peace between Imperium and Regnum, which the Lombard suffragans of Rome undertook at their ordination, was reinterpreted as early as 740 as the obligation to defend the papal status quo policy with the Lombard King: at the very time when the first papal appeal went out to the Franks. In this way was created a conflict of conscience for the Roman suffragans in the Lombard Kingdom and, in addition, for all viri devoti in the clerical and lay states. The Lombard Kings tried for a while to settle the conflict only on the political plane. Even Aistulf in a politically critical situation carefully spared the ecclesiastical rights of Rome. Only Desiderius in 769 opposed Rome on the field of canon law, when he sought to withdraw the parts of Istria occupied by the Lombards from the obedience of Grado and had a layman of his choice uncanonically elevated to the metropolitan see of Ravenna. Five years later came the decision: the Regnum Langobardorum was wrecked in its conflict with Rome.

---

[16] Perctarit and his wife built Saint Agatha at Pavia and outside the city a basilica in honor of Mary in the Lombard cemetery (G. Fasoli, Longobardi, 138).

[17] G. Fasoli, op. cit., 156.

[18] O. Bertolini, Le chiese longobarde, 491 (testimony for Lucca of 754.)

[19] Scarcely a trace is also found of provincial and diocesan synods in Lombard Italy. After the Synod of Pavia of 698 only one Milanese Synod under King Aistulf is attested (O. Bertolini, Settimane di studio . . . VII, 1, 515.)

[20] Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang., 32.

[21] The authenticity is disputed. Cf. R. Elze, "Die eiserne Krone in Monza," Herrschaftszeichen und Stantssymbolik (Schriften der MG 13), in the negative, and the recension of G. P. Bognetti, Archivio storico lombardo, Serie ottava, V (1954–55), 1–10, in the affirmative. The context of the testimonies favors the genuineness.

[22] According to G. P. Bognetti, Milano longobarda, 241.

[23] The epithets were borrowed from the style of the imperial chancery.

CHAPTER 37

The Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons and the Beginnings of the Anglo-Saxon Church

The age of the migrations meant for Britain a very much deeper turning point than for Gaul, Italy, and Spain. The German tribes of the "Anglo-Saxons"—Angles, Saxons, Jutes, and other national fragments—occupied the most permanently romanized eastern provinces with the metropolises of London and York and thereby hastened the process of deromanization among the Britons who had withdrawn to the West and were more and more isolated from the continent. Hence the Celtic language and culture again filtered through among the old established population, even if the Britons clung to the Christian faith and to the Latin language in the liturgy; in fact for a long time still they regarded themselves as members of Romania.[1] In their political and social structure the Britons and Anglo-Saxons did not differ substantially from one another. Both were, like the Picts of Scotland, organized in petty kingdoms, among which, it is true, one or the other occupied a position of hegemony. But no symbiosis of the two peoples took place. Especially in the south of the island there persisted a hostile confrontation, which did not allow a missionary impulse to appear among the Britons.

For the first Christian influences became noticeable among the Anglo-Saxons not from the British neighboring districts but from Gaul. Aethelbert of Kent, who as Bretwalda, "ruler of Britain," occupied a position of hegemony south of the Humber, before 589 married a Merovingian Princess, Bertha, daughter of King Charibert I of Paris (561–67). In her entourage came the Frankish Bishop Liuthard to the court of Canterbury. For the Queen's worship a cemeterial basilica of Roman Canterbury was furnished and presumably then dedicated in honor of Saint Martin of Tours.[2] A treasure-find in this church indicates relations with the Garonne. Apparently, through the King's Frankish marriage, connections had been established with Charibert's territory between the Lower Loire and the Garonne—Nantes, Tours, Poitiers, Bordeaux. To what extent older ecclesiastical relations between Gaul and Britain were revived from the fifth century is uncertain. However, the Merovingian Church could hardly develop a stronger missionary activity on the other side of the Channel at the end of the sixth century, since it was still entirely preoccupied with the ecclesiastical restoration within the Merovingian Kingdom.

The real initiative for the Anglo-Saxon mission proceeded from Gregory the Great. The universal mission mandate given by Christ had never entirely fallen into oblivion in the Roman Church. Leo the Great had still seen it in a connection with a providential mission of the Roman Empire: disposito namque divinitus operi congruebat, ut multa regna uno confoederarentur imperio, et cito pervios haberet populos praedicatio generalis, quos unius teneret regimen civitatis.[3] Gregory the Great was in this tradition, but he lived in a changed world. Under Augustine's influence he had again established the biblical eschatological understanding of the universal mission to pagans and in so doing had progressed from the "basic affirmation of the Church's universal missionary commission"to the "planning and organizing of a missionary enterprise outside the boundaries of the Roman Empire."[4]

---

[1] Corresponding testimonies from St. Patrick's writings are quoted in J. Ryan, "The Early Irish Church and the See of Peter," Settimane di studio . . . VII. Le chiese nei regni dell'Europa occidentale e i loro rapporti con Roma sino all'800, II (Spoleto 1960), 551. The clearest: Ecclesia Scottorum, immo Romanorum, ut Christiana ita ut Romani sitis. The notion basic to this expression is closely related to the view, to be mentioned infra, of Leo the Great.

[2] Bede dates the patronage of Martin at Canterbury to Roman times. Wallace-Hadrill is inclined to accept this testimony (Rome and the Early English Church, 529). But cf. M. Deanesly, Pre-Conquest Church, 35, 48.

[3] "For it especially accords with the work ordained by God that many kingdoms were united into the one Empire and [thus] the universal proclamation of the faith had quick

If the intellectual background of the great Pope's initiative, of the greatest importance for the future of the West, was to some extent judicious, so too the particular circumstances by which his interest was directed precisely to the Anglo-Saxons still remain obscure. The question how Britain, removed from the Roman ecumene for a century and a half, came again into Rome's line of vision is answered tersely but in a simplistic manner, by the Northumbrian Vita Gregorii and the Northumbrian legends transmitted by Bede. The external beauty of Anglo-Saxon slaves, which struck Gregory on a visit to the Forum, made him recognize that the Angles were called to be coheirs of the angels.[5] The impressive narration was probably based on the fact that in 595 Gregory gave the commission to buy up Anglo-Saxon slaves in Gaul, that is, probably in Marseille, in order to have them educated in the Christian faith with a view to a future mission activity in their homeland, even if it is not impossible that Anglo-Saxon slaves also came to the Roman market. As testimony for Northumbrian ideas of the beginnings of the mission, the narrative is worthwhile, but as a historical report it encounters critical doubts.

access to the peoples whom the rule of the one City held under its control" (Sermo 82, in natali Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, PL 54, 423).

[4] W. H. Fritze, Universalis gentium confessio, 113. Fritze rightly objects to the view represented especially in English research that Gregory's mission work must be understood from Roman imperial presuppositions (e.g., cf. M. Deanesly, Pre-Conquest England, 45, and J. Godfrey, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England, 69). That meanwhile the notion of the Imperial Church was not dead to Gregory can hardly be denied in view of every acknowledgement of his specific achievement—the renewal of the biblical "theonomous" mission idea. It was known to the Pope that the Britain occupied by the Anglo-Saxons had once belonged to the Empire, and his plan of ecclesiastical organization followed the older Roman organization. Gregory's inner connection with the Empire proceeds from other witnesses, and the restoration of imperial rule in the West lay for contemporaries at least in the realm of the possible (J. M. Wallace-Hadrill, op. cit. 522). Thus it seems to me that the distance between Leo the Great and Gregory is not so great as Fritze assumes.

[5] ". . . Rursus ergo interrogavit, quod esset vocabulum gentis illius. Responsum est, quod Angli vocarentur. At ille: 'Bene,' inquit, 'nam et angelicam habent faciem, et tales angelorum in caelis decet esse coheredes. Quod habet nomen ista provincia de qua isti sunt adlati?' Responsum est, quod Deiri vocarentur idem provinciales. At ille: 'Bene,' inquit, 'Deiri; de ira eruti et ad misericordiam Christi vocati. Rex provincia illius, quomodo appellatur?' Responsum est quod Aelli diceretur. At ille adludens ad nomen aid: 'Alleluia, laudem Dei Creatoris illis in partibus oportet cantari!' " (Hist. eccl., II, 1).

The story told by Bede is said to have occurred in the time of Pope Benedict I (575–79). A first reference to Britain is found in Gregory's Moralia, which was composed between 585 and 595. The question whether as early as 585 Gregory had conceived the plan of the mission and then intended to implement it personally—five years before his elevation to the papacy—is controverted. However, the mission had certainly been prepared long in advance, as the already mentioned mandate to buy Anglo-Saxon slaves of 10 September 595 shows. The recruiting of the first missionaries caused difficulties, for the Roman diocesan clergy evidently declined. Finally in the late spring of 596 Gregory sent the Prior Augustine with a group of monks from the monastery of Sant'Andrea al Monte Celio, which he himself had founded. The Roman missionaries landed in the spring of 597 on the island of Thanet, belonging to the Kingdom of Kent.

Gregory had not selected Kent as the starting point of the mission by accident. He must have been informed, at least in broad outline, about the possibilities of a missionary activity at the court of Canterbury. Nevertheless, the journey to the remote pagan country seemed at least to those involved as a dangerous adventure: they would have very much liked to have turned back soon after their departure. Gregory did not give in, but sent to his envoys letters of recommendation to the Papal Vicar of Arles, the bishops of Aix-en-Provence, Vienne, and Autun, the Abbot of Lérins, the Frankish Queen Brunhildis and her grandsons, Theodoric II of Frankish Burgundy (Chalon-sur-Saone) and Theodebert II of Austrasia (Metz). With regard to the Queen, the Pope motivated his missionary embassy thus: he had learned that the Angles wished to become Christians but no bishop of the neighborhood undertook to care for them. From this one could infer an initiative from Kent. But this was contradicted by, among other things, the distrust with which, according to Bede, the royal house of Kent first displayed toward the Roman missionaries. The Christian Franks in Kent seem not to have overbusied themselves in thirty years in preparing the King for Saint Augustine.[6]

The first difficulties were, however, soon overcome, and the mission work made good progress. Aid came from the Merovingian Kingdom by means of Bishop Syagrius of Autun, who was close to Queen Brunhildis. In July 598 Gregory could report to the Patriarch of Alexandria great successes, which were climaxed by the conversion of King Aethelbert, baptized probably at Easter 601. Augustine, who had been ordained a bishop in the Frankish Kingdom, founded, with the King's assistance, Christ-Church, the Cathedral of Canterbury, and near the basilica of Saint Martin a monastery, whose Church of Saint Austin was to receive the tombs of the bishops and of the royal family of Kent. The episcopal church obtained the patronage of the Saviour in imitation of the Roman cathedral at the Lateran, while the monastic church was dedicated in honor of the Princes of the Apostles.

---

[6] Wallace-Hadrill, op. cit. 527.

The newly established Anglo-Saxon Church was, in accord with Gregory's wish, to be independent of the Gallic Church and the Papal Vicar of Arles, but was to be united with the Celtic British churches of the island. Augustine was to prepare for the founding of two ecclesiastical provinces with London and York as metropolises for twelve sees each, which were to be brought to completion after his death. As head of all the churches of Britain, he received the pallium in 601 with the permission to take his seat in London.

Gregory's plan of organization was based on the older Roman division of Britain—apparently Diocletian's more recent arrangement, whereby Britain was divided into five provinces, was no longer known at Rome. However, the plan of organization corresponded neither to the political circumstances of the early seventh century nor to the status of the mission. London belonged to the Kingdom of Essex, whose ruler was subordinate to the Bretwalda of Canterbury and, besides, was still a pagan in 601. Under these circumstances, Augustine's removal to the ancient Romano-British metropolis was impracticable, and the union of the Anglo-Saxons with the British churches foundered on the difference of ecclesiastical usages, on the national antipathy of the peoples, and on Augustine's imperious manner.

The proclamation of the faith could develop only on the basis of the existing situation, and thus for the time being the mission extended only to the kingdoms which were closely connected with Kent—to Essex and East Anglia (Norfolk and Suffolk). Augustine and his companions gained a firmer footing in Essex, where a nephew of King Aethelbert ruled. Circa 604 Rochester was founded as a second see in Kent, with its Cathedral of Saint Andrew, and in Essex the bishopric of London, with the Cathedral of Saint Paul near the Roman forum. As little pressure for the acceptance of Christianity was exercised there as in Kent: Didicerat enim [rex] a doctoribus auctoribusque suae salutis servitium Christi voluntarium, non coactitium esse debere.[7] Gregory had instructed the missionaries not to destroy pagan temples but to turn them into churches and to give pagan feasts a Christian content: ut dum eis aliqua exterius gaudia reservantur, ad interiora gaudia consentire facilius valeant. Nam duris mentibus simul omnia abscidere impossibile esse non dubium est, quia et

---

[7] "The King had indeed learned from his teachers, from whom he received salvation, that the service of Christ is voluntary, and must not be compulsory" (Hist. eccl. I, 26).

is, qui summum locum ascendere nititur, gradibus vel passibus, non autem saltibus elevatur.[8]

Augustine's mission, geared to individual conversion, naturally did not exclude the idea that the conversion of outstanding princes should also involve the wholesale conversion of their retinues and clients, in which on occasion pressure may have been resorted to. Even so, at Augustine's death between 604 and 609 not even all the members of the royal families of Kent and Essex had become Christians. And so after the death of King Aethelbert in 616 and of his nephew of Essex there could ensue a pagan reaction, which, it is true, produced only a temporary reverse in Kent, but in Essex and East Anglia it destroyed the first buds of Christianity.[9] On the other hand, a decade later there opened up great prospects for the mission in northern England. King Edwin of Deira (Yorkshire), who also ruled Bernicia (Northumbria) and the Lindissi (Lindsey) and acquired the hegemony in Anglo-Saxon territory, in 625 married a daughter of Aethelbert of Kent. To northern England with the Queen went Paulinus, one of the missionaries from Kent, who was made a bishop. Edwin came into conflict with the West Saxons and in 626 held out the prospect of his conversion in the event of his victory. After the fortunate outcome of the battle he presented to the Witenagemot, that is, the meeting of the magnates of his kingdom, the question of whether Christianity should be accepted. The Witenagemot decided for collective conversion. The King had himself baptized at Easter 627.

Bede's report on the discussion at the Witenagemot is a significant monument from the history of the German mission, even if it cannot rank as a contemporary testimony in the strict sense. It shows that not only the God promising victory and success made an impression, but also the problem of the meaning and end of human life played a role.

---

[8] ". . . so that, if some joys were preserved for them externally, they might the more easily assent to the inner joys. For it is doubtless impossible at the same to cut away everything from hard hearts, because whoever seeks to mount to the highest place goes up by degrees and steps, not by leaps" (Hist. eccl. I, 30). The magnanimity with which Gregory took into account the circumstances of the mission also in matters of ecclesiastical discipline and in the law of marriage becomes evident from his responsa transmitted by Bede (Ep. XI, 56a), which according to the more recent investigations of English and Belgian scholars must probably be regarded as genuine, except for a few interpolations (on the controversy with S. Brechter, cf. the literature for this chapter).

[9] Very different views of Christianity become clear from the example of the two Kings of East Anglia and Essex. Raedwald of East Anglia had in his pagan fanum a Christian and a pagan altar (Hist. eccl. II, 15), and hence he subscribed to a religious syncretism. Sigebert of Essex was killed because he practiced love of enemies (Hist. eccl. III, 22) and hence understood the basic command of Christian ethics and made it his own in a manner rare for his day.

> "Talis," inquiens [unus optimatum], "mihi videtur, rex, vita hominum praesens in terris, ad conparationem eius, quod nobis incertum est, temporis: quale cum te residente ad caenam cum ducibus ac ministris tuis tempore brumali, accenso quidem foco in medio, et calido effecto caenaculo, furentibus autem foris per omnia turbinibus hiemalium pluviarum vel nivium, adveniens unus passerum domum citissime pervolaverit; qui per unum ostium ingrediens, mox per aliud exierit. Ipso quidem tempore, quo intus est, hiemis tempestate non tangitur, sed tamen parvissimo spatio serenitatis ad momentum excurso, mox de hieme in hiemem regrediens, tuis oculis elabitur. Ita haec hominum vita ad modicum apparet; quid autem sequatur, penitus ignoramus. Unde si haec nova doctrina certius aliquid attulit, merito esse sequenda videtur."[10]

The second ecclesiastical province of York, planned by Gregory, seems to have become a reality after the publicly decided conversion of the Angles north of the Humber. Paulinus took his seat at York, where, soon after the baptism of King Edwin, there began the construction of a stone cathedral, which replaced the one erected before the King's baptism and the wooden church dedicated in honor of Saint Peter. Popes Boniface V (619–625) and Honorius I (625–638) maintained contact also with the Northumbrian mission. The connection between Rome and the ultimi habitatores mundi was consolidated, and Honorius even brought it about in these years (629–632) that South Ireland accepted the Roman calculation of Easter.[11] But the precarious political stability of Britain again led to a severe setback. In 632 King Edwin perished at Hatfield in a battle against Penda of Mercia and the British King Caedwalla of Gwynedd. The Northumbrian mission collapsed. When Honorius I sent the pallium for Paulinus of York, the latter was in flight to Kent with the Queen and her children. Penda, ruler of the central English Kingdom of Mercia—the "March Kingdom" of the Angles against the Britons—was until his death in 654 the "central figure of Anglo-Saxon history."[12] He was and remained a pagan.

---

[10] "The present life of men on earth, O King," said one of the magnates, "seems to me in comparison to the time which is unknown to us to be of this sort: as when a sparrow hurries through your house in flight, where you are sitting down during the winter with your dukes and servants for a meal around the hearth-fire in warm comfort—but outside the winter rain and snowstorms rage everywhere. The sparrow flies through one door and at once goes out again through another. So long as it is inside, it is untouched by the fury of the winter. But in an instant the tiny space of calm unconcern has been traversed and it is already withdrawn from your eyes, returning from winter into winter. Thus seems the life of men for a short while; but what may follow we do not know. Hence if this new teaching brings more certainty, it should be properly followed." (Hist. eccl. II, 13).

[11] J. Ryan, The Early Irish Church and the See of Peter, 568–569.

Paulinus ended his life as Bishop of Rochester (635–644). Canterbury and Rochester, the two Kentish sees, had weathered the storm, and in 624 the precedence of Canterbury in the Roman mission sphere was sanctioned with the sending of the pallium by Pope Boniface V. But Canterbury's mission area shrank considerably in the following period. Rome was distant and offered little help. In place of Roman support there came with the approval of the Popes support from the Merovingian national Church of Gaul, which had already offered shelter to the refugees of the first pagan reaction, Bishops Mellitus of London and Justus of Rochester.[13]

South of the Humber there were in the time of Penda of Mercia (632–654) only two kingdoms which could be designated as Christian: Kent and East Anglia. In addition to them, Wessex must be mentioned as a third kingdom, but at that time it was only beginning to open itself to the new teaching.[14] Christian influences had first obtained recognition in East Anglia by way of Kent (Canterbury) and then by way of Deira (York). But the nova doctrina was only established under King Sigebert (630–35), who was baptized in Gaul and on his accession to the throne brought in the Frankish Burgundian Bishop Felix. Felix probably came from the circle of Luxeuil monasticism; his connections indicate especially Meaux and the monastery of Faremoutiers, which very early became a center of attraction for Anglo-Saxon princesses and ladies of the Anglo-Saxon nobility. The Frankish Burgundian bishop, whose missionary activity was authorized by Canterbury, founded the see of Dunwich in the south of the East Anglian Regnum (Suffolk). In the north of the country (Norfolk) the Irish mission obtained a foothold, still under Sigebert, through Abbot Furseus at Cnobheresburg near Yarmouth. The two East Anglian missionary groups were apparently in friendly relations. They were united in a common work, and the difference of observances was at least moderated by the Irish influence on the Luxeuil circle.[15] [12] Stenton, p. 39. According to Deanesly, Penda seems to have been Bretwalda or at least to have exercised de facto an analogous hegemony (Pre-Conquest Church, 81). Stenton thinks otherwise: he adheres to Bede's statement on Oswald of Northumbria's hegemony.

---

[13] The views here presented are based especially on Wallace-Hadrill, op. cit., 535–536.

[14] Deanesly, Pre-Conquest Church, 81.

[15] "The earliest Anglian Church was founded, through the initiative of Canterbury, by a Burgundian bishop, Felix. Its Gaulish affinities need no emphasis; they lead one to Faremoutiers, Chelles, Lagny, Péronne and quite possibly to Luxeuil" (Wallace-Hadrill, op. cit., 530).The statements of the English historian need comment. Faremoutiers and Chelles were Merovingian convents of nuns, in which the Anglo-Saxon element was

From c. 633 the Gaul (?) Birinus worked independently of Canterbury in Wessex, which up to then had not been included in the mission. Birinus had received permission to preach to pagans from Pope Honorius I and had been ordained a bishop by the exiled Metropolitan Asterius of Milan. In 636 he baptized the King of Wessex, Cynegils, and took his seat at Dorchester, at that time the center of the kingdom. His successor was the Frank Agilbert (c. 650–660), who belonged to the circle of the founders of the monastery of Jouarre in the diocese of Meaux, had studied in South Ireland, and had been ordained a missionary bishop in the Merovingian Kingdom. In 660 Agilbert fell out of favor because he was not sufficiently fluent in the Saxon tongue.[16] His successor, Wini, also ordained in Gaul, transferred the episcopal see c. 663 to the new chief residence, Winchester, but he could not long maintain himself. He was followed by Agilbert's nephew Hlothere (Clothar), at the desire of the West Saxon King and with the approval of the Archbishop of Canterbury,[17] whose precedence was thereby acknowledged also in Wessex. Of course, there can be no question of a direction of the mission by the metropolitans at Canterbury either in East Anglia or in Wessex. Deusdedit (654–663), the first Anglo-Saxon on the archiepiscopal cathedra, was de facto restricted to Kent in his activity.

---

especially strongly represented. Chelles, however, as a convent of nuns was founded by Queen Bathildis only after the death of Bishop Felix in 647. Hence direct connections could have existed only between Felix and Faremoutiers. Lagny (diocese of Meaux) was founded by Furseus after his move to the Frankish Kingdom, at the earliest in 640 and probably in 644–45, with the help of the Neustro-Burgundian Mayor Erchinoald. The latter transferred the remains of Furseus (d. 650) to Péronne, when he founded the monastery, whose direction he gave to Furseus's brother, Foilan, who had settled in the Merovingian Kingdom in 650 (P. Grosjean, "Notes d'hagiographie celtique," 38: AnnBoll 75 [1957], 392ff.) Direct relations could again have existed only between Lagny and Bishop Felix. The possibility exists that Felix, through his Merovingian contacts, supported Furseus's monastic foundation. The circumstances, then, indicate closer relations with the diocese of Meaux. On both East Anglian missionary groups, cf. also Deanesly, Pre-Conquest Church 76, 81ff.

[16] Agilbert did not return finally to the Merovingian Kingdom until after the Northumbrian Synod of Whitby (664); he became Bishop of Paris c. 667 and died between 680 and 691. He was buried at Jouarre, and his sarcophagus is preserved. The abbey of Jouarre was founded by Ado, a brother of the great Bishop Audoin of Rouen, and early transformed into a double monastery (before 650, perhaps as early as 642). The first Abbess, Theudechildis, was a sister of Agilbert. The nuns seem to have come from Faremoutiers, only about twenty kilometers away. Jouarre itself supplied the first nuns for the royal monastery of Chelles and from Ebroin's proprietary monastery of Notre-Dame de Soissons. Saint Osanna, buried at Jouarre, is said to have been a sister of the Northumbrian King Osred (705–716). Cf. J. Guérout, "Les origines et le premier siècle de l'abbaye," L'abbaye royale Notre-Dame de Jouarre (Paris 1961), 1–67.

[17] Wallace-Hadrill, op. cit., 530.

The great turning point of the mission came from the north. The Angles north of the Humber had been again united after the defeat of Hatfield by the brothers Oswald (633–641) and Oswiu (641–670) of the royal family of Bernicia. In 641 Oswald fell in the struggle against Penda of Mercia, but in 654 in the battle of Winwood Oswiu was able to break Mercia's supremacy and restore the Northumbrian hegemony.

During the reign of Edwin of Deira (616–632) the two brothers had lived in exile among the Irish and Picts of Caledonia and there they had become Christians of the Irish observance. In 634, Oswald had the Irish Abbot Aidan come from Iona; with the King's help, Aidan founded the monastery of Lindisfarne and became the abbot-bishop there. Aidan was followed by Finnan (651–661) and Colman (661–64). After Oswiu's victory of 654, Finnan baptized Penda's son Peada, who married a daughter of Oswiu, and King Sigebert of Essex, a "friend" of the Northumbrian ruler. The Irish Diuma was sent to Mercia as missionary bishop, and his Anglo-Saxon companion Cedd was soon after sent to Essex.

Thus Irish influence grew in England in the second third of the seventh century. On the other hand, Roman and continental influences made themselves apparent even in Irish-oriented Northumbria by way of Essex and Kent. The mission circles overlapped in wide areas of the Anglo-Saxon world, and conflicts could not be avoided. Into the center of the controversies moved the differences in regard to determining the date of Easter and hence also of Lent, which greatly aggravated daily life in intimate circles. At the Northumbrian court King Oswiu celebrated Easter according to the Irish calendar; the Queen, raised in Kent, according to the Roman calendar. The disadvantages which ensued called peremptorily for a clarification, and so in 664 the King summoned a Synod to Whitby.

In the Kentish beginnings of the mission, the opposition between the Roman-continental and the Celtic-insular ecclesiastical systems, strengthened by the hostility between Anglo-Saxons and Britons, had occasionally assumed sharp forms. At Whitby a different climate prevailed. Roman influences had vindicated themselves in the Irish Church: the South Irish had accepted the Roman calculation of Easter a generation earlier. Irish churchmen did not question apostolicity of faith as the basis of ecclesiastical unity, they went as pilgrims to Gaul and Rome, and they also encouraged their pupils to go.[18] Hence the decision of Whitby could hardly be in doubt. The Frankish Bishop Agilbert of Wessex and his Anglo-Saxon pupil, Abbot Wilfrid of Ripon, defended the Roman standpoint against Colman of Lindisfarne. When Wilfrid appealed to the authority of Peter and in this connection quoted Matthew 16:18, the King intervened:

---

[18] Deanesly, Pre-Conquest Church, 83. Wallace-Hadrill sees in the "emotional link with the cultus of St. Peter and thus with St. Peter's successors" the unifying bond which held together the so differently patterned Anglo-Saxon churches even before the mission of Theodore of Canterbury (op. cit., 531).

> "Verene, Colmane, haec illi Petro dicta sunt a Domino?" Qui ait: "Vere, rex." Ait ille: "Habetis," inquit, "vos proferre aliquid tantae potestatis vestro Columbano datum?" At illi ait: "Nihil." Rursum rex: "Sic utrique vestrum," inquit, "in hoc sine ulla controversia consentiunt, quod haec principaliter Petro dicta, et ei claves regni caelorum sint data a Domino?" Responderunt: "Etiam" utrique. At ille ita conclusit: "Et ego vobis dico, quia hic est ostiarius ille, cui ego contradicere nolo; sed, in quantum novi vel valeo, huius cupio in omnibus oboedire statutis; ne forte, me adveniente ad fores regni caelorum, non sit qui reserat, averso illo, qui claves tenere probatur."[19]

In this way the dispute was settled in favor of the Roman group. Colman abandoned Northumbria with a group of intransigents, but other Irish remained. The great abbatial bishopric of Lindisfarne was divided into the sees of Ripon and York.

No less important than the Synod of Whitby was the change of episcopacy which soon after occurred at Canterbury. When the Anglo-Saxon candidate chosen by the Kings of Kent and Northumbria died after his arrival at Rome, Pope Vitalian, after a painstaking selection, elevated the Greek Theodore of Tarsus. Theodore went to Kent in 669, accompanied by the Neapolitan Abbot Hadrian, an African by birth. During his long episcopate (669–690), Theodore, who was the first Bishop of Canterbury recognized in the entire English Church, gave shape to this Church. Seven bishoprics, among them two for Kent (Canterbury and Rochester), and one each for the kingdoms of Northumbria (York), East Anglia (Dunwich), Mercia (Lichfield), Essex (London), and Wessex (Winchester), were reorganized. New sees were erected in the relatively large kingdoms of Northumbria (Lindisfarne, Hexham) and Mercia (Lindsey, Worcester, Hereford). After the conversion of the South Saxons by Wilfrid (680–85), the see of Selsey arose in Sussex. After Theodore's death the number of Anglo-Saxon bishoprics was increased by only a few new foundations in Northumbria (Whithorn), East Anglia (Elmham), Mercia (Leicester, Dorchester,) and Wessex (Sherborne).

---

[19] "Did the Lord really say this to Peter, Colman?" He replied: "That is so, O King." Thereupon the King asked: "Have you anything of such force to present for your Columba?" He answered: "Nothing." Then the King said: "And so you both agree that this was said in the first place to Peter and to him the keys of the Kingdom of heaven were given by the Lord?" Both answered: "Yes." Then the King thus concluded [the debate]: "And I say to you: This one is the gate-keeper, whom I will not resist; rather I want to obey his orders in every way according to my knowledge and ability, lest, when I come before the gates of heaven, there may be no one there to open to me, because he turns his back on me who obviously holds the keys" (Hist. eccl. III, 25). On the long traditional picture of the heavenly gate-keeper cf. K. Hallinger, "Römische Voraussetzungen der bonifatianischen Wirksamkeit im Frankenreich," St. Bonifatius Gedenkgabe zum 1200. Todestag (Fulda 1954), 320–361.

Under the direction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, England became an ecclesiastical unity long before it constituted a political unity. The English Church assembled in provincial synods, which were at the same time "national synods." Since, as a consequence of the political pluralism, the councils could not be dated by regnal years, the episcopate adopted the era of the Incarnation, which soon began from England its triumphal procession through the West. The calculation of Easter was defined, and stabilitas loci was stipulated for monks, the clergy, and the episcopate. However, Theodore of Tarsus adopted basic elements of the Irish practice of penance, and for the first time he prescribed annual confession for all. A Poenitentiale, which was based on Theodore's instructions and was widely disseminated under his name, "acted so that the improved and individual penitential system of auricular confession became the common property of the Universal Church, with graduated expiatory acts even for secret sins."[20] On the other hand, the Roman influence spread from England to the Celts of the British Isles. In 704 and 716 the Northern Irish of Bangor and the Picts adopted the Roman calculation of Easter. Only the Celts of Wales held fast to Columba's old usage until 768.[21]

For two generations England remained under the ecclesiastical direction of Canterbury. Then when the Bishop of York received the pallium in 735, Northumbria separated itself from the ecclesiastical province that had embraced all England. The bisection was not only in accord with the plan of Pope Gregory but also with the special development of the northern Anglo-Saxon Kingdom. And thus it remained in the future. The ecclesiastical province of Lichfield (788–803), established in the eighth century by the Mercian overlords of the South, had no permanence. Also, the attempt of the King of Mercia to transfer the ecclesiastical metropolis of southern England from Canterbury to London was unsuccessful, although in this case one could appeal to Gregory the Great. But the tradition of the sedes of Augustine and Theodore of Tarsus already was too strong.

---

[20] T. Schieffer, op. cit., 76. Archbishop Theodore had no prejudices against the Irish. He elevated three pupils of Irish schools to be bishops (Deanesly, Pre-Conquest Church, 102; on his personality, ibid., 104–107).

[21] Deanesly, ibid., 89ff.

[Viri de gente Anglorum] qui maxime familiores apostolicae sedi semper existunt,[22] said a source of the ninth century about the Anglo-Saxons. In keeping with its origin and its character as an early medieval missionary Church, the Church of England was "more Roman" than those of the Frankish, Gothic, and Lombard kingdoms, which in their roots went back to antiquity and had a richer inheritance. The cult of Saint Peter was firmly anchored in all the German-Roman churches,[23] but it acquired a special intensity in England.

> Saint Peter clearly became the national saint, to whom monasteries and churches . . . were dedicated in great numbers. The most obvious and best known characteristic of this religious devotion was the stream of Anglo-Saxon pilgrims to the thresholds of the Apostles . . . many a one closed his earthly life in Rome, such as two Kings . . . Caedwalla (d. 689) and Ine of Wessex (d. 726).[24]

In 679 the Anglo-Saxon Church met at Hatfield at the request of the Pope in order to station itself behind Rome in the Monothelite question. The attachment to Rome also received juridical forms in England. Here the right of the metropolitan was first connected by Gregory with the reception of the pallium, a vestment consisting of a strip of white wool, which the Popes had previously granted to their vicars. By means of the pallium the metropolitan obtained a participation in the rights of the Pope and the title of "Archbishop" which had previously denoted a supermetropolitan position. As in the Lombard Kingdom, where the Pope had shared in the Lombard mission and in the reorganization of the ecclesiastical province of Milan, there occurred also in England the exemption of monasteries, which were freed from the power of the local bishop and directly subjected to Rome.[25] True, these privileges of exemption, which were granted only in a few special cases on the initiative of the founder, were not an effort by Rome to interfere in the circumstances of the English Church. For the English Church was, no less than the Frankish, Gothic, and Lombard, a "national Church," even if united more firmly with Rome. The competence of king and archbishop, of Witenagemot (meeting of the magnates) and synod extended

---

[22] "(The men of the nation of the English) who were especially closely connected with the Apostolic See from time immemorial" (Gesta abb. Fontanellensium 14, ed. Löwenfeld, 42). See Wallace-Hadrill, op. cit., 520ff.

[23] E. Ewig, "Der Petrus-und Apostelkult im spätrömischen und fränkischen Gallien," ZKG 71 (1960), 215–251. The cult of Peter had Early Christian roots outside England. It symbolized at the same time the apostolic succession of the episcopate and the union of the bishops with Rome.

[24] T. Schieffer, op. cit., 75.

[25] W. Levison, op. cit., 25ff.

> to such important tasks as the erecting of sees, . . . the naming of the bishop by the king [was] not regarded as unusual, . . . his assent to the election was taken for granted, the expulsion of the bishop from his church by the king was not unprecedented. The supremacy of the king was recorded in a legislation which assured the Church the state's protection, but also maintained an ecclesiastical disciplinary power over clerics and laity. . . . The bishops and abbots came from princely and noble families, which devoted themselves zealously to the founding of churches and monasteries, but also, in keeping with the custom of the proprietary church system, retained ownership of them.[26]

The phases of the christianization of Anglo-Saxon life can be clearly followed. The first Anglo-Saxon in the see of Canterbury was Frithona (654–663), who took the Christian name of Deusdedit. In the 640s and 650s are found the first Anglo-Saxons among the bishops of Rochester (Kent), East Anglia, and Wessex. Apart from Canterbury, all the episcopal sees of England were occupied by natives from the 670s. Earconbert of Kent (640–664) was the first Anglo-Saxon King to order the destruction of pagan shrines in his kingdom. King Aethelbert of Kent, who had the oldest Anglo-Saxon national law compiled, had already established penalties for offenses against God, the clergy, and the churches. But the national laws which Ine of Wessex and Wihtred of Kent issued in 694 and 695 are the first witnesses of a stronger Christian influence. The system of records which the Church brought to England clearly began under the episcopate of Theodore of Canterbury. From the start, the Anglo-Saxon Church was most intimately linked to monasticism, and indeed both that of Ireland as well as that of Rome and Gaul. But the great Anglo-Saxon monastic fathers—Cuthbert of Lindisfarne, Wilfrid of York, Benedict Biscop, Aldhelm of Malmesbury—belonged to Theodore's generation or were younger contemporaries of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Cuthbert (d. 687) assembled the Irish usages of his monastery into a Rule. With the romanization of the English Church the Benedictine Rule found entry, for which Wilfrid of York and Benedict Biscop (d. 690) obtained recognition in broad areas of the country. The Benedictine abbeys were to a far greater degree centers of education than were the Irish monasteries, which were for the most part overburdened by pastoral work. However, the Benedictine stamp of Anglo-Saxon monasticism must not be overestimated. Augustine and his companions were not "Benedictines," and until the eighth century one can probably speak of a Benedictine dominant character, but not of an exclusively Benedictine monasticism among the Anglo-Saxons.[27] Characteristic of early Anglo-Saxon monasticism were the double monasteries, which originated in the Merovingian Kingdom, but achieved special flowering in England.[28] There seem to have been no monasteries solely for nuns in the Early Anglo-Saxon period. Among the great abbesses who presided over communities of men and women, preeminent was Hilda of Whitby (d. 680) a relative of King Oswiu of Northumbria.

---

[26] T. Schieffer, op. cit., 73.

The Anglo-Saxon schools first entered the light of history with Archbishop Theodore and Abbot Hadrian of Canterbury (669–707/710). A special priority of the Canterbury school was the study of Roman Law and the, at that time, unique pursuit of Greek. But the brilliance of the South English cathedral school faded in the eighth century. The Anglo-Saxon center of education shifted to Northumbria: first to the monasteries of Saint Peter at Wearmouth and Saint Paul at Jarrow, founded by Benedict Biscop in 674 and 681–82 respectively, and from there to the Cathedral of York under Archbishop Egbert (734/735–766). In addition to the great schools of Canterbury, Wearmouth–Jarrow, and York, there were, however, some other centers of education which have not yet been sufficiently investigated, including that of Mercian Lichfield.

The founding or renewing of the school of Canterbury under Theodore and Hadrian marked the beginning of the Anglo-Saxon "Renaissance," which was eminently represented by Aldhelm of Malmesbury (c. 640–709), the Venerable Bede (672–735), and Alcuin, and with Alcuin led to the "Carolingian Renaissance." The importance of the West Saxon Aldhelm, who had gone through the school of Canterbury, lay in the field of grammar, prosody, and religious education. Greater than he was the Northumbrian Bede, who as teacher at Jarrow cultivated not only biblical exegesis, grammar, and poetry, but also chronology and historiography.

> The after-effects of his chronological work . . . extend to the present day, for Bede here put the Alexandrian-Roman calculation of feasts into the canonical form for the Middle Ages and brought about the definitive victory of this Easter cycle, still standard for us. In fact, he threw bridges in a twofold respect . . . to the Roman sixth century by popularizing the reckoning of time after the birth of Christ in historiography. And precisely as a historian, Bede enjoys imperishable fame, for his masterpiece, the . . . Historia ecclesiastica gentis

---

[27] K. Hallinger, "Papst Gregor d. Gr. und der hl. Benedikt," SA 42, 265.

[28] S. Hilpisch, "Die Doppelklöster, Entstehung und Organisation," Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums 15 (Münster 1928); W. Levison, op. cit., 22ff.

Anglorum, already marks a climax of the just then beginning medieval writing of history.[29]

The foundations of the Christian Anglo-Saxon culture were Roman, characterized by the canonical collection of Dionysius Exiguus, the Roman Easter cycle, the ordo cantandi Romanus, the Regula Benedicti. Benedict Biscop journeyed no less than six times to Rome and brought back from there "an innumerable collection of books of every sort."[30] But he also bought up books at Vienne and was a monk at Lérins for two years. His friend, Wilfrid of York, received decisive impressions of ecclesiastical life at Lyon. Lyon and the neighboring cities possessed well-endowed libraries in the Early Middle Ages, in which even Spanish literature, especially Isidore of Seville, was represented. Bede was familiar with Isidore and the Gallic literature of the fourth to sixth centuries: a great part of the works at his disposal must have come directly from the Frankish Kingdom.[31]

The Irish element in Anglo-Saxon culture is so clear that one often speaks simply of Insular Civilization without a detailed distinction of the two elements. The common criterion which strikes the eye is the Irish hand, which generally found acceptance in England and, as "insular," differed from "continental." However, one must think also of the Irish penitential law, of which mention has already been made. Controverted is the provenance of the insular book illumination, which originated in the transfer of the "barbarian" metalcraft to the book. The traditional view that the insular miniature is an achievement of the Irish of the sixth and seventh centuries is today under attack. Weighty arguments in fact maintain that this highly developed art arose c. 700 in Northumbria.[32]

---

[29] T. Schieffer, op. cit., 79. However, more recent studies have underlined the share of the Church of Canterbury. If the Historia ecclesiastica moved beyond the restricted North English framework to a general Church history of England, this was due in two ways to Abbot Albinus of St. Austin (Sts. Peter and Paul): by the stimulus which he gave to Bede and by the documentary material which he sent him by the London priest Nothelm (Deanesly, Pre-Conquest Church, 42ff.). The relations of the Northumbrian monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow to Canterbury went back to Benedict Biscop, who for two years governed the abbey of Saint Austin.

[30] Bede, Historia abbatum 6, ed. Plummer, 369.

[31] Wallace-Hadrill, op. cit., 527ff.

[32] A. W. Clapham, "Notes on the Origins of Hiberno-Saxon Art," Antiquity 8 (1934), 43–57; F. Massai, Essai sur les origines de la miniature dite irlandaise (Brussels 1974); F. Henry, "Les défuts de la miniature irlandaise," Gazette des Beaux Arts (1950), 5–34; F. Massai, "Il monachesimo irlandese nei suoi rapporti col continente," Settimane di studio, . . . IV. Il monachesimo nell' Alto Medioevo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale (Spoleto, 1957), 139–163. According to M. Deanesly, the abstract Hiberno-Saxon art of the cross and manuscript came from Iona via Solway Firth to Lindisfarne. The Northumbrian manuscript illumination combined Celtic and classical traditions (relationship, not filia-

Strange to say, the literary influence of the Emerald Isle gained recognition especially in southern England c. 700: through Aldhelm, who had grown up in the West Saxon abbey of Malmesbury, founded by Irish, and who adopted the obscure style of the Irish, characterized by alliteration and affected vocabulary.

While in the Romance lands Latin was still so close to the colloquial speech that it could also be still understood in broader circles, the problem of the popular tongue presented itself early in Ireland and England. Christianization had already given rise in Ireland to a literature in the popular speech, and we also observe the same phenomenon in England. Aethelbert's Kentish Lex is the first national law written down in the German language. The Widsith and the Beowulf epic—monuments of the pagan heroic age—must first have been fixed in writing in the eighth century. But also the new Christian content pressed for expression in the national language: Bede reports about the stablehand Caedmon, who received from God in a dream vision the commission to sing his praise. Caedmon entered the monastery of Whitby and followed the command, ita ut, quicquid ex divinis litteris per interpretes disceret, hoc ipse post pusillum verbis poeticis maxima suavitate et conpunctione compositis, in sua, i.e., Anglorum lingua proferret.[33] Caedmon introduced a religious poetry into the popular language, the chief works of which belong to the eighth and early ninth centuries.

The beginnings of Christian Anglo-Saxon culture decayed with the close of the mission in England, the last acts of which were the conversion of Sussex (680–85) and of the Isle of Wight. A few years later the mission crossed to the continent with Willibrord. But the Anglo-Saxon mission on the continent belongs to Frankish history. For the home of a saint is—as we may say by varying a fine expression of Delehaye[34]—not the country in which he was born, but the spot of earth where he worked and where his remains rest.

---

tion, with the Irish art of the Book of Durrow and the Book of Kells) and developed its own metaphorical style (Pre-Conquest Church, 183–187).

[33] " . . . so that, whatever he learned of Holy Scripture through interpreters, he expounded after a brief interval in poetic words of the greatest beauty and deepest sensitivity in his own tongue, that is, that of the Angles" (Hist. eccl. IV, 22).

[34] "La patrie du martyr n'est pas la contrée qui lui a donné le jour, mais l'endroit de la terre qu'il a arrosé de son sang et òu reposent ses restes" (H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, [Brussels, 2nd ed. 1933], 40).

SECTION TWO

Inner Life of the Church to the End of the Seventh Century

CHAPTER 38

North African Christianity from the Beginning of Vandal Rule to the Muslim Invasion[1]

When Augustine's life was nearing its end, the Church of North Africa seemed to look forward to a peaceful further development. The majority of the population of the Roman provinces, especially in the cities, had converted to Christianity; the still pagan minority, including members of the intellectual and propertied upper class, could be gained through a prudent missionary work, as could the pagan tribes on the long southern frontier of the romanized territory, to whom thus far too little attention had been given, because all too many personnel were tied down by the conflict between Catholics and Donatists. True, the Donatist denomination still existed, but it was forced on the defensive by State measures and especially by Augustine's theological work. Here too a positive development could be anticipated, if Augustine's program was followed, which had as its goal the inner reconciliation of the two denominations. But all this depended decisively on a consolidating of the political situation in the Western Empire, which had fallen into a very precarious position because of the wanderings of the peoples.

The North African Church under Vandal Rule

Suddenly the relatively calm situation changed for North Africa also, when in May 429 the tribe of Arian Vandals, then numbering c. 80,000 persons, under King Gaiseric (428–477) crossed from the southern Spanish coast to Tangiers and began its progress through the Roman provinces.[2] Thus began for the North African Church a period, lasting more than a century, of suppression and persecution by the new rulers, which added to it severe material and even deeper-reaching moral injuries. This persecution, which probably affected Catholics and Donatists in equal measure, knew two phases of greater and lesser intensity; it also had locally circumscribed centers of gravity and occasionally was suspended for several years, but it can neither be questioned as a whole nor minimized in its brutal characteristics. The statements of the different sources, among them eyewitness reports, are too unanimous for this and are in part confirmed by archeological investigation.[3]

---

[1] Since North African Christianity had to experience from 430 to 700 a development strongly differing from the rest of the Latin Church, a comprehensive presentation is suggested for it here.

[2] Victor of Vita, Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae 1, 2. For the earlier history of the Vandals, cf. the works of L. Schmidt and C. Courtois (in the literature).

The first, extremely harsh wave of persecution extended from the beginning of the invasion to the definitive establishment of Vandal power (429–442). Since the Vandals were preceded by the reputation of a special intolerance toward the Catholic clergy, many bishops and priests considered flight, but the aged Augustine at once intervened with a clarifying word and stressed firmly that it was the duty of the clergy to persevere everywhere, even if only a remnant of the congregations remained which would need the help of its priests then in precisely such a situation of misery.[4] The first reports on the behavior of the conquerors which reached the eastern provinces were depressing: churches burned, monasteries destroyed, cemeteries desecrated, private houses plundered, and everywhere the corpses of the slain or of those tortured to death.[5] The roads were inundated with refugees, and Bishop Capreolus of Carthage could not even gather the bishops for a synod in order to appoint the delegates for the Council of Ephesus.[6] Only a few cities, such as Cirta, Hippo, and Carthage, which were moreover filled with refugee peasants, were able to hold out longer. A first agreement with Ravenna, which in 435 recognized the Vandals as foederati, was exploited by Gaiseric to prepare for new warlike measures, and the persecution of the clergy continued. In the province of Byzacena the bishops of Vita and Usurita were tortured to death; three others, including Possidius of Calama, were exiled; three noble Spaniards in Vandal service who refused to convert to Arianism were executed.[7] A series of sermons give information about the situation and frame of mind of the Catholics, especially in Carthage before the conquest of the city in 439; with good reason they are attributed to the

---

[3] The attempt by C. Courtois, Victor de Vita et son oeuvre (Algiers 1954), to question extensively the value of the statements of Victor's Historia persecutionis has rightly been rejected.

[4] Augustine, Ep. 228 ad Honoratum, put by Possidius in his Vita s. Augustini, c. 30.

[5] Victor of Vita, Hist. 1, 3–4; Possidius, Vita s. Augustini, c. 28.

[6] Capreolus, Ep. ad concil, Ephes., ACO I, 2, 64, PL, Suppl. 3, 259.

[7] Victor of Vita, Hist. 1, 10; Honoratus, Ep. ad Arcadium (PL 50, 567–570); Prosper, Chron. ad. a. 437/38.

Bishop Quodvultdeus.[8] He regarded the calamity which had overtaken the Church of North Africa as punishment for the tepidity of many Christians, who were even now to be found in the circus instead of letting themselves be guided by the heroic model of their martyrs, Perpetua, Felicity, and those who right then in the country were more gladly enduring death than betray their faith. An apparently considerable number of Christians had already succumbed to the pressure of the enticements of the Vandals and had gone over to the Arian profession. In the most severe expressions they were warned of attempts at blackmail and bribery.[9]

After the fall of Carthage the wrath of the conquerors exploded in full force against the inhabitants because of their long resistance. So many people met death that they had to be interred in a mass-grave without ecclesiastical burial. Plundering affected especially the property of the Church: the principal churches of the city were given to the Vandal clergy, others were used as barracks. Bishop Quodvultdeus was banished with a part of his clergy and taken to damaged ships, which however still reached Naples.[10] The senators and other members of the upper class were first expelled from the city, then banished from the country. Flight brought some of them as far as Syria, where Bishop Theodoret of Cyrrhus took care of them.[11] An organized care of souls was not possible for years in the occupied territories, and the demoralizing consequences were not lacking. The pressure was partly alleviated when a new treaty between Gaiseric and the Emperor Valentinian III in 442 transferred to the Vandals the provinces of Proconsular Africa, Byzacena, Tripolitana, and eastern Numidia as an independent sovereignty—the so-called sortes Vandalorum—while western Numidia and the two Mauretanias remained imperial. Pope Leo I at once tried to reconstruct, at least in these provinces, a Church government capable of functioning.[12] After a vacancy of fifteen years, the Vandal King also allowed the occupation of the see of Carthage by Bishop Deogratias in 454.[13]

The political chaos produced in Italy by the assassination of Valentinian III in 455 was exploited by Gaiseric for a quick attack by his fleet on the Tyrrhenian Sea; he took Rome by a coup de main and subjected the city to a heavy contribution in art treasures and precious metals; Pope Leo I had to surrender liturgical vessels but obtained from Gaiseric in return that the city would be spared burning and bloodshed. In addition to the widowed Empress and her two daughters, the Vandals carried off to Africa a large number of captives of different ranks, whose misery Bishop Deogratias tried to alleviate so far as he could. When he died in 457, the Church of Carthage was again orphaned for twenty-four years.[14] Any new filling of an episcopal see that became vacant was forbidden, so that of the 164 episcopal communities of Proconsular Africa eventually only three had a bishop.[15] Not until toward the end of Gaiseric's reign could the Emperor Zeno obtain permission for the return of the exiled clerics (475).[16]

---

[8] Catalogue of the twelve sermones: CIP, nos. 401–412; survey of the state of the discussion about the author in P. Courcelle, Histoire littéraire, 126, note 7.

[9] Especially characteristic are the two sermones de tempore barbarico, PL, Suppl. 3, 287–298, and PL 40, 698–708.

[10] Victor of Vita, Hist. 1, 6; 1, 9; 1, 16.

[11] Ibid. 1, 12; 1, 15; Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Ep. 29, 31, 36, 52–53, 70.

[12] Leo I, Ep. 12; Ad episc. Afr., PL 54, 646–656.

[13] Victor of Vita, Hist. 1, 24.

The first years of the reign of King Hunneric (477–484) seemed to introduce a change for the better, since Catholic worship was again allowed and the community of Carthage obtained a new head in Bishop Eugene (481).[17] Through his social concern, he quickly gained high esteem, but thereby aroused the envy of the Vandal clergy and of the Patriarch Cyrila, who gradually succeeded in inducing the King to a change of course. At first attendance at Catholic worship was forbidden to all who wore Vandal dress, hence also to all Catholics in the service of the Vandals.[18] A repulsive campaign of moral defamation of clergy and nuns ensued. Then all Catholics in the army and administration were given the alternative of accepting Arianism or giving up their positions; but the latter were punished by confiscation of property and banishment to Sicily or Sardinia.[19] With the issuing of a decree in 483 which banished almost 5,000 people, clerics and laity of all classes, to the frontier district of the province of Byzacena, dominated by the Moors, the persecution under Hunneric reached its first climax. Victor of Vita described the march of the exiles to the desert, partly as an eyewitness; for many it became a road to death. Rediscovered inscriptions and the remains of a memorial chapel of their graves confirm his report.[20]

Probably as a reply to the remonstrances of the Emperor Zeno, Hunneric summoned the Catholic bishops to Carthage for a religious discussion on 1 February 484,[21] although the Vandal clergy, in contrast to the Catholic, had hitherto shown little interest in theological discussion.[22] Bishop Eugene wanted also Catholic representatives from non-African countries, especially from Rome, to be invited to it, because a discussion between Arians and Catholics was not merely an inner African matter. The request was rejected, and before the beginning of the conference some Catholic bishops who were versed in theology were banished or intimidated by ill-treatment.[23] What then took place at the sessions under the presidency of the Vandal Patriarch Cyrila was less a religious discussion than a passionate debate of both sides concerning questions of procedure; nevertheless, the Catholics were able to submit a detailed profession of faith, probably drawn up by Eugene.[24] King Hunneric at once took up the charge of the Vandal participants in the meeting that the Catholic bishops were the real mischief-makers and issued an edict which placed the Catholic Church entirely under particular law. According to this, the earlier imperial laws against heretics were again declared valid against all who within a determined interval had not been converted to Arianism: all churches were to be closed, all Masses, baptisms, and ordinations were to be discontinued, the liturgical books were to be destroyed, the church property was to be conveyed to the Vandal clergy.[25] After various tortures, a part of the bishops were deported to Corsica, the majority were degraded to the status of coloni, a remnant were forced to work in the mines.[26] Now the harshest phase of the persecution also overtook the general population; occasionally it had sadistic features. Add to this a severe famine, so that under the double pressure the number of conversions to Arianism from all classes rose sharply, while others bravely endured torture and death.[27] Only the accession of King Gunthamund (484–496) brought a mitigation of the terror. The decrees of banishment were partly annulled, Bishop Eugene after his return in 487 could also resume Mass in the cemetery church of a suburb of Carthage, at his request Gunthamund in 494 finally allowed the return of all the exiles, and Catholic churches were again opened everywhere in the country. The African Church as a whole offered a picture of devastation, in which the spiritual and moral damage weighed far more than the material—a recovery had to last for years. Since the surviving bishops at first could not meet for a synod of the entire African Church, they turned over the question of the treatment of the numerous lapsi to Rome for instructions; the sources, however, supply no data on the number of those willing to do penance.[28]

---

[14] Ibid. 1, 25–27. For the taking of Rome and its consequences see finally H. J. Diesner, Das Vandalenreich, 64f.

[15] Victor of Vita, Hist. 1, 28–29.

[16] Ibid. 1, 51.

[17] Ibid. 2, 1–5.

[18] Ibid. 2, 6–11.

[19] Ibid. 2, 23–25.

[20] Ibid. 2, 26–37; the inscriptions in O. Fiebinger–L. Schmidt, "Inschriftensammlung zur Geschichte der Ostgermanen," DAWW 60 (1917), and 70 (1939), nos. 39 and 15 respectively; picture of an inscription in P. Courcelle, op. cit., plate 31, text p. 362.

---

[21] Decree of convocation in Victor of Vita, Hist. 2, 39.

[22] Until 484 there is known only a discussion between Cerealis and the Arian Bishop Maximinus (PL 58, 757–768), while on the Catholic side a series of African authors were concerned with the theme of Arianism: see Bardenhewer, 4, 545–557.

[23] Victor of Vita, Hist. 2, 39–46. List of participants: Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Africae, CSEL 7, 117–134.

[24] Victor of Vita, Hist. 2, 56–101.

[25] Text of the edict, ibid. 3, 3–14.

[26] Ibid. 3, 20–21.

[27] Ibid. 3, 22–54; the famine and its effects: 3, 55–58.

But no real reconstruction, within and without, came about, for the period of relative toleration ended after the first years of the reign of King Thrasamund (496–523). When the ecclesiastical leadership in the province of Byzacena began around the turn of the century to give new bishops, as far as possible, to the orphaned communities, in opposition, of course, to a royal edict, a new decree sent both consecrators and the newly ordained into exile. Again part of the bishops had to flee or look for a hiding place, again conversions to Arianism were recorded.[29] Among the deported was the new Bishop of Ruspe, Fulgentius, whose theological learning soon made him the intellectual leader of the African episcopate.[30] Through his extensive correspondence, which he carried on from Sardinia, partly as "secretary" of the exiled bishops, through his activity as superior of the monastery founded by him at Cagliari, through his preaching and lecturing, he became a factor in ecclesiastical politics whose importance the Vandal King could not neutralize by mere banishment. When c. 515 Thrasamund let him be brought to Carthage[31] to have him give his opinion in regard to the objections of the Arian clergy against the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, he seemed to have had hopes of a disputation conducted in writing with Fulgentius alone rather than of a religious discussion on the model of 484. The Arian compiler of the objectiones, which the King had presented to Fulgentius, once in writing, the other time only read out, is unknown. Fulgentius replied in two works, which in their verbal respect toward the King corresponded to etiquette, but de facto represented the Catholic standpoint without any compromise; the second turned directly to Thrasamund and demanded of him that he accept the Catholic teaching.[32] Since Fulgentius used the relative freedom granted him in Carthage for a successful activity among Catholics and Arians, under the pressure of the Vandal clergy he had to return to exile in Sardinia in 517. An abecedarian psalm from his pen, oriented on the

---

[28] Mansi 7, 1056–1059, 1171–1174.

[29] Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. II, 2, 3; Coll. Avell., nos. 230–321; Ferrandus, Vita s. Fulgentii, 9, 13, 17–18; Ennodius, Ep. 2, 14.

[30] Cf. the works by G. G. Lapeyre and H. J. Diesner (in the literature).

[31] Ferrandus, Vita s. Fulgentii, 20.

[32] The two works of Fulgentius: a) Responsiones ad dicta regis Thrasamundi, b) Ad Thrasamundum regem Vandalorum libri tres: CChr 91, 67–185.

Augustinian model and sharply anti-Arian, which urged the Catholics to remain true to the faith, belongs to this period.[33] Thus ended in failure the attempt of King Thrasamund to take the Catholic Church of North Africa into the service of the Vandal Kingdom, first by reprisals, then by more ecclesiastico-political procedures.

A lasting peace for the Catholic Church of North Africa was first brought about by the accession of King Hilderic (523–530), to whom hostility to Catholics was foreign, since he had spent years at Constantinople and regarded himself as a member of the Theodosian Dynasty through his maternal pedigree—he was the son of Eudocia and the grandson of Valentinian III. His first measures, probably undertaken in agreement with the Emperor Justin I—annulling of the decree of exile for the bishops, return of the alienated churches, permission for the filling of orphaned sees[34]—gave back freedom of worship and of preaching to the Church and made it possible for it to tackle the reconstruction of a too deeply disturbed ecclesiastical life. As early as 523 the bishops of Byzacena in synods at Junca and Sufes took inventory; two years later the new Bishop of Carthage, Boniface, summoned a general council, in which the list of participants, only sixty bishops, had of course to note many absences.[35] Hilderic's ecclesiastical policy of friendliness to Catholics, however, evoked an ever-growing opposition among the Vandals, at whose head stood Gelimer, a great-grandson of Gaiseric. Then when Hilderic's troops suffered several defeats in battle against rebel Berbers, Gelimer had him imprisoned and himself acclaimed as King of the Vandals in 530. The ever more clearly apparent decay of Vandal power induced the Emperor Justinian I, in spite of some hesitations because of the technical difficulties of the enterprise, to bring the North African provinces again under the full authority of the Empire by a military intervention. In half a year, September 533 to March 534, the Byzantine expeditionary force under Belisarius, supported by the native population, succeeded in breaking the Vandals' resistance. In the victor's triumphal procession at Constantinople was seen their last King, Gelimer.[36]

---

[33] Ferrandus, Vita s. Fulgentii, 21. For the abecedarian psalm see C. Lambot, RBén 48 (1936), 221–234; the text: CChr 91A, 877–885.

[34] Ferrandus, Vita s. Fulgentii, 25–26; Victor of Tunnuna, Chron. ad a. 523; Isidore of Seville, Hist. Wandal. 82. See H. J. Diesner, Die Auswirkungen der Religionspolitik Thrasamunds und Hilderichs auf Ostgoten und Byzantiner (Berlin 1967).

[35] Acts: CChr 149, 254–282; list of participants, ibid., 271f.; see Hefele–Leclercq 2, 1055–1074.

[36] Cf. C. Saumagne, "La reconquête byzantine de l'Afrique," Les Cahiers de Tunisie 7 (1959), 281–297.

Christianity in Byzantine North Africa

The Emperor Justinian, who saw himself confirmed in his religious mission through the success of the North African undertaking, promised in the law which reorganized the administration of the Diocese of Africa that all inhabitants of these provinces would understand in what freedom they could live under his rule.[37] Above all, the Catholic clergy could assume that they had special claim to freedom. They immediately began at a general Synod under Bishop Reparatus of Carthage in 534, in which 220 bishops were able to participate, discussions on the restoration of their so severely injured Church. In this, three problems occupied the foreground: 1) the restoration of all African clerics who were still staying in the other areas of the Empire, but now were needed for the rebuilding of an organized pastoral work in their homeland; 2) the procedure in the reception of Catholics who through force or seduction had gone over to Arianism, among whom were numerous clerics; 3) the reinstituting of the Catholic Church in its previous rights, which included both the return of its former possessions and the recognition of the special position of the Catholic denomination. For the first two questions the Council requested the confirmation of its decrees by Rome. According to these, only those clerics overseas should be received who could show in writing a special commission from their bishop. Further, every Arian cleric willing to return should be received only as a lay person, but the Church should see to his suitable support.[38] For the regulation of the third question an imperial decree was required, and Justinian issued it in August 535.[39] It ordered the return of all church buildings and liturgical vessels and confirmed the metropolitan rights of the Bishop of Carthage. Extremely severe were the measures which the decree laid down in regard to Arians, Donatists, Jews, and pagans: they had to close their churches and stop every cultic act; any gathering was forbidden; it sufficed that they were able to live. The Pope congratulated the Emperor for such zeal for the spread of God's Kingdom.[40]

This harshness would take a bitter toll. When, soon after the return of Belisarius to Constantinople, the indigenous tribes in the south and west of the central provinces rose against the new regime, the Arian and

---

[37] R. Devreesse, "L'église d'Afrique durant l'occupation byzantine," MAH 57 (1940), 143–168. Justinian's law: Cod. Just. I, 27.

[38] Letter of the Synod to Pope John II and replies of Pope Agapitus I: Coll. Avell., nos. 85–87.

[39] Nov. 37.

[40] Coll. Avell., no. 88.

Donatist clergy supported the rebels, so far as was possible, in their war, which lasted more than fifteen years and made a consistent and effective reconstruction of the Catholic Church impossible. But one gets the impression that the episcopate, on the other hand, had no comprehensive reconstruction plan sketched out on a wide view, although occasionally synods were held, which, however, like that of Byzacena in 541, were preoccupied chiefly with the special rights of their ecclesiastical province.[41] Add to this the further burden of the controversy over the Three Chapters, in which the African episcopate took an active part. As its two spokesmen first appeared Facundus of Hermiane and the deacon Ferrandus of Carthage, both of whom repudiated Justinian's theology or called for opposition to it.[42] In 550 the Synod of Carthage even withdrew its communion from Pope Vigilius in the event that he annulled his Judicatum and formally protested to the Emperor against the condemnation of the Three Chapters.[43] Of the heads of the African ecclesiastical provinces summoned to Constantinople, only the Primate of Numidia proved to be submissive to the imperial wishes, while Reparatus of Carthage had to pay for his refusal with banishment to Pontus, where he died in 563. A second group of eight bishops, who were probably chosen as delegates for the Council of 553 by the successor of Reparatus, Primosus of Carthage, because they were loyal to the Emperor, likewise caused no difficulties. After the Council Primasius of Hadrumetum accepted the condemnation of the Three Chapters, in return for which Justinian rewarded him with the dignity of Primate of Byzacena. But on their return to Africa these bishops encountered the cold repudiation of their colleagues, whose resistance to the decrees of 553 they could break only with the aid of the State's power. Among the unreconciled was Victor of Tunnuna, who as an exile had to lead a ceaselessly itinerant life and was finally confined to a monastery in Constantinople.[44]

With the accession of Justin II (565–578) this theological strife gradually died out, but the authoritarian claims of the Byzantine Emperor left their mark on the African episcopate. In the Exarch of Carthage they constantly had the representative of imperial power close by; he had to foster the true faith, of course, but at the same time he understood this commission as control over the Church or as a right to interfere in its affairs. Thus more and more there spread among the bishops a certain resignation, and smaller and smaller grew the number of those who devotedly troubled themselves over the restoration of religious life. Furthermore, a peaceful development favorable to this was again and again placed in jeopardy by tedious struggles with the rebel tribal chiefs, such as King Garmul, which only came to an end under the Emperor Maurice.

---

[41] Mansi 9, 111f., Justinian, Nov. 131.

[42] Ferrandus, Ep. 6; Facundus Hermian., Pro defensione trium capitulorum, PL 67, 527–852; two other works on the question, ibid., 853–878. The leading role of the African bishops in the Controversy over the Three Chapters is stressed by R. A. Markus, "Reflections on Religious Dissent in North Africa in the Byzantine Period," StChH 3 (1966), 140–149.

[43] Victor of Tunnuna, Chron. ad a. 550.

[44] Ibid., ad a 551 ss.

In the face of the frequent encroachments of an often corrupt bureaucracy the African Church more than previously sought aid from the Roman Pope, but only men like Gregory the Great could occasionally secure remedies here. His correspondence with his Legate, Hilary, with some reliable bishops, and with the high State officials partly discloses serious abuses also in the higher clergy, which could only be regarded as signs of a progressively negative development. Tirelessly, Gregory sought to shake the bishops out of their lethargy, which showed itself especially in regard to the Donatists, who were becoming again very active in Numidia, since the Emperor Maurice had relaxed Justinian's strict decrees. The Synod under Dominic of Carthage in 594 at least decided to watch more zealously than before over the preservation of the purity of the faith, but it still had to threaten with deposition bishops who were all too negligent. Several synods of Numidia likewise worked for the localizing of the danger, but Donatism persisted until the Muslim conquest.[45]

However, the resumption of missionary work among the pagan tribes in the frontier zones of the provinces represented a positive characteristic in the life of the African Church of this time. Here the Byzantine policy of securing the Empire's boundaries by the christianization of the population at the same time coincided with the Church's mission mandate. Already under Justinian the Moorish tribes in the south of the province of Tripolitana had been gained for Christianity. The year 569 brought the conversion of the Garamantes in the district of Fezzan in southwest Libya.[46] And in the south of Byzacena Christianity found entry among the tribes in the oasis of Girba and in the southern slope of the Aurès Mountains. In the extreme west of Mauretania Caesariensis numerous Christians lived under the rule of King Masuna, and their bishops took part in the synods at Carthage. Even Arabic authors attest that the Islamic troops in their conquest encountered many native tribes that professed Christianity.[47] The representatives of this mission activity are unknown as individuals. However, the outcome of their efforts was not lasting, since the follow-up of the evangelization requiring years, which would have assured a conversion in depth, was missing. Under the burdens of the Muslim invasion that soon occurred, the new faith possessed only slight and easily paralyzed powers of resistance.

---

[45] On Gregory's correspondence with Africa see P. Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam II, 2 (Paris 1965), 226–233; on Donatism c. 600: R. A. Markus, StChH 1 (1964), 118–126, who, however, probably correctly, would see the basis for the careless attitude of some Catholic bishops in regard to the Donatists in a toleration, agreed to by both denominations, that had meanwhile appeared.

[46] Procopius, De aedif. 6, 4, 12; John of Biclar, Chron. ad a. 569.

The scanty sources on the interior situation of North African Christianity begin to flow somewhat more abundantly in the first decades of the seventh century, when the Monothelite Controversy made an impact here too. With the wave of eastern Christians who fled to Africa before the Muslim conqueror c. 640 came also adherents of Monothelitism, whose propaganda was, of course, at first severely suppressed by the Exarch George with the approval of the Catholics.[48] An opportunity for the African Church to reject the new theological doctrine just as decisively as once it had rejected the condemnation of the Three Chapters was the public dispute between Maximus Confessor and the former Patriarch Pyrrhus of Constantinople at Carthage in 645, in which Maximus overwhelmingly demonstrated the untenability of the Monothelite theology.[49] The bishops informed Pope Theodore of their rejection of Monothelitism and at the same time asked him to induce the Patriarch Paul of Constantinople to the same view or to exclude him from ecclesiastical communion. They addressed a letter with the same content to the Emperor Constans II (641–668), and finally directly called upon the Patriarch to abandon the erroneous teaching at the beginning of 646.[50] A delegation of African bishops took part in the Lateran Synod of 649, at which Pope Martin I solemnly rejected Monothelitism. With the episcopate of the other western countries the bishops of Africa adhered to Rome's verdict, which the Pope made known to all churches by an encyclical.[51]

The Muslim Invasion and the Ruin of North African Christianity

The tedious theological confrontations, along with other reasons, had led in the population of the North African provinces to a new wave of hostility toward Byzantine rule. The Exarch Gregory used this situation for open rebellion against the central government, but he was soon involved in battle because of an advance of Arab troops to Sufetula in Byzacena, and in it he found death (647). The incident should have been the signal for the Byzantine government to put the North African provinces at once in a state of defense. When, two decades later, the Arabs again invaded the same province, they could without hindrance build the city of Kairawan as their religious and military center in North Africa; thereby a constant threat to Carthage and the rest of North Africa was created. Only when in 696 the Arabs under Hassan brought Carthage under their power did the Emperor Leontius send a fleet, which was at first able to relieve the city, but in the spring of 697 the Byzantines yielded without a battle rather than face another attack. In the next years, the Muslim troops broke the resistance of the Berber tribes in Numidia and Mauretania, and in 709 all of North Africa except for the bridgehead of Septem (Ceuta) was in their hands.[52]

---

[47] See A. Audollent, "La diffusion du christianisme en Afrique au sud des territoires soumis à Rome, après le V^e siècle," CRAI 1942, 202–216, especially 212f.

[48] Hefele–Leclercq III, 1, 402–404.

[49] Mansi 10, 709–760, and PG 91, 287–354; see Hefele–Leclercq, 422–425.

[50] Mansi 10, 929–931, 943–949; see Hefele–Leclercq, 426–430, and V. Grumel, ÉO 26 (1927), 24–32.

[51] Acts of the Synod: Mansi 10, 863–1183; see E. Caspar, ZKG 51 (1932), 75–137.

Unfortunately there is no eyewitness report from a Christian pen which would directly inform in detail of the conduct of individual Christians as well as of Church leaders during the Islamic conquest and of the situation of Christianity in the following decades. One may certainly reckon with a considerable decline of the Christian population in the years of the subjugation, which was caused by the flight of many Christians to Italy and Gaul as well as by the death of many inhabitants in the severe battles for the possession of the cities, which were in the majority Christian.[53] However, the remainder of the Christians were at first treated according to the usual practice of the conquerors, that is, the exercise of their religion was allowed on the payment of a tax and the renouncing of any propaganda for their faith. But c. 720 a heavy pressure began under the Caliph Omar II on the still Christian Berbers to convert to Islam, and most succumbed to it. Archeological investigation has been able, it is true, to bring to light a considerable number of Christian inscriptions and remains of Christian churches, which attest the continued existence of Christians in several places of North Africa long after the conquest.[54] And reports of Arab writers and even letters from the papal chancery in the eleventh century testify to the continued life of at least small Christian groups up to this period.[55] But these testimonies underscore ultimately the fact that North African Christianity, differently from the Egyptian or Syrian under similar conditions, perished relatively fast as a large organized community. The question often raised as to the causes of this process can be answered only with reference to many factors.[56] A cause reaching far back was produced with the split of African Christianity into a Catholic and a Donatist denomination, which reduced their interior strength more and more. A further weakening followed from the Vandal persecution with its crushing permanent effect, from which the Church never really recovered. The rapid apostasy of the christianized Berber tribes, finally, was very much the fault of the African Christians themselves, who in the fourth century did too little and thereafter carried out an intensive mission activity too late among this part of the population and thus could not achieve an existential conversion. The rest of western and eastern Christianity in its total tragedy scarcely noted the ruin of a Church which had produced figures such as Tertullian, Felicity and Perpetua, Cyprian, and Augustine. There were no voices that would have given authentic expression to the shock of this loss.

---

[52] See finally M. Dall'Arche, Scomparsa del Cristianesimo ed espansione dell'Islam nell'Africa settentrionale (Rome 1967).

[53] Dall'Arche, op. cit., 150f.

[54] See W. Seston, "Sur des derniers temps du christianisme en Afrique," MAH 53 (1936), 101–124.

[55] C. Courtois, "Grégoire VII et l'Afrique du Nord. Remarques sur les communautés chrétiennes d'Afrique au XIe siècle," RH 195 (1945), 97–122, 193–226.

[56] C. J. Speel, "The Disappearance of Christianity from North Africa in the Wake of the Rise of Islam," CH 29 (1960), 379–397, who especially strongly emphasizes the effects of the Vandal persecution.

CHAPTER 39

The Papacy between Byzantium and the German Kingdoms from Hilary (461–468) to Sergius I(687–701)

The relative understanding with the Christian East, especially with Byzantium, reached under Pope Leo I, continued under his successor, Hilary (461–68),[1] who as Legate at the Synod of Ephesus of 449 had become acquainted with the East from personal observation. But a new topic of future papal concern was already intimated during his reign: the relationship to the Arian Germans. Hilary had to live with the fact that an Arian community had established itself in Rome and with the help of the German military commander Ricimer built a church of its own, from which grew the Church of Santa Agata dei Goti.[2] His program, announced at his accession, that he would strive especially for the unity of the episcopate, caused him to intervene repeatedly in the questions of jurisdiction among the Gallic and Spanish bishops, and in these cases he preferred to have his decisions reached at Roman synods.[3]

---

[1] Letters in A. Thiel, op. cit., 126–174.

[2] See H. Grisar, Geschichte Roms und der Päpste I, 88.

The extant correspondence[4] of Pope Simplicius (468–483) shows that the post-Chalcedon development in the East was beginning to claim the special attention of the Popes. There, under the Emperors Leo I (457–474) and Zeno (474–491), the nascent Monophysite movement succeeded in filling the sees of Alexandria (Timothy the Cat) and Antioch (Peter the Fuller) with its own men, who enjoyed the special favor of the usurper Basiliscus (475–476). When the last-named, under their influence, condemned the creed of Chalcedon and the Epistola dogmatica of Pope Leo I in his Encyclion, and thereby intended to restore the Christological question to the position of Ephesus of 431, and when some 500 bishops, even though under pressure, assented to the edict, it was understood at Rome on what precarious ground the result gained with so much work at Chalcedon stood. In a series of letters Pope Simplicius implored the Emperor Zeno, restored to power in 476, and the Patriarch Acacius (471–489) to preserve the legacy of Chalcedon and to eliminate the people who were threatening it. The delaying tactics of Acacius, concerning whose failure to supply information the Pope repeatedly complained bitterly,[5] led to a steadily growing mistrust on the part of Rome, especially when Constantinople elevated an open supporter of Timothy the Cat, Peter Mongus, to be Patriarch of Alexandria. This mistrust in Rome worked disastrously in regard to the Henoticon, composed by the Patriarch Acacius and issued by the Emperor in 482, which aimed to bring about a union of the factions by a compromise, avoiding an unambiguous acknowledgment of Chalcedon but expressly recognizing Cyril's anathemas. The Henoticon promptly obtained the consent of the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, who interpreted it in the Monophysite sense. The urgent warnings of the Pope against an obliteration of principle remained unheeded.

Since neither Emperor nor Patriarch even notified the Pope about the Henoticon, the far more self-conscious and energetic Felix II (483–492),[6] in comparison to Simplicius, decided on crucial but momentous measures, especially since the abbot of the monastery of the Acemetae monks of Constantinople was complaining of Rome's hitherto hesitant attitude toward the Monophysite movement that was growing ever stronger. A papal embassy brought letters for the Emperor and the Patriarch, in which the latter was summoned to a Synod at Rome. When the papal legates were thereupon first imprisoned at Constantinople and then won over by bribes to accept the communion of Acacius and Peter Mongus, Felix II, in the setting of a Synod in July 484, had the Bishop of Constantinople solemnly deposed from his priestly office and any communion with him forbidden. In several letters to the clergy and people of Byzantium, to the monks of the city and its vicinity, but especially to Acacius and the Emperor himself, the decree of the Synod was made known and justified in sharp expressions.[7] The chief reason for the condemnation of the Patriarch was, in Rome's view, the fact that he had again accepted the ecclesiastical communion of Peter Mongus, whom he had himself once condemned as a heretic, and whose condemnation he had also demanded of Rome. At Rome, despite Acacius's contrary assertions, people remained convinced that the Patriarch of Alexandria had never repudiated his rejection of Chalcedon, especially since his adherents in Rome confirmed this.[8] Thus the Roman decision meant an open break between East and West, the Acacian Schism, which was deepened through the sharp and at times cutting instruction, never heard since the time of Ambrose, to the Emperor Zeno on the limits of imperial power vis-à-vis the Church: "The Emperor is a son of the Church, not a bishop of the Church. In matters of faith he must learn, not teach. . . . By God's will the direction of the Church belongs to the bishops, not to the civil power. If this is a believer, then God intends it to be subject to the Church."[9]

---

[3] The universalis concordia sacerdotum, Ep. 6, 2; here too his second principle: "ut in una ecclesia . . . una sit in omnibus observantia disciplinae."

[4] Thiel, 174–214; fourteen letters also in the Coll. Avell. For the post-Chalcedon development in the East see supra, Chapters 22–26 and W. H. C. Frend (Literature). Here it is only alluded to in so far as it is relevant to the contemporary papacy.

[5] Cf. for example, Ep. 17, 18, 20.

[6] His letters in Thiel, 222–277 and in part in E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen (Munich 1934).

Pope Gelasius I (492–496)

The freedom of the Church from the tutelage of the State, here demanded, was also the primary goal of the activity of Pope Gelasius I (492–96), who as Felix II's deacon, had formulated the statements quoted.[10] The erasing of the names of Acacius and Peter Mongus from the diptychs remained for Rome the conditio sine qua non for the restoration of unity: only thus, so it was thought, was a clear recognition of Chalcedon assured. This attitude was also maintained when Acacius's successor Fravitas, made known to the Pope the hope of an elimination of the schism, and also when the next Patriarch, Euphemius (490–495), held himself aloof from Peter Mongus, because the latter had demanded of Fravitas the rejection of the Council of Chalcedon and thereby had himself confirmed Rome's suspicion of his Monophysite connections.[11] The reply of Gelasius I to Euphemius's notification of his election, which clearly aspired for peace and was not sparing in its praise of the Pope, was not only inflexible in the matter but even in form was a perplexing mixture of cold lack of courtesy and irony.[12] The Pope utilized his first contact with the Emperor Anastasius I (491–518) for the presentation, more moderate in tone but portentous for the future in its content, of the task and rank of the two powers by which the world is ruled, the auctoritas sacrata pontificum and the regalis potestas.[13] The competence of the latter is fully recognized for the secular sphere, and it also binds the bishops, but it remains subordinate to the former, so that the Emperor cannot direct the bishops, to whom res divinae are entrusted, according to his will, but is dependent on their judgment. Among the representatives of the spiritual authority, the occupant of that see is again preeminent whom the word of Christ placed ahead of all and whom the Church from time immemorial has recognized as its supreme head. The responsibility placed on this Apostolic See for the preservation of the purity of the faith has made necessary the exclusion of Acacius, since he maintained communion with those who rejected the creed of Chalcedon.[14] Gelasius also staunchly defended these views in his letter to the episcopate of the provinces of Illyricum and Dardania, which were especially exposed to Greek counterpropaganda. He thereby definitively secured himself against the reproach made by the Greeks that basically the See of Rome did not care about the question of faith but about the condemning of persons through whom it felt itself injured.[15] In reality, the theological question so deeply troubled the Pope that he gave an account of it in several treatises, some of them quite detailed, especially in the work De duabus naturis, which went beyond Leo I's achievement, since it displayed a deeper knowledge of Greek theology and found more precise formulations, even if it could not define the exact relationship of nature and person.[16] It must be admitted that Gelasius I understood that to a great degree he was responsible for preserving the heritage of Chalcedon from any falsification and depreciation, and since he saw it threatened also by the imperial power, he sharply pointed out the State's limits in relation to the Church. Unfortunately, he defended his view vis-à-vis Constantinople with a roughness that was bound to make the opponent obdurate rather than flexible.

---

[7] Felix II, Ep. 3–4, 6–12.

[8] See the extensive justification of Rome, probably put together under Felix II, among the letters of Gelasius I: Ep. 1, 18.

[9] Ibid., 1, 10.

[10] Cf. H. Koch, "Gelasius im kirchenpolitischen Dienst seiner Vorgänger," SAM 1935, 6; restrictive of this: N. Ertl, AUF 1 (1937), 56–112 and DA 2 (1938), 219f. The letters and treatises of Gelasius in Thiel, 285–613; the letters of the Collectio Britannica in P. Ewald, NA 5 (1880), 509–562, and in S. Löwenfeld, Epistulae Pontificum Romanorum ineditae (Leipzig 1885, reprinted at Graz 1959).

---

[11] Felix II, Ep. 14 and 15; Theophanes reports on the conflict of Peter Mongus with Euphemius, Chron. ad a. 5981.

[12] Gelasius I, Ep. 3.

[13] Gelasius I, Ep. 12, 2–3. On the terminology see W. Ensslin, HJ 74 (1955), 661–668, and W. Ullmann, op. cit., 18–20. On the Emperor's religious policy see C. Capizzi, L'imperatore Anastasio I (Rome 1969), 100–137. On the "Two-Power Theory," see A. K. Ziegler, "Pope Gelasius I and His Teaching on the Relation of Church and State," The Catholic Historical Review XXVII, 4, 412–437.

[14] Gelasius I, Ep. 12.

[15] Ibid. 7, 18, 26, 27.

The opinion that the Pope's intransigent attitude is explained by the strong backing which the Ostrogothic power in Italy gave him against Byzantium finds no corroboration in the sources. Already as a deacon, Gelasius had defended this policy in respect to Constantinople, before Theodoric had firmly established himself in Italy, and as Pope he just as courageously warned the Gothic Count Teja not to interfere in ecclesiastical affairs, especially since he belonged to another denomination and his master, Theodoric, had recognized the autonomy of the Church. When he once enumerated examples for ecclesiastical opposition to State encroachments, he could with satisfaction refer to the fact that he himself had refused any obedience to the German King Odocer, when the latter demanded something unlawful from him.[17] It is understandable that the Pope repeatedly turned to Theodoric from nonpolitical motives, since the Gothic King had expressly guaranteed to respect the Catholic Church and especially the Roman See.[18] If Gelasius's understanding of the primacy, as it is manifested in word and deed, is compared with that of Leo I, two important further developments become prominent: the obligation of the Roman Bishop to watch over the purity of doctrine was drawn more strongly into the foreground and maintained without compromise, and the freedom of the Church with respect to the highest representatives of the civil power was thought out anew and more deeply and formulated with a precision which defined the relations of the two powers to each other for the West for centuries, in a sense that strongly deviated from the understanding of the Byzantine imperial power.[19] [16] The treatise De duabus naturis in E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen, 85–106, then PL, Suppl. 3, 763–787; on the importance for the history of dogma see F. Hofmann, Chalkedon II, 64. Also the comprehensive treatise, Adversus Pelagianam haeresim (Thiel, 571–598) attests the Pope's theological interest.

---

[17] See footnote 9, Letter to Teja: PL, Suppl. 3, 753f.; on Odoacer: Ep. 26, 11.

[18] See W. Ensslin, Theoderich der Grosse (Munich, 2nd ed. 1959), 98–103.

[19] See A. St. McGrade (Literature for this chapter).

Because of this activity, another aspect in the total work of Gelasius I is occasionally unduly relegated to the background—his extensive pastoral work. In the heavy afflictions which the Ostrogothic conquest meant for the population of Italy, he exerted himself tirelessly for the alleviation of every misery. From Theodoric's mother, the Catholic Ereleuva, he asked support for his seeking of aid from the King.[20] He repeatedly reminded the clergy that one-fourth of the revenues of a church must be used for the poor, that the bishops should maintain captives and strangers from their share, that a conscientious administration of Church property was a duty of the episcopal office.[21] Concern for widows and orphans had to remain a constant aim of the clergy.[22] He often protested the rather frequent violation in those disturbed times of the churches' right of asylum.[23] An irrevocable presupposition for the pastoral mission of the Church was seen by Gelasius to be a zealous, conscientious clergy; in a comprehensive decretal he assembled guidelines for the selection of recruits, for their formation, for the active care of souls, for the building, endowing, and dedicating of churches.[24] True, the Pope had far more to blame than to praise in his clergy, but he still had a sympathetic heart for their problems and needs; full of concern, he inquired after the state of health of a sick bishop, warmly interceded for a priest whom some wanted to deprive of his position after an accident, and threatened to report to the King an official who disregarded the rights of his clergy.[25] Just as little did the Pope put up with a diminution of the rights of the lower clergy and of the laity by the bishops; when, during the election of a bishop, the bishops wanted to make the decision on the candidate among themselves, he decisively insisted that the clergy of all parishes and the entire community should take part in the election.[26]

Liturgical activity did not occupy the lowest rung in the pastoral work of Gelasius I. He may be regarded as the compiler of the old Roman Kyrie-Litany, the Deprecatio Gelasii, which was probably introduced in connection with an adaptation of the Universal Prayer, related to it in content, in the Mass liturgy.[27] Finally eighteen Mass formularies preserved in the Sacramentarium Leonianum go back to him. They are all in the context of Gelasius's struggle against the spring festival of the Lupercalia on 15 February, still attractive to many Romans in his day even if no longer understood in its pagan meaning; he took a stand against it in his comprehensive "Open Letter."[28]

---

[20] Gelasius I, Fragm. 36.

[21] Gelasius I, Ep. 14, 27; 17, 1; Fragm. 22–24, 28, 34. Dionysius Exiguus praises his beneficence: ". . . omnes fere pauperes ditans inops ipse moreretur" (Thiel, 287).

[22] Fragm. 31–33, Ep. 1, Löwenfeld.

[23] Fragm. 39–40.

[24] Gelasius I, Ep. 14; Fragm. 48 supplies a concise mirror of bishops.

[25] Fragm. 9; Ep. 9, Löwenfeld.

[26] Fragm. 4.

[27] The Deprecatio Gelasii, edited by B. Capelle, RBén 46 (1934), 135–144; see J. A. Jungmann, Missarum sollemnia I, 416–419 (with the text of the Deprecatio).

Under Pope Anastasius II (496–98) a change in the relations between Rome and Byzantium seemed to be in progress, since he delegated an embassy to the East to carry notification of his election to the Emperor. In a letter, very humble in form,[29] the Pope expressed his regret over the existing separation and unambiguously recognized the validity of the ordinations and baptisms performed by Acacius, but he still did not see himself in a position to confirm his orthodoxy by placing his name in the diptychs. In another place he even candidly expressed his satisfaction that the Church of Thessalonica had assented to the verdict of Gelasius I on Acacius.[30] Anastasius defended himself against the charge that the Apostolic See, for which he claimed the primacy of the Universal Church, had acted in the condemnation of the Bishop of Constantinople not out of concern for the faith but out of arrogance. The early death of the Pope prevented further discussion.

The split in the Roman congregation over the question of what attitude to maintain toward Byzantium led to a double election and hence to the Laurentian Schism,[31] which for years crippled the activity of the Roman See. After hearing the bitterly feuding factions at Ravenna, King Theodoric first decided against the pro-Byzantine priest Lawrence for Symmachus (498–514), in whose favor the earlier time of his ordination and the greater number of adherents also spoke. At a Roman Synod in 499 Symmachus tried to prevent a repetition of such occurrences by a unique decree on the papal election,[32] which aimed to assure to the reigning Pope a sort of right of designation of his successor and hence in practice excluded the collaboration of the community in the election of the Pope. Although Lawrence signed the synodal decrees and then assumed the see of Nocera, the pro-Byzantine senatorial faction continued its opposition to Symmachus and accused him to Theodoric of serious moral lapses, squandering of Church property, and disregard of the date of Easter, whereupon the King ordered an investigation of the accusations by a synod and appointed a visitor for the Roman Church until a clarification of the affair had been made. Despite repeated admonitions from Theodoric and pressure from the senatorial majority, the Synod, which met from early summer to late autumn 502, could not decide on a formal judicial process against Symmachus because people were of the opinion that the occupant of the Roman See cannot be judged by his subordinates. Finally, it reached the uniquely formulated decree that a verdict in this case must be left to God, that Symmachus himself should be regarded as immune from judgment and able freely to celebrate the liturgy in all churches.[33] But this outcome only hardened the resistance of the opposition, which brought Lawrence back to Rome and, in addition to the papal residence of the Lateran, was able to put him in possession also of most of the Roman titular churches, whereas Symmachus was restricted to Saint Peter's. The continuing disturbances in the city were accompanied by serious literary feuding, in which Ennodius, then still a deacon at Milan, and Avitus of Vienne intervened and in the course of which the so-called Symmachan Forgeries were launched, whose aim it was to prove by the example of alleged cases from the history of the papacy the principle that the first episcopal see cannot be subjected to any court—Prima sedes a nemine iudicatur.[34] Not until the fall of 506, when Theodoric had to take into account the growing political tensions with Byzantium, did he decide, pointedly and definitively, for Symmachus, to whom he had all the churches of Rome given back, and thus caused the end of the schism, especially since the opposing faction soon lost its head through the death of Lawrence, whom Symmachus had excommunicated.[35]

---

[28] All texts edited by G. Pomarès, SChr 65 (Paris 1959), with introduction on Gelasius's authorship.

[29] Anastasius II, Ep. 1 (the four genuine letters of the Pope–1, 3, 4, 6—in Thiel, 615–637).

[30] Anastasius II, Ep. 3, 1.

[31] The most important sources in E. Caspar, Theoderich der Grosse und das Papsttum, KIT 162 (Berlin 1931). Basic for the history of the schism is R. Cessi ASRomana 42 (1929), 5–229; on the synods, G. P. Picotti, Studi in onore di G. Volpe II (Florence 1958), 743–786; finally, C. Pietri, MAH 78 (1966), 123–139.

[32] Preserved as Ep. 1 of the letters of Symmachus Thiel, 641–654.

How very much this victory increased the Pope's self-consciousness in regard to Constantinople appears from his answer to a letter of the Emperor Anastasius, who saw himself betrayed by the Roman Senate and in his anger reviled the "illegally ordained" Pope as a Manichaean. Symmachus paid him back with equally gross coin, accused the Emperor of favoring every heresy, and branded him as a persecutor of the orthodox and a despiser of the Roman See.[36] Also a letter, probably composed by Ennodius by command of the Pope, to the Illyrian episcopate is characterized by a like intransigence toward Constantinople;[37] the gulf was not to be bridged under this Pope.

---

[33] Decree of the Synodus Palmaris in E. Caspar, op. cit., 17.

[34] Text of the forgeries: L. Duchesne, LP I, CXXXIIIff.; a part also in PL, Suppl. 3, 1249ff. Ennodius, Libellus pro synodo; Avitus, Ep. 34 in Caspar, 32–59. On the pre-Constantinian development of the principle, see M. Koeniger, Festgabe A. Ehrhard (Bonn 1922), pp. 273–300.

[35] Fragm. Laurent in Caspar, 31.

[36] Symmachus, Ep. 10; Anastasius's letter is not extant.

In the West Symmachus showed a special interest in the Church of Gaul. He not only restored the old vicariate rights of Arles in their full extent, but extended its jurisdiction even to the Spanish sees. A hitherto unusual distinction of a bishop was the granting of the pallium to Caesarius of Arles.[38] The conversion of the Arian Burgundian Prince Sigismund of Geneva to Catholicism—he appeared also at Rome as a pilgrim[39]—the first case of a change of denomination on the part of a German king, seems however not to have been clear in its significance to the Pope, any more than a Roman reaction to the baptism of the Frankish King Clovis can be perceived.

Pope Hormisdas (514–523)

For Pope Hormisdas (514–523),[40] previously the trusted collaborator and the successor of Symmachus, reconciliation with the East was also a duty of the first rank, but he undertook its solution with much greater caution, flexibility, and genuine readiness for peace. In this he was favored by certain factors of the inner political development in the East, such as the growing discontent of the population of the capital with the pro-Monophysite policies of the reign and the revolt of the general Vitalian in 513–15,[41] which forced the Emperor Anastasius at least temporarily to greater indulgence. To two letters from the Emperor, which invited Hormisdas to a Synod at Heracleia,[42] the Pope replied with the sending of a carefully briefed delegation under the leadership of Ennodius of Pavia in August 515, which explained in Constantinople the Roman minimum conditions for a restoration of peace: recognition of the Council of Chalcedon and of the pertinent writings of Pope Leo by the Emperor and the bishops of the East; condemnation of Nestorius, Eutyches, and their adherents, including Acacius; signing of a libellus, the Formula Hormisdae, and treatment of the cases of the deposed or exiled bishops before a papal tribunal. In addition, detailed instructions were given to the papal embassy for the conduct of the negotiations.[43] But the entire enterprise ended in failure, since the Emperor, after an abatement of the inner political difficulties, was not prepared to accept the Roman demands, especially the condemnation of Acacius.[44] The same fate befell a second attempt of the Pope in 517, who this time had given to his legates a series of letters and propaganda writings for the Patriarch, the bishops of the East, and the clergy and people of the capital. Pope and Emperor maintained their basic positions, and in a crude letter Anastasius declared that further negotiations were meaningless, since he "was unable to accept any commands" from Rome.[45]

---

[37] Symmachus, Ep. 13.

[38] Paraphrase of the rights of the vicariate: Symmachus, Ep. 14 and 16. Granting of the pallium in the decretal Ep. 15, 9; see G. Länggartner, Dei Gallienopolitik der Päpste im V. und VI. Jahrh. (Bonn 1964).

[39] Avitus of Vienne, Ep. 8 and 29 (Sigismund to Symmachus).

[40] Correspondence of Hormisdas in Thiel, 741–990 and, with a few exceptions, also in the Coll. Avell., CSEL 35.

[41] Cf. E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire II (Paris 1949), 177–185.

[42] Coll. Avell., nos. 109 and 107. But the synod probably did not take place.

Only the change on the throne in 518, which placed the Byzantine religious policy in the hands of the Emperor Justin I (518–527), a pro-Chalcedonian, and of his nephew and successor, Justinian I (527–565), brought a fundamental change. Since both men at once asserted their readiness for peace and asked for the sending of an embassy or, if possible, for the personal presence of the Pope, Hormisdas gave his legates the draft for a conclusion of peace, already worked out for Anastasius, in addition to letters to Justin, the imperial nephew, the Patriarch John, and other highly placed personalities of the capital; in these the glad and certain expectation of the restoration of Church unity was emphatically expressed.[46] Immediately after the arrival of the delegation some bishops in the Balkan Peninsula accepted the libellus of Hormisdas and hence confirmed the Roman optimism.[47] Surprisingly quickly, the legates were able to furnish the Pope with a detailed report of the union consummated on 28 March 519, when the Patriarch after initial hesitations signed the libellus amid the acclamations of clergy and people.[48] An enthusiasm of joy and gratitude over the ending of the thirty-five-year-old schism runs through the letters on both sides, exchanged on this occasion; the Pope stressed with praise the share of the Emperor in the arrangement of the union, but also admonished him to be active for the full restoration of unity in Antioch and Alexandria.[49]

There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of the "Gloria in excelsis

---

[43] The Roman conditions in the Indiculus Hormisdae, Coll. Avell., no. 116a; the Formula Hormisdae, ibid., no. 116b; letter to the Emperor, no. 115.

[44] An imperial delegation was supposed to explain to the Pope and the Roman Senate the standpoint of Anastasius: Coll. Avell., nos. 111–114, 125, 137.

[45] Coll. Avell., nos. 126–134, 138. On the details of this second effort, see F. Hofmann, Chalkedon II, 81–84.

[46] Coll. Avell., nos. 141–158.

[47] Ibid., nos. 213–214.

[48] Report of the embassy, Coll. Avell., no. 223, supplemented by Coll. Avell., no. 167.

[49] The entire correspondence in Coll. Avell., nos. 160–165, 168–170, 176; analysis of the letters of Emperor and Patriarch to Rome in L. Magi, 29–55.

Deo" in the letters of thanks and congratulations from Pope Hormisdas to the Emperor Justin.[50] Of course, if the value of the achievement is gauged only on the criterion of the permanence of the success, then, with a view to the new difficulties soon to emerge, one would be inclined to speak of Rome's pyrrhic victory. But such an evaluation is not appropriate to the basically religious motives by which the papacy was guided in its exertions to guarantee the Christological propositions of Chalcedon. One needs only to ask what would have become of these if the papacy had left alone without resistance the changing interests of the imperial policies of the Byzantine Empire.

Resistance to the restored unity came, as was to be expected, principally from Egypt, from where the exiled Severus of Antioch tried to sabotage it, and from the Metropolitan Dorotheus of Thessalonica, whose deprivation of office the Pope was unable to effect with the Emperor.[51] A totally unnecessary threat to the peace was presented also by the so-called Theopaschite Controversy,[52] which proceeded from a group of Scythian monks. They demanded the solemn recognition of the formula "One of the Trinity suffered in the flesh," because by it the Council of Chalcedon was really protected against any Nestorian interpretation. Neither the papal legates at Constantinople nor Hormisdas at Rome saw the necessity of the formula, correct in itself, and rejected it as inopportune, since the statements of Leo I and of the Council of 451 did not require such an interpretive addition, which would perhaps occasion new discussions.

Despite all his involvement in the question of union, Pope Hormisdas sought to maintain close contact with the Western Church, as his correspondence with the Spanish Bishops John of Ilici, Sallust of Seville, the bishops of the province of Baetica, and the entire Spanish episcopate makes clear.[53] He informed them, among other things, of the end of the Acacian Schism, gave guidelines in regard to the discipline of the clergy, inculcated the holding of annual synods, and confirmed and defined the sphere of the Vicariate of Seville, always guided by the effort to keep awake and deepen the awareness of a living connection of the Spanish Church with Rome, even under the rule of the Visigoths.[54] His correspondence with Avitus of Vienne and Caesarius of Arles,[55] with the reports on the status and progress of the negotiations for union with the East, aimed to stimulate interest in the fate of the Universal Church.

---

[50] Coll. Avell., no. 168.

[51] Coll. Avell., nos. 225–227.

[52] See A. Grillmeier, Chalkedon II, 797–805 (Literature).

[53] Hormisdas, Epp. 24–26, 88, 142–143, Thiel.

[54] See the analysis of the letters by K. Schaeferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Suewen (Berlin 1967), 75–81.

[55] Hormisdas, Ep. 9, 22, 150.

Hormisdas's successor, John I (523–26), opened the series of those strikingly brief pontificates, whose holders were necessarily caught up in the struggle which the mortally threatened Ostrogothic Kingdom had to wage against the superior Byzantine power. These Popes were partly not spiritually and morally, partly not even physically equal to the burdens connected with this struggle, and so the papacy of these years had to endure an unmistakable loss of authority. The descent began in the last years of the reign of King Theodoric, who, through the turning of the Burgundian Sigismund and of the Vandal King Hilderic in 523 to the Byzantine Emperor, was thrown into a political isolation, which caused him to end his hitherto tolerant attitude toward the Catholics of Italy. In his suspicions, he had the Patrician Albinus, his minister Boethius (524), and the latter's father-in-law, Symmachus, leader of the Senate, executed, one after the other, because of alleged conspiracy with East Rome or the abetting of high treason.[56] When he learned that the Emperor Justin was applying the laws on heresy against the Arians of the Eastern Empire and turning over their churches to the Catholics, and that many Arians embraced their faith under pressure, he demanded of the Pope a shameful mission: John I, by a personal intervention with the East Roman Emperor, was to demand the repeal of these measures. The Pope, of course, even before his departure from Ravenna, refused to ask for a return of converted Arians to their former denomination. The humiliation imposed on him could not be offset by the manifold honors bestowed on the papal guest—the Emperor accorded him the adoratio proper in itself only to the imperial majesty, and at the Easter liturgy in 526 had the imperial crown placed on his head by the Pope instead of, as usual, by his Patriarch; they only increased the suspicion of the King, who after the Pope's return kept him at Ravenna because of the nonimplementation of his chief demand, and there he quickly died.[57] This treatment made John I a martyr in the eyes of the Roman Catholics, while only a few generations later legend made the Arian Ostrogothic King the melancholy persecutor of Catholics and had him, like Arius, the founder of his denomination, die a ghastly death, fancifully described.[58]

---

[56] W. Ensslin, Theoderich der Grosse (Munich, 2nd ed. 1959), 305–316.

[57] On the relations of Theoderic with Pope John I and on the Pope's journey to Byzantium, see H. Löwe, HJ 72 (1953), 83–100, and P. Goubert, OrChrP 24 (1958), 339–352.

[58] See Anonym. Vales. 16, 94–96; Procopius, Bell. Goth. 1, 1, 35; Gregory I, Dialogi 4, 30.

In an effort to assure a man of his confidence in the Roman See, Theodoric contrived the elevation of the deacon Felix III (526–530) as Pope,[59] but the King's death soon after, in August 526, did not allow a collaboration of any duration. Felix III's intervention in the final phase of the controversy over grace became of importance when he supported Caesarius of Arles in the warding off of Semipelagian tendencies, a help which the Gallic bishop used effectively at the Synod of Orange.[60] Since the opposition between pro-Gothic and pro-Byzantine factions continued even in the Roman clergy, Felix III sought to counter a possible double election after his death by the designation of the Archdeacon Boniface as his successor. His intention was supported by a decree of the Senate, which forbade any agitation about an election during the lifetime of a Pope.[61]

Nevertheless, after Felix's death a majority of the clergy decided on the pro-Byzantine former Alexandrian deacon, Dioscorus, who however died after a few weeks, and so Boniface II (530–32) quickly obtained general acceptance.[62] But when he too designated the deacon Vigilius as his successor, the clergy, with the cooperation of the Senate, compelled him to rescind this uncanonical decree,[63] a procedure which did considerable damage to papal prestige. What possibilities of conflict between Rome and Byzantium were also offered from now on in the Balkans was shown by the case of the Metropolitan Stephen of Larissa, who was deposed by the Patriarch of Constantinople, although his see belonged to the Vicariate of Thessalonica; his appeal to Pope Boniface became the subject of discussion at a Roman Synod.[64]

After a vacancy of three months, during which the papacy again lost respect because of the quarrel over the succession, in accord with the wish of the Ostrogothic King Athalaric the priest Mercury was elected Bishop of Rome—he called himself John II (533–35),[65] the first example of a change of name by a Pope. He let himself be won by the Emperor Justinian I for the acceptance of the Theopaschite Formula, by which the latter intended to strengthen his policy of union in regard to the Monophysites.[66] In this connection Justinian had, it is true, praised the doctrinal authority of the Roman Bishop in high-sounding words, but it became clear here that he would on occasion stress them for his own religious and political goals, an attitude which could easily bring the papacy into serious conflict or into unworthy dependence on the Byzantine imperial office.

---

[59] Thus in agreement are LP I, 106, Duchesne, and Cassiodorus, Var. 8, 15, 1.

[60] Felix III, Ep. ad Caesar Arell., Caesarius, Ep. 11. The syllabus of the Synod of Orange, confirmed by Boniface II: Caesarius, Op. II, 70–78, Morin; see G. de Plinval, Fliche–Martin 4, 397–418.

[61] Praeceptum Felicis and Senatus consultum: ACO IV, II, 96f., PL, Suppl. 3, 1280f.

[62] Formula of recognition of Dioscorus's former adherents: PL, Suppl. 3, 1282.

[63] LP I, 281, Duchesne.

[64] Acts of the synod in the Coll. Thessal. 1–16, Silva-Tarouca.

[65] From him are preserved one letter each to the Emperor Justinian (Coll. Avell., no. 84) and the Roman Senate (ACO IV, II, 206–210), and three to Gaul, Ep. 12–14, among the letters of Caesarius of Arles.

Pope Agapitus I (535–36)[67] showed himself to be equal to this danger to a certain extent: like John I a few years previously, he likewise had to make the journey to the Byzantine imperial court at the command of an Ostrogothic king, Theodahad, in an effort to induce Justinian to halt the already far developed preparations of East Rome for the liberation of Italy from Gothic rule.[68] While the Emperor, who again did not fail in external reverence for the Pope, brusquely rejected Theodahad's request, he showed himself to be surprisingly accessible in the ecclesiastical-political sphere. When, in spite of all pressure, Agapitus stubbornly refused to accept the communion of the Patriarch Anthimus, transferred from Trebizond to the see of Constantinople, friendly to the Monophysites, and a favorite of the Empress Theodora, Justinian abruptly abandoned Anthimus and put in his place the former priest Menas, who even had himself ordained by the Roman Pope. Emperor and Patriarch again professed the Formula of Hormisdas, and Justinian also confirmed the verdict of a synod which came out against Anthimus, Severus of Antioch, and their adherents, even though Pope Agapitus had died at Constantinople, following a brief illness, a few weeks after the elevation of Menas.[69] The sudden death of this strongly principled man, also very receptive to theological scholarship,[70] introduced the most serious crisis of the papacy in the sixth century.

After the news of his death had arrived, Silverius (536–37), a son of Hormisdas, was quickly made Pope by Theodahad. The struggle between the Byzantines and the Ostrogoths for the possession of the City of Rome and the intrigues of the deacon Vigilius, who had counted on his own election, were to be fatal to the new Pope. Even though on his advice the Romans had surrendered the city without a struggle to the Byzantine general Belisarius, the Pope was accused of high treason, deposed in a disgraceful manner, and banished to Lycia. At the command of Belisarius, who was probably following a directive of the Empress Theodora, Vigilius (537–555) was elected his successor. True, Justinian had Silverius brought back to Italy for a new investigation, but [66] Justinian's letter is included in the Pope's reply.

---

[67] Letters: PL 66, 35–47, Coll, Avell., nos. 86–91, Caesarius of Arles, Ep. 15 and 16.

[68] Cf. E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire II, 343.

[69] Coll. Avell., nos. 89 and 90; see Caspar, II, 222–228.

[70] See H. I. Marrou, MAH 48 (1931), 124–169.

Vigilius had him relegated by Belisarius to the island of Ponza, where he died the same year, 537.[71] Vigilius believed he was now at the secure goal of his desires.[72] For the methods he used to achieve it he was to do penance with a humiliation such as had hitherto befallen no Pope.

In 543 the Emperor Justinian had by decree condemned the so-called Three Chapters and now he sought to end the resistance of the West to this edict precisely by having it signed by the Roman Pope, whom he curtly summoned to Constantinople for this very purpose. The tragedy during the eight years of the Pope's stay at East Rome has been told in Chapter 25: on the one side the figure of the authoritarian Basileus, who in opposition to the previous order disposed tyrannically of the doctrine and faith of the Church and played a repulsively cruel game with Vigilius's spiritual misery; on the other side, the equally depressing figure of the Pope, who, weak in character, changed his opinion with the lengthy pressure from the Emperor and entered into a secret, compromising agreement with him, and who ultimately lacked the courage to give the witness to which his office obliged him. In all this he should have been able to appeal for a clear, decisive attitude to the extensive support of the western episcopate, but instead he had to accept from it a stormy protest, which culminated in his excommunication by an African episcopal synod.[73] Spiritually and morally broken, Vigilius died at Syracuse on the return journey to Rome.

The mortgage left by him heavily burdened the pontificate of his successor, Pelagius I (556–561),[74] selected by Justinian. True, as papal apocrisiarius in Byzantium, he had first called upon his master to resist the Emperor's demands and had come out against them in a work of his own,[75] but then he had accepted the verdict of the Synod of 553 against the Three Chapters. Only painfully and with slight success could he overcome the enormous suspicion which he encountered everywhere in the West. In Tuscany several bishops refused to mention his name in the Eucharist, the Metropolitans of Aquileia and Milan renounced communion with him, in Gaul people disseminated his work in defense of the Three Chapters and spitefully compared it with his later attitude.

---

[71] On the deposition of Silverius, see P. Hildebrand, HJ 42 (1922), 213–249; O. Bertolini: ASRomana 47 (1924), 325ff.; and E. Stein, II, 386f.

[72] His letters and decrees: PL 69, 15–178, supplemented by E. Schwartz; Vigilius's letters: SAM (1940), 2, 1–15, and ACO IV, II, 138–168. On the whole matter, L. Duchesne, L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925), 151–218; P. Batiffol, Cathedra Petri (Paris (1938), 286–314; and Seppelt, II, 270–290.

[73] Victor of Tunnuna, Chron. ad a. 550 (2, 202, Mommsen). Also Facundus of Hermiane, Pro defensione trium capit. II, 6, blames the Pope.

[74] Caspar, II, 286–305.

[75] In defensione trium capitulorum, ed. R. Devreesse (Rome 1932), then PL, Suppl. 4, 1284–1369.

Again and again the Pope stressed his loyalty to Chalcedon and the doctrinal writings of Pope Leo I, to his predecessors John II and Agapitus I, and even sent a solemn profession of faith to the Frankish King Childebert.[76] He was able gradually to overcome the opposition of the Romans by means of his grand-scale concern for the poor, the renovation of churches looted during the disturbances of the war, the reorganization of the administration of the papal patrimonies, and, not least, through his exertions on behalf of recruits for the clergy.

Only his successor, John III (561–574), was able to diminish the schism in Upper Italy when in 572 he gained the Bishop of Milan. But the ecclesiastical province of Aquileia again refused any union. In his pontificate occurred the invasion of Italy by the Arian Lombards in 568, whose pitiless warfare extensively limited the activity of his immediate successors, Benedict I (575–79) and Pelagius II (579–590). The appeals for help to Constantinople remained without an echo worthy of mention, since in the East people were tied down by the Persian war. But at that time Pelagius II saw in the Frankish Kingdom a possible support for the papacy, since he designated its kings as the helpers of Rome and Italy appointed by God, a concept which would be realized a century and a half later. Under Pelagius II occurred the first conflict with the Byzantine Church over the title of "Ecumenical Patriarch," which the Pope came upon as a designation for the Bishop of Constantinople in the acts of the Synod of 587.[77]

Pope Gregory the Great (590–604)

With the great-grandson of Felix III[78] there succeeded to the See of Rome a man who again so unmistakably represented the papal office by the uniqueness of his religious and priestly personality that to posterity he long appeared as the ideal figure of the papacy by which its later representatives more and more had to be measured. He came of a senatorial family and had risen in the civil service to be head of the city administration of Rome; after that he lived in the Roman monastery of Sant' Andrea al Monte Celio which he had founded,[79] until he was ordained a deacon in 579.

---

[76] Pelagius I, Ep. 7 (according to the numbering by Gassó-Batlle). He also made a profession of faith before the Roman community immediately after the election: Ep. 11.

[77] Pelagius II, Ep. ad Aunarium episc. (MGEp. III, 448), ACO IV, 2, 105–132; O. Bertolini, pp. 225–300.

[78] Sec. A. Ferrua, "Gli antenati di s. Gregorio M.," CivCatt. (1964), 4, 239/246.

[79] On the discussion of the "Benedictine" character of this monastery, see K. Hallinger, SA 42 (1957), 231–319; O. M. Porcel, Scripta et Doc. 12 (Montserrat 1960), 1–95, and P. Verbraken, StudMon 2 (1960), 438–440.

Gregory saw the relationship of the papacy to the Byzantine imperial office and hence also the relationship of Church and State in fundamentally the same understanding as had his predecessors. For several years, until the end of 585, he had lived as papal apocrisiarius at the Byzantine court, and in his view the Basileus, even when he was so doubtful a character as the Emperor Phocas (602–610), remained in principle the supreme head of the Christian Imperium, called by God, and even the Pope could treat with him only in the established forms of court etiquette. If in regard to the Lombards Gregory regarded as necessary a different attitude from that of the Emperor Maurice (582–602), this was not an indication or a result of a basically new orientation of papal policy, but an insight gained from Italy's bitter, concrete situation and based in the final analysis on pastoral considerations.[80] Since the Exarch of Ravenna was militarily not the equal of the Lombards, their pressure on the people and Church of Italy could be relieved only by the concluding of peace with them, and this again was only assured if there was success in gaining them for the Catholic confession.

It was also principally pastoral motives which caused Gregory's important correspondence with the Merovingian rulers, without whose consent and cooperation a change in the Frankish clergy, especially in the episcopate extensively infected by simony, could not be achieved. And so he had proposed an "eternal peace" between Franks and Byzantines,[81] because in his eyes it was the precondition for the restoration of health to religious life, especially in Italy. If Gregory also did not thus intend the Frankish alliance, de facto by these contacts with the Merovingian Kingdom he created the initial moves toward a development in the course of which the Byzantine protectorate would finally be exchanged for the German.

Gregory's rank in the history of the papacy is also not based on an especially striking defense of the Roman Primacy or on a profound theoretical justification of the primatial idea. Like his predecessor, he also protested against the title of "Ecumenical Patriarch" to John the Faster at Constantinople, because it seemed to him to place in jeopardy the preeminence of the Roman Church. But he lodged his protest in the form of an unofficial discussion and referred the Patriarch to the non-biblical character of this title, just as for himself he refused the title universalis episcopus. When his objection remained without effect, he did not for this reason permit matters to proceed to a break with the East, but, with recourse to a phrase of Augustine, he preferred in his letters the formula servus servorum Dei, which was later adopted by the papal chancery.[82]

---

[80] See Gregory's letter to Maurice, respectful in form but derisive in content: Reg., Ep. 5, 36.

[81] In the letter to King Theodoric II, Reg., Ep. 13, 9.

The real greatness of Gregory is based rather on his extensive pastoral activity, which made him one of the most important shepherds of souls among the Popes. Here must be mentioned charitable activity that shrank from no toil and no sacrifice; by means of it he sought to moderate the overwhelming misery of the people of Italy. Without hesitation he used for this purpose the patrimonial possessions of the Roman Church in Italy, Sicily, Dalmatia, and Provence, which, according to one of his most beautiful expressions, were "the property of the poor,"[83] and energetically reorganized the administration that had been shattered by the confusion of the interminable wars, so that a better yield would be forthcoming. He took the officials directly into the papal service, admonished them firmly to loyalty and justice, and especially protected the small farmers from exploitation. His warm-hearted care was directed especially to the socially weak, the orphans, the ashamed poor, those suddenly fallen into distress through misfortune. This aspect of his work, apart from the grateful devotion of the people, brought to Gregory a degree of esteem in the public life of Italy which elevated him far above the highest ranking official of the country, the Exarch of Ravenna.

Gregory devoted a great deal of time and energy to the improvement of the clergy, who everywhere, especially in the Frankish Kingdom, had sunk to a low level. For them he composed in his Regula Pastoralis an impressive mirror for shepherds, to which he added the happy motto: ars est artium regimen animarum. For centuries this was the book for the pastors of the West to the same degree that the Regula Benedicti was to become so for western monasticism.[84] In addition to the duty of daily self-examination, he especially inculcated in the clergy responsibility for the orthodox proclamation of the faith. Preaching was to take place during the celebration of the Eucharist and especially should explain the gospel of the day. Gregory's forty extant Homilies on the Gospels[85] supply an instructive glimpse into his special manner of preaching. They renounce any rhetorical accessories and aim to touch the heart of the faithful in their intentionally simple style and to impress themselves on the memory with their many examples taken from life.

---

[82] See E. H. Fischer, 97–110.

[83] Reg., Ep. 13, 23, 19.

[84] PL 77, 13–128. The motto, perhaps from Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 2, 16, Reg. past. I, 1. Cf. D. M. Wertz, The Influence of the Regula pastoralis to the year 900 (dissertation, Ithaca 1936); C. Chazottes, Sacerdoce et ministère pastoral d'après la correspondance de s. Grégoire le Grand (dissertation, Lyon 1955); G. Hocquard, La tradition sacerdotale (Lyon 1959), 143–167 (priestly ideal).

[85] PL 76, 1075–1312; see H. Schwank, Gregor d. Gr. als Prediger (dissertation, Berlin, Hanover 1934). On Gregory's liturgical activity, see Chapter 41.

The former monk Gregory gave, even as Pope, a preferred place in his thought and works to monasticism, provided effective aid for monasteries that had fallen into distress, and sought in every way to support and renew monastic discipline. He addressed himself to monks in his most voluminous work, the Moralia in Job,[86] originating in talks which he later retouched. Here and in the twenty-two Homilies on Ezekiel, which likewise presupposed a preponderantly monastic body of readers, Gregory set down his thoughts on Christian ethics, piety, and striving for perfection,[87] gained from an allegorical exegesis of Scripture, which he preferred. What to today's reader seems a defect, precisely allegory, the breadth of the presentation, the numerous digressions, was regarded in another age as praiseworthy excellence and gained a deep-reaching aftereffect for these works in the medieval monasteries and, especially because of their content, in the moral theology of this period.[88] In addition to Scripture, Gregory's personal piety was nourished on that of his favorite author, Augustine, even if for the reproduction of his thought at the end of the sixth century the same linguistic possibilities of expression were no longer at his disposal. By his innermost inclination totally devoted to contemplatio, like his model he did not refuse himself to service for his fellowman in and outside the Church. Although Gregory was deeply affected by the idea that an aging world was moving to an end soon,[89] this conviction did not for a moment cripple his activity, which besides he had to wring from a usually sickly body. Rather, this eschatological tension impelled him to the undertaking which sprang from his initiative and was most pregnant in consequences both for Church history and universal history, the evangelization of the Anglo-Saxons. As no Pope before him, he understood the work of the mission as the first-ranking duty of the supreme head of the Church and in this connection he was the first Pope to consciously direct his gaze beyond the frontiers of the Imperium. His effort to gain the Lombards to Catholicism was partly determined by the severe distress of the Church in Italy itself, but in the Anglo-Saxon enterprise the biblical mission mandate operated in its original purity. (On the course and outcome of the Anglo-Saxon mission, see Chapter 37.)

---

[86] PL 75, 509–1162; 76, 9–782; SChr 32 (1950); SChr, 212 (1974).

[87] See R. Gillet, DSp VI (1967), 881–910, and C. Butler, Western Mysticism (London, 3rd ed. 1967), 65–92, 171–188.

[88] See D. Hofmann (Literature) and R. Wasselynck, L'influence des Moralia in Job de s. Grégoire le Grand sur la théologie morale entre le VII^e et la XII^e siècle (dissertation, Lyon 1956, typed).

[89] C. Dagens, "La fin des temps et l'église selon saint Grégoire le Grand," RSR 58 (1970), 273–288.

Someone once designated Gregory as a "really little great man" and claimed that he did not deserve the nickname "the Great."[90] Such a judgment was to a great extent determined by the lack of sympathy for the religious and moral qualities which were manifest in Gregory's pastoral work. The faithful of Italy and later of the other countries of Western Europe felt with a surer instinct that, besides diplomatic dexterity and authoritarian display, there was also greatness of heart, and for centuries willingly let itself be stamped by Gregory's religious world.

Popes of the Seventh Century

Gregory's immediate successors could not in their mostly brief pontificates maintain the papacy at the height reached by him. More than ever before, it fell into dependence on the Byzantine imperial office and into the tangled mesh of ecclesiastical politics, which operated especially ominously in the Monothelite quarrel. Only a few of its representatives are treated in what follows.

In the history of the City of Rome, Boniface IV (608–615) left his mark, for he obtained the Pantheon from the Emperor Phocas and consecrated it as the Church of Sancta Maria ad Martyres, and so in this way it has been preserved to the present.[91] The Roman Synod of 610 saw the first Bishop of London, Mellitus, among its participants.[92] The Schism of the Three Chapters, not yet liquidated in the ecclesiastical provinces of Milan and Aquileia, evoked new discussions when the Lombard King Agilulf patronized it and the monk Columban of the monastery of Bobbio let himself be induced by him to intervene in the quarrel. In a long letter he exhorted the Pope with Irish verbosity and very audacious formulations to that watchfulness in which, despite his name, Pope Vigilius had been deficient.[93]

The pupil of Gregory the Great, Pope Honorius I (625–638),[94] sought to carry out his office in the spirit of his model, with whom he shared a care for a correct adminstration of the Roman Patrimony and zeal for the winning of the Lombards. He had a partial success in his exertions to liquidate the schism in Upper Italy, since he contrived to fill the metropolis of Grado with a bishop loyal to Rome.[95] Honorius also showed great interest in the progress of the Anglo-Saxon mission and granted the pallium to the Metropolitans of Canterbury and York.[96] But his stand in the Monothelite controversy had a disastrous effect: with it he created the assumptions for the origin of the "Question of Honorius," so much discussed at the First Vatican Council.[97] When the Patriarch Sergius I of Constantinople reported in 634 on the divisions in this matter within the Eastern Church and proposed to him, in the interest of an elimination of the quarrel, that henceforth there be no further talk of one or two energies but only of one will in Christ, Honorius to a great extent followed this proposal, without seriously examining its theological significance and without considering the opposing view of, for example, the Patriarch Sophronius of Jerusalem. In this regard he commended the avoidance of the manner of speaking of one energy and professed "one will of the Lord Jesus Christ," but, of course, he stressed that in this question he intended to follow the plain faith of the Bible and rejected whatever in new formulas could become a scandal especially for the unlearned in the Church.[98] The historic context of these expressions—approval of a suggestion of the Patriarch of Constantinople, who had not requested a decision of faith universally binding, inadequate examination of the theological problem—lets it appear as highly doubtful that here Honorius intended to render a decision ex cathedra in today's meaning. The "Question of Honorius" received its real importance rather from the fact that the Sixth General Council of 680–81 believed it should and must condemn the Roman Pope as a heretic because of his expressions and that Pope Leo II (682–83) confirmed the decrees of the Council and hence its verdict on Honorius, even if he tried to soften it by the hint that the Pope, through his negligent conduct in this question, had become an abettor of heresy.[99]

---

[90] See Hallinger, I, 295; cf. the opposing view of Caspar, II, 512–514.

[91] Dölger, Reg. no. 156.

[92] Bede, HE 2, 4.

[93] Columban, Ep. 5; see G. S. M. Walker, S. Columbani Opera (Dublin 1957), XXXVIIIf.

[94] His letters in PL 80, 467–494, 601–607, PL, Suppl. 4, 1658f.

---

[95] Honorius I, Ep. 2, which Silva-Tarouca, Gr 12 (1931), 44, may regard as unauthentic, but which as regards content is confirmed by an inscription from St. Peter's; see Duchesne, LP, 325f.

[96] Honorius I, Ep. 6 and 7 (=Bede, HE 2, 17 and 18).

[97] See P. Stockmeier, "Die Causa Honorii und K. J. v. Hefele," TQ 148 (1968), 405–428; id., "Der Fall des Honorius und das erste Vatikanische Konzil," G. Schwaiger (ed.), Hundert Jahre nach dem Ersten Vatikanum (Regensburg 1970), 109–130 (literature).

[98] Letter of Sergius I: Mansi 11, 530ff.; reply of Honorius, ibid., 538–549; sec. P. Galtier, "La première lettre du Pape Honorius," Gr 29 (1948), 42–61; Fragments of a second letter of Honorius to Sergius in Mansi 11, 579ff.

[99] The acts in question of the Council of 680–81: Mansi 11, 550ff.; the position of Pope Leo II, ibid., 11, 730ff. and PL 96, 408–419. See K. Hirsch, "Papst Honorius und das VI. Allgemeine Konzil," Festschrift der 57. Versammlung deutscher Philologen zu Salzburg 1929 (Baden bei Wien 1929), 158–179. On the whole matter: DTHC 7, 93–132; Caspar, II, 530–542, Seppelt, II (2nd ed.), 47–58.

How difficult it was to get free of entanglement with the imperial religious policy was to be learned, after the unsuccessful efforts of Pope Theodore I (642–49), especially by Pope Martin I (649–653/655),[100] who as a former apocrisiarius had a good knowledge of the theological dispute and of the personalities involved in the discussion. Without awaiting the imperial confirmation of his election, he had himself ordained and convoked a Synod to the Lateran for October 649, at which he had Monothelitism, its leading representatives, and their writings condemned, and had the verdict circulated to the Universal Church.[101] The Emperor Constans II (641–668), to whom the Pope had sent the synodal acts with the request that he assent to the anathema,[102] intended to enforce his will in Italy, and, after a first failure, had the Pope arrested by his Exarch in June 653 and brought to Constantinople. Here he was condemned to death, not because of his rejection of Monothelitism, but for alleged high treason, then reprieved with relegation to Cherson in the Crimea, where after a few months he died of physical and spiritual exhaustion in September 655.[103] What oppressed Martin most of all was the total silence of the Roman clergy, who as early as August 654, only too submissive to the imperial will, had elected as his successor Pope Eugene I (654–57).[104]

Only under Pope Agatho (678–681) was reconciliation between Rome and Byzantium possible, when he acceded to the request of Constantine IV Pogonatus (668–685) and, following preliminary preparations by the Lateran Synod of 680, sent a delegation to a "conference" at Constantinople, which became the Sixth General Council. At the fourth session the Pope's dogmatic letter was approved and in the concluding decree on the faith Monothelitism was definitively repudiated.[105] However, under the last Pope of this century, Sergius I (687–701) new tensions resulted, when the Emperor Justinian II (685–695 and 705–711) summoned a Synod at Constantinople—Trullan II or Quinisext of 692—at which, without the participation of the West, under the almost exclusive use of eastern sources of canon law, 102 canons[106] of a predominantly disciplinary character were issued, but Latin customs such as fasting on Saturdays or priestly celibacy were sharply rejected. When Pope Sergius decisively refused the assent demanded by the Emperor to these synodal decrees, it was intended that he, like Pope Martin earlier, should be made agreeable after a forcible kidnapping to Constantinople, but the plan foundered on the resistance of the militias of Rome, Ravenna, and the Pentapolis.[107] The aborted action revealed unmistakably the current limits of imperial power on Italian soil and definitively introduced the process of the political and ecclesiastical separation of the West from the East.

---

[100] Margin I's letters: PL 87, 119–204; Mansi 10, 785–1188.

[101] On the acts of the Synod: E. Caspar, ZKG 51 (1932), 75–135.

[102] Martin I, Ep. 3.

[103] An eyewitness report on the course of the trial in PL 129, 591–604; Martin's description of his arrest and journey to Constantinople in Ep. 14f.

[104] Martin I, Ep. 16 and 17.

[105] Acts of the Synod: Mansi 11, 19–920; definition of the faith also in D 289.

[106] Mansi 11, 921–1006; see Hefele–Leclercq 3, 560–581.

[107] Duchesne, LP 372f.

CHAPTER 40

The Ecclesiastical Organization and the Clergy

Papal Vicariates

SPAIN. Pope Simplicius (468–483) was the first to confer special full authority on a Spanish bishop, namely Zeno of Seville. Zeno, because of his particular merits, was to take care, in place of the Roman See and with its authority in Spain, that the decrees enacted by the Holy Fathers were not violated.[1] Pope Felix II(483–492), Simplicius's successor, wrote in the same vein to the same Zeno of Seville. Thirty years later Pope Hormisdas renewed the full authority of the Bishop of Seville, who was now Sallust. However, this letter[2] apparently contains a restriction: the power of vicar is valid only for the provinces of Baetica and Lusitania, hence for southern and southwestern Spain, no longer for central Spain or for the north and northwest. Likewise, in regard to content the authority which Sallust obtained from Pope Hormisdas was not so great: the privileges of the metropolitans were not to be infringed. The papal vicar was to be concerned chiefly for the observances of ecclesiastical tradition and, if necessary, summon synods. It seems also that this conferring of the privileges on Bishop Sallust of Seville did not proceed motu proprio on the Pope's part, but was demanded by a letter from the bishops of the province of Baetica, who showed themselves to be alarmed by the fact that Pope Hormisdas had granted special powers to Bishop John of Ilici. John had gone to Rome in 517 and on the one hand had informed the Pope of the situation in Spain and on the other hand had received from him the commission to send there a libellus on the question of Acacius for the bishops to sign and to make known rules of conduct in regard to ecclesiastical community with people coming from the East.[3] Of course, full authority comparable to that of the Bishop of Seville was not bestowed on the Bishop of Ilici, which lay about 100 kilometers north of Cartagena, to whose ecclesiastical province it belonged. John was only to press for the maintenance of the ecclesiastical canons and the papal decretals, especially of those of Hormisdas himself, in addition to making known the important canonical cases (causae ecclesiasticae) to the Pope.[4] Whether the Bishop of Ilici, relying on this papal letter, came forth with special authority is unknown. Likewise, nothing more is known of disciplinary measures of the Papal Vicar of Seville.[5] The sole testimonies are the papal letters themselves. Hence it is perhaps advisable not to speak of "vicariates" in the general sense, but merely to regard the bishops personally charged in each case as extraordinary envoys for very specific functions. Each individual Pope appointed them for the duration of his pontificate only, in the expectation that their zeal would be enhanced by the granting of the "vicarship." From the conversion of the Visigoths under King Recared in 586, the basis for a vicariate in Spain was eliminated. The Church felt itself to be safe under the protection of the King and flatly declined the care of the far distant Pope.[6] Gregory the Great seems already to have perceived this; in any event, he sent the pallium to his friend, Bishop Leander of Seville, as a purely personal distinction, even if he also appealed to tradition[7] and made it known to King Recared.[8] But this was not at all the granting of a vicarship.

---

[1] PL 58, 35.
[2] Ibid. 63, 426.

ARLES. We know more about the Vicariate of Arles, which went back to Pope Zasimus (417–18),[9] and was confirmed by Leo the Great, than about the papal vicariates in Spain. Leo's successor, Pope Hilary (461–68), expected from the Archbishop of Arles reports from time to time on all important ecclesiastical events and problems and scolded him if such information arrived from elsewhere.[10] The Bishop of Arles was to hold synods and issue letters of recommendation for traveling Gallic ecclesiastics. But Arles did not thereby gain precedence in southern Gaul; there persisted the old rivalry between Arles and Vienne, which possessed in Avitus a bishop towering far above the entire Gallic episcopate. Indeed, at the end of the fifth century there was an interlude in favor of Vienne. Pope Anastasius, whose letter is lost, gave Avitus of Vienne the right to ordain bishops in some churches which had hitherto belonged to the metropolitan territory of Arles. In 500 Pope Symmachus confirmed the rights of the Bishop of Arles, because Anastasius had acted against tradition.[11] In the next year Symmachus appeased the Metropolitan of Vienne: he was to suffer no loss if he could supply documents from which the legality of the decision of Anastasius should be made clear.[12] Only in 513 did Pope Symmachus definitively confirm the precedence of Arles,[13] and that even though Avitus of Vienne a decade earlier had converted Sigismund, son of the Burgundian King, to Catholic Christianity, and the latter had turned up in Rome as the first royal pilgrim from a German kingdom. Symmachus not only again took up the old tradition: Caesarius, the Archbishop of Arles, on his visit to Rome, had personally taken care to ask for new papal decrees for questions which had long ago been in reality canonically regulated.[14] Thus the Pope granted him the right, as the first western bishop, to wear the pallium.[15] In the next year Caesarius was expressly made Vicar for all the Gallic and Spanish provinces,[16] but this probably only meant that Caesarius was to be competent for all provinces under the sovereignty of Theodoric of Ravenna, who at the time was ruler of Provence and exercised a guardianship over the Spanish Visigothic Kingdom. The far larger part of Gaul was then already in the possession, respectively, of the Franks or of the Burgundians now quickly losing importance. As Papal Vicar, Caesarius was to exercise the function of a supermetropolitan: he alone should issue letters of safe-conduct for all ecclesiastics traveling from Gaul, just as Pope Zosimus had decided, and Pope Hilary had renewed it. Thus Arles possessed a clear position of preeminence in southern Gaul, which would probably have devolved on this see even without the papal vicariate. True, there is mention already of special care in questions of faith,[17] but Caesarius did not at all appear in the entire Semipelagian controversy as an ecclesiastical prince conscious of special authorization. Rather, he requested instructions from Rome and obtained them from Pope Felix III; besides, he even had the decrees of his synod confirmed by Pope Boniface II.[18] In the dispute over the ecclesiastical penance of Bishop Contumeliosus of Riez Caesarius was expressly entrusted by Pope John II with the supervision of the vacant see,[19] which should have been taken for granted in the case of a papal vicar. Furthermore, soon afterward Pope Agapitus I quite unnecessarily disavowed Caesarius in this same affair, blaming him for a too severe verdict, which Caesarius had not even issued.[20] On the contrary, humble as ever, he had defended the verdict of Pope John II against all the Gallic bishops and had supported it with synodal excerpts.[21] It is probably to be understood from the example of Caesarius and his relations with the various Popes that the vicariate authority had no firmly determined dimensions and hence the vicariate was not an element of the ecclesiastical structure; the vicar had merely to act ad nutum pontificis. This held good even when, for example, in the letter of Pope Pelagius I (556–561), it was stated that the Church of Arles possessed the primacy over Gaul and the vicarship of the Apostolic See.[22] Pelagius himself by no means regarded Bishop Sapaudus of Arles as his vicar from the start but only held out to him the prospect of such an honor, if he solicited it and especially stood up for the Roman Church.[23] He only obtained the dignity in the next letter.[24] Moreover, it meant a great deal to Pelagius to bind Sapaudus especially to him, although he seems to have been rather tardy;[25] he was to dispel all doubts remaining in Gaul about the personal orthodoxy of the Pope, who even before his election had recognized the Fifth Council of 553, which he had originally combated.[26] Sapaudus, however, seems to have accomplished nothing;[27] in fact he even had to endure that the Frankish King Childebert summoned him before the court of a subordinate bishop,[28]—which represented a clear contempt of his dignity as Primate and his vicariate, but at the same time made known that there could be no future for a papal vicariate of Arles in the Frankish Kingdom, especially since it apparently never played a role in the care of souls and the inner life of the Church.[29] Later Gregory the Great seems not to have taken this omen into consideration.

---

[3] E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums II, 144.

[4] PL 84, 819 f.

[5] Fernández Alonso, op. cit., 236.

[6] Braulio of Zaragoza, Ep. 21; cf. Lacarra, Settimane . . . VII, 362ff. The theoretical basis for such an attitude may be found in Isidore's explanation of the archiepiscopal office (Etym. VIII, XII, 6.7): the archbishop is the superior of the other bishops and metropolitans, who without him must not undertake anything, because while he does not have a sedes apostolica like the patriarch, still he possesses vices apostolica, that is, he stands in place of an Apostle. But if every archbishop by virtue of his offices has an apostolic vicariate, then a grant of special vicarship of the Roman Patriarch (ibid., no. 5) means no superiority of rank worth seeking.

[7] Reg. Epp. IX, 227.

[8] Ibid. IX, 228.

[9] Cf. MGEp, tom. III, Ep. Arelatenses, nos. 1–7.

[10] Ibid., nos. 15 and 19.

---

[11] Ibid., no. 23.

[12] PL 62, 51.

[13] MGEp, III, I, no. 25.

[14] Ibid., nos. 26 and 27.

[15] Ibid.

[16] Ibid., nos. 28 and 29.

[17] Ibid., no. 28.

---

[18] Cf. infra. p. 727.

[19] MGEp, III, I, no. 33.

[20] Ibid., nos. 36 and 37.

[21] Ibid., nos. 34 and 35.

[22] Ibid., no. 51.

[23] Ibid., no. 49.

[24] Ibid., no. 50.

[25] Cf. ibid., no. 53.

[26] Cf. infra, pp. 730f.

[27] Cf. Caspar, op. cit. II, 301, and Langgärtner, op. cit., 164.

[28] Cf. MGEp. III, I, no. 52.

Especially deserving of being stressed is the fact that with Pope Vigilius (537–555), the predecessor of Pelagius, a new element became noticeable in the granting of the vicarship.[30] He obtained the assent of the Emperor Justinian before he agreed in 545 to the request of Auxanius of Arles, presented in 543, and transmitted special synodal jurisdiction to him, with the exception of causae maiores.[31] In the next year Vigilius even joined the conceding of the dignity of vicar to Aurelian of Arles with the commission to work for a good understanding between their Byzantine majesties, Justinian and Theodora, and the Frankish King Childebert. Hence the papal vicar at Arles was expected to contribute to the political and military encirclement of the Ostrogothic King Totila in Italy.[32] It is not known whether Aurelian undertook anything in this regard successfully.

In the following years the relations between Rome and Arles seem not to have been especially close; in any event, Gregory the Great had to have the Metropolitan of Arles warned by another Gallic bishop to send on to Rome the revenues which his predecessor had drawn from the patrimonies of the Roman Church but had withheld.[33] But it must not be concluded from this that there was a deterioration of the relationship between Gregory and Virgil of Arles, who had been named as vicar the year before; for the reason why Gregory turned to Protasius of Aix lay merely in this, that under Virgil's predecessor Protasius had been the administrator of the property of the Church of Arles.

The clearest and most comprehensive account of the papal vicariate for Arles comes from Gregory the Great in his three letters to Virgil, the bishops in Childebert's kingdom, and Childebert himself.[34] Virgil was to represent the Pope in Childebert's entire Kingdom; without his permission no bishop could undertake a journey of some distance; he was to decide questions of faith with a Commission of Twelve of the bishops. Only when a question could not be decided should it be submitted to the Pope,[35] whereas hitherto in principle all causae maiores had been reserved to the Pope. The bishops were admonished zealously to obey the invitations to synods, to be expected from Virgil. Childebert, who had supported Virgil's request for the grant of the dignity of vicar, was called upon to give him all assistance so that the abuses that were prevalent in the Church of Gaul, namely simony and the premature ordination of laymen, could be eliminated. One would expect success for this far-reaching project of Gregory, pushed with such effort. But, despite the great authority given him, his vicar acquired no important influence. Arles lay too much on the outer fringes of the Frankish Kingdom and had been incorporated into it too late. In the course of the sixth century the Bishop of Lyon obtained greater importance in the Frankish Kingdom; he was even referred to as Patriarch by the Synod of Mâcon in 585.[36] Of course, at Mâcon there were only the bishops of the kingdom of King Guntram, hence from Burgundy–Orléans, but they represented, nevertheless, six ecclesiastical provinces. At the great synods of the seventh century—Paris in 614, Clichy in 627, Chalon in 650—the Bishop of Lyon presided unchallenged. The vicariate of Arles came to an end at the moment when it should have obtained its greatest authority. In 613 Boniface IV granted the pallium to Bishop Florian of Arles still only as a personal distinction, after Gregory had been prepared to give it also to Bishop Syagrius of Autun, not only, of course, because the Frankish Queen Brunhildis intervened for him, but also because he seems to have been deserving due to the mission to England.[37]

---

[29] Beck, 34.

[30] Langgärtner, op. cit., 131f., naturally sees in it only a self-evident practice, which purely by chance is otherwise not attested.

[31] MGEp. III, I, nos. 39 and 40.

[32] Caspar, op. cit. II, 237.

[33] Reg. Epp. VI, 56.

[34] Ibid. V, 58–60.

[35] Ibid. V, 58.

Gregory the Great had himself probably understood that he could not adequately assert his influence by means of his vicar at Arles in the Frankish Kingdom. So he tried, through Abbot Cyriacus,[38] whom he sent to Gaul, and the Priest Candidus, whom he had appointed steward of the Roman patrimonies in Gaul,[39] to influence the Church in the Frankish Kingdom and to remedy its abuses through a synod, which should meet under the presidency of Syagrius.[40] But the new men likewise disillusioned him; neither the synod nor the reform of the Frankish Church took place!

THESSALONICA. After the civil dioceses of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace had been subordinated to the ecclesiastical supremacy of New Rome by canon 28 of the Council of Chalcedon in 451, Western Illyricum was left under the supremacy of the sole Patriarch who could claim it, namely, the Bishop of Rome. True, a part of Western Illyricum belonged to the eastern half of the Empire, but through the delimiting of a sphere for Constantinople, it could, from Rome's viewpoint, appear less urgent to have a man of confidence in Illyricum than at the end of the fourth century, when precisely the Western Emperor had relinquished these provinces to the Eastern Empire and an ecclesiastical orientation of these sees to the East was to be feared. Thus the papal vicariate of Thessalonica apparently fell into oblivion in Rome itself c. 500 and was again brought to mind there only through the appeal of Bishop Stephen of Larissa, who had been deposed at Constantinople and hence had turned to Rome for help. At the Roman Synod of 531[41] the representatives of the Metropolitan of Larissa, two of his suffragans, submitted twenty-seven documents, all of which referred to the vicariate function of the Bishop of Thessalonica. Pope Agapitus had them examined for their authenticity by means of the Roman register. It is striking that Pope Agapitus now did not call upon the Metropolitan of Thessalonica to become involved in this affair or censure him for not bringing Stephen of Larissa's case before him and having it decided in the name of the Roman See. Nothing of the sort was also intended on the part of the Illyrian petitioner. The reference to the vicariate function, conferred repeatedly on Thessalonica, served only to emphasize the competence of the Bishop of Rome, and not of that of Constantinople, for Illyricum. In this connection people were probably aware that on the one hand the Illyrian bishops were inclined to appeal to Constantinople, that is, apparently to the Emperor, not so often to the Patriarch, and on the other hand in Constantinopolitan circles appeals to the Roman See were very badly received.

---

[36] Conc. Galliae, CChr 148A, 238; cf. Caspar, op. cit. II, 495.

[37] Reg. Epp. IX, 213 and 222.

[38] Ibid. IX, 213, 218, 219.

[39] Ibid. VI, 53 and IX, 221.

[40] Ibid. IX, 218 and 222.

But this Roman Synod of 531 did not involve, as might have been expected, a renewal of the papal vicariate of Thessalonica. Instead, the Emperor Justinian was soon busy; in 535 he raised his native city, under the name of Justiniana Prima, to the rank of an ecclesiastical supermetropolitan and assigned to it as its sphere of jurisdiction provinces for which Thessalonica had hitherto been competent. The assent of the Pope was not obtained nor was the papal vicariate of Thessalonica at all mentioned.[42] Law 131 of the year 545 then gave the definitive version of the Novel of 535. In it there is at least a reference to an agreement with Pope Vigilius, which however did not mean much, since the Pope probably merely had to acquiesce. To the city of Justiniana Prima was now granted the position of Rome's vicar for the provinces definitely assigned to it. In all this, then, there was no question of a papal authorization of the Bishop of Justiniana Prima but of an elevation in rank of this city by imperial decree, for which a canonical status familiar in Rome, that of a vicariate, served well. This occurred at the same time to the prejudice of Thessalonica, whose area of influence was diminished. But neither the Bishop of Justiniana Prima nor that of Thessalonica seems to have exercised the power of a vicariate by a Roman mandate in the sixth century.[43] Only Gregory the Great in one of his letters referred to the vicariate position of the Bishop of Justiniana Prima. He scolded[44] Bishop John, because in a legal quarrel with Bishop Adrian of Thebes occasione vicium nostrarum he had dared to commit a wrong.[45] True, judicial competence had been entrusted to John by the Emperor at Constantinople, but he had had a deacon turned over to the secular power and tortured. Gregory the Great examined the acts of the trial that were submitted to him and himself handed down a decision; hence he also did not bring in the Bishop of Thessalonica. He was apparently content with the transfer of the dignity to Justiniana Prima, for he bestowed it on the successor of the Bishop John whom he had blamed, who was also named John: Pallium . . . ex more transmisimus et vices vos apostolicae sedis agere iterata innovatione decernimus.[46] But not much authority is here discernible. John is admonished to be a good shepherd and to guard himself especially against simoniacal ordinations.[47] Gregory apparently did not intend to be active in the Balkans by means of the Bishop of Justiniana Prima. On another occasion[48] he addressed the metropolitans of Illyricum without distinction of rank or dignity. It was more in accord with his policy to intervene even in the Balkans through his stewards, assigning to them duties of supervision and representation even in jurisdictional questions. Thus the subdeacon Antoninus received instructions to arrange a canonical episcopal election in Salona, that is, to prevent a simoniacal election[49] and completely to rehabilitate the Archdeacon Honoratus of Salona.[50] [41] Mansi VIII, 739ff.; cf. Caspar, op. cit. II, 207f.

---

[42] Caspar, op. cit. II, 209.

Gregory the Great was generally inclined now also to entrust with tasks of ecclesiastical discipline the rectores of the Roman patrimonies, whom he himself had appointed, in order to assure to his Church the necessary revenues—the local episcopate, which was earlier responsible for the administration of the goods, was really negligent in the transmission of the produce. The very first letter of Gregory that has come down to us speaks of the subdeacon Peter, who was to administer the Roman patrimonies in Sicily and in addition obtained the authority of a vicar with allusion to earlier models. If by these are meant the vicariates of Arles and Thessalonica, it is still clear that, as the papal stewards were appointed entirely ad nutum pontificis, so the vicariates were only to be thus understood and did not represent structural elements in the Church. In any case, in Church history they had as little future as the many new vicariates which Gregory conceded.[51] In North Africa, in Britain, in Ireland, there were never papal vicariates. In Africa the position of the Primate of Carthage on the one hand and the exertions for independence on the other hand were so strong that there was a situation there similar to that of Spain in the seventh century. Ireland probably lay too far on the fringe of Europe, and England was at first to be cared for from Gaul.

---

[43] For the ecclesiastical territory and the location of Justiniana Prima (between Nisch and Skopje), cf. Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte, ed. H. Jedin, K. S. Latourette, and J. Martin (Freiburg 1970), no. 20.

[44] Reg. Epp. II, 6.

[45] Cf. Caspar, op. cit., II, 440f.

[46] Reg. Epp. V, 16. It must be kept in mind that the Registrum here offers the false sequence of events; hence V, 16, belongs before II, 6, and in both cases deals with the same Bishop John.

[47] Ibid. V, 16.

[48] Ibid. IX, 156.

[49] Ibid. III, 22.

[50] Ibid. III, 32.

Parish Organization

It is true that the future parochial organization could first be discerned not only in the country but also in the city as early as the fourth century, and in the great cities such as Rome, Carthage, and Alexandria even earlier, but what is today understood by "parish," which possessed a certain autonomy even vis-à-vis the bishopric, was first found in the epoch to be surveyed here.[52] Churches in the countryside are attested as early as the First Council of Toledo, which in 398 required in canon 5 that every cleric, if there was a church in his place of residence, should go there every day for the sacrificium. In this connection also the castella, vici (villages), and villae outside the cities were also mentioned as places where there were churches, and hence where the clerics should fulfill this duty. This prescription appeared, it is true, in number 63 of the collection of capitula of Bishop Martin of Braga in northwestern Spain c. 585 which states that clerics should come to the church morning and evening for the sacrifice of the psalmody, psallendi sacrificium, whereas participation in the celebration of Mass was required of all clerics only on Sundays (ibid., 64). The Council of Tarragona in 516 insisted on the daily celebration of Vespers and Lauds in all churches, but in this matter priest and deacon might alternate weekly. Probably the First Council of Toledo did not intend to oblige every cleric to the daily celebration of the Eucharist in his church,[53] but only imposed on clerics attendance at church as a duty of their state not attached to a locality. The synod attests that churches with regular worship were no longer anything unusual even in the countryside. But whether they were parish churches, hence whether the clergy had pastoral responsibility and authority for a definite territory is not clear. The ordinary worship might represent a free offering for the people living nearby or correspond to the desire of the founder[54] or even occasionally have served for the veneration of relics. In any event at Epaon in Burgundy in 517 a synod forbade in canon 25 the depositing of the relics of saints in a church in which there was not at least one cleric who could see to the regular psalmody. The rural parishes were apparently, in any case in southern Gaul, erected not in just any nucleus of a settlement but in a place which represented, even in pre-Christian times, a religious center for the surrounding peasantry.[55] Thus it becomes clear that the organization of the parish system in the country coincided with the evangelization of the country. Thus Martin of Tours, during his long episcopate, consolidated the christianization of the peasantry by the erecting of parishes. True, he himself founded only six, and his successors to the end of the fifth century founded only fourteen more parishes. Thus the see of Tours, which c. 500 still had the extent of a modern département, included only about twenty parishes.[56] Around the same time the bishop of Auxerre had the same number of churches in the country, of which eight were in vici and twelve in villae; a century later there were thirty-seven—thirteen in vici and twenty-four in villae.[57] In this regard not the entire area of the bishopric was divided into these pastoral centers, but they were responsible only for a smaller territory; the care of the rest of the territory was still directly incumbent on the bishop.

---

[51] For example, to the Bishop of Syracuse (Reg. Epp. II, 8) and the deacon Cyprian in Sicily (ibid. VII, 38, and oftener). In the entire seventh century the title of a papal vicar in the sense here used appears only twice, both times in connection with Thessalonica. Pope Martin I (649–654) saw in the heretic Paul of Thessalonica a special wickedness because he had not acted "as a vicar subordinate to the Apostolic See" (PL 87, 191D). Thirty years later John of Thessalonica signed the acts of the Sixth General Council (681) with the title "Vicar of the Roman Apostolic See." But we hear nothing about the conferring of the title (P. Conte, 206–210). Apparently, however, at least a memory was preserved at Thessalonica and Rome despite the interlude of Justiniana Prima.

[52] N. Maurice-Denis-Boulet, MD 36 (1953), 32.

While the Council of Agde in 506 still expressly forbade priests in canon 44 to give blessings or penance to the faithful in the church, Isidore of Seville at the beginning of the seventh century saw it as precisely the duty of a priest to bless the people. Hence, in the meantime a decisive change must have occurred; the credit belongs to Caesarius of Arles, who it is true held the presidency at Agde, but at the time had had only a few years' pastoral experience. Twenty years later at the Synod of Carpentras in 527 he drew the canonical consequences from his experiences as bishop and established an administration of the property of the rural churches that was to a certain degree autonomous. Previously, the bishop received[58] half the offerings in the cathedral—the rest of the clergy received the other half—and one-third of the offerings in the rural churches; their land and other property were on the whole administered by him. But now, in accord with the wish of Caesarius, the bishop could have recourse to the rural churches only when they were wealthy and his cathedral was in special need.[59] The Synod of Vaison in 529, likewise presided over by Caesarius, expressly gave to the priests in the country the right of preaching, which at the same time meant the duty of preaching; if no priest was present, the deacon should at least read aloud the Lord's Prayer (canon 2). For Caesarius preaching was the chief means of the care of souls. True, Pope Celestine had reproached some South Gallic bishops for turning over the entire activity of preaching to their priests,[60] but this seems to have referred to Masses in the episcopal church. But perhaps this papal admonition contributed to the fact that into the next century priests were regarded as unqualified to preach. Thus the decision of Caesarius of Arles was really a deeply effective measure and gave the rural clergy and hence the rural churches a real importance.

---

[53] Thus Fernández Alonso, op. cit., 207.

[54] Cf. Gregory the Great, Reg. Epp. IX, 71.

[55] Seston, op. cit., 241–254.

[56] Gregory of Tours, Hist. 10, 31; cf. E. Griffe, MD 36 (1953), 44.

[57] Griffe, op. cit., 55.

Caesarius wanted to go even further and oblige the rural priests to recruit their own successors, that is, first to educate young lectors,[61] and in this he appealed to Italian customs which he had himself come to know on the occasion of his journey to Ravenna and Rome. He surely was also thinking of the example of the school in his own episcopal residence and in those of many of his educated colleagues.[62] Thus here was the beginning of the parish school; indeed, it even appeared as a sort of seminary for priests. Caesarius himself seems not to have established any rural parishes; they were probably present in the territory of Arles in sufficient numbers.[63] But the admonition to the pastors to be concerned for the young clergy seems to have been successful; in any event, his Vita (II, 20) reports that Caesarius miraculously cured an only eight-year-old cleric on one of his visitation journeys. Then in the course of the sixth century there arose parish schools in various places in Gaul, not only in the form of a boarding school, as Caesarius intended, but also for externs.[64] But naturally these were to the advantage of the future clergy.

---

[58] In any event according to cans. 14 and 15 of Orléans of 511.

[59] Concilia Galliae, CChr. 158A, 48.

[60] E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne II, 367f.

[61] Synod of Vaison 529, can. 1.

[62] Cf. Riché, op. cit., 166ff.

[63] Delage, SChr 175, 124.

The requirement of canon 18 of the Synod of Mérida in southern Spain in 666 went, it is true, in a similar direction, but it had a lesser impact. There the pastors were admonished, on the basis of the wealthy church property, which also included slaves, familia ecclesiae, to raise such church slaves in their house and to train them as lesser clerics—today they would be called altar boys—and servants. It must not be assumed that they were regarded as recruits for the priesthood. Besides, it is not known how much success the canon had, so that one cannot infer from it the existence of parish schools in all Spain.[65] It may be assumed that around the middle of the sixth century there were rural parishes in the entire Christian West, even if the network of the parochial organization became constantly thicker in the succeeding centuries. Even in the well documented districts of the Frankish Kingdom the number of parishes was then about five times smaller than today. Furthermore, the Arian Vandal Church in Africa seems to have known rural parishes as early as c. 500; in any case, the Vita of Fulgentius (chapters 6 and 7) reports on an Arian priest residing on a villa. We hear scarcely anything about Italy, apart from the reference in Caesarius. The reports on the Italian pievi (plebes) only begin in the eighth century.

The question of from when on parishes were also erected on villae cannot be easily answered. True, the First Council of Toledo in 400 presupposed churches in villae, and the First Council of Orange in 441 regulated the competence of the diocesan bishop for such churches; but precisely because the proprietors built these churches it seems to follow that it was not a question of parish churches. Many churches of villae became such only in the course of the sixth century; in every case they were such as early as 541, when a Synod of Orléans (canons 26 and 33) demanded adequate endowment for them and at the same time their subordination to the bishop.[66] The first builders of "proprietary churches" seem to have been bishops, who in this way intended to care for the people of a villa belonging to their cathedral. They also regarded themselves as justified in such care if the villa lay in the territory of another bishop. Great proprietors from the lay state seem then to have followed this example of the bishops. In any event, canon 9 of the First Council of Orange in 441 let it be presumed, when it required that the dedication and the entire administration of such a church was reserved to the bishop who was responsible for this territory and not to the builder-bishop, and a fortiori it did not pertain to a bishop invited at pleasure. If by this was meant also the administration of the property, then the wish of this synod was not universally implemented. In any case, the Second Council of Braga in northwestern Spain in 572 had to complain in canon 6 that churches were partly built simply for the purpose of making money, since the builder left one-half of the contributions received to the clerics appointed there and reserved the other half for himself. Since in preceding canons the Council had taken measures against the avarice of bishops, the suspicion is obvious that the censured erecting of churches for mere purposes of gain must be traced back to the bishops. The Seventh Council of Toledo in 646 still had to defend parish priests against the greed of the bishops in canon 4. But synods had to deal much more frequently with proprietary churches in order to insist that they and especially the clergy serving them were under the direction of the diocesan bishop or of his archdeacon respectively. Such admonitions were directed to the clergy of the proprietary church[67] or also to the proprietors.[68] [64] For example in Auvergne; cf. Riché, op. cit., 324.

---

[65] Fernández Alonso does so, op. cit., 116.

[66] Cf. Beck, 75.

The parish organization spread slowly from South to North. It gradually established itself in England, for example, in the eighth century.[69] In Thuringia, Hesse, and Bavaria, on the other hand, it seems to have existed even before the arrival of Boniface. In any event, he encountered rural priests, whom he could only regard as half-pagan, as heretical, and as immoral (letters 68 and 91), and from this it must be inferred that a certain decay had already set in.

It needs to be observed also that, parallel to the increase in the number of churches in the country, the privileges of parish churches were stressed. True, the Synod of Agde in 506 recognized the justification of oratories and Masses in the country propter fatigationem familiae, and hence to spare long journeys to the serfs: at Easter, Christmas, Epiphany, Ascension, Pentecost, and the Birth of John the Baptist, however, the celebration of Mass should take place only in the cities (cathedrals) and parish churches; the clerics of the oratories had to come there, unless the bishop made an exception. Four years later, in 511, this demand appeared at Orléans in canon 25, on the one hand restricted to the three high feasts of Easter, Christmas, and Pentecost, and on the other hand it affected only the townsmen, not the clerics. Probably the liturgy was celebrated also on these feasts for the serfs. Hence in central [67] Orléans 541, can. 26.

---

[68] Lérida 546, can. 3; Toledo 633, can. 33; Chalon 650, can. 14.

[69] Wallace-Hadrill, Settimane, . . . VII, 545.

Gaul people were more generous than in the South. In the Kingdom of Burgundy again the adult townsmen were admonished to seek out some bishop in the city at Easter and Christmas in order to receive his blessing.[70] This prescription had, of course, nothing to do with the parochial principle. Instead, this was all the more clearly expressed then in 535 at the Auvergne Synod in canon 15, in which the rule of Agde was renewed, whereby all "canonical" ecclesiastics not in the parishes were to assemble around the bishop; the adult townsmen were to do the same. Hence Mass was to be celebrated in parish churches on these feasts, but not in private oratories. Finally, canon 3 of the Council of Orléans in 541 decreed that the first citizens must not celebrate Easter outside the city; if one did so without having expressly obtained the bishop's permission, he should be refused communion on this feast. Hence the Eucharistic celebration was also presupposed in the villae on these great feasts.

After the middle of the sixth century such instructions disappeared. Apparently people had to come to terms with the fact that all high feasts were celebrated in the private churches; in addition, the number of parishes in the country, that is, also in the villae, grew considerably. Thus the Council of Lyon of 583 in canon 5 limited itself to inculcating in the bishops themselves that they celebrate in their own churches on Easter and Christmas, unless they were prevented by a royal mandate. And almost a century later, in 673, the Council of Saint-Jean de Losne in Burgundy in canon 8 again imposed this duty exactly. Behind all these decrees stands, of course, the self-evident assumption that the bishop or parish priest or the priest of an oratory respectively only celebrated once daily and that there were sufficient clergy. A totally different development occurred in Visigothic Spain. Although some churches were rich in land and serfs, others possessed nothing, so that the support of an ecclesiastic was not assured and several churches had to be assigned to one priest. But then he was obliged to celebrate on all Sundays in all his churches, and hence to celebrate several times.[71]

Noteworthy in the history of the parish is the change of name: parrochia originally denoted the urban congregation ruled by the bishop. Rural congregations were so named for the first time by Pope Zosimus in 417.[72] At first such a community that depended on the bishop was called diocesis, by which was expressed that the rural parish was an administrative unit of the local episcopal church. From the time of Sidonius Apollinaris at the end of the fifth century it became customary to use both expressions interchangeably. In the course of the sixth century the current distinction of name established itself with a few variations; this was true for the Merovingian Kingdom as well as for the sources available from Spain and Italy, notably Gregory's letters.[73] Then universally from the seventh century the territory of one bishop was designated as diocesis, the individual congregation subordinate to him as parrochia. The episcopal church had, so to speak, given up its honorary name and become a unit of administration; the religious life was moved into the parishes for the majority of the faithful. The consequence of this was that the parishes no longer felt so intimately joined to one another, as was the case in the unity of the episcopal parrochia. The bishop lost a good part of his religious authority and tried to compensate elsewhere by relying on the feudal lords.[74] Of course, the reason for this must not be sought only in the strengthening of the parishes but in this, that the originally annual visitation journey of bishops was disregarded by all parishes. The Council of Tarragona of 516 in canon 8 represented it as an ancient custom, which was no longer in use everywhere, so that churches could go to ruin without anyone caring about them. The Synod of Braga in 572 enacted an exact program for the visitation journey in canon 1, and the Fourth Synod of Toledo in 633 again imposed the duty of annual visitation in canon 36; in the latter case the bishop, if he was ill or hindered, could be represented by a priest. Hence it must be concluded that visitation journeys were probably made, but not with the necessary regularity. Equally or even more important for the union of bishop and parishes would have been the diocesan synods. The oldest whose acts are extant took place at Auxerre between 561 and 605. In Spain every pastor had to render an account to the diocesan synod, while the bishop reported on the results of the provincial synod.[75] But all together these synods also seem not to have been very frequent, so that the estrangement between bishop and rural clergy could gain ground.

---

[70] Epaon 517, can. 35.

[71] Council of Mérida in 666, can. 19. This obligation to several Masses on the same day seems to have led to the abuse that some priests themselves communicated only in the last of the Masses celebrated by them on one day. This abuse is severely censured by the Twelfth Council of Toledo of 681 in canon 5, which established as the penalty exclusion from communion for a year.

[72] MGEp. III, I, no. 1; cf. Seston, op. cit., 251ff.

---

[73] Gregory the Great, Reg. Epp. IX, 122: to the bishop belongs one diocese but a multiplicity of parishes; IX, 214: some parishes which now lie in Frankish territory were taken from the Bishop of Turin. Otherwise, Reg. Epp. IX, 218: the sacerdotes, hence the bishops, should hold "councils by parishes" in Gaul. Furthermore, in Gregory's view, the chief task of the presbyter parrochialis seems to be baptism and burial.

[74] Seston, op. cit., 253.

[75] Le Bras, Settimane VII, 600.

Clergy

FORMATION. The Gallic councils especially have much to say about the essential morals, the financial resources, and the rights of clerics, in particular the privilegium fori, but very little about their formation and education. Apart from Caesarius's initiative in regard to encouragement of recruits,[76] there were occasional references at councils to the effect that lay persons who were to become priests or bishops must study ecclesiastical discipline for at least a year.[77] In 524, in canon 2 of the Council of Arles, Caesarius stated as a reason for the ordination of laymen as bishops and priests the fast growing number of churches. Nevertheless there was surprise that it was Caesarius who brought forward this argument, although he himself seems not to have established any parish but had found sufficient churches.[78] When the Synods of Orléans of 533 in canon 16 and Narbonne of 589 in canon 11 demanded that only one who could read and write might be ordained a deacon, this was a sign of a quite low level of education of clerics. The Diocesan Synod of Auxerre, which took place between 561 and 605, said in canon 44 that lay persons must not disregard the instruction and admonition on the part of the archpriest, that is, probably generally on the part of their pastor; but it may be asked how these clerics were in a position to provide instruction and admonition. The overwhelming majority of pastors in the sixth century must not have been equal to theological confrontations, even if they had behind them the ideal career—ten years as lector, five years as subdeacon, fifteen years as deacon, twenty years as priest—as for example, the priest Cato at Clermont, who for this reason thought himself qualified to succeed the deceased bishop,[79] and hence probably correctly regarded himself as a very special person. But whoever had been a lector for ten years probably satisfied Caesarius's demand (Vita, I, 56) that every future deacon had to have read the entire Bible four times.

In Spain also conciliar legislation had to be concerned with the education of the clergy. Thus the Second Council of Toledo in 527 required in canon 1 that young lectors be trained in the bishop's house under a master and be introduced into the ecclesiastical sciences; at the same time Caesarius of Arles demanded that this be done not only on the level of the bishopric but, probably on a more modest scope, on the level of the parish. In canon 11 of Narbonne in 589 uneducated priests and deacons were obliged to learn to read and write. In canon 25 the Council of Toledo of 633 deplored the ignorance of some priests: it is the mother of all errors, and hence priests, that is, bishops, who should teach the people, must incessantly study and meditate on the Holy Scriptures and the canons. Knowledge of the canons was also demanded by the bishops in Gaul.[80] The fact that in Gaul no complaints of synods over the ignorance of the priests are found probably does not prove that the clergy were generally better educated than in Spain. For if there were episcopal schools in some twenty episcopal cities of Gaul,[81] it was the urban clergy who took advantage of them, hardly those in the country. The Spanish episcopal schools, which were the object of conciliar legislation, were, however, not the reason why there were bishops of outstanding literary merit in Spain; rather, they had obtained their education in monastic schools.[82] So that the individual priest would not be left to his own devices in his parish, the Council of Toledo of 633 in canon 26 demanded that the bishop give him a sacramentarium or libellus officialis. In Gaul we hear nothing of such books, except of the one which Sidonius Apollinaris, that highly educated Bishop of Clermont, had compiled at the end of the fifth century, apparently only for his own use.[83] But the clergy, even in Spain, should not be dependent on such books but know the entire psalter, the customary hymns and canticles, and the rite of baptism by heart.[84]

---

[76] Cf. supra, p. 646.

[77] Can. 2 of Arles 524, can. 6 of Orléans 538, and can. 9 of Orléans 549.

[78] Cf. supra, p. 646.

[79] Gregory of Tours, Hist. 4, 6.

MORALITY. The synods were even more concerned for the morals of clerics. In 583 it was decreed at Orléans in canon 30 that clerics from deacon upward must not engage in money-lending, which apparently was not generally forbidden for a Christian but only for clerics, who were supposed to separate themselves entirely from secular businesses. Thus at the Burgundian national Council of Epaon in 517 in canon 4 and at Mâcon in 585 in canon 13 the owning of hunting dogs and falcons was forbidden to them, as was participation in the hunt at Saint-Jean de Losne in Burgundy in 673. The Synod which met near Bordeaux in 662 forbade clerics in canon 1 to bear arms or wear extraordinary dress. Canon 1 of Narbonne in 589, which was at that time under Spanish Visigothic rule, similarly forbade clerics to wear purple dress. A few years earlier, at Mâcon in 581 in canon 1, it was enjoined on clerics to avoid secular dress entirely; of course, in none of these passages was it said how the ecclesiastical dress of clerics should look.

---

[80] Carpentras 529, ep. synod.; Orléans 538, can. 36.

[81] Cf. Riché, op. cit., 328ff.

[82] Ibid., 335ff.

[83] Cf. Gregory of Tours, Hist. 2, 22. To this period must therefore be assigned the gradual origin of Mass libelli and sacramentaries. Cf. infra, pp. 658ff.

[84] Eighth Council of Toledo, 653, can. 8.

Clerics, more exactly priests and deacons, must not undertake a journey without a testimonial letter from their bishop; in any event, they must nowhere be admitted to sacramental communion.[85] From the time of Pope Zosimus the Bishop of Arles was to issue the required passports for all clerics traveling out of Gaul.[86] According to the view of the Council of Orléans in 533 in canon 9, priests must not even live together with so-called worldlings, unless the bishop has permitted this.

CELIBACY. Celibacy occupied the most space in clerical legislation. The requirement of celibacy for the higher clerics was made as early as c. 300 at Elvira, but this Council seems to have had no influence on the further development. The demand for celibacy again appeared toward the end of the fourth century with Popes Damasus I and Siricius. Then in the fifth century Innocent I and Leo the Great referred to Siricius, and Leo extended the requirement of celibacy also to subdeacons. However, this did not mean that married men would no longer be admitted to the higher ranks of the clergy, but only that, before their ordination, they must promise not to live any longer with their wives in the conjugal state. On the part of the Popes, however, there had always been hesitations about the ordaining of a married man, especially if he had children. Thus Pope Pelagius I (556–561) only very reluctantly agreed to the candidacy of a married man for the episcopal see of Syracuse. For each case he demanded that a complete list of his private properties be supplied in order to make certain that at his death he would not bequeath to his children a part of the ecclesiastical property.[87] Here must be recognized an important root of the legislation on celibacy, namely, concern for church property. Celibacy was the surest guarantee that ecclesiastical office-holders would have no heirs. Under Pelagius II (578–590), however, it became clear that in any case the subdeacons in Sicily for far more than a century had not carried out the requirement made by Leo the Great, and the corresponding instruction of the reigning Pope appeared to them as a novelty.[88] Gregory the Great expressed himself very urgently on the matter and declared that married men who received the higher orders must not dismiss their wives but must live with them, from then on, in complete continence.[89] In his Dialogues (4, 11) Gregory gave an example of how such continence was observed in an exemplary manner by a priest and his wife.

---

[85] For example, Orléans 538, can. 18.

[86] Cf. supra, p. 638.

[87] Letter 33 to the Patrician Cethegus.

[88] Cf. Gryson, op. cit., 166.

In Gaul people willingly accepted the new legislation from Rome. In its canon 21 the Council of Orange of 441 had already prescribed that for the future married men were to be ordained deacons only when they began an ascetic life, that is, took the vow of perfect chastity. This vow was also required of the wives of these clerics, so that, if, for example, the husband died, they for their part could not remarry.[90] But not all married men could be ordained to the higher ranks of the clergy: one who had married a second time or had married a widow was just as much out of the question as was one who had done public penance, for this excluded one entirely from the clergy.[91] The vow of perfect chastity, in which in Gaul was seen the most effective protection of celibacy, was required in Spain only about two centuries later, namely by the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633.[92] In Gaul also the Roman motivation for celibacy was adopted, especially the exegesis of First Corinthians 7:5, in which Paul, really to limit overzealous asceticism and to guard his Corinthians against disillusionment, had instructed them to hold themselves aloof in order to devote themselves for a time especially to prayer. But now, after celibacy seemed required,[93] this became the instruction: if lay people must live in continence so that their prayers may be heard, all the more then the priests and levites who constantly serve in God's presence and must pray for the people. Hence it is not surprising that almost all synods of the fifth and sixth centuries in Gaul imposed the obligation to continence on the higher clerics. In this connection it is interesting that the wife of the bishop was called episcopa and apparently occasionally played an important role in the administration of the see, for example, by undertaking the charitable activity.[94] A bishop who had no episcopa seems, according to canon 14 of the Council of Tours of 567, to have clearly been an exception. He should have himself served by clerics; these should see to it that no woman came into the house. The same Council spoke of the wife of a priest, presbytera, and of the diaconissa and the subdiaconissa in canon 20; apparently they all occupied a worthy rank in Church and society, but could no longer live together with their men in the married state. But the decrees on penalties for transgressions of these prescriptions were frequent, just as the synods quite often had to take care that clerics who were not married were reprimanded because of intercourse with women and issue regulations as to how the household of a priest should be managed. Only close female relatives might be in the house of a bishop or priest, such as the mother, sister, daughter, or other persons who could evoke no suspicion of any sort.[95] For the rest, the archpriests should especially see to it that other members of the clergy should always be in their company, who could give testimony to their continence.[96] In Spain canon 6 of the Council of Gerona of 517 expressed the desire that the higher clerics after their ordination should no longer live in a house with their wives, whom they had now to consider as their sisters; but this demand did not become law. After the conversion of the Arian Visigoths in 586 there resulted for the Spanish Catholic Church a special problem due to the conversion of certain Arian clergymen who had up to now been married and now also wanted to continue their marriage, after they had been accepted into the Catholic clergy following a special examination. But canon 5 of the Third Council of Toledo in 589 decreed that such ecclesiastics, if they insisted on their marriage, were to be degraded to the order of lector. The same Council proceeded especially severely against concubinage: the ecclesiastic should submit to canonical penalties, that is, be deposed and sent to a monastery, the woman should be sold as a slave and the price of the sale distributed among the poor (canon 5). The Fourth Council of Toledo in 633, which was entirely under the influence of Isidore of Seville, demanded in canon 27 that the priests and deacons of rural parishes take a solemn vow of chastity before their bishop; in 666 the same was required at Mérida by the bishops in canon 4. The Eighth Council of Toledo in 653 was forced to deal with subdeacons who not only continued their marriage but also those who believed themselves justified in marrying again after the death of their wives. They cited as motive that at their ordination they had received no benedictio from the bishop, as was the case with priests and deacons. In canon 8 the Council decided that a benedictio should be inserted into the rite of ordination of subdeacons so that such an evasion could no longer be allowed. But two years later, in 655, the Ninth Council of Toledo in canon 10 had to state that the many decisions of the Fathers which were supposed to serve to restrict the licentiousness of clerics had had no impact up to now, and so it had recourse to the severest means: children born to a cleric, from subdeacon to bishop, after his ordination, were not to be entitled to inherit, in fact they were forever to be slaves of the church which the clergyman served. If the Eleventh Council of Toledo in 675 decreed excommunication and perpetual banishment for a bishop who was said to have seduced a relative of a secular lord, then it was certainly thinking of an individual case, and this was not an allusion to the general moral level of the Spanish episcopate.

---

[89] Reg. Epp. I, 50; IX, 110.

[90] Cf. Agde 506, can. 16; Orléans 511, can. 13. In Mâcon 585, can. 16, this was extended even to the wives of exorcists and acolytes.

[91] Epaon 517, can. 2.

[92] Cf. Gryson, op. cit., 190.

[93] Ibid., 199.

[94] Cf. Beck, 27.

---

[95] Gerona 517, can. 7; Clermont 535, can. 16; Tours 567, can. 10 and often.

[96] Council of Tours 567, can. 20.

Nevertheless it must be admitted that toward the end of the seventh century an intellectual and moral decline in the Spanish episcopate must be deplored, which went back to the strong involvement of Church and State with each other: the bishops belonged to the electoral body for the crown, and the King named all bishops. Also in Frankish Gaul the influence of the crown on the filling of episcopal sees had grown greatly in the sixth century.[97] The consequence was that frequently laymen were ordained and simony flourished. The fact that in Gaul too the bishops became increasingly involved in politics in the seventh century must probably be attributed to this, that from the middle of the seventh century the parish system was established and the bishops had no further dynamic function within the Church.[98] On the other hand, there was a reason for this in the deficient education of the episcopate. True, c. 575 Gallic bishops were pleased to be extolled by Venantius Fortunatus because of their stylistic skill, and at the Synod of Mâcon in 585 Bishop Praetextatus of Rouen received only scattered applause for his preaching, because it displayed no rhetorical art,[99] so that an awareness of style may be assumed in a majority of the episcopate, but the complaints on the decline of education are general.[100] Gregory the Great especially tried to obtain bishops from monastic circles, because they guaranteed a minimum in intellectual and moral formation. Still one must guard against too dark a picture. In any event, for the sixth century in southeastern Gaul east of the Rhone and south of Lyon, of 148 bishops thirty-four at least can be named who were venerated as saints.[101] And when it is seen how decisively Gregory the Great proceeded against violation of duty,[102] it cannot be assumed that the entire episcopate had become corrupt.[103]

ARCHPRIEST. With the completion of the parish organization, in any event in Gaul, the title of "archpriest," which hitherto had been reserved to a cleric of the episcopal church, came into wider use. These were now the archpriests appearing in the countryside—for the sake of clarity they were called "village archpriests," archipresbyteri vicani, in canon 20 of the Synod of Tours in 567. They were not, as later in the Carolingian age, competent for several parishes, but at times only for their own parish, but there they were responsible not only for the care of souls but also for the behavior of all the others of the parish clergy, to which, in addition to readers, singers, in any event in Merovingian Gaul, seem to have always belonged at least a deacon and a subdeacon. In many cases it seems that, besides the archpriest, there were still other priests in the parish. Since the number of rural pastors who bore the title of "archpriest" is very large, but still smaller than the number of pastors in general,[104] it may be assumed that only those pastors did not bear the title of archpriest in whose parish there were no other priests.[105]

---

[97] Gregory of Tours, Hist. 3, 17; 4, 6; 4, 26.

[98] H. F. Muller, L'époque mérovingienne (New York 1945), 93f.

[99] Gregory of Tours, Hist. 8, 20.

[100] Gregory of Tours, Hist., praef.; Gregory the Great, Regular pastoralis 1, Intro.

[101] Beck, 40.

[102] For example, Reg. Epp. III, 44, 45.

[103] Giordano, op. cit., 81f.

In Spain, on the other hand, there continued to be only one archpriest in each episcopal church. He, or the archdeacon, according to canon 7 of the Synod of Braga of 563, which of course applied only to Galicia, had the duty of administering the third of the ecclesiastical revenues which was destined for the purposes of worship. And canon 5 of the Synod of Mérida of 666 decreed for all Spain that a bishop could be represented at a synod by his archpriest or another worthy priest but by no means by a deacon. Thus in Spain the archpriest appears alongside the archdeacon, in fact with a certain precedence. In Merovingian Gaul, on the contrary, the one archdeacon in each bishopric was placed over the many archpriests of the parishes, for lapses of the clergy were to be reported to him or to the bishop;[106] in regard to jurisdiction he was the vicar of the bishop and during the vacancy of the see the ultimately responsible steward. Some Gallic councils apparently wanted to exalt the esteem of the archpriests: they should be deposed only with the consent of the other priests[107] and only for a serious lapse;[108] they were to take care that younger clerics were always with them to testify to their fidelity to celibacy.[109]

Two synods of the seventh century, that of Clichy of 626 in canon 21 and that of Saint-Jean de Losne in Burgundy of 673 in canon 9, forbade without qualification the giving of the office of archpriest to a layman; hence this custom had probably crept in. But in this regard it was not greed that was blamed, as might be suspected.[110] There seems to have been another reason. The Council already mentioned, which took place at an unknown locality after 614, forbade the installing of a layman as archpriest by the bishop, unless the candidate exhibited special personal superiority and was alone in a position to defend the members of the parish. The archpriest was competent, in fact, not only for the care of souls and the supervision of the rest of the parochial clergy but also for the defense or representation respectively of the parish clergy in public. The diocesan Synod of Auxerre (between 561 and 605) decided in canon 43 that no judge must bring a cleric before his court without the consent of the bishop or of the archdeacon or at least of the competent archpriest. Apparently it became difficult to defend the parish clergy in this manner in the course of the seventh century in the framework of the decay of the Merovingian Kingdom and its organization. In any event, this may still have been possible for people who had secular esteem and secular power and who for this reason were appointed as archpriests by the bishops. Here would be a comparison with the function of monastic advocatus that would come into vogue later; but this providing of the archpriest from the lay state had no future.

---

[104] E. Griffe, MD 36 (1953), 57.

[105] Thus Sägmüller, op. cit., 35.

[106] For example, Auxerre 573/603, can. 20.

[107] Tours 567, can. 7.

[108] Council at an unknown place after 614, can. 11.

[109] Tours 567, can. 20.

[110] Of course, this motive cannot be excluded; canon 5 of the Synod of Chalon (between 647 and 653) finds fault that laymen (saeculares) had the property of a parish or the parish itself (apparently for the sake of the property) made over to them.

CHAPTER 41*

Liturgy, Care of Souls, Piety

Liturgy

The period between the pontificate of Leo the Great and the beginning of the eighth century brought the Roman Liturgy to full development and in many features to its definitive shape. The oldest extant collection of Mass prayers bears the name of Leo the Great; another, which reveals a later stage of development, is attributed in tradition to Pope Gelasius I (492–96), and a third, in which the liturgy appears substantially curtailed and more rigid, to Pope Gregory the Great (590–604).

The oldest of these sacramentaries must have originated through the combining of individual booklets, Mass libelli, which collected various Mass formulas for the same feast of the Lord or of a saint. These libelli themselves are probably to be explained by the fact that Roman priests who preserved them in the archives of the Lateran compiled Mass prayers recently drafted from time to time by individual Popes.[1] The Leonine, better called simply the Veronese from its place of discovery, extends only from the months of April to December: the beginning seems to have been lost. In April are found forty-four Mass formulas for feasts of saints, grouped together with different numbers of prayers; for Christmas there are nine formularies, not all of which, it is true, are complete, but all contain a proper preface. One gets the impression that the compiler aimed to preserve every discoverable prayer of the Roman Liturgy, but occasionally there was a wrong classification. Thus we find in this sacramentary under the date of 2 August nine formularies for the old Roman feast of Pope Stephen I, killed in 258 in the Valerian Persecution and, under the indication of place, in cymeterio Callisti in via Appia, hence of the burial place of the third-century Popes, but all these formularies refer to the Protomartyr Stephen, who died in Jerusalem and whose feast was celebrated on 26 December from the time he was generally venerated in the West.[2] In this connection, however, some of the formularies make known, through mention of the birth of Christ, that they were composed for the feast of this Stephen. Such a confusion would probably not have occurred to a Roman cleric.

---

* The author must, especially in this chapter, thank his teacher, Karl Baus, for his turning over of notes and references to the literature, but at the same time he regrets that not all the phenomena of the inner life of the Church in the brief period at his disposal could be pursued, as he would have liked to do in the earlier planned twofold division of the chapter.

The oldest extant manuscript of the sacramentary that is connected with Pope Gelasius comes not from Rome but from the Frankish Kingdom and is one of the many testimonies to the zeal with which Roman liturgical property was appropriated on purely private initiative in the Frankish Kingdom in the course of the seventh century. The Gelasian Masses are distinguished by this, that before the prayer over the gifts they provide two or three prayers which apparently are not optional, for then it is said: item alia, and hence one can infer more than merely two scriptural readings. In Gaul and Spain three readings were usual up to the adoption of the Roman liturgy.[3]

The Gregorian Sacramentary is preserved substantially in two forms: first, as the so-called Hadrianum, which was sent to Charles the Great as a result of his request by Pope Hadrian I, but which must have been supplemented in the Frankish Kingdom, since the Sunday Masses were missing, and then the Paduense, named from the place of finding, which was likewise written in the Frankish Kingdom but reached Padua via Verona, where the Mass of Saint Zeno was added to it.[4] In the Sacramentarium Gregorianum the modern reader to whom the liturgy from the period before the reform of Vatican II is familiar immediately feels at home. The Mass formularies generally contain only three prayers, occasionally another optional one; the prefaces are strictly abbreviated. Here obviously there was at work a man to whom what mattered were clarity, purity, and intelligibility. People are quite prepared to recognize here the work of the great Pope, who reorganized the Roman ecclesiastical system at the turn of the seventh century. Probably for the sake of easier use, the Mass formularies were put into a continuous series, whereas the Gelasianum were put in three books, first the Proprium de tempore, in the second book the Proprium de Sanctis, in the third book the Votive Masses. Of course, the transition to the Gregorianum does not always also represent a qualitative advance; that Pope Gregory in remodeling made old prayers shallow in some places seems to have already struck the Frankish compiler of the Gelasianum that has come down to us:[5] in some places he did not take the more recent prayers, but followed the older and better form.[6] While the Gelasianum still gives no Mass formularies for the Thursdays of Lent, such are found from the start in the Gregorianum-Hadrianum—they were later added in the Paduense. But in fact, according to the information in the Liber Pontificalis, it was Pope Gregory II (715–731), who was also the first Pope officially to direct his energies to establishing the influence of the Roman Liturgy outside Rome, namely through Boniface in Bavaria, who ordered these Thursday Masses and had texts created for them. The Sacramentarium Gregorianum-Hadrianum can thus have achieved its definitive form not under Gregory I but at the earliest under Gregory II; this also follows from the presence of Gregory's feast on 12 March,[7] before the revision of the liturgical calendars. Hence when it is claimed in the title of the book that this sacramentary was editum by Pope Saint Gregory, this only means that Gregory was the liturgical authority for the eighth century, probably because his creative liturgical activity was still best remembered, though probably with some exaggeration. A first redaction of the Gregorianum occurred probably as early as under Honorius (625–638).[8] Especially characteristic, on the other hand again familiar to the modern person acquainted with the preconciliar liturgy, is the indication of the Roman churches in which Mass was celebrated, hence to which the Pope went on occasion, for example, on Christmas to Santa Maria Maggiore at night, to Santa Anastasia at dawn, to St. Peter's in the day. Hence it reveals the Gregorianum as clearly composed for the papal Mass, whereas the Gelasianum does not mention the stational churches but, for example, for the three Christmas Masses gives only the times of day, and so can thereby, among other things, be recognized as a Mass book for priests. Chavasse has discovered in it two strata, which he would like to explain by means of two Roman nonpapal liturgical centers, namely St. Peter's at the Vatican and St. Peter-in-Chains. But scholarship has not followed him in this absolutely. The two strata can probably be explained also by the assumption that two different priests coming to Rome, probably from the monastic state, must be regarded as responsible for the compilation.[9] One of the two could have come from Campania, which would explain the actually very striking emphasis on Campanian saints in the Gelasianum without one's having to suppose a Campanian origin for greater portions of the Gelasianum. In every case also the Old Gelasianum—many mixed forms later appeared in Italy and the Frankish kingdom—seems not to have been a genuine Roman work. The mixture of feasts celebrated in the sixth century in still locally separated churches, that is, only in individual ones dedicated to saints, seems to exclude this.[10] That Bishop Maximian of Ravenna was the author[11] seems not yet to be adequately demonstrated. True, the Gelasianum goes back to the time before Gregory the Great, but it cannot have received the form in which it migrated from Rome into the Frankish kingdom before 628, when the Emperor Heraclius brought the holy cross back from Persia to Jerusalem, for we find there on 14 September the feast of the Triumph of the Cross, which commemorates the victory of Heraclius.

---

[1] Cf. A. Stuiber, Libelli Sacramentorum Romani, Theophaneia VI (Bonn 1950).

[2] Cf. Calendarium Polemii Silvii of the year 448, PL 13, 676–688.

[3] Cf. infra, p. 669.

[4] Cf. Dushusses, Einl.

---

[5] Cod. Vat. Regin. lat. 316.

[6] C. Coebergh, ALW VII, 1 (1961), 56.

[7] Sect. 30, nos. 137–139, ed. Deshusses.

[8] Cf. Deshusses, 53.

Some references to the form of celebration of Mass can be inferred from the sacramentaries, but they contain no liturgical rubrics. This gap is closed by the so-called Ordines Romani, which give, among other things, the external course of the Papal Mass (Ordo I), of the preparation for baptism (Ordo XI), the celebration of Holy Week (Ordo XXVII), the ordination of clerics from acolyte to bishop (Ordo XXXIV).

In Ordo I the solemn papal stational Mass is described, in which the entire celebration begins with the assembling of the Roman urban clergy at the Lateran Palace. It is stated from which of the seven regions of the city the clergy had to carry out the service in the papal Mass on the individual days of the week. In what order the clergy go to the stational church is also described; it is even decided in what manner someone coming down the road may present a petition to the Pope, the Apostolicus. On Easter Sunday, when the Pope goes to Santa Maria

---

[9] C. Coebergh, loc. cit., 72.

[10] Id., loc. cit., 71.

[11] K. Gamber, SE 12 (1961), 19.

Maggiore, there comes to meet him on the Via Merulana the notary of this region to make known to him the number of children baptized on the vigil at Santa Maria Maggiore. The Pope rides to the stational church, and some other high dignitaries accompany him likewise on horseback, while the majority of the clergy precede on foot. Naturally, with so numerous an entourage, the entry of the Pope into the stational church was a very solemn procession, and it is not surprising that during it the schola executed a chant, the introitus. The Pope was preceded by a subdeacon with the censer and seven acolytes with candlesticks. The Ordo prescribed exactly how at which parts of the Mass the candlesticks were to be placed in the altar area. After the introitus the schola sang the Kyrie eleison: then the Pope, standing at his chair that had been specially brought along (Ordo I, 23) turned to the people and intoned the Gloria, but then immediately turned back to the East or the apse respectively. For the Pax vobis he again faced the people, but once more turned to the East to say Oremus and the prayer. This rubric seems to presuppose the, for the most part, de facto not real orientation of all Roman churches, hence it can probably be recognized as a Frankish interpretation.[12]

In regard to the direction in which the Pope prays there is also the important instruction (Ordo I, 87) that before the beginning of the preface the regionary subdeacons should station themselves opposite the Pope on the other side of the altar—retro altare aspicientes ad pontificem—so that they can give the responses to the Dominus vobiscum, Sursum corda, and Gratias agamus. Hence it must not be excluded, though it is also not self-evident, that the celebrating Pope faced the people on the other side of the altar.

Contact with the crowd of the faithful, at least with those of senatorial rank, was had by the celebrating Pope at the preparation of the gifts and the communion. Following the Dominus vobiscum and Oremus after the gospel—they apparently had long served no purpose (Ordo I, 63, 69)—the Pope, assisted on his right and his left by the first notary and the first defensor, went from his seat down to the nave in order to receive the gifts of the nobles (principes). He handed them to the regionary subdeacon and by the hands of the next subdeacon they arrived at the altar. At the same time that the Pope was receiving the gifts of bread, the archdeacon accepted the gifts of wine in little vessels and poured them into a larger chalice, which was then again poured into a larger vessel (ibid. 70). The gifts of bread and wine of the rest of the people were accepted by the bishop who performed the weekly service or the next deacon respectively (nos. 72 and 73). It is expressly stressed that the Pope also went to the women's side to accept their gifts. It is interesting that apparently all clerics taking part in the Mass brought gifts to the altar; even the Pope had his personal gifts of bread given to him by the archdeacon (nos. 74, 82, 83).

---

[12] Cf. C. Vogel, "L'orientation dans les ordines Romani," Studi medievali III (1960), 452ff.

During the actual celebration of the Eucharist a paten and only one chalice with handles stood on the altar. Naturally the chalice did not suffice for the communion of the entire clergy and people. Furthermore, the Pope communicated, apparently for the sake of solemnity but hardly in accord with the meaning of the Eucharistic celebration, not at the altar but at the seat. While a deacon brought the apparently very large paten[13] to the Pope seated on his cathedra, it should be noted that a piece of the Eucharistic bread remained on the altar so that during the celebration of Mass "the altar may not be without the sacrifice" (no. 105). After the communion of the Pope a small amount of wine from the consecrated chalice was poured into the large vessel containing unconsecrated wine, which the acolytes were holding. Then all clerics present communicated at the altar, during which the highest in rank of the celebrating bishops received the chalice from the hand of the archdeacon (no. 110). The consecrated wine still remaining after the communion of the clerics was likewise poured into the large vessel already mentioned. Then the Pope himself went down to the nave to give the consecrated bread to the faithful of senatorial rank. The archdeacon gave them the Precious Blood (no. 113), but apparently not from the chalice, which was in the meantime again put away (no. 112), but from the other vessel, which was filled from the large pitcher (nos. 111, 115). The wine which the faithful received in communion was therefore consecrated by contact with the Precious Blood poured into it.[14] This seems to have been a peculiar Roman usage. In Gaul from the start there were apparently two or three chalices on the altar in order to have sufficient consecrated wine at the disposal of the laity. But later Pope Gregory II found fault with this custom in his fourteenth letter to Boniface: Christ took one chalice and said, "This cup . . ." and so forth; hence it is not fitting to have two or three chalices on the altar.

For the distribution of communion also the Pope went to the women's side (Ordo I, 118) and returned to his seat for the final prayer. The external course of the celebration of Mass is strongly characterized by the two ceremonies of the kiss of peace, which was passed from clergy to people (no. 96), and the breaking of the Eucharistic bread, in which all priests present took part (no. 102). In order that no particles might be lost, the consecrated breads were first put into small bags (no. 101). The ceremony of the breaking of the bread was accompanied by the singing of the Agnus Dei, which according to Ordo I, 105, was sung by the schola, but according to Ordo XV, 53, by all. During this chant, the Pope dictated to a secretary the names of those who should be invited for this day to the noon meal with him or with his vicedominus. Then two clerics went down immediately to the nave and gave the invitation. Equally surprising is it to the modern reader that the archdeacon, with the Eucharistic chalice in his hand, announced where the next stational liturgy would take place (no. 108). The reason was perhaps that many left during the communion, so that this announcement could not be delayed until the end of Mass. It is also interesting that neither Ordo I nor Ordo XV attests a blessing at the end of Mass. Perhaps the deacon proclaimed Ite, missa est, but the Pope's last word was the concluding prayer, before which, furthermore, he did not direct the introductory Dominus vobiscum to the people, but said it toward the East or the apse respectively (no. 123). Of course, during the recessional the Pope blessed in order the bishops, priests, monks, schola, standard-bearers, candle-bearers, and sacristans (I, 126; similarly, Ordo XV, 65).

---

[13] It can also be carried by two clerics: Ordo I, 103.

[14] Cf. M. Andrieu, Immixtio et consecratio. La consécration par contact dans les documents liturgiques du moyen âge (Paris 1924).

The description of the celebration of Mass in Ordo XV, it is true, lets the personnel appear less; but it is doubtful whether it is therefore to be regarded as older.[15] It may for this reason deal with different degrees of solemnity. Both descriptions of Mass may probably belong to the seventh century,[16] but then to its last years, for it was Pope Sergius I (687–701) who introduced the Agnus Dei, attested in both, into the Roman Liturgy.[17] Ordo I especially shows a type of Mass so richly developed and at the same time so specific even in details and distributed among the different ranks of the clergy that probably Byzantine influence could rightly be responsible for it.[18] More exactly, one may think of the pontificate of Pope Vitalian (657–672), who disregarded the dogmatic tensions of the Monothelite controversy and thought of a compromise with Byzantium. The fact that the papal singers were later called Vitaliani[19] lets one conclude that Vitalian entrusted the new chants to the Lateran school, one of the two scholae cantorum founded by Gregory the Great, while that at St. Peter's continued to cultivate the traditional Roman urban chants.[20]

Thus there developed in the second half of the seventh century the new typically papal rite and chant, which differed from the old Roman considerably, but was only codified and recommended for dissemination in the West by Pope Gregory II (715–731).[21] One reason for this conclusion is that the English Church, which had been founded from Rome and accordingly had extensively adopted the Roman Liturgy, toward the end of the seventh century regarded the establishing of new contacts with Rome as necessary. In any event, Benedict Biscop, who died in 689 as Abbot of Wearmouth and Jarrow, went to Rome several times and each time brought back liturgical books. On the journey at the time of Pope Agatho (678–681), John, Abbot of the Roman monastery of St. Martin, who at the same time was archcantor at St. Peter's, came with him to England, where he trained many clerics and wrote books on ecclesiastical chant.[22] All this seems to indicate that in the second half of the seventh century a decisive liturgical change was in progress at Rome.

---

[15] Van Dijk, SE 12 (1961), 458f.

[16] Id., loc. cit., 458, 446.

[17] Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne, I, 376.

[18] Van Dijk, loc. cit., 462ff.

[19] Ibid., 487.

[20] Van Dijk, ELit. 77 (1963), 335–356.

But allusions to the changes of rite, which had taken place as early as the sixth century, can also be obtained from the sacramentaries. Thus the Mass formularies of the Gelasianum contain, after the prayer designated as post communionem, very frequently another prayer which is entitled ad populum. Also the formularies of the Leonianum regularly provide after the preface two prayers, the latter of which asks God's protection for the Christian people, believers, the household of God, and the like. Hence it seems that into the sixth century no blessing was spoken at the conclusion of Mass in Rome, but the prayer over the people. The Gregorianum contains in both its Hadrianic and its Paduan versions a prayer over the people only for the weekdays of Lent, as this was preserved up to our own day. Apparently in the course of the seventh century the episcopal blessing took the place of the prayer over the people as the conclusion of Mass at Rome.[23] Since this form probably represented a certain solemnity, it seems not to have been employed for the Lenten weekdays. That in the sixth century no other type of final blessing besides the prayer over the people was known appears from the report of the arrest of Pope Vigilius by the Byzantine police. He was dragged away from Mass; the people followed him and demanded to receive the prayer from him. After he had given the prayer, the people responded Amen, and the ship sailed off with the Pope.[24] Later a series of fifty-two blessings for various occasions was added to the Gregorianum–Hadrianum in the Frankish kingdom. The difference which existed between the benedictio and the oratio super populum was not only that the oratio was very much more concise than the benedictio, but especially that the oratio addressed God, whereas the benedictio addressed the people and mentioned God in the third person.

---

[21] Id., SE 12 (1961), 484.

[22] Bede, Hist. IV, 18; cf. Andrieu, Ordines II, 27f., and supra, p. 600.

[23] Cf. Chavasse, Le sacramentaire Gélasien, 188f.

[24] LP I, 297; cf. Chavasse, op. cit., 189.

The blessings were especially popular in the Gallican and Spanish liturgies, but there they had their place before the communion. This blessing was especially favored by Caesarius of Arles;[25] canon 44 of the Synod of Agde in 506 expressly reserved this blessing to the bishop. Furthermore, it was enacted in canon 47 that no one must leave Mass without having received the bishop's blessing.[26] It was probably endured as inevitable that then many left the church and only those who were to communicate remained. The fact that at Rome the place of the next stational liturgy was announced before the distribution of communion[27] seems to indicate that there too similar habits prevailed. The episcopal benedictio offered pastors the opportunity to enter again into the mystery of the feast and give the faithful a reminder for the journey. At the same time one could display all one's rhetorical gifts. In any event, this blessing seems to have been extraordinarily popular in Gaul and Spain with episcopate and people: all together 2,093 different formulas of benediction have come down to us,[28] and this, even though Pope Zachary in 751 in his letter to Boniface cited against such a peculiar Gallic custom very serious but probably not appropriate exegetical arguments and compared the Gauls, desirous of glory, with people who preach another gospel.[29] The benedictio was without doubt one of the elements of the Gallic or Visigothic-Spanish liturgies respectively which proved them to be more strongly pastorally oriented and popular than the Roman Liturgy. Therefore it is to be welcomed that the solemn benedictio in the most recent liturgical reform has again come into honor, provided it is employed only pastorally and does not serve for inflexible solemnization.

The liturgical dress customary in Rome during this time was quite different from contemporary custom. Ordo Romanus I expressly testifies that at the end of the seventh century a distinction was made between the liturgical and the ordinary dress. In connection with Ordo 34, 10, it is known that with the exception of the deacon, who was clothed in the dalmatic, all clerics from acolyte to the bishop, hence also the subdeacon and the priest, wore the planeta during the liturgy, but it was probably not like the Mass vestments of modern times, but must have been very long and wide, probably also of flimsy material, so that the acolytes could hold the sacred vessels or the gospel book with hands veiled in the planeta.

---

[25] Caesarius, Sermo 73, 2; 74, 2; 76, 3.

[26] Cf. also Delage, 165.

[27] Cf. supra, p. 664.

[28] Cf. CChr, Series Latina, 162 and 162a, ed. E. Moeller (1971).

[29] PL 89, 951f.

The liturgy in use in Gaul and Spain not only differed from the Roman as regards the already mentioned episcopal benedictio before communion, in which, of course, one should speak rather of a divergence of the Roman Liturgy from a probably extensively universal basic type. Reference has already been made[30] to the fact that the three prayers at the beginning of the Mass in the Leonianum and in the Gelasianum seem to point to three readings at Rome also. Of course, it must be taken into account that a wider reading attested in Rome, as also the first prayer, did not belong to the stational liturgy but were spoken in the church of the collecta, from which people marched to the stational church.[31] The churches of Gaul and Spain in any case preferred three readings; regularly one from the Old Testament, one from the epistles, and one from the gospel. In this connection, on feasts of saints the Old Testament reading could be replaced by the passio or vita of the saint or at least by its last part, which had not been read in the solemn morning Office.[32]

It is striking that in southern Spain before the middle of the sixth century gospel and sermon apparently only took place after the preparation of the gifts and the dismissal of the catechumens. In any event, canon 1 of the Council of Valencia in 549 decreed that the gospel should be read before the inlatio munerum and the missa catechuminum so that catechumens as well as the penitents could be edified by gospel and sermon, and others perhaps be even converted by them, as had occasionally happened. A few years later, in 561, canon 4 of the First Council of Braga, which of course made rules only for the small and at that time still dependent Kingdom of the Sueves, decreed that Mass should be celebrated according to the model which Bishop Profuturus had brought from Rome; and canon 5 stated that baptism likewise should be administered in the Roman way.

In fact, Pope Vigilius at the beginning of his pontificate had in 538, at the request of the Bishop of Braga, sent him a baptismal ritual and an ordo precum and had indicated that the latter always remained the same in the celebration of Mass, that only on Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, Epiphany, and feasts of saints were capitula especially appropriate to these days inserted.[33] From this it may probably be deduced that on the one hand at Rome in the days of Vigilius there were still no liturgical books in which the celebrations of one year or even only of a part of the Church year were collected,[34] and on the other hand an official control of the variable prayers was not regarded as necessary. In fact, in contrast to the African Church, which very early knew prescriptions relating to the liturgical prayers, the Roman Church did not make the first efforts in this direction until the eighth century.[35] Until then limits were hardly placed on the creative liturgical activity of the Popes. Thus, the oldest Roman collection of prayers, hence the so-called Sacramentarium Leonianum, contains several Mass formularies which Pope Vigilius probably composed.[36] It is fitting to stress that at the Synod of Braga the texts that had come from Rome appeared as adequate models, hence that there was no wish to set limits to the free creative activity of the bishops for the variable prayers, whose volume in the Spanish Liturgy to a great extent surpassed the variable prayers of the Roman Mass.

---

[30] Cf. supra, p. 659.

[31] K. Gamber, "Oratio ad collectam," ELit 82 (1968), 45–47.

[32] Gregory of Tours, Gloria martyrum 89; cf. E. Griffe, BLE (1975), 23.

[33] PL 69, 18C =PL 84, 832B; cf. C. Vogel, Settimane . . . VII, 192f.

If it is also questionable to speak of a Gallic Liturgy, because in Gaul there was absolutely no uniformity, still some common characteristic features can be emphasized. To be sure, we first have adequate sources only for the seventh century, for the letters of pseudo-Germanus, in which is found a description of the liturgy, are really an "edifying commentary on the liturgical decrees of an unknown Frankish council of the end of the seventh century." All the extant Gallic sacramentaries, for example, the Gallicanum Vetus, the Missale Goticum, and so forth, are already romanized.[37] It has been pointed out that the Gallic, and likewise the Spanish, Liturgy shows a greater common character with the oriental than with the Roman. But it must be noted that in the variability of the Mass prayers Roman and Gallic Liturgies are in agreement against the oriental.[38]

The Gallic pontifical Mass probably did not know a solemn entry of the bishop to the accompaniment of song before the seventh century; the bishop seems rather to have come in without any special ceremony so that the deacon first had to urge the faithful to silence in order that then the bishop could greet them.[39] Then the Trisagion was sung in Greek and Latin; but it was probably adopted from the East only in the seventh century, and then the older Kyrie-litany standing at this place, which for its part had been introduced by canon 3 of the Synod of Vaison of 529 not only for Mass but also for Lauds and Vespers, was reduced to a mere appendage. The Benedictus occupied the place which the Gloria had maintained at Rome since Pope Symmachus. Then the celebrant said the first prayer, the collecta. After the readings from the Old Testament and the apostolic epistles, the Canticle of the Three Children, called the Benedictio, was executed as the intermediate song. The gospel was read from the ambo, to which there was a solemn procession. After this, some of the faithful left the church, as Caesarius complained (Sermo 73, 2) and tried to correct, among other things by having the church doors closed. After the sermon the deacon recited a litany, which was concluded with the collect of the celebrant. The dismissal of the catechumens and of the penitents was followed by the Prayer of the Faithful, but probably, as at Rome, this had been severely reduced under the influence of the Gelasian Kyrie-litany. During the bringing of the gifts to the altar the so-called Laudes, that is, a triple alleluia, was sung. To this was added the mention of the names of the dead, for whom prayers were to be offered, and this was continued in a special prayer post nomina. Next the kiss of peace was given, introduced by a suitable prayer ad pacem. At Rome in the early fifth century the kiss of peace had found its position at the place in the Mass familiar to us today. Also at Rome there was occasional criticism that in Gaul the names of those for whom there were to be prayers were mentioned before the Canon. The preface, called contestatio in the Gallic Liturgy, was often a long description of the miracles of a saint.[40] The further course of the Mass, namely, Canon, breaking of the bread, Lord's Prayer, was, except for the episcopal blessing before communion, very much like the Roman. But it should still be emphasized that in Gaul Psalm 33 was sung at communion, apparently because of verse 9: Gustate et videte, quoniam suavis est Dominus.

---

[34] K. Gamber, Sakramentartypen, 51f.

[35] Cf. M. Vos, 11.

[36] Chavasse, ELit. 64 (1950), 161–213; 66 (1952), 145–219.

[37] C. Vogel, Settimane . . . VII, 201f.

[38] Ibid., 200.

[39] Beck, 137ff.

The Spanish Visigothic Mass, in any case, from the time of Julian of Toledo, knew a penitential act of the priest at the beginning.[41] Isidore of Seville enumerates seven variable prayers,[42] which were to be attached to the Mass of the Faithful. The first is a prayer of admonition to the people; the second, an appeal to God that he would accept the gifts and hence corresponds to the Roman Prayer over the Gifts, the former Secreta. The third prayer is the Oratio post nomina, hence an intercession for the deceased just named. The fourth prayer is related to the kiss of peace, that is, it asks that what is expressed by the external sign may be effective in the faithful. The fifth variable prayer, the inlatio, corresponds to the Preface. After the Sanctus there is also a variable prayer, which leads on to the consecration. The Liber ordinum gives as the seventh variable prayer one after the account of the Last Supper (post pridie), whereas Isidore gives it as the transition to the Lord's Prayer. Apparently, Isidore wanted to extol the sacred number of seven, and so the benedictio and the completuria, which are attested by the Liber ordinum and other liturgical documents,[43] are left unmentioned.

---

[40] Gregory of Tours, Virt. s. Martini 2, 14; cf. Beck, 147.

[41] Fernández Alonso, 314.

[42] Eccl. off. I, 15; PL 83, 752ff; Fernández Alonso, 318ff.

Especially in comparison with the full mention of the names of the deceased and the prayers post nomina of the Gallic and Spanish Liturgies, it is surprising that no commemoration of the dead is found in the Canon in the Gregorianum-Hadrianum. However, this may be explained in this way, that at Rome on Sundays and solemnities, differing from Gaul, the deceased were not expressly named,[44] and the model sent to Aachen contains only the solemn form of the papal Mass. Furthermore, the memento mortuorum seems, together with the Nobis quoque peccatoribus, to have been inserted into the Canon by Pope Gelasius when the Oratio fidelium was abolished and at least in part supplanted by the Kyrie-litany.[45] If it is thought that the intercessions for the living and the dead must have been a special concern of the faithful, then, at Rome in any event, solemnity defeated popular appeal in the liturgy. Moreover, the papal rite and chant, newly introduced in the seventh century under Byzantine influence, made of the participants at Mass mere viewers and listeners.[46] Both the Gallic and the Spanish Liturgies were, from the pastoral viewpoint, superior to the Roman Liturgy, but only so long as the people understood the liturgical language.

To the normal liturgical life belongs not only the celebration of the Eucharist but also the Liturgy of the Hours. Early Christianity took care, as Tertullian testifies, to sanctify the important hours of the day by prayer. Then this became the special duty of monks. But also in the episcopal churches these hour-prayers of the Officium divinum are found in the sixth century, probably through adoption from the monastic life. Surest is the testimony for Arles, where Caesarius, who during his long episcopate retained his monastic ascetical life, had the entire Office, namely, Lauds, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and, before the great feasts, Vigils celebrated by his clergy, but with the participation of the people, because these hours represented for him an important means of pastoral care, especially since he frequently preached at morning or evening prayer. In the sharing in these hours of prayer, which he presented as obligatory at least for Lent (Sermo 196, 2), he saw an essential manifestation of devotion.[47] But there must also have been psalmody, that is, the hour-prayers, in the rural churches and chapels, at least a morning and an evening prayer:[48] however, the more exact scope is unknown to us. In Spain, Isidore of Seville first attests[49] the Little Hours as a duty of the diocesan clergy, but nothing is observed in regard to an obligation of participation by the people. Besides, Isidore, who was basically as monastic-minded as Caesarius, seems not to have succeeded in introducing the Little Hours as a fixed element of the cathedral office.[50] Still, in the meantime the development had gone so far that Isidore attests Compline as a special hour-prayer after Vespers.[51]

---

[43] Cf. Beckmann, 91, 96.

[44] Cf. Andrieu, Ordines II, 276.

[45] Ibid., 278, footnote 1, and reference to K. L. Kennedy, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass (1938), 34–38.

[46] Van Dijk, ELit. 77 (1963), 336.

While in most areas of Christianity a distinction must be made for the seventh century between the monastic liturgy and the liturgy of the diocesan clergy, this was not the case at Rome, because there were monasteries at the great basilicas.[52] In fact the monks who were on duty at Rome before Benedict had "so thoroughly replaced the cathedral prayer by their own arrangement that the modern Roman Office has an expressly monastic character."[53] In the seventh century all the hours of prayer later customary took place, as can be learned from Ordo Romanus XII. It is expressly indicated that on Holy Saturday only the nocturns and Matutinae Laudes were prayed. Especially impressive in Rome must have been the customary double vigil celebration before great feasts. On the eve was held a vigil without invitatorium and without participation of the people, which included between five and nine readings and from six to nine psalms. Then around midnight began the second vigil, which was introduced by the invitatorium and took place with the participation of the people, and then to it were attached the Matutinae Laudes.[54]

The order of readings for the Liturgy of the Hours began at Rome in the spring, seven days before the beginning of Lent, with Genesis, which was followed by the other books of Moses and then Joshua and Judges (Ordo Romanus XIV, 27). For the Franks, however, the liturgical year began with Advent, so that Ordo XVI, which witnesses to the adoption of the Roman order of readings in Frankish monasteries, begins with Isaiah, which was also read in Advent at Rome, but the books of Moses were allowed to remain in Lent. Thus it may be assumed that, from the time people thought at all about the question of the beginning of the liturgical year, the spring date was the oldest. True, both the Gelasianum and the Gregorianum begin the cycle of the year with Christmas, but the Advent Masses still stand at the end of the series in the Sankt Gallen Late Gelasianum,[55] which on the one hand was under strong Frankish influence, and on the other followed the arrangement of the Gregorianum.

---

[47] Beck, 119.

[48] Cf. supra, p. 644f.

[49] Eccl. off. I, 19–23.

[50] Fernández Alonso, 340f.

[51] Eccl. off. I, 20, 21.

[52] Van Dijk, SE 12 (1961), 430.

[53] Pascher, LThK 2 (1958), 680.

[54] Ordo Romanus XII, 23, 24; cf. also Andrieu, Ordines II, 465, footnote 23; reference to Amalarius, PL 105, 1305f.

In Spain, on the contrary, it had become usual in the seventh century to have the liturgical year begin even with 17 November, hence with the start of the long period of preparation for Christmas.[56] But the originally Gallic usage of beginning with a shorter Advent definitively established itself. While at Rome, besides the books of the Bible, also the treatises of Jerome, Ambrose, and the other Fathers were read at the nocturns;[57] in Gaul also the accounts of the sufferings of the martyrs and the biographies of the Fathers acquired a place in them and were not displaced even at the adoption of the Roman order of readings.[58]

The hymns, without which the Church's Liturgy of the Hours is hardly possible, had in the countries of Western Christendom a very different fate, which can easiest be illustrated in the office of Good Friday. While at Rome very early the Missa praesanctificatorum (of the bread and wine), coming from the East, was adopted for Good Friday,[59] Isidore of Seville, who calls Palm Sunday also Capitilavium, because on it the heads of the children qui unguendi sunt were washed, and who reports expressly about the liturgical celebration of the Cena Domini, knows no Good Friday liturgy. It was first introduced by canon 7 of the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633. The fact that the hymn Crux fidelis, composed by Venantius Fortunatus, was sung in the Good Friday office was only possible after the decree of the First Council of Braga in 563, whose canon 12 had excluded all nonbiblical hymns from the liturgy, apparently out of concern that they might not be orthodox, had lost its meaning. Still, the Fourth Council of Toledo, just mentioned, saw itself required expressly to defend the newly composed hymns and to threaten their rejection with excommunication (canon 13). There would also be other "prayers" and "imposition of hands" composed for the liturgy. As a matter of fact, the Spanish Church in the seventh century produced some fifty hymns.

---

[55] Das fränkische Sacramentarium Gelasianum in alemannischer Überlieferung, ed. K. Mohlberg, Liturgiegesch. Quellen 1/2 (Münster 1939).

[56] Fernández Alonso, 354.

[57] Cf. Ordo Romanus XIV, 10.

[58] Cf. Ordo XIV, 10, Codex M.

[59] Cf. Gelasianum I, XLI, and Andrieu, Ordines III, 139.

Care of Souls

PREACHING. If occasionally a powerful means of pastoral care was seen in the publication of conciliar decrees[60] or in the reading of the accounts of martyrs' sufferings, after which, for example, Braulio of Zaragoza permitted the omission of preaching,[61] nevertheless the sermon was still the chief instrument of which pastors, especially of the sixth century, disposed. It was consistently composed of instruction for adults; we nowhere hear of a special catechesis for children.[62]

If one bears in mind that at the end of the sixth century there were still many pagans in Spain and especially in Gaul in the rural areas,[63] then one is surprised that absolutely no testimonies in regard to missionary initiatives are to be found.[64] At most it was expected that pagans should come to Mass and be converted by hearing the gospel and sermon.[65] Gregory the Great, who inaugurated the Anglo-Saxon mission and gave his missionaries very useful instructions and also wanted to have the pagan or heretical Germans in Italy converted by preaching and admonition,[66] recommended for the gaining of the pagan remnant still in Sicily only administrative measures, as it were: pagans who worked and lived on ecclesiastical property (rustici) should, if necessary, be compelled to convert by raising their rents.[67]

When Caesarius of Arles declared that the word of God and hence its interpretation in the sermon was no less than the body of Christ, that is, the reception of communion (Sermo 78, 2), he then attested to the usual high estimation of preaching which was general in Gaul of the sixth century. In Rome too it was known that there were then capable preachers in Gaul.[68] The Statuta Ecclesiae antiquae (no. 31) threatened with excommunication those of the faithful who went out during the bishop's sermon. Caesarius not only urged them to remain, he personally thwarted those who wanted to leave Mass early by even having the church doors closed and not opened again until after the blessing.[69] But it would be false to conclude from these references that people had no interest in preaching; in sixth-century Gaul it was still quite usual that the faithful reacted to the sermon with applause or rejection; occasionally there was loud muttering, especially against purposeful moral exhortation.[70] Caesarius demanded of his colleagues and of himself that they preach on all Sundays and solemnities; and in Lent he even did so daily (Sermo 230, 6), often even in the morning and evening, namely at Lauds and Vespers.[71] According to Avitus of Vienne also, preaching should be frequent. The normal sermon lasted, in any case with Caesarius, not more than a half-hour.[72] In most cases the sermons must have been very simple, because the preachers had an all too meager education, but also because it was desired to make oneself understood by all the hearers.[73] Of Caesarius it is known that he quite consciously preached on different levels, in each case depending on the state of education of his audience.[74] Caesarius was probably not the first who put his sermons at the disposal of others; but he was the first who planned his own collections of sermons and dispatched them even to Spain.[75]

---

[60] Cf. Sixteenth Council of Toledo of 693, can. 7.

[61] Vita sancti Aemiliani 2; cf. Fernández Alonso, 383.

[62] Fernández Alonso, 400.

[63] Cf. Gregory of Tours, Vita Pat. XVII, 5.

[64] Fernández Alonso, 258; Beck, 184.

[65] Ildefonse, Cogn. baptismi XVII, and Council of Valencia of 549, can. 1; also, see supra, p. 667.

[66] Reg. Epp. II, 4; IX, 102.

[67] Ibid. IV, 26.

[68] Arator to Parthenius, PL 68, 252; cf. Beck, 259.

[69] Vita Caesarii I, 27.

The bishops preached not only in their cathedrals but also especially on the occasion of the visitation of parish churches. Thus the work on the improvement of the peasants of Archbishop Martin of Braga in northwestern Spain is nothing more than a model sermon for which he had been asked by his colleague, Polemius of Astorga, and which was to be given chiefly on the occasion of the visitation, regarded as annually necessary.[76] There is also a visitation of Caesarius extant: sermo in parrochiis necessarius.[77] Of course, such a sermon could hardly take into consideration the parts of the liturgical year; but it can be gathered from many sermons of Caesarius and Avitus that the Gallic pastors of the sixth century found abundant points of contact in the feasts of the Church's year and the biblical readings proper to them.[78] The chief end of the sermon seems to have been to guide the thoughts of the hearers to eternity. But in this regard what mattered especially to Gregory the Great was to comfort the faithful so that they would not perish in the misery of this life (Moralia I, XIV, 27); Gregory lived in difficult times, which also marked his liturgical production. Caesarius, on the other hand, ascertained a rather careless attitude in his people and held before their eyes the picture of Christ the Judge. Indeed, he could even claim that the words of Christ on the Last Judgment would be completely sufficient of themselves alone; it was not necessary to have more of Holy Scripture (Sermo 158, 1).

---

[70] Beck, 266.

[71] Vita Caesarii I, 59.

[72] Beck, 263.

[73] Gregory of Tours, hist. praef.

[74] Delage, 202.

[75] Vita Caesarii I, 55.

[76] Correct. no. 1; Barlow, 183.

[77] In Morin, no. 13.

[78] Cf. Beck, 125, 264.

In the decisive struggle against superstition and magic, especially for the sake of cures, as they had been preserved from pagan times, Caesarius and Martin of Braga were in agreement.[79] The pastors of the whole Christian world must have seen themselves facing this task at the time. Caesarius of Arles, furthermore, saw himself forced especially to warn against drunkenness; for Martin of Braga, on the contrary, pride and vanity seem to have been the special dangers to the Christian life.[80] Caesarius stressed that it is more important to have Christ before one's eyes as model than to ponder individual commandments (Sermo 35, 2). The name of Christian does not do it alone; even the sign of the cross does not help alone: necessary are alms, love, justice, and chastity (Sermo 13).[81] On the other hand, Caesarius emphasized also the necessity of a minimal knowledge of the faith; at least one must master the Creed and the Lord's Prayer (Sermo 135, 1). But to an active Christian life also belong the gifts made at the altar (wax, oil, bread, wine) and attendance at Sunday Mass (Sermo 13). Later, canon 4 of the Second Council of Mâcon in 585 required that all men and women bring wine and bread to the altar every Sunday, because one may thus expect to be freed from sins and made a sharer in the communion of saints. Finally, the demand for Sunday rest was inculcated not only in sermons but also in synodal decisions.[82]

The Sunday rest, was, of course, not demanded for its own sake. On the one hand, it was, so to speak, defined interiorly: good works, even long journeys to visit a friend, were permitted.[83] Indeed, the earliest extant synodal decision on the question[84] was directed first against "Jewish" exaggeration, which allowed no sort of journey, preparation of foods, cleansing, and so forth. Only the agricultural work should remain undone. In other respects, the Sunday rest was not only an element of religious culture,[85] but a Christian profession, especially where it replaced the hitherto usual rest from work on Thursday, hence on Jupiter's day.[86]

---

[79] Beck, 280; Fernández Alonso, 412.

[80] Fernández Alonso, loc. cit.

[81] Cf. Griffe, BLE 76 (1975), 25.

[82] Council of Orléans of 538, can. 31; Narbonne of 586, can. 4; Chalon of 647/653, can. 18.

[83] Martin of Braga, corr. 18; Barlow, 202, 15ff.

[84] Orléans of 538, can. 31.

[85] Isidore, De natura rerum I, 4: PL 83, 965.

[86] Caesarius, Sermo 13, 5; 52, 2.

From the moral instruction which Caesarius provided for his hearers two points must be singled out, because they throw a piercing light on the situation in southern Gaul of the early sixth century. In spite of all the exertions of the pastors, the number of young men who early entered into concubinage and only later into lawful marriage was so large that it was not possible to excommunicate all of them (Sermo 43, 4.5). Naturally this evil custom prevailed only in the upper class. The ladies of the aristocracy were blamed by Caesarius because they wanted to restrict the number of their children to at most two or three and hence drank means that would produce a miscarriage or make them sterile. Caesarius regarded both as murder. Against contraception he had an interesting argumentum ad hominem ready: the noble ladies regard it as important that their serving women have numerous children so that a large serving class may grow up. But then they should not limit the number of future servants of God (Sermo 44, 2).[87]

BAPTISM. To the extent that, in the course of the sixth century, baptism was administered in ever greater numbers to children and no longer to adults, it took place more and more in the parishes and not only in the episcopal churches. However, there are accounts of the administration of baptism, for sixth-century Gaul, only in Caesarius.[88] At most there are references that not only infants but also one-year-old to two-year-old children were baptized. True, an effort was made to keep the Easter Vigil as the sole date for baptism, but canon 3 of the Council of Mâcon in 585 had to complain that occasionally at most two or three children could be found for this date. Most children were baptized at Christmas or on the feast of Saint John or on that of another saint;[89] even Clovis, the first Frankish King to be converted, had been baptized on Christmas, as appears from the letter of Avitus to the King.[90] Caesarius adapted himself to the new situation not only by accommodating the old catechumenate, which had its most intensive phase in Lent, to the conditions of the baptism of children, but also by anticipating in brief form for each baptism the preparations formerly properly made in Lent. Even infants were registered among the competentes and received the imposition of hands and the anointing on the forehead.[91] If at Rome the scrutinia were customary as examinations of the faith and life of the competentes and if in Africa exorcisms were seen in the scrutinia, the custom of Gaul, namely, that of exorcisms by breathing, was nearer to the African than to the Roman.[92] The giving of salt to the competentes was a typically Roman usage and had no parallel in Gaul. In the framework of the longer, pre-Easter preparation for baptism, a particular role was played by special instruction, which was addressed chiefly to the godparents. They bound themselves to teach the child later the minimum profession of faith, that is, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, and to assure his or her introduction into virtue. For baptism in the course of the year Caesarius required at least a week of preparation, during which the child received anointing and imposition of hands, and the parents were supposed to fast and at least take part in the morning Mass.[93] Of course, he did not refuse baptism if the parents appeared in church with the child only for the baptism itself. An anointing administered immediately before baptism was not known in Gaul, but probably after baptism first the anointing with oil, then with chrism, and finally the consignatio, that is, the sealing with the sign of the cross. Very probably after the renunciation of the Devil the entire profession of faith was asked of the candidate or the godparents, perhaps in the way in which it was already attested in the Church Order of Hippolytus.[94] As the final ceremony there took place in Gaul the washing of the feet of the neophytes. A further symbol of faith in the Trinity may have been seen in the three steps which led down to the baptismal font.

---

[87] Cf. Delage, 133.

[88] Beck, 164.

[89] Gregory of Tours, Hist. 8, 9.

[90] Cf. Beck, 168.

[91] Cf. Delage, 162.

Baptistries in Gaul were occasionally flanked by a bath house, which served for cleansing before the baptism. Occasionally too there was another area furnished with an apse, in which confirmation was administered by the bishop.[95] In Spain Ildefonse of Toledo, hence in the seventh century, like Martin of Braga in the sixth, still reckoned with adult applicants for baptism, to whom he gave the Creed on Palm Sunday and from whom he inquired about it on Holy Thursday.[96] In this connection the adult applicants were probably not only Jews baptized under compulsion; however, the pastoral practice of the Spanish Church in the seventh century was powerfully overshadowed by the compulsory conversion of Jews. Canon 57 of the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633, it is true, tried to assure freedom of religion, but it did not allow the reversion to Judaism of those converted by force. Besides, canon 3 of the Sixth Council of Toledo in 638 brought back the old harsh language.

PENANCE. While in most parts of the Western Church the bishops reserved to themselves the administration of penance and the imparting of reconciliation, at Rome this, like baptism, was the affair of priests.[97] For the Sacramentarium Gelasianum, intended for use by priests, contains rubrics and prayers for the treatment of the penitents on Ash Wednesday (I, XVI, no. 83) and their reception back into the community on Holy Thursday (I, XXXVIII, nos. 352f), whereas the Gregorianum, destined for papal use, contains a reference to the penitents neither on Ash Wednesday nor on Holy Thursday. The only prayer for penitents which is given (no. 989) is a later addition.[98] Furthermore, the Gelasianum prescribed on Ash Wednesday a solemn confining of the penitents. It is not said where this was to happen; in every case it seems to concern a special Roman custom. On Holy Thursday the penitents were again released from their voluntary custody.[99]

---

[92] The word scrutinium, furthermore, was not used: Beck, 172f.

[93] Sermo 225, 6; 229, 6; 121, 8.

[94] Caesarius, Sermo 12, 4; 85, 3; cf. Martin of Braga, corr. 15.

[95] Beck, 180.

[96] Fernández Alonso, 274.

In the sixth century, even though in principle the ancient form of public penance was maintained, in Gaul the periods of penance were strongly curtailed in comparison with the earlier custom, and the bishops were clearly aware of this fact.[100] But the ancient forms were kept: at the start of the period of penance the bishop imposed hands on the penitent and handed him the cilicium, a hood of goat's hair.[101] The penitent himself was then obliged to cut off his hair and put on the penitential garb.[102] Penitents were not allowed to take part in banquets and in trade; rather they were to spend their time in fasting and prayer; even military service was forbidden to them. Caesarius of Arles expected of penitents all the corporal works of mercy, such as to give alms, shelter strangers, care for the sick, bury the dead, and finally to clean the church.[103] But the most incisive demand was that of perfect continence in marriage. This obligation continued even after reconciliation, and hence it pertained to the permanent consequences of penance, just like the inability to be accepted into the clergy.[104] It was especially aggravating that even a penance accepted on one's deathbed had the same effect in the case of an unexpected recovery as every other public penance.

As regards admission to the clergy, evidently a very serious problem was seen here, which canon 1 of the Council of Gerona in 517 sought to solve: if a person had declared himself a sinner only generally in the most serious illness, but without actually confessing serious sins, he could later still become a cleric. Canon 54 of the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633 renewed this prescription. The problem of continence required in marriage by penance was solved differently. Avitus of Vienne[105] advised younger people who had no culpae capitales to prefer to die without penance than to put themselves in the danger that, on recovering, they could not observe conjugal continence and for that reason would have to be regarded as apostates. Canon 27 of the Council of Orléans in 538 decreed in the same sense that the penitential blessing must not be entrusted to young people; the married might receive the penitential blessing only in advanced age and also with the consent of the other spouse. It is surprising that it was really nowhere asked by what right permanent continence was demanded even after the completion of penance. Only Fulgentius of Ruspe seems to have convincingly solved the problem as pastor. Even in his first letter he declared that the penance accepted in danger of death obliged to continence only when the other spouse had consented to this. But even in this case he wanted to show a certain mildness. Anyone who could not observe continence should abstain from all wickedness and guard himself especially against avarice, that is, give alms. Then, according to Fulgentius's assurance, he might count on not being damned. Canon 8 of the Sixth Council of Toledo in 638 apparently first found a synodal regulation of the problem, conceding as a favor that everyone who had undertaken penance in danger of death but had recovered might go back to conjugal life; if the other spouse died, then the penitent must not remarry; but in the case of the demise of the reconciled penitent, remarriage was permitted to the surviving spouse. But the burden of penance and of its consequences was apparently not yet made tolerable thereby, for canon 4 of the Sixteenth Council of Toledo in 693 still had to state that some sinners committed suicide out of despair over the stringent penance. But the bishops did not have a solution for this problem: it must probably be said that here penance was literally reduced ad absurdum.

---

[97] Cf. Gregory the Great, In Ezech. 40, Hom. 10, 13.14.

[98] Cf. Chavasse, Le Sacramentaire Gélasien, 141f.

[99] Cod. Vat. Reg. lat. 316, ed. Mohlberg, no. 83, 352; cf. also J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung (Innsbruck 1932), 65f.

[100] Council of Epaon of 517, can. 26; cf. Beck, 193f.

[101] Council of Agde of 506, can. 15.

[102] Ibid., and First Council of Barcelona of 540, canons 6 and 7.

[103] Delage, p. 166.

[104] Ibid., 167; cf. supra, pp. 653f.

In other respects, a broad decline of public penance can be ascertained in the course of the seventh century in Spain; its place was slowly taken by private penance.[106] In Gaul as early as the beginning of the sixth century Caesarius had to state that most persons put off penance to the end of their life (Sermo 60, 4); this situation was intensified in the course of the sixth century. Thus the time was clearly ripe for private penance. However, it did not come into practice first with the Celtic monks, disciples of Columban, but was spread by usages which can be ascertained as early as the sixth century in Gaul and Spain.[107] This is true for both the laity and the clergy. Originally, there was no penance for clerics; they were deposed but might communicate as laymen; rehabilitation was not possible. But gradually a period of penance was also adopted for clerics, usually in a monastery, and after it restoration to office.[108] Gregory the Great quite often prescribed a penance even for bishops, for example, he imposed on John of Justiniana Prima thirty days' abstention from the Eucharist,[109] and on Spanish bishops six months' penance in a monastery.[110] Such a penance was doubtless public, but it did not prevent the people thus treated from remaining in or returning to their office respectively.

[105] Ep. de subitanea poenitentia, MGAuctant VI, 2, 30; cf. Beck, 201.

[106] Fernández Alonso, 541.

[107] Beck, 220f.

Canon 11 of the Third Council of Toledo in 589 aimed to eliminate the abuse whereby in some churches of Spain people practiced penance in such a way that they demanded reconciliation just as often as they had sinned and to restore the old canonical form to force. It seems however to be much more certain that priests were acting in the exercise of their office and that in this there was question of sins which excluded one from the Eucharist.[111] Less clear is a reconciliation, that is, absolution from serious sins, without public ecclesiastical penance in the writings of Caesarius of Arles. He first got around the difficulties which were connected with public penance by urging to frequent self-imposed penance and especially to examination of conscience (Sermo 50, 3). If he declared that crimina, hence serious sins, had to be effaced either by elemosynarum remedia or by poenitentiae medicamenta (Sermo 56, 2), he still seems to attribute to the private devotional exercise of almsgiving the same efficacy as he did to public ecclesiastical penance. The consequences would be that the penitent, after the verdict of his own conscience, would again join in the reception of the Eucharist.[112] On the other hand, Caesarius speaks not only in his Rule for Virgins of confession through which guilt is made known,[113] but he urges younger sinners against chastity to come quickly to confession and penance.[114] If one considers how reserved he was otherwise with penance, especially for younger persons, there is probably not a question here of public penance with all its consequences. And when he finally declared expressly that penance, which a person publicly undertakes, could also be performed in secret (secretius), then he seems to have thought of a procedure which took place, not indeed before the community, but, however, could be considered as ecclesiastical in so far as it was under the supervision and responsibility of the bishop.[115] [108] Fernández Alonso, 560ff.

---

[109] Reg. Epp. III, 6.

[110] Ibid. XIII, 47.

[111] Fernández Alonso, 571.

[112] Thus Delage, 169f., against C. Vogel, La discipline pénitentielle en Gaul des origines à la fin du VII^e siècle (Paris 1952).

[113] Floril. Patr. 34, p. 36.

[114] Sermo 66, 1; similarly 56, 3; 65, 2.

In the Vita of Bishop Desiderius of Vienne and in that of Bishop Siffred episcopal absolutions seem to be attested apart from public penance.[116] It is most interesting that Bishop Philip of Vienne in 570 appointed the priest Theudarius as poenitentiarius of his diocese.[117] That means that many came to him and confessed their secret sins; each left medicatus sanusque . . . securior et laetior. Here confession and the forgiveness of sins in entirely the modern sense seem already attested.[118]

In this context attention should be directed to the Ninth Sermon of Gregory the Great on Ezekiel 40. He there requires (no. 18) the capability of distinguishing in penance: neither must discipline be too strict nor must mercy be too soft; neither must guilt be illegally remitted, because otherwise the guilty person would become more deeply involved in guilt, nor must guilt be regarded beyond the proper degree, because otherwise the penitent would become even worse, since he experienced no mercy. Indeed, it could even happen that a pastor, who lacked the spirit of discrimination, either was so easy on sins that he did not correct them, or, because he really injured in correcting, he did not remit the sins (no. 20). On this occasion Gregory reports that many are made aware of their sins by preaching and afterwards come to the preacher and confess and ask his intercession for their sins; he should then extirpate by his prayer the guilt which he made known through his preaching. The holy teachers must pray to almighty God for the contrite and sinners confessing their guilt. It is striking how often in this connection confession is stressed. If one recalls that the normal penitential care of souls, including excommunication and reconciliation, was provided at Rome not by the Pope himself but by the priests of the titular churches, then one is inclined to see here something like private or, better expressed, not public confession or penance. Perhaps one may even glimpse in the prayer of the holy teacher, which, according to Gregory, should efface sins, a deprecatory form of absolution, especially since Leo the Great declared (Ep. 108, 3) that the guilt of sin was absolved by the intercession of the bishop, sacerdotalis supplicatio, which brought the performance of public penance to an end. That finally around the middle of the seventh century penance was no longer connected with a class of penitents seems to be clear from canon 8 of the Council of Chalon

---

[115] Beck, 217.

[116] Thus Beck, 210f.

[117] Vita Theudarii 14.

[118] Beck, 214.

(between 647 and 653), since there penance is characterized as a remedy for sins and necessary for all men.

ANOINTING AND IMPOSITION OF HANDS. It has already been pointed out that in Spain and Gaul as well as at Rome in our period the neophytes received an anointing, in some places even a twofold anointing.[119] This anointing was not regarded at any time as the Sacrament of Confirmation or brought into connection with the Holy Spirit; Isidore, for example, who knew only one postbaptismal anointing, namely that with the chrism, declared rather that this anointing took place to make one like Christ, and only after that was the Holy Spirit given to the baptized and anointed by the imposition of the bishop's hands[120] or the invocation of the Holy Spirit respectively.[121] Furthermore, we know from a letter of Eugene of Toledo to Braulio of Zaragoza[122] that often even the deacons performed the anointing with chrism after the baptism. Anointing with chrism was ambiguous in so far as it could also be the external sign of the readmittance of heretics to the Church.[123] Canon 16 of the Council of Epaon in 517 decided that heretics who wished to convert should request the chrism from the bishop; but if they were dying, the priest might come to their aid with the chrism. Hence there was question here not of the anointing of the sick but of an anointing which could be placed on a level with the postbaptismal anointing. The otherwise customary imposition of hands as a sign of the reconciliation of heretics was, it is true, still cited by Pope Siricius in his letter to Himerius of Tarragona[124] in connection with the invocation of the Sevenfold Spirit, but Pope Vigilius in his letter to Profuturus of Braga (no. 3)[125] introduced a careful distinction: the reconciliation takes place not by that imposition of hands which acts through the invoking of the Holy Spirit, but by that one through which the fruit of penance is acquired and the restoration of holy communion (of the communion of the Church) is completed.

Nevertheless, canon 7 of the Second Council of Seville in 619 still seems to make no distinction between these two impositions of hands, when in one breath it forbids the priests to give the Holy Spirit through the imposition of hands to baptized faithful or to those converted from heresy. Perhaps one may see in this the aftereffects of early African theology, for this view corresponds exactly to that of Cyprian's opponents, who did not rebaptize but only wanted to impose hands for the reception of the Spirit.

---

[119] Cf. supra, pp. 676f.

[120] Eccl. off. II, 26.

[121] Etym. 6, 19, 54.

[122] Braulio, Ep. 35.

[123] Cf. infra, p. 710.

[124] See Denzinger–Schönmetzer, no. 183.

[125] PL 69, 18A =PL 84, 831C.

The anointing of the sick is attested for the sixth century in both Gaul and Spain. In Spain the oil for the anointing of the sick was consecrated on the feast of the holy physicians, Cosmas and Damian, with a prayer which asked the healing of body and soul by virtue of the sufferings of Christ.[126] There are many testimonies in Gaul that this holy oil was used by lay persons to cure the sick or drive out demons. The faithful were even urged to this by the clergy, for example, by Caesarius of Arles, but apparently chiefly to draw them away from ancient pagan magical practices.[127] Caesarius of Arles invited the sick to come to church to communicate and be anointed; thus would the admonition of the Epistle of James (5:14f.) be implemented (Sermo 19, 5). It is astonishing, however, that Caesarius could instruct the sick to have the consecrated oil given to them by the priest and to anoint themselves (Sermo 13, 3). That in this also Caesarius saw a complying with James 5:14 seems to indicate that he was not thinking of a self-anointing by the sick but has only expressed himself tersely on the subject.[128]

Piety

At the turn of the fifth to the sixth century the frequency of the reception of the Eucharist sharply declined. As early as 506 the Council of Agde in canon 18 had to declare that whoever did not communicate at Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost could not be regarded as a Christian. But since the same Council demanded a strict preparation for communion, it could hardly have paved the way to more frequent communion. Caesarius of Arles in his sermons appealed besides for communion on the feast of John the Baptist and the other martyrs, but he did not venture to require a regular Sunday communion. The reason was no doubt the strict standard which was laid on the necessary preparation. Thus, for example, Caesarius required of those who wished to communicate at least several days of conjugal continence (Sermo 16, 2; 19, 3; 44, 3).[129] He invited the newly married to stay away from church for a month (Sermo 43, 23). It deserves to be stressed that he emphasized the equality of rights and equality of obligation of both sexes according to Christian faith (Sermo 44, 5). In Spain continence was inculcated as a preparation for communion even in the marriage ceremony, and Isidore

---

[126] Fernández Alonso, 577.

[127] Beck, 242.

[128] Thus in any case, Beck, 245ff.

[129] Cf. Delage, 157.

(Eccl. Off. 1, 18, 9–10) required many days of continence, but perhaps in this lay a conscious exaggeration.[130] In any event, even daily attendance at Mass did not yet mean frequent communion.[131]

Christian piety is at times powerfully impressed by the saints, to whom special veneration belongs. In relation to the present-day understanding, one should ask first about the place which Mary occupied in the Christian consciousness. At Rome the name of Mary was introduced into the canon at the beginning of the sixth century, but the first Marian feasts in the West date only from the seventh century. The Sacramentarium Veronense (Leonianum), in which the first three months are missing, knows, in addition to the feasts of local Roman saints, only the veneration of the Baptist and of the Protomartyr Stephen, and Mary is mentioned only in a preface for the feast of the Baptist.[132] Under Pope Theodore (642–49) the feast of the Purification on 2 February was introduced, and before Pope Sergius I (687–701) were added the feasts of the Annunciation (25 March), the Assumption (15 August), and the Birthday (8 September). Here eastern influence is clearly to be seen.[133] In this it is noteworthy that Pope Sergius was apparently not satisfied with the form and the Mass formularies of the three last-named Marian feasts, but desired greater solemnity. He accomplished this by introducing a procession for these feasts, on which the people set out from another church. The collecta was recited in this church of the assembly. Thus these last three feasts obtained the same solemnity as was already customary on the feast of the Purification. This is revealed by the fact that the Hadrianum and the Paduense agree in the Mass formulary of 2 February and both provide a collecta at the beginning. On the other hand, in the Paduense the other three feasts have no collecta and hence no procession took place. The Hadrianum gives for the last three Marian feasts prayers differing from the Paduense and for each a collecta at the beginning.[134]

But the Marian feasts were not the oldest testimony to the veneration of Mary. In Gregory the Great, for example, we find no Marian feast attested, but he does mention churches dedicated to the Mother of God, not only Santa Maria Maggiore at Rome but also several churches and oratories in Italy, and one in Gaul, at Autun.[135] Then in Gaul in the seventh century numerous convents of nuns are ascertained whose churches were dedicated to Mary;[136] indeed, this was the rule, while monasteries of monks were mostly dedicated to Peter and Paul. Circa 705 the seriously ill Wilfrid of York was reproached in a vision of an angel that he had indeed erected churches for Peter and Andrew but still none in honor of Mary,[137] from which it must probably be concluded "that Mary and the Apostles belonged together in the piety of the age!" But the cult of Mary verified by patronages can be pursued farther back. Circa 400 Nicasius seems to have built the first Marian cathedral at Reims,[138] and this so set a precedent that in the sixth century in many episcopal churches a complex of three churches was characteristic, namely, with one church for clerics dedicated to the Apostles, one church for catechumens dedicated to Mary, and the baptistry dedicated to John the Baptist.[139] In Spain the cathedrals were mostly dedicated to Mary in the sixth and seventh centuries, but there the cult of Mary is found in literature only at the middle of the seventh century with the treatise of Ildefonse of Toledo on the perpetual virginity of Mary. The Tenth Council of Toledo of 656 in canon 1 transferred the feast of the Annunciation, which till then had not yet been celebrated uniformly on 25 March, to 18 December. The day was certainly not only chosen because it comes a week before Christmas, but also because at the Fifth Council of Toledo in 636 in canon 1 new rogation days had been introduced for the triduum of 15–17 December. In this connection there was probably only a question of accommodating King Chintila, who was seeking the protection of heaven, but later these rogation days served to enhance the solemnity of this Marian feast now transferred to Advent. The fact that in the festal Mass the above-mentioned treatise of Ildefonse, divided into six or seven sections, was read in place of the Old Testament selection shows how movingly and in response to the demands of the people and the time the Spanish Church of the seventh century fashioned its liturgy.[140]

---

[130] Thus Fernández Alonso, 335.

[131] Gregory of Tours, Gloria Confes. 65.

[132] Sacramentarium Veronense, ed. Mohlberg and others, no. 234.

[133] Deshusses, 53.

[134] Ibid., 54.

[135] Cf. Reg. Epp., MGEp. II, Index.

The long-disseminated view that the "Merovingian Age" was under the aegis of the patrons of the country and the place, "and the cult of Peter was only transmitted to the Carolingians by the Anglo-Saxons" can no longer be held, after it can be shown that not only in the seventh century were there seventy-eight monasteries under Peter's patronage, occasionally joined with the patronage of Paul or of Mary,[141] but that even for the early Merovingian period some forty basilicas in honor of Peter and about half as many cathedrals dedicated to him can be named.[142] In this regard, in many places the patronage of Peter seems to have succeeded a general patronage of the Apostles, so that the "cult of the Apostles obtained a more personal note." The Princes of the Apostles, especially Peter, passed over in the Early Middle Ages as the special patrons of the Roman Church into general awareness.[143] The Latin episcopate of late antiquity, in order to emphasize the unity of the Empire against all appearances of collapse, had fostered the cult of the two Princes of the Apostles and thus passed it on to the newly converted Burgundians, Visigoths, and Franks.[144] But in many places the cult of Peter in the later Merovingian period was overshadowed by the veneration of those saints whose remains were buried locally. This was not least of all connected with the fact that people could obtain only second-class relics from the Roman graves of the Apostles, whereas first-class relics corresponded more to the German mentality.

---

[136] E. Ewig, "Der Petrus- und Apostelkult im spätrömischen Gallien," ZKG 71 (1960), 217.

[137] Ibid., 227.

[138] Ibid., 247.

[139] Ibid.

[140] Fernández Alonso, 389.

[141] E. Ewig, loc. cit., 226.

Like the cult of Peter, so the newly Christian German peoples also adopted the custom of the pilgrimage from Latin and Greek antiquity. The first Christian king of the Burgundians, Sigismund, was at the same time also the first Christian German king to make the pilgrimage to Rome. He brought back relics, which were apparently soon used up, for he sent a deacon to Rome to fetch new relics.[145] In 590, Bishop Gregory of Tours likewise sent his deacon to Rome, and he brought back many relics. From him Gregory also learned how Peter's tomb was venerated at Rome. Especially impressive is the description that, if one prayed devoutly and piously enough, the little cloth which one was careful to let down to Peter's grave in order thereby to obtain a second-class relic was heavier than before after its contact with the tomb, and so one had proof of the grace of God.[146] From the British Isles also pilgrims came to Rome even before the year 500. The new German rulers of the island, who were converted to the Catholic faith, also adopted the high esteem for Peter and the instinct for the pilgrimage. Some rulers laid aside their crown and went as pilgrims to Rome. In their own country they erected churches in honor of Peter as substitutes: one who could not go to Rome should honor Peter here.[147] It is due to these eager pilgrimages of the Germans that in the fifth and sixth centuries, when Rome was gradually losing its external splendor, after it had lost its power, the former center of the Empire became the Holy City. In it during these centuries were honored the most famous martyrs of all Christendom; thus Rome became the agent and the distributor of these treasures. The pilgrimage to Rome for relics was of the greatest importance for the religious and cultural development of the West.[148] Indeed it can even be said that pilgrimages created and developed a Catholic spirit, that is, a universal spirit for the whole of Christianity. Through the pilgrimages was spread a really fraternal attitude among the faithful in the most varied lands.[149] In the seventh century there developed in Western Christianity, under the influence of the new penitential practice of the Irish monks, a new type of pilgrimage, namely, the penitential pilgrimage. It was chiefly undertaken by clerics, who were not admitted to public penance, for the expiation of serious sins; in this it was not a question of a specific goal, but of assuming homelessness as atonement. Of course, such pilgrimages also led to the holy places and contributed to the spread of the cult of saints and relics.[150] Deserving of mention in this context is also the pilgrimage to the shrine of the Archangel Michael on Monte Gargano in South Italy, because here was found not the tomb of a saint or the site of a biblical event in the center of the pilgrimage, but the place where, according to legend, the angel appeared. The pilgrimage, which then assumed a total European extent in the Middle Ages and could also be compared with the pilgrimages to Rome and to the alleged tomb of the Apostle James at Santiago de Compostela, apparently began as early as the seventh century.[151] Also, of course, to be mentioned would be the pilgrimage to the grave of Saint Martin at Tours, which in the sixth century was occasionally even more highly esteemed than the pilgrimage to Rome. In any event it corresponded to the active propaganda of Bishop Gregory of Tours.[152] But it must be remembered that the pilgrimage to Rome, which apparently received very early the character of a pilgramage of expiation, occupied a special place, in so far as people went as pilgrims not only to the tomb of the Apostle but increasingly at the same time and in the course of years to the successor of the Apostle, the Roman Pope, in whom people were quite aware was the power of the keys, that is, Peter's full power of forgiving.[153] [142] Ibid., 242 and 244 respectively.

---

[143] Ibid., 249.

[144] Ibid., 250.

[145] Avitus, Ep. 27: MGAuctant VI, 2, 59.

[146] Gregory of Tours, Gloria Mart. 28: PL 71, 728ff.

[147] B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa, 242.

At Arles there were in the sixth century some twenty to twenty-five feasts of saints;[154] in general, this century saw a powerful growth of the cult of saints, as can be inferred especially from the works of Gregory of Tours.[155] Originally, of course, the veneration referred to the martyrs, but then it was extended to the ascetics, who through their austerity had shown that they were of the same rank as the martyrs.[156] In many cities, for example, of southeast Gaul, there were tombs of saints, and people were interested in finding new ones, and then in some cases built large churches over the tombs.[157] But the saints were not only invoked at their graves, but also at a great distance away; then, of course, the effort was made to get into contact with them through relics. Gregory of Tours recommended their use in case of sickness, probably to wean the faithful from magical practices. It is noteworthy that Caesarius did not yet know this use of relics.

---

[148] Ibid., 244f.
[149] B. de Gaiffier, 35.
[150] C. Vogel, Le pèlerinage pénitentiel, 56f.
[151] A. Petrucci, 149–153.
[152] E. Delaruelle, 216f.
[153] A. Prandi, 446f.

It was important to know the exact day of death of a saint, because his feast had to be celebrated on it. A vigil was held throughout the night, or at least a very early celebration of Lauds. The solemn Mass began around nine o'clock; in it the passio or the vita of the saint was read. The clergy who served at the shrine of a martyr were furthermore obliged to treat the people flocking there to wine. For their part the faithful sought the closest possible contact with the tomb of a saint. Thus they took along, for example, oil from the lamps burning there, in order to use it against sickness.[158] The cult of saints must not only be regarded as a characteristic of popular devotion: it was rather a part of episcopal pastoral care. The picture of the saint might achieve more than the preaching of the bishop; indeed, it could even be said that the saint complemented the bishop's activity, but he was a mysterious, all-knowing power, which began to act where the bishop's action ceased.[159] In general, the bishops seem to have had no reservations in regard to the cult of saints and relics: quite the contrary. Canon 5 of the Third Council of Braga in 576 saw itself obliged to check somewhat the zeal that probably promoted the personal vanity of the bishops. The shrines of relics were to be carried by deacons; in no case, however, should a bishop, under the pretext that he had to hold the shrine of relics, have himself carried on a chair. Only once is it attested that a bishop, namely Serenus of Marseille at the end of the sixth century, took a stand against the cult of saints. He even had their images destroyed, because he assumed that the people adored them.[160] Gregory the Great[161] indeed praised his zeal for the exclusive adoration of God, but at the same time blamed the destruction of the images, since they could be of service to the faith of the uneducated.[162]

---

[154] Beck, 314.

[155] E. Griffe, 23.

[156] Beck, 287.

[157] Ibid., 292f.

[158] Ibid., 234ff.

[159] Muller, 81.

It must be stressed that the cult of relics was in no sense only a characteristic of popular devotion. In fact, the Christian theologians of late antiquity were occupied with the question and assured the faithful that even the smallest part of the relic of a martyr meant a great treasure, for the power and grace of the saint were in some way in every tiniest particle as in the entire body.[163] The distribution of relics, on the other hand, facilitated the collecting of relics of many saints, whereby people thought, probably quite naïvely, to assure themselves of the protection of many saints. In this way, the system of phylacteries, that is, the manufacture and use of amulets with relics, flourished.[164] The fact that at Rome no bodily relics of the Apostles were given up, but only second-class relics, was based not only on the cult of the Apostles but also on the belief that every division of the relics of the Apostles would have weakened the position of the papal primacy, which for that age was founded not only on the succession of Peter but on the possession of the Apostles' tombs.[165]

If it is now recalled that Isidore's monastic Rule (24, 1–2), hence a work from the seventh century, mentions for the first time an annual memorial on which the holy sacrifice was to be offered for all the deceased[166]—Masses for the dead, which were celebrated partly at the exact hour of death of the deceased, were known in Gaul as early as the sixth century[167]—then it may be said that the decisive monuments of Christian piety were formed in the period here surveyed. This applies especially if it may be assumed that auricular confession, only generally coming into practice under the influence of the Celtic monks, which is without doubt a characteristic of Catholic piety, was already spread in this period on the basis of the development of the ancient western practice of penance.

---

[160] But this does not seem to have been the case. From the reports of Gregory of Tours it appears rather that the most zealous devotees of the saints knew they depended on the almighty power of God, with whom the saints could only intercede. Cf. also van der Lof, p. 40.

[161] Reg. Epp. IX, 208, and XI, 10.

[162] Beck, 306.

[163] Kötting, Reliquienverehrung, 326.

[164] Ibid., 327.

[165] Ibid., 330.

[166] Cf. Fernández Alonso, 586f.

[167] Beck, 256f.

CHAPTER 42

Latin Monasticism from the Mid-Fifth Century to the End of the Seventh Century

The further development of Latin monasticism from c. 450 to 700 makes it clear that the episode of the wanderings of the peoples with its effects fostered the previously high estimation of the monastic ideal far more than obstructed it. The continuity with the monasticism of the fourth century was maintained, since both its ideal basis, the example of the East, and the earlier forms, cenobitic and eremitical, persisted. The latter experienced a certain variation, since, first, in addition to the strict eremitism of the individual, a type became more frequent which kept the hermit in the vicinity of a monastery and hence in contact with its abbot, and second, now itinerant hermits, at first predominantly of Irish origin, appeared, who joined to anchoritism the peregrinatio, the ascetical renunciation of home and all it meant.[1] From now on, eremitism was valued as the chief form of monastic existence, to the demands of which only one who had previously been proved in a cenobitic community should expose himself.[2]

The great majority of ascetics accordingly chose the cenobitic form of life, which in the period here treated acquired some characteristic features. Monasteries, growing vastly in number—their founders were, besides the individual monk, bishops, Popes, and also well-to-do lay persons, especially the Merovingian nobility and crown—first consolidated their inner organization, since they more and more lived according to a definite Rule, now fixed in writing.[3] In such Rules, indeed, the ideal of eastern cenobitism was ever more decisive, but everywhere an adaptation to the concrete circumstances of Western European areas was undertaken. This is already noticeable in the Institutiones (1–4) of John Cassian and in the Latin form of Basil's Ascetica, and more clearly in the revision of the Rule of Pachomius and the two rules coming from Lérins, the Regula quattuor Patrum and the Regula Macarii, which belong to the fifth century.[4] In southern Gaul abbots of several monasteries met on occasion for discussion of the inner structure of their monasteries, and from their decisions proceeded the so-called Regula quattuor Patrum, the Regula secunda and tertia Patrum.[5] The sixth century was the age of the great Rules of the Master and of Benedict of Nursia in Italy and of the Bishops of Arles, Caesarius and Aurelian, in Gaul, who, however, made use of earlier works. Some of the new Rules were expressly mixed Rules, Regulae mixtae, such as the Regula Ferioli, the Regula Tarnatensis Monasterii, the Regula Orientalis, and the Regula Pauli et Stephani, which took over whole parts of existing Rules.[6] Thus the Irish-Frankish monasticism acquired its own form through combining the Regula Columbani with the Regula Benedicti. In the monastic Rules of Spain from the seventh century, which were composed by Leander of Seville, his brother Isidore, and Fructuosus of Braga, even more eastern influence is detectable, in addition to that of the Rule of Augustine.[7] The observance of the same Rule in several monasteries did not yet lead to their organizational union.

---

[1] See J. Leclercq, "Mönchtum und Peregrinatio im frühen Mittelalter," RQ 55 (1960), 212–225, with much evidence for the eremitism of the sixth and seventh centuries, and also his survey, Le Millénaire du Mont Athos I (1963), 161–180; P. Doyère, DSp 4 (1960), 953–982.

[2] Thus already John Cassian, Institut. Coenob. 5, 36; 8, 17; Coll. 18, 3; Benedict, Regula, chapter 1; also A. Hastings, "St. Benedict and the Eremitical Life," DR 61 (1950), 191–211.

[3] Cf. A. de Vogüé, "Sub regula vel abbate," Coll. Cist. 3 (1971), 209–241.

In so significant an element of the Church's inner life that the numerous monasteries represented, the contemporary episcopate showed an understandable interest and aimed, stimulated by the monastic legislation of the Council of Chalcedon,[8] to see also in the Latin West the monastic system subjected in principle to its jurisdiction. This process of increasing episcopal control began in the fifth century, but, of course, it did not move everywhere at the same pace. In North Africa the oppressed situation of the Church under Vandal domination fostered an extensive independence of the monasteries. In Italy, following the Byzantine reconquest in 535, the eastern monastic canon law established itself especially in the area under Byzantine authority and thereby gave the bishop the possibility of calling upon the monks of the many smaller monasteries, especially in the South, for pastoral tasks. In the parts of Italy controlled by the Ostrogoths and then by the Lombards, however, the less numerous but often more important monasteries retained a greater freedom of movement with regard to the bishop.[9] Then Gregory the Great subordinated them in general to episcopal supervision, which in the course of the sixth century was recognized also in Gaul and Spain, as the synodal legislation of the time makes known. The crucial points of episcopal control were influence on, or at least examination of, the election of the abbot and overseeing the administration of monastery property. A relaxation and limitation of episcopal jurisdiction, however, followed in the seventh century from the influence which the wealthy layman who had participated in the founding of the monastery could keep for himself, or from privileges which the landowner granted to a monastery.[10] Monastic exemption, here under way, was first conceded in its full extent to the Upper Italian monastery of Bobbio by Pope Honorius I in 628.[11] [4] Regula Macharii, ed. H. Styblo, WSt 76 (1963), 124–158, and A. C. Vega, BRAH 164 (1969), 27–34.

---

[5] Regula quattuor Patrum, PL 103, 435–442; Regula secunda Patrum, ed. J. Neufville, RBén 77 (1967), 92–95; Regula tertia Patrum, PL 103, 443–446; see A. Mundó, "Les anciens synodes abbatiaux et les 'Regulae Patrum,' " SA 44 (1959), 107–125.

[6] Catalogue of sixth-century rules for Gaul and Spain in A. Mundó, StudMon 9 (1967), 229–231.

[7] For editions of individual rules see infra, footnotes 63ff.

[8] For the aftereffects of Chalcedon's canons on monasteries in the ecclesiastical legislation of the West, see L. Ueding, Chalkedon II, 642–660.

A further important development in western monasticism of this period appeared with the undertaking of missionary activity on a scale hitherto unknown. From the thus far customary, often only occasional, mission among the population of the neighborhood of a monastery, the glance was directed to distant goals; there was a going over to the evangelization of unfamiliar peoples, which, as in the mission to the Anglo-Saxons, was planned and taken up on a grand scale. Then when the Irish-Scottish monks joined the ascetical peregrinatio with missionary work on the continent, the great missionary task was firmly anchored in the consciousness of western monasticism.[12]

As a final characteristic of Latin monasticism of this age must be mentioned the monastic school, an institution now spread everywhere. True, it served exclusively for the formation of the monastery's own recruits, who had to be enabled to read the texts for the liturgical service and the Holy Scripture as material for the lectio divina and be able to prepare the manuscripts required for this; hence it purposely excluded the profane, especially the pagan, literature of antiquity from its program. But this monastic school was still not an ever atrophying remnant of the decaying school system of the Later Empire with its other institutions; rather, despite its elementary character, it was the viable germ from which, just as from the episcopal schools of the age, the medieval school would spring as the agent of Western Christian education.[13] In the following geographically arranged survey the important facts, personalities, and tendencies in the monasticism of the period will be set forth.

---

[9] G. Penco, Storia del monachesimo, 27–42.

[10] On episcopal jurisdiction over early monasticism see T. P. McLaughlin.

[11] The Privilegium Bobiensi coenobio datum: PL 80, 483, and IP VI, 2, 249, no. 6.

[12] For the Anglo-Saxon and Irish-Scottish mission on the continent, see Chapters 37 and 34.

[13] See H. I. Marrou, Geschichte der Erziehung im klassischen Altertum (Freiburg 1957), 481f.; P. Riché, Education et culture dans l'Occident barbare (Paris, 3rd. ed. 1973), 140–163, 200–215, 336–350.

Italy

The eremitical life, already noteworthy in Italy at the turn of the fourth to the fifth centuries, retained its esteem in the following period, but now it was encountered, not only on the preferred islands of the Mediterranean, but also in the interior of the country, for example, on Montelucano near Spoleto.[14] The influence of Egyptian anchoritism here present was kept alive by the Latin translations of the Apophthegmata literature of the sixth century, the Verba seniorum, in which the future Popes Pelagius I (556–561) and John III (561–574) took part.[15] But Italian cenobitism was also further oriented toward the eastern model, as, for example, with Lawrence, probably a native of Syria, who around the middle of the sixth century founded near Spoleto the monastery of Farfa, eventually to become famous.[16] The Regula Orientalis, whose title indicates eastern influence, also had an Italian origin, apparently at the beginning of the sixth century. Gennadius praised its clarity, but erroneously attributed it to a deacon Vigilius.[17] Certain impulses for the Italian monasticism of this period proceeded also from African monks, who abandoned their homeland under the pressure of Vandal rule. Thus the African Gaudentius founded a monastery at Naples, and Fulgentius of Ruspe assembled African monks in two settlements at Cagliari on Sardinia, in which theological study occupied no small position.[18] Circa 500 a monastic community settled around the grave of Saint Severinus in the Castellum Lucullanum near Naples, whose second abbot, Eugippius, author of the Vita of Severinus, also wrote, according to Isidore of Seville, a Rule for his monastery, which is very likely identical with the anonymous Rule of a Parisian manuscript.[19] In the course of the sixth century the number of monasteries in Italy grew vastly, as the correspondence and the Dialogi of Gregory the Great show, in which is mentioned an abundance of monastic settlements, but no precise information on the circumstances of their origins is available.

---

[14] G. Penco, op. cit., 22.

[15] A. H. Salonius, Vitae Patrum (Lund 1920).

[16] G. Penco, op. cit., 22f., and Atti II° convegno Studi umbri (Perugia 1965), 257–276.

[17] Text of the Regula Orientalis, PL 103, 477–484; see A. Mundó, StudMon., 9 (1967), 231, Gennadius, Script. eccles., can. 51.

[18] Vita Fulg. 19; 24.

[19] Eugipp., Vita Severini 46, 6; Isidore of Seville, Vir. ill 26; see A. de Vogüé, "La Règle d' Eugippe retrouvée," RAM 47 (1971), 233–266.

Today, almost without exception, the two most comprehensive monastic Rules of this epoch, which since 1938 have been the object of an intensive and still not finished discussion, the so-called Regula Magistri (RM) and the Rule of Benedict of Nursia (RB), are assigned to the sixth century.[20] Between them exists so strong a relationship, in both content and form, that on the one hand the question of their reciprocal dependence, on the other hand that of the priority in time of the one over the other, urgently intrudes itself. The Regula Magistri is anonymous and in comparison with the Rule of Benedict about three times as large; in most manuscripts there is named as author of the latter a Benedict, who is apparently identical with that Benedict of Montecassino, whose signs and miracles Pope Gregory the Great described in the second book of his Dialogi and to whom he attributed a monastic Rule which was marked by discretio and clarity (Dial., II, 36). True, Gregory supplied few chronological references to events in Benedict's life, but together with some credible criteria from the rest of the tradition about him they permit one to assign his life-span between 480/490 and 550/560. This tradition has him come from the old province of Nursia and study for a time at Rome in his youth. But he soon left the city in order to live as a hermit in a cave near Subiaco until disciples joined him, whom he is said to have gathered, according to the Pachomian model, into several communities. Then he sought to realize the experiences and insights gained here in regard to real cenobitism in a new foundation on Montecassino, where he must have died around the middle of the sixth century.

Today the priority of the Regula Magistri may be regarded as the established and also almost generally recognized outcome of the discussion just mentioned, and its origin ascribed to the first three decades of the sixth century, since, among other things, it represents a less developed cenobitism than that of the Regula Benedicti, since it also employs the apocryphal Scriptures to a degree that can only with difficulty be reconciled with the so-called Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis of the early sixth century, and finally since it was already used by Abbot Eugippius of Lucullanum (d. c. 530) in his now identified Rule. On the other hand, there is less agreement on the homeland of the [20] The complete bibliography on the investigation of both Rules from 1938 to 1970 was compiled by B. Jaspert, StudMon 13 (1971), 129–171, but separately as Subsidia Monastica I (Montserrat 1971). The discussion on the two Rules was initiated by M. Alamo, "La Règle de s. Benoît éclairée par sa source, la Règle du Maître," RHE 34 (1938), 740–755, but attention was called orally to the problem by A. Genestout; see A. Genestout, "La Règle du Maître et la Règle de s. Benoît," RAM 21 (1940), 5–112.

---

Regula Magistri: some would see its origin chiefly in the vicinity of Rome, others hold rather that it came from Provence.[21]

With the priority of the Regula Magistri there is also established its employment by Benedict, since a model common to both could be demonstrated with as little conviction as the thesis that Benedict was the author of both Rules. These did not find their definitive form in their first versions, but were expanded in content (the Regula Magistri) or improved in form (the Regula Benedicti): very likely the Regula Magistri was in Benedict's hands in an intermediate stage. Among the sources common to both Rules Holy Scripture holds the first place; both also refer to Cassian, and Cyprian is familiar to them, while the meager use of the apocrypha by Benedict indicates, not a direct knowledge of them, but a direct adoption from the Regula Magistri, apparently even without more detailed knowledge of their character. As the special property of the Regula Magistri is knowledge of Julianus Pomerius, Caesarius of Arles, and Nicetas of Remesiana, while Benedict is acquainted with far more voluminous relevant works, such as the Vitae patrum, the "Rule of our holy Father Basil," the Historia monachorum, the Rule of Pachomius, and especially the Rule of Augustine, from which he gained some ideas, without expressly naming it.[22] With the stock of ideas created from these sources Benedict put in order the knowledge acquired from his own experience and meditation, as this seemed to him essential for the cenobitic form of life and at the same time humanly possible. Thus, with a greater stylistic ability than the author of the Regula Magistri could call on, he created in a happy synthesis the hitherto most complete monastic Rule, which was to surpass for the next centuries in its greater power of attraction all other Rules from the early age of monasticism. It in no way diminishes the rank of Benedict's achievement when one refuses to designate him, as historically incorrect, as the founder of western monasticism or even as the Father of the West.[23]

If one asks about the basic idea of the Regula Benedicti, its Christocentrism will have to be named.[24] Already the decisive motive for the entry into the monastic community is the desire for the unconditional following of Christ. Service in the militia Cristi Regis determines the entire manner of life of the monk (conversatio morum). He gives obedience to the abbot,[25] because in him he sees Christ; he takes up every renunciation because he wants to share in the Passion of Christ; nothing is dearer to him than love for Christ. To assure this central following of Christ is the purpose of the regulations on the liturgy (opus Dei),[26] on the lectio divina, and on stabilitas loci.[27] With the following of Christ as thus understood, Benedict's second fundamental concern is assured, caritas fraterna, which must be at the same time as the deepest Christian humanitas the basis of any monastic community, an insight which Benedict to a great extent owes to the reading of the Rule of Augustine.[28] Some individual prescriptions of the Regula Benedicti are so flexibly composed that they could easily be adapted to various climatic conditions: hence its author reckoned on its spread. Whereas the testimonies for the existence of the Regula Magistri in the sixth century are relatively frequent, they begin only in the seventh century for the Regula Benedicti. Certainly the picture of Benedict in the Dialogi of Gregory the Great fostered its spread, and it appeared relatively early in the Merovingian Kingdom, at times as part of a Regula Mixta, for example, together with the Rule of Columban, until in the course of the eighth century it gained ground powerfully and through the combined efforts of the first Carolingian Emperors and of Abbot Benedict of Aniane (d. 821) achieved almost exclusive validity.[29] [21] A good survey of the current state of investigation is supplied by the lectures and discussion of the First International Congress on the Rule of St. Benedict from 4–9 October 1971 at Rome, repeated in the first volume (Hildesheim 1972) of Regulae Benedicti Studia. Here we cannot go into many individual problems yet to be clarified.

---

[22] On the sources of both Rules see occasionally the introduction to the editions by A. de Vogüé in SChr.

[23] See B. Jaspert, "Benedikt von Nursia—der Vater des Abendlandes? Kritische Bemerkungen zur Typologie eines Heiligen," Erbe und Auftrag 49 (1973), 90–103; 190–207.

[24] Besides the editions with commentary mentioned, see the commentary of I. Herwegen, Sinn und Geist der Benediktinerregel (Einsiedeln 1944); B. Steidle, Die Regel St.

In the former minister of the Ostrogothic King Theodoric, Cas-

---

Benedikts (Beuron 1952); id. (ed.), "Commentationes in Regulam S. Benedicti," SA 42 (Rome 1957); G. Turbessi, Ascetismo e monachesimo in San Benedetto (Rome 1965); P. Delatte, Commentaire sur la Règle de s. Benoît (Solesmes 1969). On the Christocentrism of the Regula Benedicti see A. Borias, "Le Christ dans la Règle de s. Benoît," RBén 82 (1972), 109–139.

[25] On the position of the abbot, his election and installation, see, besides A. de Vogüé (Paris 1960, in the Literature for the chapter), K. Hallinger, ZKG 76 (1965), 233–245; H. Grundmann, ibid. 77 (1966), 217–223; R. Sommerville, RBén 77 (1967), 246–263; M. Angerer, StudMon 12 (1970), 43–56.

[26] See A. de Vogüé, RBén 71 (1961), 233–264; RAM 42 (1966), 389–404; 43 (1967) 21–33.

[27] On conversatio and stabilitas see B. Steidle, SA 44 (1959), 136–144, and Erbe und Auftrag 36 (1960), 103–112; H. Hoppenbrouwers, Graecitas et Latinitas Christianorum primaeva, Suppl. 1 (Nijmegen 1964), 45–96.

[28] See the proofs in A. de Vogüé, La Règle de s. Benoît, 131f., and A. Borias, "Hospitalité augustinienne et bénédictine," RHSp 50 (1974), 3–16.

[29] On the spread of both Rules see G. Penco, Benedictina 10 (1956), 181–198; SA 42 (1957), 321–345.

siodorus,[30] born c. 485, we meet a layman, who as a zealous promoter of monasticism founded on his South Italian estate of Squillace two colonies,[31] a settlement of anchorites on the hill of Castellum and in the immediate vicinity the real monastery of Vivarium, which was intended to serve a specific task, namely, scientifically based and organized work on the Bible that went far beyond the previous lectio divina. In his Institutiones divinarum et saecularium litterarum,[32] dedicated to the monks, Cassiodorus set down his ideas on this and developed a concrete program of studies. An important presupposition for this was a library[33] in which faultless biblical manuscripts, introductions to the Bible, the exegetical works of the Church Fathers, and those works of profane literature were on hand which could not be dispensed with for a scientifically fruitful study of the Bible. A special scriptorium should undertake the production of the necessary manuscripts. New in this concept was, first, the demand of genuine scientific activity at all, and then the strong stress which was laid on the recourse to profane literary scholarship, but which Cassiodorus tried to justify again and again. In the realization of such exalted aims, of course, not all the monks of the monastery were involved; in any event a rather long starting-time was needed before a work force capable of such achievement was trained. But as early as the founder's death c. 580 interest in the enterprise apparently began to flag, and thus from Vivarium came only one exegetical work, an Expositio psalmorum, and even this came from the pen of Cassiodorus himself,[34] who in it relied on Augustine's Enarrationes in psalmos, without attaining its religious value even remotely. What were the most worthwhile, then, were, first, the stock of the library built by Cassiodorus and his program developed in the Institutiones, which of course would later gain a substantial share in the renewal of scholarly activity in the West.[35]

---

[30] See, in addition to D. Cappuyns and R. Helm, RAC 2, 915–926, J. van Besselaar, Cassiodorus, Level en werken (Antwerp 1950).

[31] On the situation and structure of Cassiodorus's foundation, P. Courcelle, MAH 55 (1938), 259–307. That Cassiodorus introduced the Rule of Benedict at Vivarium is just as unproved as the view that he was the author of the Regula Magistri, which D. Cappuyns proposed in RThAM 15 (1948), 209–268.

[32] Edition of R. A. B. Mynors (Oxford 1937). On the importance of the Institutiones see L. Alfonsi, Klearchos 6 (1964), 6–20.

[33] See P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident (Paris 2nd ed. 1948), 313–388, and L. Teutsch,"Cassiodorus Senator. Ein Beitrag zur Würdigung seiner wissenschaftlich-bibliothekarischen Leistung," Libri e Riviste 9 (1959), 215–239; P. Riché, op. cit., 204–212.

[34] CChr 97–98, ed. M. Adriaen (Turnhout 1958). Cf. A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, "Contenuto e metodo dell'Expositio psalmorum di Cassiodoro," VetChr 5 (1968), 61–71.

[35] On Cassiodorus's later influence, see H. Thiele, SM 50 (1932), 378–419.

The powerful impulses which proceeded from Gregory the Great, himself a monk and founder of monasteries at Rome and on Sicily, to the contemporary monasticism of Italy, have been repeatedly mentioned. Many of his measures were intended for the external and internal reconstruction of the monastic system, which, like ecclesiastical life as a whole, had suffered because of the chaos of the Lombard invasion.[36] It was further significant that Gregory more and more took monasticism into the direct service of the Church, called abbots to become bishops, sent them on important missions to Ravenna or Pavia, for example, or assigned to them the preaching among the Lombards and the evangelization of the Anglo-Saxons. Here is discernible an informative change in Gregory's view of the vocation of the monk, which was based on his own career. Whereas he at first regarded the monk's being and the exercise of an ecclesiastical office or function as incompatible, he later saw in the service of the Church a possibility for attaining the highest perfection, since in it could be joined together the vita activa and contemplativa.[37] Soon after Gregory's death the Irish-Scottish monasticism acquired influence on the Italian, when in 612 Columban (d. 615) founded not far from the Trebbia, south of Pavia, his last monastery, Bobbio, which from the start enjoyed the rich encouragement of the Lombard royal family and in a certain sense was a royal proprietary monastery. Its rapid economic flowering allowed it an intensive activity in the cultural and theological sphere; especially by means of its scriptorum Bobbio became a first-class intellectual center in contemporary Italy, which with its numerous daughter-houses and through the spread of the cult of Columban, radiated not only in the area of Lombard rule but also into Byzantine territory. Columban's austere Rule remained in force under his first successors: only in the second half of the century did the influence of the Regula Benedicti gradually assert itself, to then become exclusively prescribed in the eighth century.[38]

---

[36] T. Leccisotti, "Le consequenze dell'invasione longobarda per l'antico Monachesimo italico," Atti I° congr. internaz. Studi longobardi (Spoleto 1951), 369–376. On the destruction of Montecassino in 577 see H. S. Brechter, SM 56 (1938), 109–150.

[37] In addition to P. Rudmann (Literature), cf. R. Gillet, "Spiritualité et place du moine dans l'Église selon s. Grégoire le Grand," Théologie da la vie monastique (Paris 1961), 323–351.

[38] The early charters for Bobbio in C. Cipolla, Codice diplomatico del monasterio di s. Colombano di Bobbio I (Rome 1918). On Bobbio's legal position see C. G. Mor, S. Colombano e la sua opera in Italia (Bobbio–Parma 1953), 73–83. A. Maestri, Il culto di s. Colombano in Italia (Piacenza 1955). On Bobbio's importance for the mission among the Lombards, see supra, Chapter 36.

Monasticism in the Merovingian Kingdom

In what had been Roman Gaul there continued as the two centers of gravity for the expansion of monasticism in the fourth and fifth centuries the area of the Lower Rhone Valley and Aquitaine, but in the sixth and seventh centuries they experienced important differentiations, partly coming from without. In Rhone monasticism the influence of Lérins at first still remained predominant, as especially the already mentioned Regula Macharii makes known.[39] Reference has already been made[40] to the importance of the synods of abbots, now making their appearance in the provinces of Narbonne and Provence. Bishop Caesarius of Arles (d. c. 542) became the most important promoter of southeast Gallic monasticism; he himself was a monk at Lérins before he assumed the direction of a monastery outside the gates of Arles, until 502. In the two monastic Rules composed by him—the first[41] was written for the convent of nuns of Saint John, founded by him as bishop, and his sister Caesaria was its superior; the second, a Rule for Monks, is probably only a revised abridgment of the Rule for Nuns[42]—now, besides the Lérins tradition, the influence of Augustine's Rule becomes traceable.[43] The Rule for Nuns obtained special esteem when Chlotar I's wife, Queen Radegundis (d. 587), adopted it for the convent of nuns of Saint Mary, later of the Holy Cross, founded by her; apparently this was true also in the two convents of nuns at Autun, founded by Queen Brunhildis.[44] Both Rules of Caesarius worked to stimulate later authors of monastic rules, such as his successor Aurelian, who strongly relied upon Caesarius in his Rules for the monasteries erected at Arles by King Childebert.[45] Likewise, for the anonymous author of the Regula Tarnatensis monasterii, which probably lay on the River Tarn in South Gaul, Caesarius, in addition to Augustine, was a source from which he took passages, partly verbatim. A relationship, more similar in ideas, with the Rules of Caesarius is present in the Rule of Bishop Ferreolus of Uzès (553–581) in the southern part of the Frankish Kingdom, but the Regula Tarnatensis was also familiar to him. All the above-mentioned post-

---

[39] See footnote 3.

[40] See footnote 4.

[41] Caesarius of Arles, Opera II, 101–129 (ed. G. Morin), and separately in FlorPatr 34 (Bonn 1933).

[42] Caesarius, Opera II, 149–155; see A. de Vogüé, RAM 47 (1971), 369–406.

[43] Already proved by C. Lambot, RBén 41 (1929) 333–341; cf. L. Rodorel de Seilhac, L'utilisation par s. Césaire d'Arles de la Régle de s. Augustin (dissertation, Paris 1967).

[44] Cf. E. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum, 77f., and G. Marié, Études mérovingiennes (Paris 1953), 219–225.

[45] Text of both Rules of Aurelian in PL 68, 385–406.

Caesarian Rules, however, display no influence of the Regula Benedicti.[46] Finally, still in the seventh century, Bishop Donatus of Besançon (c. 624–660) relied on Caesarius's Rule for Nuns when he compiled a Regula Mixta for the convent of Jussa-Moutier; furthermore, this adopted much from the Regula Benedicti and some things from the Rule of Columban, among whose disciples Donatus had previously been.[47] The fact that the Rhone monasteries gave themselves a stricter organization so relatively early through the introduction of a Rule could not but have had a positive impact on the entire monastic life. It certainly contributed to the circumstance that precisely in the South Gallic monasteries there was a lively interest in theological and religious questions, as this became clear in the discussion on Augustine's doctrine of grace. It is furthermore striking that the very bishops who came from Rhone monasticism showed a special readiness actively to shape public life both in the ecclesiastical and in the secular sphere.

In the central and western areas of ancient Gaul monasticism was at first still under the influence of Martin's ideals and retained its old inclination to individualism, which showed itself, in addition to other ways, in the rejection of stabilitas loci and of the introduction of a definite monastic Rule. Thus there occurred again and again the founding of monasteries by individual monks without a definite plan and often soon abandoned; hence the first Frankish national Council of Orléans in 511, in clear conformity with the monastic regulations of Caesarius of Arles, made the establishing of monastic settlements dependent on the consent of the local bishop and prescribed that monks settle down.[48] That these decrees were implemented, however, only to a modest degree becomes clear from the reports of Gregory of Tours on the monasticism of the late sixth century, in which lack of discipline and organization was still characteristic.

The decisive impulse for a further development of Merovingian monasticism came when the Irish monk Columban[49] (c. 543–615) arrived there with twelve companions to the Frankish Kingdom c. 590

---

[46] Regula Tarnatensis: PL 66, 977–988; Regula Ferrioli, ibid., 959–976. See especially L. R. Delsalle, "Comparison, datation, localisation relative des Regles monastiques de. s. Césaire d'Arles s. Ferréol d'Uzés et de la Regula Tarnatensis monasterii," Augustiniana 11 (1961), 5–26; G. Holzherr, Regula Ferrioli (Einsiedeln 1961); F. Villegas, RBén 84 (1974), 7–65, with new text of the Regula Tarnatensis.

[47] Text: PL 87, 273–298; see S. G. Luff, DR 70 (1952), 180–203, and R. Hanslick, Stpatr 10, 1 (TU 107, Berlin 1970), 100–104.

[48] Council of Orléans (511), can. 11.

[49] Chief source is the Vita Columbani by the monk Jonas of Bobbio, ed. B. Krusch, MGSS rer. Mer. 4 (1902), an ed. minor (Hanover 1905). Columban's works edited by G. S. M. Walder, S. Columbani Opera (Dublin 1957).

and was able to put the monastic ideal of his homeland[50] into effect on new soil. When the Irishman gave up the position of first teacher at the school of his monastery of Bangor in order to go far way, his motive was the peregrinatio in its religious understanding, as he emphasized in his letter to the bishops of the Merovingian Kingdom.[51] Only when he came to know the depressing situation of the Merovingian Church from his own observation did he also decide on pastoral work among the people, in so far as this was possible in the framework of monastic community life. In this it was of the greatest importance that for his activity Columban quickly found the approval and support of King Sigebert and of the Merovingian upper class, who were powerfully impressed by the personality of the Irish monk. On the southeast slope of the Vosges he was able to establish, one after another, three settlements, Annegray, Luxeuil, and Fontaine,[52] of which the second became the most important because of the magnitude of the plan—refectory, monastic school, guest-house—and the rapidly growing number of monks. For these monasteries Columban wrote down his regulations, the Regula Monachorum in ten chapters, which rather determined the basic attitudes of the ascetical life of monks, and the Regula Coenobialis, a loose sort of notebook record of penances which were imposed for failings in the monastic life.[53] Both reflect the theory and practice of the Irish home monastery of Bangor, which its Abbot Comgall had there introduced. To these belong especially the serious, strict characteristic of striving for interiority, to which the monastic Rule leads, the order of prayer (Chapter 7), and the detailed penitential regulations of the Regula Coenobialis. From the start, Columban's foundation had a strong power of attraction, which was expressed in two important traits. First, the Frankish nobility were attracted in a unique way by the Irish-Scottish monastic ideal: its sons were partly educated at Luxeuil or entered there as monks: monks of Luxeuil were summoned to be bishops, who then called into being monasteries on the model of Luxeuil or introduced the order of Luxeuil into existing monasteries; and finally laymen made numerous new foundations in both Neustria and Austrasia and North Burgundy, so that the number of monasteries oriented to Luxeuil rose to more than 100 in the course of the seventh century.[54] The originally exclusive validity of the Rule of Columban was, of course, replaced in the course of the century by a Regula Mixta, into which it developed with parts of the gradually advancing Benedictine Rule. Second, there proceeded from these monasteries far-reaching pastoral activity, since auricular confession, which they recommended, and the stressing of a serious penitential attitude[55]—in brief, the excercise of an individual pastoral care—met a deep need in all levels of the population. This twofold success of the Luxeuil spirit, however, immediately became also an occasion for a serious conflict between monasticism and parts of the episcopate, as well as with King Theodebert II. The bishops were displeased by the relative independence of the Irish-Frankish monasteries, just as by the effective pastoral activity of Columban, and both the bishops and the King especially took a dim view of the candid words of the Irish monk, who unambiguously recalled to the diocesan clergy their duty as shepherds and sharply rebuked the King for his concubinage. Columban finally had to yield in 610 to the common pressure from both; after two years' missionary work among the still pagan population between the Lake of Zurich and Bregenz, he crossed the Alps in the fall of 612 and at Bobbio reached the last city of his peregrinatio.[56] But the work of the Irish-Scots on Frankish soil began an important stimulus for the religious elevation of the population of the Merovingian Kingdom, which can be ascertained at the beginning of the Carolingian Age.

---

[50] On the development and peculiar character of Irish-Scottish monasticism, see supra, Chapter 33.

[51] Columban, Ep. 2, 6.

[52] Jonas, Vita s. Columb. 1, 6; 1, 10.

[53] The Regula Monachorum: 122–142; the Regula Coenobialis: 142–168, ed. Walker. The manuscript tradition of both Rules shows many later enlargements; cf. Walker, Introduction, XLII–LII.

Spanish Monasticism

The development of Spanish monasticism in the fifth century was interrupted by the invasion of the Vandals, Sueves, and Visigoths, but after the consolidation of the political situation it knew a steady upswing, which led to a considerable flowering in the seventh century. Just as in Italy, here too eremitism retained its importance, especially on the Balearic Isles and in the mountains of Asturias and Galicia,[57] but the center of gravity lay in the cenobitic colonies, rapidly growing in numbers, which at first owed their origin to bishops and monks and then, after the conversion of King Recared to Catholicism in 589, also to the reigning dynasty.

---

[54] The history of these foundations in F. Prinz, 121–151, with maps V, VIIA, and VIIB; on the Regula Mixta, ibid., 270–289.

[55] The authenticity of the penitential attitude should be maintained in the readiness for corresponding works of penance, which Columban collected in two catalogues, preserved as Poenitentiale; see pp. 168–180 of Walker and the special edition of J. Laporte, Le Pénitentiel de s. Columban (Tournai 1958).

[56] On the chronology of this phase of Columban's life, see J. O'Carroll, IThQ 24 (1957), 76–95.

[57] Cf. M. C. Díaz y Díaz, op. cit., and A. Linage Conde, 244–250. Especially to be noted is the self-willed figure of the hermit Valerius of Bierzo.

Soon after 506 the monastery of Saint Martin of Asan was founded on the southern slope of the Pyrenees, north of Huesca; its Abbot Victorian (d. 558) was active to the mid-century for the spread of monasticism by the erecting of smaller colonies subject to him.[58] Even more important was the work of Martin of Braga, a native of Pannonia, who came from Palestine to Galicia c. 550 and there established the monastery of Dumio, over which he presided as abbot until he was called to be Bishop of Dumio in 556. By means of a collection of sayings of Egyptian Fathers, translated and revised by him, which could be employed as a "Rule," he gave his monastery an eastern outlook, which made it similar to the Martinian monasticism of Gaul.[59] Then, not without influence on Spanish monasticism, came the founding of the monastery of Servitanum in the Visigothic sphere by Abbot Donatus, who before 570 migrated from North Africa with seventy monks and a considerable library and soon acquired high esteem.[60] His successor Eutropius, who became Bishop of Valencia after the Council of Toledo of 589, defended the stern discipline of his monastery in a special work.[61] It must probably be assumed that the Rule of Augustine was followed in the Monasterium Servitanum.[62]

The treatise De institutione virginis, which Bishop Leander of Seville (d. c. 600) composed for his sister, the nun Florentina, made use of ideas from the writings of Jerome, especially his Letter XXII to Eustochium, but also of Cassian and Augustine; however, no traces of the Rule of Benedict can be found.[63] The Regula Monachorum of his brother and successor Isidore (d. 636) is, in regard to content, dependent on eastern monastic writings—the Rules of Pachomius and Macarius, Cassian—and on western works—Jerome, Caesarius of Arles, and perhaps also Benedict. His own achievement consisted in the clarity and balance with which he formed the material before him into a well-thought-out Rule.[64] Isidore reported also of a contemporary, Bishop John of Gerona (d. before 621), who founded the monastery of Biclarum on the spurs of the Pyrenees and wrote a Rule for it, but this must probably be regarded as lost.[65] A helpful promoter of monasticism was also Isidore's friend, Bishop Braulio of Zaragoza (d. 651), a pupil of the monastic school of Seville.[66] He maintained a correspondence with Fructuosus of Braga (d. c. 665), who came from a prominent Visigothic family, used his wealth for the erecting of several monasteries in Galicia and on the southern coast of Spain, and later became Bishop of Dumio and Metropolitan of Braga. His Regula Monachorum is based on Pachomius, Cassian, and Isidore, but also displays certain parallels to Jerome and Augustine.[67] Unique is the prescription in Chapter 22 that the monk, on entering the monastery, signs a pactum, in which he asserts the voluntary character of his decision and obliges himself in a sort of treaty to the fulfilling of the monastic statutes.[68] The Regula communis, attributed to Fructuosus, probably incorrectly, refers to another special type of monastery, common in Galicia, in which entire families led a sort of monastic life on their property, but this involved several abuses.[69]

---

[58] His tomb inscription in J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas (Barcelona, 2nd ed. 1969), no. 284. Cf. also Venantius Fortunatus, Carm. 4, 11.

[59] The Sententiae patrum aegyptiorum in C. W. Barlow, Martini episcopi Bracarensis opera omnia (New Haven 1950), 30–51. The Bishop of Braga called the Gallic Martin his patronus—see the epitaph composed by him in Barlow, p. 283—and Venantius Fortunatus, Carm. 5, 1, calls him Martini heres.

[60] Ildefonse of Toledo, Vir ill. 4; John of Biclar, Chron. ad a. 571. The author of the Vitae patrum Emeritensium 3, reports the arrival of a rather large group of African monks at Mérida, a report whose nucleus can be true.

[61] Isidore of Seville, Vir. ill. 45; 65. Eutropius's work De distinctione monachorum, PL 80, 15–20, and in M. C. Díaz y Díaz, Anecdota wisigothica (Salamanca 1958), 20–35. On Eutropius, also J. Vives, DHGE 16, 84–86.

[62] A. Manrique, "La Regla de s. Agustín en España durante los primeros siglos de su existencia," CD 182 (1969), 485–513, especially 488, 490.

[63] Leander's "Rule" is handed down in three versions: a) PL 72, 873–894; b) ed. A. C. Vega, S. Leandro de Sevilla. El 'De instit. virg.' (El Escorial 1948) =PL Suppl. 4, 1421–1449; c) ed. J. Mádoz, AnBoll, 67 (1949), 407-424. On Leander's sources see id. MiscMercati 1 (1946), 265–295, and J. Campos Ruiz, BAC 321, 9–19.

As a special characteristic of the Spanish monasticism of this period may be mentioned its receptivity to intellectual activity, in which the study of the Bible, which in Leander's view was also a duty in convents of nuns, retained its previous preeminence.[70] For the daily prescribed three hours of lectio the monk obtained his reading matter from the sacrarius from the monastic library of Seville; it included also the works of profane authors to the extent that they were beneficial for theological study.[71] Almost all the more important Spanish bishops of the seventh century obtained their considerable education in the monastic schools of Seville, Toledo (Agali), or Zaragoza, and as bishops continued to use and foster their scriptoria.[72] In this lively interest in intellectual activity may rightly be seen the influence of African monasticism at work, which proceeded from the monastery of Servitanum, already mentioned, under the African Abbot Donatus.[73] It was the merit of the Spanish monasticism of this period to have given to its Church an episcopate which, measured by its ascetical and theological formation, occupied a high rank in the Latin Church of the seventh century. The religious self-evaluation of this monasticism was, of course, traditional, if it is compared with the zeal which it devoted to the practical shaping of monastic life by means of rules, synodal decrees, and other writings. It was extensively oriented to the stock of ideas which was offered by Jerome, Augustine, and Cassian, and at times a renovation and reform of monasticism were understood in the sense of a return to its original idea.[74] [64] Regula Monachorum, PL 83, 867–904, and BAC 321, 79–125; on its sources see R. Susin Alcubierre, Salmanticensis 14 (1967), 371–394. Synodal decrees on monasticism: Concil. Hispa. II, canons 10 and 11; Concil. Tolet. IV, canons 48–53, 56.

---

[65] Isidore of Seville, Vir. ill. 44. See J. Campos, Juan de Biclaro (Madrid 1960), 32–41. J. Pérez de Urbel, Hispania 1 (1940), 9–39; 2 (1941), 32–52, would identify John's Rule with the Regula Magistri; A. C. Vega, BRAH 16 (1969), 13–27, with the Regula Macarii.

[66] C. H. Lynch–P. Galindo, S. Braulio, obispo de Zaragoza (Madrid 1950).

[67] On Fructuosus, cf. M. C. Díaz y Díaz, DSp. 5, 1541–1546. The anonymous Vita s. Fructuosi, PL 87, 459–470, and in F. C. Nock (Washington 1946). The Regula Monachorum, PL 87, 1099–1110, and BAC 321, 129–162; its sources: R. Grégoire, RAM 43 (1967) 172–174; J. Oroz-Reta, Stpatr 10, 1(TU 107, Berlin 1970), 407–412.

[68] Model of such a pactum: PL 87, 1127–1130; BAC 321, 208–211; on the spread of the custom, see C. J. Bishko, Estudios Menéndez Pidal II (Madrid 1951), 514–531. The German character of this custom, assumed by I. Herivegen, Das Pactum des hl. Fructuosus von Braga (Stuttgart 1907, reprinted Amsterdam 1965), is uncertain.

[69] The Regula communis: PL 87, 1111–1127; BAC 321, 165–208; see J. Orlandis, "Los monasterios familiares en España durante la alta edad media," Anuario de historia del derecho español 26 (1956), 5–46.

The Monasticism of Africa

African monasticism, which reached a rapid flowering chiefly through the initiative of Augustine, was affected in the last months of his life by the invasion of the Arian Vandals, just as the African Catholic Church as a whole. In addition to churches and cemeteries, many monasteries were also destroyed, partly burned down, and their inhabitants expelled; some of them found death through the sword or torture, others were sent off into captivity.[75] Probably those monasteries were chiefly affected which lay on the Vandals' route of march or in the province of Africa Proconsularis, the special territory of settlement of the Vandals. Since many African monasteries of men also had clerics in their community, these were also included in King Gaiseric's decree of expulsion against clerics.[76] Going beyond his father's measures, King Hunneric (477–484) planned the total suppression of all monasteries, since by a decree of 484 he had them turned over to the Moors, but his death prevented the implementation of the project.[77] Under the persecution of Hunneric, besides clerics, also monks and nuns went over to the Arianism of the conquerors,[78] but the majority splendidly stood the test in difficult circumstances. When King Gunthamund (484–496) revoked in succession his predecessor's decrees of persecution and banishment, the expelled religious were able to return and put an end to the damage done in the persecution; even a relatively rapid renewal of monastic life can be ascertained, which is reflected, especially for the province of Byzacena, in the Vita of Bishop Fulgentius of Ruspe (d. apparently in 527).[79] As earlier, there were, in addition to monasteries which had only lay persons as members and were in the minority, others in which also clerics and, with them at times, the bishop lived as monks.[80]

---

[70] J. Orlandis, "La 'lectrio divina' en el monasterio visigodo," Jus canon 7 (1957), 149–156. Leander of Seville, Reg. ad. virg. 6.

[71] Isidore of Seville, Reg. mon. 8, 1.

[72] P. Riché, Education et culture dans l'Occident barbare (Paris, 3rd ed. 1973), 339–345. On Isidore's profane education see J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne visigothique (Paris 1959), 735–762.

[73] P. Riché, op. cit., 345–348.

[74] On the theological importance of monasticism in the Visigothic period see J. Fontaine and M. C. Díaz y Díaz, Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris 1961), 353–369, 371–383, and in Fructuosus, R. Grégoire, RAM 43 (1967), 159–176.

[75] In agreement are Possidius, Vita s. Aug. 28, 7, and Victor of Vita, Hist. persec. 1, 4–7. Whether the raping of nuns by barbarians in the province of Mauretania, of which Leo I, Ep. 12, 8 and 11, speaks, must be attributed to the Vandals is not certain.

At the Synod of Carthage in 525 there occurred an interesting discussion on monastic canon law. In this an Abbot Peter made charges against Bishop Liberatus, Primate of Byzacena, because the bishop had subjected the abbot's monastery completely to episcopal jurisdiction and treated the monks as though they were his clerics. The Council decreed the full independence of the monastery from the bishop, especially the free election of the abbot, and stressed that the Rule given to the monastery by its founder was to be observed in every respect; to the bishop belonged only the right of ordination of the clerics destined for liturgical duty in the monastery. The matter came up once again for discussion at the Council of Carthage of 536, at which a Bishop Felix from Numidia stood up for the confirmation of the synodal decrees of 525.[81] Frequently in the contemporary sources there is mention of a rule or order, according to which monasteries lived. It is, of course, natural to think here of the Rule of Augustine, especially since the memory of Augustine was highly esteemed precisely in the African monasteries, but the question must be left open, because in the time of Fulgentius there were monasteries of varied austerity of observance.[82] However, that Augustine's spirit lingered on in African monasteries of the fifth and sixth centuries can be inferred from the interest which they displayed in the study of the Bible and in the theological discussions of the day, as for example, the monks Ferrandus and Felix proved in the Three Chapters controversy.

---

[76] Victor of Vita, Hist. persec. 1, 14–15; 1, 51.

[77] Passio septem monachorum 5 (CSEL 7, 109): "universa monasteria virorum vel puellarum sanctarum gentibus id est Mauris cum habitatoribus donare praecepit."

[78] A Roman Synod of 487 established the conditions for their readmittance to ecclesiastical communion: Mansi 7, 1056–1058, 1171–1174; see Hefele–Leclercq 2, 934–935.

[79] The author was the monk and Deacon Ferrandus of Carthage: PL 65, 117–150. Critical edition of G. Lapeyre (Paris 1929). On the year of Fulgentius's death see C. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique (Paris 1955), 300.

[80] J. J. Gavigan, op. cit., 150–153.

[81] Acts of the Synods: Mansi 8, 633–656, 841–842, and Concilia Africae, CChr 249 (Turnhout 1974), 273–275 (Council of Carthage 525); 283 (Council of Carthage 536).

A new feature was brought into the picture of African monasticism when, after the Byzantine reconquest of North Africa by Belisarius (533–34), Greek monks in flight before the Persians came to North Africa from Palestine, Syria, and Egypt, or later in consequence of the Monothelite quarrel, and settled in Proconsular Africa, where in the first half of the seventh century four Byzantine monasteries, among them a laura of Saint Sabas, can be demonstrated.[83] Among the most famous representatives of this monasticism were, at least for a time, the Abbots Sophronius and Thalassius, that of Saint Sabas, and Maximus Confessor. The three last-named journeyed from Africa to Rome and took part in the Lateran Synod of 649, which occupied itself with the Monothelite controversy. When the Arab invasion began around this time, North African monasticism, with the African Church, was also drawn into the ever-changing struggles for the possession of these provinces and shared with it the fate of a long but inexorable death.

---

[82] Ferrandus, Vita s. Fulg. 12, 63; 28, 135.

[83] On the name and location of the Byzantine monasteries, see J. J. Gavigan, op. cit., 209–214.

CHAPTER 43

Theological Discussions

The Church's Confrontation with the Arianism of the Vandals and the Goths

The confrontation was conducted on the part of the Vandals in Africa as a persecution, using all the State's means of power. This is attested by the History of the Persecution in the province of Africa of Bishop Victor of Vita, published in 488–89, which was of course not only a historical record but at the same time an agency of the argument. Victor aimed (3, 62) to set right all who highly esteemed the barbarians and to show that the barbarians were still barbarians and had nothing else in mind than the annihilation of all Romans; hence he identified Catholics with Romans and conversely. He closed with a prayer that God might put an end to this punishment for the sins of the Romans (3, 70), but he probably also hoped to induce the Byzantines to intervene in Africa, in which of course he did not succeed. Over and above this purpose, the work, despite its partiality, remains one of the most important sources, from which it follows that the Vandals indeed tried to gain the Catholic African population, but insisted on the rebaptism of those converted. The Roman Count Sebastian, for whom King Gaiseric personally exerted himself, rejected conversion and rebaptism thus: "As bread originates by the fact of flour's passing through water and fire, so I was baptized and cooked by the fire of the Holy Spirit. When bread is again cut up, soaked again, and baked again and in this way becomes better, then I will have myself rebaptized."[1] Here it can be ascertained that the confrontation with the Arianism of the Germans was not only a matter for theologians and pastors, but also for the laity. The possibilities for the clergy were extraordinarily limited: Gaiseric forbade not only solemn Catholic funerals with chants and hymns,[2] because he regarded them as effective propaganda, but he also received reports on the sermons of the Catholic clergy. Anyone who had spoken of Pharaoh or Nebuchadnezzar or a similar figure from the Old Testament was accused of having thereby meant the king and was sent into exile.[3] Gaiseric may have been hypersensitive, but it must be assumed that in fact sermons in this encoded manner were doing battle against the Arian ruler who was persecuting the Church. Gaiseric's successor, Hunneric, in 483 again prescribed the creed of the Synod of Rimini of 359 for North Africa, because it was, he said, really ecumenical.[4] The Vandals should be regarded not simply as Arians, but as adherents of the vague creed of Rimini, hence as Homoians. It is remarkable that King Hunneric appealed expressly to the anti-Arian legislation of the Emperors in order to use it against the Homoousians, the Catholics.[5] When the Eastern Roman Emperor Zeno interceded with Hunneric to permit again the election of a Catholic bishop for Carthage, he demanded on his part freedom of worship and of preaching for the Arian bishops at Constantinople and in the eastern provinces; otherwise, the Carthaginian clerics would be exiled. Here can be recognized, at least in its initial stages, an Arian, or, rather, an anti-Catholic Germanic ecumenical conviction, which could not but appear threatening to the Catholic Church. Thus the clergy of Carthage preferred to renounce the election of a bishop, but had to yield to the wish of the people.[6] [1] Victor, Hist. pers. 1, 6, 19–21.

---

[2] Ibid. 1, 16.

[3] Ibid. 1, 27.

[4] Ibid. 3, 5.

[5] Ibid. 3, 7, and 12.

In his history of the persecution Victor included a book on the Catholic faith,[7] in which, among other things, he presented the Christology of Chalcedon, that is, the doctrine of the two natures. Hence he was aware that only at Chalcedon was the definitive reply given to Arius. However, Fulgentius of Ruspe, Victor's younger contemporary,[8] was first able to argue successfully from there. In addition to the scriptural arguments, which were known from the first Arian controversy, and were already developed in the lands of Greek speech, Victor profited from the text of the Old Latin translation. Thus he quotes from Jeremiah 9:10: "They do not hear the voice of the substance." What was meant was: "The hills no longer hear the sound of the flocks": in this way Jeremiah described the abandonment of the land of Israel, punished for its sins. In this passage Victor saw a proof that the heretical Arians, who would have nothing to do with the common substance of Father and Son, were facing damnation.[9] Apparently the Vandals in Africa called themselves Catholics, while on the other hand they labeled both Roman Catholic Christians and Donatists together as Homoousians.[10] Thus Fulgentius could argue that the word "Catholic" was no more scriptural than was homoousios; the Arians would have to submit to being called the Triousians.[11]

From the disciplinary measures which the Church had to adopt it appears that the struggle against Arianism was not always successful, but that many of the faithful, even clerics, let themselves be seduced to the Arian side. Thus in 487 Pope Felix II assembled at Rome a synod of the African episcopate to solve the problems of the apostates in the Vandal persecution. In his letter to the bishops of Sicily[12] he made known the outcome: higher clerics who had gone over to the Arians should do penance throughout life; lesser clerics, monks, and lay persons should spend three years among the hearers and seven more years among the penitents, and for two years they must not take part in the presentation of gifts at the altar.[13] Later, canon 9 of the Council of Lérida in Spain in 523 decreed that all who had had themselves rebaptized without compulsion might only pray for seven years among the catechumens and then two more years among the faithful before they were fully reconciled. It is noteworthy that no regulation was made there for those who had accepted rebaptism under compulsion, probably because the Visigoths in Spain did not resort to force. As a rule, the Arians, or, more correctly, the anti-Nicene Germans, insisted on the rebaptism of those converted to them. The Visigothic King Leovigild in 580 was the first to disavow this demand in order to facilitate conversions.[14] But as early as c. 500 there were in Africa Catholics who went over to the Arians without rebaptism and expressed the hope that they had not sinned so seriously and would not incur the loss of eternal salvation.[15] On the other hand, under the rule of the Catholic Clovis, who in 507 seized the greatest part of Gaul from the Arian Visigoths, there were conversions of Arian clerics. For then, canon 11 of the Council of Orléans, which met at Clovis's command in 511, decreed that they were to be restored to office through the laying on of hands of the Catholic bishop; Arian churches should be consecrated. The national Burgundian Council, which met at Epaon in 517, decided, on the contrary, in canon 33 that only such churches should again be taken into Catholic use which had been Catholic before their occupation by the Arians; the others should be thoroughly desecrated. Naturally, such decisions were possible only in the areas ruled by Catholic princes. Arian lay persons who converted to Catholicism should be admitted to the Church by anointing with chrism, which the priest might administer in cases of necessity;[16] otherwise, the bishop. Gregory of Tours reports that both in Frankish Gaul[17] and also in Spain it even happened that sometimes a new name was given to the convert.[18] Gregory the Great, however, saw the reconciliation anointing for Arians only in the East; in the West the mere imposition of hands was performed.[19] One will hardly have to reckon with a change of practice, but think of the Italian Roman custom, which Gregory regarded as general for the West.

---

[6] Ibid. 2, 2.

[7] Ibid. 2, 56–101.

[8] See infra, p. 716.

[9] Similarly, Fulgentius in his replies to King Thrasamund: CChr 91, line 377.

[10] Fulgentius, Ep. 9, 4.

[11] Replies: CChr 91, lines 651ff.

[12] Cf. Hefele–Leclercq 2, 2, 934f.

[13] Mansi VII, 1057C.

In the first third of the sixth century Caesarius, Bishop of Arles, distinguished himself in southern Gaul as the opponent of Arianism. More important than his work on the mystery of the Holy Trinity and his Breviary against heretics was without doubt the fact that, due to his influence, canon 3 of the Council of Vaison in 529 prescribed the threefold Sanctus for all Masses. In this way it was probably intended to express that the three divine persons are holy in the same way, that is, they are of one being; for canon 5 decreed that, as hitherto in the East, Africa, and Italy, so now also in the southern Frankish Kingdom the "as it was in the beginning, is now, and will be for ever" was to be added to the Gloria Patri in order to counteract the Arian "There was a time when he was not." No doubt such liturgical anti-heretical measures were especially successful and lasting. In this connection it must be mentioned that the insertion of the Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople into the Mass, which had taken place at Constantinople as early as the beginning of the sixth century, represented for the West an anti-Arian measure. The Visigothic King Recared decreed, in the introduction to the Third Council of Toledo in 589 immediately after he had converted to the Catholic faith with his people, that from now on this Creed was to be recited aloud at all Masses before communion. In the Spanish Visigothic Kingdom Recared also decided, as earlier in the Frankish Kingdom of Clovis, to retain celibacy for the reception of Arian clerics into the Catholic clergy, in case they were prepared.[20] Here a new ordination seems, however, to have been required; in any event, there is mention that the "blessing of the priesthood" must be received again.

---

[14] John of Biclar, Chronicle 14, 2.

[15] Cf. Fulgentius, De remissione peccatorum 1, XXII, 1.

[16] Epaon 517, can. 16.

[17] Hist. IV, 27.

[18] Ibid. V, 38; cf. infra, p. 713.

[19] Reg. Epp. XI, 52.

True, Victor of Tunnuna[21] reported for 507 that theology, that is, the doctrine of the Trinity, was discussed at the baths, but very little is said about debates among theologians. The encounter between the African Bishop Fulgentius, banished to Sardinia but briefly recalled to Carthage, and the Arian Vandal King Thrasamund c. 515 represented an outstanding episode, which could indeed be likened to that between Ambrose and Theodosius.[22] For this occasion Fulgentius composed his still extant three-volume work for King Thrasamund.[23] A little earlier Bishop Avitus of Vienne in the southern Frankish Kingdom may have discussed the Trinity with the still Arian Burgundian King Gundobad (d. 516).[24] Of course, the situation in the Burgundian Kingdom was different from that in the African Vandal Kingdom. Avitus succeeded in converting Sigismund, son and successor of Gundobad, to the Catholic faith. It is not surprising that for the period of Justinian's wars against the Germans there were no reports of theological discussions. Then toward the end of the sixth century there was at least a report of the debate between the Catholic Bishop Masona, who, furthermore, was of Gothic descent, and the Arian Bishop Sunna under King Leovigild at Mérida.[25] But the report creates the impression of something extraordinary. Unexpectedly Masona argued in a scholastically clear and convincing manner, so that his Arian opponent Sunna could not refute him. Hence there was surprise at how philosophically and technically this bishop could debate. Unfortunately, none of his arguments has been quoted. It must probably be assumed that such discussions were not at all frequent,[26] especially since Leovigild had this one held as a theological duel over the episcopal see of Mérida.

---

[20] Second Council of Zaragoza 592, can. 1.

[21] MGAuctant XI, 139.

[22] Diesner, Religionspolitik 13.

[23] See infra, p. 716.

[24] Cf. Letter 53 of Avitus to Heraclius.

[25] Vitae Patrum Emeritensium 11.

Gregory of Tours reports in his historical work, completed toward the end of the sixth century, two discussions which he himself had had with Gothic Arians from Spain, no doubt in such detail because the war against Arianism was to him an important concern; however, he introduced his complete work not only with the Nicene Creed but in the foreword he refuted the Arian argument from Mark 13:32—the Son does not know the time of the end—understanding by this Son the entire Christian people. The Goth Agila, who was not a priest but an envoy of King Leovigild, proved to be quite equal to the discussion, even if Gregory judged him quite contemptible.[27] He referred to the fact that, according to John 14:28, the Father is greater than the Son, that Christ was grieved and gave up his spirit, as Matthew's gospel declares in 26:38 and 27:50, and he even included the Holy Spirit in the discussion: he was promised and sent—. . . Promissus—missus—hence he is less than Father and Son. Gregory tried to argue from the miserable end of Arius, but drew from Agila the deserved rebuff: another's religion must never be ridiculed; the Arians did not do so; rather they permitted everyone the freedom to honor even a pagan sacrificial shrine by a bow of the head.[28]

The discussion with Oppila in 584[29] makes known that Gothic Arianism in Spain had meanwhile changed. Oppila professed himself to be orthodox—Father, Son, and Spirit are unius virtutis—and participated in the Mass but without communicating. But afterward Gregory took him to task, for he declared that he had stopped short because of the Gloria Patri. Glory must be given to the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit. In this Gregory recognized him as a heretic and discussed at length but without success, in order to convince him of the correctness of the Catholic formula: "Glory to the Father and the Son . . ." If the report[30] is included that the Arian Visigothic King Leovigild began to pray in Catholic churches and stated that the Son is aequalis

---

[26] This is the view of Díaz y Díaz, Settimane . . . V, 185.

[27] Gregory of Tours, Hist. V, 43.

[28] Cf. also F. J. Dölger, AuC 6, 69f.

[29] Gregory of Tours, Hist. VI, 40.

[30] Ibid. VI, 18.

Patri but he could not recognize the Holy Spirit as God, then it is seen how thoroughgoing was the change which King Leovigild imposed at the Arian Council of 580[31]—the only one of which we know: cessation of the demand for rebaptism, recognition of the equal divinity of the Son. Nevertheless, it is surprising that the King then clung so tenaciously to the Arian form of the Gloria Patri. From this it probably appears that the Arians, and a fortiori the Arian kings who ruled their Churches, were not really concerned with theologically pondered considerations, but rather with traditions, even with liturgical forms. In any case, Leovigild, of course without intending it, had prepared the conversion of his entire nation to Catholicism, by decreeing on the whole a decisive change which, in addition, already represented the half-way point to the Nicene profession;[32] for, through it, Arianism, which lived only on the basis of the tradition, could not but be convulsed. On the other hand, through this deep intrusion into dogma and ecclesiastical discipline, Leovigild must have prepared the supremacy of the later Catholic kings over the Church, especially since one must reckon with the fact that among the bishops of the Third Council of Toledo in 589, at which King Recared acted so authoritatively, were some who had taken part in Leovigild's Arian Synod of 580 but had meanwhile become Catholics.

Special doctrinal discussions of course occurred on the occasion of the marriages of princes, as, for example, when c. 565 the Arian Visigothic Princesses Brunhildis and Galswintha went from Spain as wives of two Frankish kings and were converted as a result of "the preaching of the bishops and the urgings of the kings," professed the Holy Trinity, and were anointed with chrism.[33] It is interesting that in the reverse case, that is, when a Catholic Frankish princess, Ingundis, came to Spain as the wife of an Arian Visigothic prince, Hermenegild, Gregory attributed the preaching to her. She thereby brought it about that Hermenegild became a Catholic, received the anointing with chrism, and in this connection even received a new name, John.[34] Gregory had little sympathy for anything Gothic, in fact for anything Spanish. Thus he did not mention the activity of Bishop Leander of Seville, which was of importance for Hermenegild's conversion, but only the admonition which the Bishop of Agde imported through Ingundis as she was en route.[35] For him, just as for Gregory the Great, it was Hermenegild who rebelled against his father and was finally murdered in prison, a martyr. On the contrary, the Catholic Spanish writers of the seventh century did not speak of Hermenegild's conversion but only of his alliance with the Greeks and his revolt against the legitimate King Leovigild.[36] Thus did the judgment change quickly through the elimination of the Arian controversy. If Gregory of Tours also apparently had an interest in extolling the Franks and hence also the Frankish Princess Ingundis who had gone to Spain to be married, there is no need to doubt the authenticity of the reports on her steadfastness and her religious formation. Despite the threats and blows of her mother-in-law, who even had her thrown into the Arian baptismal font in an effort to force her rebaptism, she declared in Spain: "It is sufficient that I was once cleansed of original sin by the healing bath of baptism and professed the Holy Trinity in one equality."[37] Ingundis's resolution may have contributed to King Leovigild's abandoning of the demand for rebaptism.[38] From the conduct of the three princesses, from the intervention of Leovigild and similar procedures in Vandal Africa, it may be concluded that Catholic Christianity developed an individual denominational moral sense among the newly converted German peoples, whereas Arian Christianity continued to be determined by the principles of the German comitatus.

---

[31] John of Biclar, Chronicle 14, 2.

[32] Cf. K. F. Stroheker, "Leovigild" in id., Germanentum und Spätantike (Zurich-Stuttgart 1965), 134–191, especially 174ff.

[33] Gregory of Tours, Hist. IV, 27.

[34] Ibid. V, 38.

[35] Ibid. IX, 24.

The struggle against Arianism, however, easily operated to the other extreme. King Chilperic, who also on other occasions showed himself to be quite pretentious, composed a dogmatic decree on the Trinity and intended to oblige all bishops to it.[39] Gregory of Tours at once recognized that in it Sabellianism was merely undergoing a revision, but only the Bishop of Albi was able to dissuade the King from his plan, which in any event had to be fitted into the total confrontation with Arianism. At the time a good share of this argument was borne by lay people, probably even by lay people of nonnoble rank, even if detailed accounts of this are lacking. Thus the merit for the overcoming of Arianism belongs not only to the outstanding figures among bishops and theologians, but to the totality of the Roman Catholic faithful.

The Arian German domination in North Africa and Italy, which had experienced in the sixth century a development working in the opposite direction, in the sense that the Vandals moved from intolerance to a certain toleration in regard to Catholics, whereas in the Kingdom of Theodoric the Great the converse was true,[40] ended in both cases in the middle of the sixth century in Justinian's reconquest. The Visigoths' Arian domination in Spain, which had been rather tolerant until c. 580, but then for a short time under Leovigild had exerted pressure on the Catholics, became Catholic under King Recared in 586, so that toward the end of the sixth century Arianism could really have been overcome everywhere if the Lombards had not produced a certain epilogue. It cannot be determined exactly what, as regards faith, they really brought with them to Italy; it is certain that many of them were still pagans, but they appeared not as persecutors of the Catholics but rather as brutal warriors.[41] Religiously and ecclesiastically, the Lombards, though masters of Italy, felt themselves overcome by the people they ruled. True, under the Lombard King Rothari, hence in the second quarter of the seventh century, there was in many a city of Italy besides the Catholic also an Arian bishop,[42] but we hear nothing about theological controversies. From c. 640 to 680 the Lombards converted to Catholicism, something that was facilitated for them by the circumstance that the Catholic Church was in opposition to Byzantium either because of the quarrel over the Three Chapters[43] or because of the Monothelite controversy,[44] so that they did not have to accept the religion of their political opponents.[45]

---

[36] Krusch-Levison, Gregory of Tours, MGSS rer. Mer., p. 244, note 3.

[37] Gregory of Tours, Hist. V, 38.

[38] See supra, p. 713.

[39] Gregory of Tours, Hist. V, 44.

[40] Diesner, op. cit., 5 and 19.

What the Catholic writers transmit does not permit us to assume a very high theological level among the Arians. However, some important testimonies are still extant. Thus the famed Codex Argenteus, which is kept at Uppsala, a Bible manuscript written with silver ink, must have been written in Italy in the time of Theodoric and is proof of a high Arian religious culture. That there were also Arians of high theological and scientific rank can be deduced from a codex which was apparently written in Italy in the sixth century by an educated Goth.[46] There is found on the wide, originally empty border of a codex of Ambrose, which contained the first two books De fide of the Bishop of Milan and the Gesta Aquileiensia, hence the acts of the Synod of Aquileia of 381, the Dissertatio Maximini contra Ambrosium. Hence the writer of the gloss attached importance to correcting the report on that Synod influenced by Ambrose by this means, that he wrote into the same codex the work of the Arian Maximinus against Ambrose. This theological level of Gothic Arianism may have survived the political dominance. In any event, the polemic which Bishop Agnellus of Ravenna composed c. 560 against Arianism[47] was directed against Arian Goths.

---

[41] Cf. Sestan, Settimane . . . V, 661.

[42] Paul the Deacon, Historia Langobardorum IV, 42.

[43] Cf. infra, p. 728.

[44] Cf. supra, p. 635.

[45] Sestan, loc. cit. V, 664.

[46] Thus Kauffmann, op. cit., XXII.

It can be ascertained in the seventh century that the Bishop of Pavia was directly subject to Rome and was ordained by the Roman Bishop, even though Pavia really belonged to the ecclesiastical province of Milan. This case is the earliest exemption of a bishop in the West, in fact the only one at all until the eleventh century.[48] True, the royal Lombard residence was probably supposed to be especially honored, but this arrangement occurred as a result of the Arian quarrel. At Pavia apparently the Catholic succession had died out at the beginning of the seventh century, but then the Arian bishop became a Catholic: he had announced his conversion to the Roman Bishop and was received by him.[49]

Accomplishment and progress, but at the same time also endangering and one-sidedness of the anti-Arian theology, which had an impact on the future and to a degree even today, are seen most clearly in Fulgentius. At the beginning of the sixth century bishop of the North African city of Ruspe, he was during most of his episcopate an exile in Sardinia. He stood forth not only as the greatest Latin theologian of his century, but also as the most determined and profound opponent of the anti-Nicene Homoian creed of Seleucia–Rimini upheld by the Germans. In his anti-Arian works he quoted especially Cyprian and Tertullian, hence pre-Nicene authors, but not, for example, Augustine by whom he was so strongly influenced that he could be called the abbreviated Augustine. He argued against the Germans, who had stopped on the position of the Synod of Seleucia–Rimini,[50] from the height, meanwhile achieved, of Trinitarian theology and the development of Christological dogma. Thus, for example,[51] he aimed so to speak that no one could impute to him either the idea of two Christs or the introduction of a fourth person into the Trinity. And so, in regard to this basically outdated confrontation, he had at hand the anti-Nestorian concern of the fifth century and the anti-Apollinarist concern of the fourth. Indeed, he could even expound results of the purely theological development of the Vandals, not supported by ecclesiastical definition, as necessary for salvation. This was true especially of Augustine's psyschological analogy of the Trinity, which in him is found as memoria—intelligentia (respectively cogitatio or verbum)—voluntas.[52] For example, he declared[53] against Fabian that whoever later wanted to learn the truth of the Creator himself now had to look at the picture of the Creator in the mirror of created man; through this faith one could ascent to the sight. But Fulgentius did not stop with Augustine: in some Christological questions he went far beyond him. For Augustine, the soul of the Redeemer was, as it were, the connecting link between his divinity and his humanity, so that at the moment of his death the divinity remained united only with the soul, but not with the body.[54] Fulgentius, on the contrary, repeatedly stressed the idea that the divinity of Christ remained united with the body at his death; hence at least in this point he was influenced by eastern Christology,[55] for the first to express himself clearly in this sense seems to have been Gregory of Nyssa.[56] Fulgentius championed his doctrine[57] probably not only to stress the omnipresence of the supernatural nature of Christ and from there to prove its divinity, but also to expound its incapacity to suffer, which for the anti-Nicene Germans was always unacceptable: in the biblical accounts of the Passion they found the proof of the inferior divinity of Christ.[58] Fulgentius developed at least an elementary psychology of Jesus: It was of his human soul that it was said it did not yet know the good and the evil; of it was said that it grew in wisdom and grace.[59] In this too appeared the significant progress of the Nicene position in relation to the Arian dispute of the fourth century. Even more it was the result of the Catholic Trinitarian theology, that had meanwhile become common property, that Fulgentius attributed all appearances and all supernatural effects to the entire Trinity and thus merged the divine persons to such a degree that their invocation became indistinguishable. Against the argument of the anti-Nicene Fabian, that the "Our Father" is addressed to the Father alone and the sacrifice of the Church is offered to the Father alone, hence Son and Spirit are of a lower rank, Fulgentius reacted decisively and maintained that not only the "Our Father" but also the sacrifice of the Church are directed to the entire Trinity;[60] the same applies to the prayer of the prophets; the Father alone was named so that the danger of polytheism could be avoided;[61] because the Trinity is only one substance and effects our salvation in inseparable power and goodness, it is invoked together, even under the Father's name.[62] If Fulgentius rejects the view that Exodus 3:14f. refers to the person of the Father alone, and immutable being is attributed to him alone, with the argument that it would follow from this that the Father had appeared,[63] then this sounds archaic and recalls the ideas of the apologists[64] and the pre-Nicene theology in general. Hence it was expected that the appearance would be attributed to the Son, and Fulgentius thus interprets the divine appearance: God made himself visible by means of a creatura subiecta; hence Exodus 3:14 must refer to the entire Trinity.[65] Of course, Fulgentius still knew that some (aliquanti, apparently not only anti-Nicenes) referred to the revelations of God in the Old Testament and the coming down of God to the Son:[66] but the future did not belong to this interpretation.

---

[47] Schanz, op. cit. IV, 2, 595.

[48] Bertolini, Settimane . . . VII, 479.

[49] Bognetti, Settimane . . . VII, 429.

[50] Cf. supra, pp. 47ff.

[51] Ad Trasam. III, 2, 1.

---

[52] Contra Fast. CChr 91, nos. 643, 697, 774.
[53] Fragm. 18, 4–6.
[54] Grillmeier, op. cit. 325f., 391f.
[55] Ibid., 283.
[56] Antirrheticus, c, XVII.
[57] Ad Trasam. III, 1 and 3; 30 and 31; Contra Fastidiosum 20, 4 and passim.
[58] Cf. Ad Trasam. III, 19.
[59] Ibid. 1, 8, 2, and III, 16, 4.
[60] Fragm. 31 and 34 against Fabian.

The opponents of Fulgentius also, even though they appealed to the Council of Seleucia–Rimini, did not entirely stop in the first phase of the theological discussion of the Trinity, but included the question of the Holy Spirit with it. Fabian, for example, regarded the Holy Spirit as a subordinate essence of lesser rank, because one did not pray for his coming but that he be sent.[67] Hence here an argument from the prayer practice of the Church was opposed to the argument from the baptismal form, usual on the Catholic side, for the divinity of the Holy Spirit. The sending of the Holy Spirit, however, according to Fulgentius, could not be compared to the sending of the angels, as Fabian did it;[68] the Spirit is regarded rather as sent by Father and Son for this reason[69] that he proceeds from the Father and the Son, a patre filioque procedit.[70] Hence the later disputed Filioque had at least an anti-Arian root. But the procession gives to the Holy Spirit an entirely special rank. While essence of begotten or born can be transmitted from the one Son to the many adoptive sons, procession applies only to the Holy Spirit and cannot be stated of any creature.[71] Fabian had appealed for the lesser divinity of the Son to this, that man was created according to his image, hence according to that of the Son. But Fulgentius insisted that man is an image of the entire Trinity.[72] Without quoting the Augustinian analogy of the Trinity, he betrayed how very much he was dependent on it in this passage. But this meant, on the one hand, that only the intellectual part of human nature is understood as the image of God, namely memory—understanding—love, as representation of Father, Word, and Spirit, and, on the other hand, that, without this being intended, the relation of God to man is no longer a personal relation but appears as a natural reflection. Each has considerable consequences for Christian morality and piety in so far as, on the one side, the entire Trinity is, as the one substance, the one addressed in prayer and sacrifice,[73] and, on the other side, no positive importance can any longer be assigned to sexuality, for example.[74] Of course, the ideas of Fulgentius and of the other Catholic defenders of Nicaea were not so much pushed in this direction by original hostility to the body as rather by the insight that all statements about God can be made only in analogy. On the contrary, the opponents of Nicaea wished to imagine the divine as they imagined the human.[75] Indeed, Fulgentius blamed them for expressing thoughts of flesh and blood, which cannot inherit the Kingdom of God (cf. 1 Cor. 15:50). Such argumentation no doubt made an impression, but it confused the requirement which must be placed on philosohical thought with the New Testament requirement of penance and conversion.

---

[61] Ibid. 29, 18 and 19.

[62] Fragm. 30, 5.

[63] Ad Trasam. III, 10, 3.

[64] Cf. for example, Justin, First Apology 63, 10ff.

[65] Ad Trasam. III, 11, 1.

[66] Ibid. II, 10, 2.

[67] Cf. Fragm. 29, 14, against Fabian.

[68] Fragm. 28, 1.

[69] Fragm. 29, 18.

[70] Fragm. 19, 18 and passim, 27, 7.

[71] Fragm. 27, 8.

To the former Catholic monk, then Arian priest Fastidiosus, who thought that it would follow from the indivisibility of the Trinity that it had been born together, suffered together, and so forth,[76] Fulgentius replied with the aid of Chalcedonian Christology: Just as in Christ there are not two persons, although the special character of each of the two natures persists, so too the assumption of human nature was not common to the entire Trinity.[77] In this connection attention must be directed to a significant weakness of Fulgentius's theology, which clearly called for compensation. Although the unity of the person of the Redeemer was for Fulgentius an established theological possession, just as the duality of natures, it must be stated that he had no concept of person in the sense of personality, but understood persona almost as something natural: God suffered in the Man, because the person of God and of the Man is only one; God did not suffer with the Man, because the substance of God and of Man is not blended in the one Christ.[78] Because of the unity of the person, Scripture attributes suffering to the Son of God, but the divinity of Christ itself, which suffered for us according to the flesh, must be regarded as immortal and incapable of suffering.[79] Hence not the person is the subject, but the divinity of Christ. Finally, Fulgentius could even draw a parallel between the person-unity of God and Man in Christ, which signifies suffering and resurrection of the Son of God, with the nature-unity of Father and Son, in consequence of which the sacrifice of the Son by the Father is at the same time a self-sacrifice of the Son.[80] If, however, he says that both priest and also sacrificial gift are accomplishments and names of Christ's human nature[81] or the total Man offered himself or employed his soul respectively,[82] then the humanity in the Redeemer appears almost as an autonomous subject alongside the divinity of Christ. Thus Fulgentius comes suspiciously close to Nestorianism, because he lacks Cyril of Alexandria's doctrine of appropriation, that the Son of God made the flesh his very own with all its sufferings, and he also thought that in the anti-Arian opposition he had to insist that the entire Trinity is the subject of the sacrifice. Nevertheless, he there succeeded, where he renounced the concepts of nature and person, in expressing himself not only as authentically Cyrillan but as completely orthodox in the sense of the Universal Church, by employing the slogan of Cyril, "one and the same," adopted by Chalcedon. One and the same Christ experienced in the humanity what was of man, but in the divinity he remained incapable of suffering and immortal.[83]

---

[72] Fragm. 21, 3.

[73] Cf. supra, p. 718.

[74] Cf. doctrine of original sin, infra, p. 724.

[75] Cogitare divina sicut cogitat humana: Fragm. 28, 16, against Fabian.

[76] Sermo Fast., no. 4.

[77] Contra Fast., no. 12. Diesner (Fulgentius, 54) finds the invectives of Fulgentius against Fastidiosus merely painful. He probably understood them as expression of the conviction frequently expressed in the struggle against heretics, that heretics are morally inferior. Fulgentius's claim that the monk and priest Fastidiosus had fallen into impurity and had lived in it for two years and regarded himself as fortunate until he died apparently pretty early (Contra Fast., 21, 1, and 22, 1) seems to show a knowledge of the facts. Perhaps there was question here of a monk who among other things had gone over to "Arianism" in order to marry and still remain a priest. Thus this case belongs to the history of celibacy; on the other hand, it makes clear that the Catholics had to do not only with Vandals who spoke Latin poorly but also with converted Latins.

The discussion of the idea that Christ suffered in his supernatural nature[84] led Fulgentius to claim that Christ assumed a rational soul with its passiones for the purpose of freeing our souls from all passiones.[85]

---

[78] Ad Trasam III, 18, 3.

[79] Ibid. III, 27, 2.

[80] Ibid. III, 32, 2.

[81] Ibid. III, 30, 5.

[82] Ibid. III, 18, 1.

[83] Ibid. III, 28, 3.

[84] Ibid. III, 19.

[85] Ibid. 21, 1.

There redemption is interpreted very one-sidedly, more Stoically than biblically. Hence the biblicism of the Arians evoked in the Catholics a moving away from the Bible in the direction of philosophical positions. This also operated exactly as one-sidedness in the theology of the Trinity. While the Nicenes of Serdica in 343 had still conceded that the Father is greater than the Son precisely on the basis of the name of Father, for Fulgentius the Son is subordinate to the Father only as the Incarnate One;[86] indeed, the Father must not even be placed before the Son.[87] Thus anti-Arianism led to the complete leveling of the theology of the economy of the Trinity.

A similar one-sidedness can be ascertained in the image of the Church: the true Church is characterized almost only by the faith in a Trinity undivided in substance;[88] the saving faith seems to be only the profession of God one in substance.[89] The proclamation of God's saving work in the historical Jesus moves into the background. For his ecclesiology, Fulgentius relied on Cyprian,[90] but for Cyprian there was outside the Church, the one Mother, absolutely nothing worth recognizing, Christian, endowed with grace. Fulgentius, however, as heir of the Augustinian anti-Donatism, sought the following compromise: The Church as Mother is like Sarah, and the schismatic or heretical communities are to be compared to her maid. The children of the maid could also be saved, if they came to the true Mother; only then is the truth of the paternal seed of use to them, namely, baptism administered validly in heresy.[91] However, it appears there when membership in the Church determines the effectiveness of the true divine gift of grace, when the Church stands above God or at least closer to the feeling of the believer or to the theological thinker. Thus this greatest theologian of the West in the sixth century is a proof of how fateful on the one side was an antiheretical position, especially then when the development of theology had proceeded beyond this controverted point, and on the other side how necessary was the acceptance of the total achievement of the past generations of theologians.

In fact, within Catholic piety and Catholic expressions of faith after the conclusion of the confrontation with the Arianism of the Germans, there are found remnants of this struggle which to a degree last to this day.[92] The Spanish Liturgy especially displayed the effort again and again to stress the equal divinity of Christ and the Holy Spirit. That the language of prayer glides and it is often unclear which divine person is meant seems to be intention rather than carelessness. Something similar, if softened, could be found in the Gallic Liturgy. But the fact that the Spanish Bishop Braulio of Zaragoza (d. 651) spoke of the Creator Christ the Lord[93] has in this connection not received the importance that similar expressions of Gregory the Great have. For example, in his seventh Sermon on Ezekiel 1–3 (no. 2) he called Christ both Judge and Creator; Christ is our Maker (auctor noster, ibid., no. 4); Christ is Maker and Redeemer of the human race (ibid., no. 12); Christ is the Creator of all, even of the angels (ibid., no. 19); Christ is the sublimis Deus, of whom there is mention in Ezekiel (ibid. 8, 2); Christ is the ever active God, who inwardly infuses grace, while outwardly he draws man to himself. Indeed, just where Gregory stressed against Pelagius that we can do any good only on the basis of the Lord's gift (ibid. 9, 2) it was clear that he was thinking of Christ as God. And so his viewpoint, also in this connection, was more strongly anti-Arian than anti-Pelagian. This even appeared when Gregory forbade Bishop Desiderius of Vienne to teach grammar, because praise of Jupiter could not have place together with praise of Christ in one and the same mouth.[94] Hence Gregory instinctively opposed Jupiter, the pagans' supreme god, not to God the Father, but to Christ. Since Gregory, with his letters, homilies, and scriptural exegesis was of such importance for all of medieval devotion, it is not surprising if this outlook was disseminated: the Heliandlied, for example, was entirely influenced by it. Perhaps that custom of our age still simply to call the Crucified One the Lord God—compare "carving of the Lord God," "shrine of the Lord God"—is a final offshoot of that anti-Arian exertion to stress the divinity of Christ by every means. In any event, it must be affirmed that the Western Church was never so enduringly influenced by any dispute as by the struggle with Arianism. The two controversies still to be treated were rather episodes.

---

[86] Contra Fast., 8, 1.

[87] Nec praeferendus: response: CChr. 91, line 614.

[88] Remiss. peccat. I, 22, 2.

[89] Ibid. I, 21, 7.

[90] Ibid. I, 21, 1.

[91] Ibid. I, 23, 1.2.

The Semipelagian Quarrel

Fulgentius, concerning whom there was detailed mention in the framework of the dispute with Arianism,[95] was also the one who completed the Augustinian doctrine of grace. With a view to the so-called Semipelagians, that is, those theologians such as the monk John Cassian and Bishop Faustus of Riez in southern Gaul, who had understood man's desire for salvation as the achievement of his own will and predestination simply as the result of God's foreknowledge, and whose view had prevailed at Gallic synods after 470, Fulgentius defended Augustine by pushing his doctrine to its most extreme consequences even if he did not overstate it. In Augustine are found contradictions, but not in Fulgentius. Augustine corrected himself several times—in his sermons he frequently withdrew, even quite far, from the theses which he upheld in his polemics. Fulgentius, however, came with inexorable logic, without letting himself relent through any sort of consideration, to the following chief doctrines.

---

[92] Cf. also J. A. Jungmann, "Die Abwehr des germanischen Arianismus und der Umbruch der religiösen Kultur im frühen Mittelalter," Liturgisches Erbe und pastorale Gegenwart (Innsbruck 1960) 3–86, especially 41 and 52ff.

[93] Ep. 20, cf. Jungmann, op. cit., 41f., notes 40 and 41.

[94] Reg. Epp. XI, 34. The study of grammar was actually not possible without the study of ancient pagan texts, always religiously colored.

[95] See supra, p. 716.

The guilt of our first parents was transmitted through procreation.[96] All men are unworthy of salvation and sentenced to damnation.[97] The free will is fundamentally incapable of turning itself to the good.[98] The grace of God is absolutely necessary to begin every meritorious work, to continue it, to bring it to a good end.[99] The grace of God is absolutely unearned, all are undeserving of it, it is granted to men through pure mercy and in accord with God's discretion.[100] God does not look at the future works of men to predestine them for heaven,[101] but only to predestine them for eternal punishment.[102] God's salvific will is universal (1 Tim. 2:4) only in so far as men are selected from all nations, all classes, and all ages.[103] Children dying without baptism are condemned to eternal punishments.[104] When it was objected to him that not only is baptism necessary for salvation, but also the eating and drinking of the Lord's body and blood, Fulgentius could thus interpret the reception of the Eucharist: Because all Christians are the one body of the Lord, one participates in this body at the moment when one is added to it, that is, baptized.[105] Hence baptism bestows all that is the content of the Eucharist.

For the rest, it is not the sacrament of baptism as such which grants deliverance from sin, but children are freed by means of the profession of others, since they are also bound by the chain of the unrighteousness of others. They are cleansed when others utter the spirit-filled profession, since they are also tainted by the carnal intercourse of others.[106] Hence, because children are destined by the agency of others for condemnation in a twofold manner—through the origin and the transmission of sin—they can also be externally destined for salvation through the faith and the profession of others. Hence, on the one hand, the sacrament is here spiritualized and made relative, and, on the other hand, carnalis concubitus and spiritualis affectus are as equally contrasted as spirit (=grace) and flesh (=sexuality) are directly natural contrasts. This impression is confirmed if the original sin of man is understood as the loss of the soul's health (animae sanitas) or of the garment of faith (vestimentum fidei), so that carnal desires inflict wounds on man.[107] It seems to be forgotten here that the sin of Adam consisted in the wish to be like God, not that the flesh gained the upper hand. But this is not the only one-sidedness which can be ascertained in this great disciple and executor of the testament of Augustine. He interpreted the redemption so consistently as a new creation that man could contribute nothing at all to it,[108] and God's salvific action had to precede in time every act proper to man. This constraint in the time-scheme and this clearly natural, indeed material, understanding of the power of sin and the grace of redemption did not facilitate an agreement with the opponents of such an excessively consistent Augustinianism; these doctrines were not then adopted unreservedly by the Universal Church, although Fulgentius was regarded in the whole of Christendom as the expert in the theology of grace, and people applied to him from Constantinople itself.[109]

---

[96] Verit. praedest. I, 4.5.

[97] Ibid. 7.

[98] Ibid. II, 5.

[99] Ibid. II, 13.

[100] De fide 33 and 34.

[101] Verit. praedest. III, 4.5.

[102] Ad Monimum I, 24.

[103] Verit. praedest. III, 15.

[104] De fide 70. On the whole: G. G. Lapeyre, St. Fulgence de Ruspe (Paris 1929), 271f.

[105] Ep. 12, 24, ad Ferrandum.

Fulgentius maintained that the eternal punishment of sinners was fair because they did not even wish to stop sinning, indeed they took more pleasure in the sin than in life;[110] however, he also regarded it as freely decided by God that pardon took place only here on earth, and thereafter only punishment; God could have decided otherwise, but he did not wish to.[111] The eternity of the punishment seemed to Fulgentius to be such a concern that it falsified his exegesis. Thus for him the sentence from the Sermon on the Mount, "You will not come out until you have paid the last penny" (Matt. 5:26), curiously became a proof for the unending pains of hell.[112] The fact that he so understood the resurrec-

[106] Ibid. 12, 18.
[107] Ep. 17, 26.
[108] Ibid. 17, 39.
[109] Cf. Epp. 16 and 17.
[110] Remiss. peccat. II, XXI, 3.
[111] Ibid. II, XX, 2.
[112] Ibid. II, V, 1.

tion of the dead that only the just acquired a transformed and transfigured body, while sinners, on the contrary, received a perishable one, capable of suffering,[113] was of course not his fault but the fault of the textual development, which had turned 1 Corinthians 15:51, "We will not all fall asleep, but all will be changed" into "We will all indeed rise, but not all will be changed."

As much as the emphasizing of grace and hence of the all-causality of God served to make man humble and take from him all pride, for example for ascetical achievements, so too, an unprecedented claim to authority could flow precisely from this. Thus Fulgentius declared that he intended to write to Euthymius in regard to the forgiveness of sins whatever God suggested to him; it is then necessary for salvation to say that exactly; but then the addressee must accept it.[114] But at least equally dangerous is the plain application of the doctrine of predestination to one's own experience, especially if it went hand-in-hand with antiheretical polemic. Thus it is said in Fulgentius's biography (XXI, 46), which came from one of his pupils and displayed his spirit, that the Arian Vandal King Thrasamund did not let himself be convinced by Fulgentius, because "he was not predestined to salvation." Later Gregory of Tours distinguished according to this standard between Arian Goths and Catholic Franks and regarded the possession of Gaul as proof of the divine favor for the Franks.[115] As much as the intervention of Fulgentius on behalf of the Augustinian theology of grace was a necessary reply to Semipelagianism, which had again established all of salvation, with the initium fidei as its basis, on the will of man itself, just as little could this theology be the last word in the question. The Universal Church followed Fulgentius less than Gregory the Great, or, at first, Caesarius of Arles respectively.

Caesarius of Arles, the somewhat younger contemporary of Fulgentius, had, in the conflict with Semipelagianism, not thought so one-sidedly of Augustine's doctrine as final, but, so to speak, had reduced it to the degree generally tolerable to the Church. Since the condemnation of Pelagius, it was the conviction of the entire Church that God's grace is necessary for every meritorious work. But it seemed, especially to some monastic circles, not only in Africa but also in southern Gaul, that human free will was abolished by Augustine's doctrine; by means of the theology of Fulgentius, such suspicions were even strengthened. Freedom seemed to be maintained only if at least the beginning of conversion, the first step to faith, was understood as the accomplishment of the human will itself. Even if especially Bishop Faustus of Riez, who had earlier been a monk on the island of Lérins, had expressed himself in this sense as early as the fifth century, this so-called Semipelagianism must still not be regarded as the characteristic attitude of mind of the island monastery, for Caesarius, who helped Augustine to victory against Semipelagianism, remained to the end of his life entirely under the stamp of Lérins. Of course we do not have from Caesarius a theological treatment of the problem, as we do from Fulgentius. But the expressions frequently coming from his pen, such as "with God's help" or "if the Lord grants it," make known that, like Augustine, he was convinced of the necessity of God's grace for beginning, continuing, and completing every good work.[116] To the hearers of his sermons Caesarius did not appear to suggest any Pelagian or Semipelagian errors; in any event, he rather saw himself compelled to take a stand against those who denied the freedom of the human will, Manichaeans and astrologers (Mathematici).[117] The will was so important for him because it could directly substitute for the external good work: fasting and almsgiving are doubly good; almsgiving alone is meritorious; fasting alone, without alms, is not meritorious, because it is, as it were, only a form of thrift, that is, of concern for self. But to one who has nothing at all from which he can give alms good will suffices, that is: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will." Sermon 199, in which these statements are found (Chapter 2), was regarded as the most widely read of all Caesarius's sermons, and this fact was surely no mere accident. It is shown in this, that the popular preaching tended rather to moralize than that the height of the Augustinian theology of grace could maintain itself. True, Augustine refers the words from the angelic hymn of Luke 2:14, which characteristically do not appear in his early anti-Pelagian writings, to the human will in the work On Grace and Free Will (2,4), but he there understood them entirely as the gift of God, not as the least achievement of man, as Caesarius did. Caesarius took pains to rework, in the Augustinian sense,[118] the material for his sermons, which he took wherever he found it, for example, in Faustus of Riez or in the collected sermons of the so-called Eusebius Gallicanus, but there still remained in his model sermons expressions such as would probably never have come from Augustine's lips. Our God feeds (pascitur) not on the abundance of alms but on the good will (benevolentia) of the giver, appears in Sermo 197, 4, which depended extensively on Faustus; indeed, Caesarius could even so express himself as though man had to care quite alone for his eternal salvation. In Sermo 198, 2, he indeed said that the soul is fed by the food of the Word of God, but he then explained: "If we each year fill barns, granaries, and cellars so that our body may have food for a year, how much must we then lay aside so that our soul may have suppport for eternity."

---

[113] Ibid. II, XI and XII, and De fide 37 and 72.

[114] Remiss. peccat. I, III, 1.

[115] Gregory of Tours, Hist. II, 37.

---

[116] Delage, SChr 175 (1970), 192f.

[117] Ibid., 145.

[118] Cf. ibid., 109, note 2.

In the discussion with his colleagues, Caesarius put the accent differently. At the Synod of Valence in 528 he was attacked because of his standing up in principle for Augustine. It was characteristic of him that he did not compose a polemic against this Synod but turned to the Roman See. "A few (pauca) chapters" came from there as his answer, which he himself designated as extracts from Holy Scripture made by the Fathers.[119] Caesarius submitted them to a synod of his suffragans at Orange in July 529, which adopted them as their own. In regard to form, these capitula appeared with surprisingly little claim to authority. True, the first eight, which deal with original sin (1 and 2) and grace (3 to 8), are presented in the form of canons, beginning with "if anyone . . .," but they do not end with anathemas but with judgments such as: "contradicts the Prophet Isaiah" or "resists the Holy Spirit." It was the two chief errors of Pelagius—that only the body of man, not also the soul, was injured by sin, and Adam hurt only himself, not his posterity—that were shown to be contrary to Scripture. Then there was question principally of expounding that God does not await the decision of the human will for the good, that he not only increases faith but also grants the initium fidei, indeed even the devout desire for faith (canon 5); that his grace precedes every good human impulse (canon 6); that the nature of man, of itself, with the enlightenment and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, is capable of no good work deserving of salvation (canon 7). Hence here was made a sharp separation between every supernatural salvific activity and every natural thing unimportant for salvation. And this is true not only of a part of men, so that some would be saved only by grace, others by the decision of their own will, but of all (canon 8).

Canons 9–25 present extracts from the propositions from the works of Augustine that had been collected by Prosper of Aquitaine. In some passages the harmony is not perfect, but essential modification probably cannot be established. The choice is, of course, characteristic; there is found no single expression on predestination or on perseverance in good. Of course, this is not due to Caesarius but probably to that Roman cleric who had made the selection from the Augustinian florilegium. Nevertheless, this selection agrees with the views of

---

[119] Denzinger–Schönmetzer, 370ff.

Caesarius. In any event, he emphatically stressed in his accompanying letter the necessity of the prevenient divine grace and the incapacity of human nature to acquire salvation of itself.[120] It was his desire to stress, however, that with the aid of Christ's grace the faithful should and could fulfill what was necessary for the soul's salvation. He came to speak of predestination only in the sense that he angrily rejected the idea that some are predestined by the divine omnipotence to evil. Of course, neither Augustine nor his overly consistent pupil Fulgentius had claimed that. The question to what extent predestination may and must be spoken of was not answered by the Second Council of Orange. Besides, even though Caesarius had requested and obtained from Pope Boniface II an express confirmation, in which divine grace, preceding every good work, was again emphasized,[121] it very soon fell into oblivion and was not again brought to light until the discussions of the Council of Trent. But Gregory the Great followed Augustine, on whom he extensively depended, only so far as did the Council of Orange, and thus showed that the Roman tradition, as whose expression it must be understood, had maintained itself.[122]

The Quarrel over the Three Chapters

The decree by which the Emperor Justinian I condemned Theodore of Mopsuestia, the anti-Cyrillan writings of Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and the letter of Ibas to Mari[123] evoked a powerful rejection in the entire Western Church. The sharpest and most detailed repudiation of the imperial decree was the work of the African Bishop Facundus of Hermiane in his Defense of the Three Chapters. Although he was clear as to the authorship, he declared that he did not wish to regard Justinian as the author, because in it he discovered a contradiction of the faith already professed by the Emperor. Indeed, in accord with 1 Peter 2:17, one must fear God and honor the king. Thus, out of fear of God, he would refute what contradicted the Church of Christ but, out of honor for the king, not charge to the king the views he had to combat but charge them to the Eutychians, who had merely used the awe-inspiring imperial name (terror personae).[124]

Facundus knew he was in agreement with Justinian in this, that on the one hand one must profess as a definition against both Nestorians and Eutychians that one of the Trinity was crucified for us, and on the other hand that Mary is truly and really called Mother of God. But it must still be added—he apparently missed this in Justinian—that the same Lord Jesus Christ exists in two natures, that is, that divinity and humanity are not diminished in him.[125] True, Facundus occupied himself essentially with questions of form in order to show that the Three Chapters should not have been condemned, but he also offered a few noteworthy reflections of theological content. Thus in John 1:14 he found an adequate scriptural argument against Nestorians as well as Eutychians and their Apollinarist ancestors: "The Word became flesh" designated the one person, because the same one, who is God-Word, became Man; "he dwelt among us" shows that the two natures remain, because another is the one that indwells, and another is the one that serves as the dwelling.[126] Despite this Johannine perspective, Facundus declared that one comes through the humanity of Christ to the knowledge of his divinity,[127] and thereby expressed a basic rule always valid for theology and faith, even if often not sufficiently observed.

---

[120] Ibid., 396.
[121] Ibid., 398.
[122] Cf. infra, p. 748.
[123] Cf. supra, p. 450.
[124] Defens. II, 1, 3.

Facundus did not think that the Eutychians would really return to the communion of the Church when the Three Chapters had been condemned.[128] The attack on the Three Chapters would not succeed in freeing Chalcedon from the charge of pro-Nestorianism and thus make it acceptable to the Eutychians, but only in burdening it and fighting it. If it was a question of the defense of Cyril, then people would also have to attack, for example, Isidore of Pelusium and Gennadius of Constantinople and others, who had expressed themselves harshly in regard to Cyril.[129] Later the subsequent Pope Pelagius I also adopted this idea in his work, likewise called Defense of the Three Chapters, composed while he was still a deacon. He followed Facundus also in this argument: if praise of Cyril were the sole criterion of Orthodoxy, then the Eutychians would have to be considered orthodox.[130] But in his argumentation Facundus surely went too far when he claimed that the letter of Ibas should not now be condemned because it had been approved at Chalcedon. No synodal verdict was issued at Chalcedon on this letter any more than on the works of Theodoret, but there was question there of the person of the two bishops just mentioned, namely, whether they might be recognized as full participants in the synod and retain their episcopal sees.[131] Later it was declared on the part of Rome, in order to [125] Ibid. I, 2, 15, 16.

[126] Ibid. VI, 4, 1–3.

[127] Ibid. VII, 7, 6.

[128] Ibid. I, 2, 6–8.

[129] Ibid. II, 1, 2; II, 4, 1ff. and 12ff.

[130] Ibid. VI, 2, 2ff.

[131] Cf. Duchesne, op. cit., 224f.

reconcile the Fifth Council with that of Chalcedon, that at Chalcedon there was question of the sessions of an ecumenical council only to the sixth session inclusively, hence only so long as the imperial commissioners supervised the agenda; the rest, in which Theodoret and Ibas had been rehabilitated, were not binding and were also not approved by Pope Leo.[132]

One will perhaps not agree with Facundus, but still show a certain admiration for the keenness of mind with which he defended the letter of Ibas. Since Ibas attacked Cyril only because of an Apollinarist opinion imputed to him, but then praised him because of his alleged conversion from Apollinarist error, a condemnation of the letter of Ibas means nothing more than subsequently to make Cyril a Nestorian.[133] In the case of Facundus, as of almost all opponents of the Second Council of Constantinople and moreover of the opponents of the Three Chapters—later theology has to a great extent adopted this simple legacy—a defect in historical reflection must be ascertained, when he wanted, for example, to defend Theodore of Mopsuestia with the allusion that he had been praised by such orthodox teachers as John Chrysostom and Gregory Nazianzen:[134] Theodore outlived both of them long enough to have been able to fall into serious errors. On the other hand, one insight of Facundus is perhaps still helpful today: the Church Fathers, who illuminated us like heavenly lights, often suffered eclipses exactly like these, namely, when they had controversies among themselves which we cannot understand and approve.[135]

That Facundus, however, toward the end of his work,[136] tried to reduce ad absurdum the strivings for union as they were being pushed in the East, especially by the Emperor Zeno, by the fact that he declared that where one God is, there can be only one Church and not, for example, different communities of the same Church, may indeed seem logical, but it causes one to suspect an inflexibility in the discussions, which then brought no honor to the Christian name in the course of Church history. Facundus himself in fact remained inexorably consistent; Pope Pelagius, on the contrary, who as a deacon had definitely championed the Three Chapters, but then had probably realized that Chalcedon had not been denigrated by the Council of 553, perhaps also by the hint that he was the only one under consideration as a successor for Vigilius, had been moved to a change of position,[137] but had to let himself be reviled by the irreconcilable Africans, especially by Facundus, as nekrodioktes—persecutor of the dead—because he had accepted the condemnation of the long dead Theodore of Mopsuestia. In this connection, Pelagius in his great profession of faith, which he made on his assumption of office at Rome, passed over Theodore in silence but expressly defended the persons of Theodoret and Ibas.

---

[132] Thus in a letter probably of the deacon Gregory, the future Pope, to Bishop Elias of Aquileia: Reg. Epp., Appendix III, 1; MGEp II, 463.

[133] Defens. VI, 4, 13–15.

[134] Ibid. VII, 7, 21ff. and 28ff.

[135] Ibid. VI, 5, 32, 33.

[136] Ibid. XII, 4, 18.

Most strongly compromised was, of course, the memory of Pope Vigilius. Occasionally he incurred a plain damnatio memoriae, even there where his papal decisions remained in force. Thus the First Council of Braga in Galicia of 561 appealed four times to the letter of Vigilius to Profuturus of Braga in canons 4 and 5, but without mentioning Vigilius by name, although it otherwise cited all papal decrees by the name of the author.[138]

The most significant theological achievement in the quarrel over the Three Chapters, important even for posterity, was produced by the Roman deacon Rusticus, nephew of Vigilius. He was deposed and excommunicated by the latter because of his obstinate championship of the Three Chapters, that is, because of his opposition to recognizing the Fifth Council as ecumenical, but he found refuge in a monastery of the Acemetae at Constantinople. There he compiled the Latin collection of the acts of the Council of Ephesus, which was to serve not only the purposes of documentation but as an argument in the theological debate. He himself intervened in this with great energy and deep professional knowledge. True, his work on the definitions, which he himself mentions,[139] is lost, but the chief outcome seems to have been included in the extant disputation against the Acephalae. In it[140] Rusticus offered the results of the theological discussions which he had conducted at Constantinople, at Antinoë in the Thebaid, and at Alexandria. He showed himself in these discussions to be well acquainted with the Aristotelian philosophy and with real skill developed the theological speculative argument which Boethius had made important.[141] In the theology of the Trinity, it is true, he displayed a greater obligation to eastern thought than to that of Augustine and Boethius by basing the Trinity of the divine persons not so much on relations as rather on proprietates;[142] but in Christology he relied on Boethius's definition of person and at the same time carried it farther. "Person" was for him not the individual substance endowed with reason, but the rational individual subsistence. In this regard he seemed to be aware that person could not be defined in opposition to nature but could at most be described. Thus the person is the coming together, concursus, of all that describes the rationally endowed subsistence.[143]

---

[137] Duchesne, op. cit., 228.

[138] Cf. Schäferdiek, op. cit., 125f.

[139] PL 67, 1238B.

[140] Cf. Praefatio, PL 67, 1170B.

[141] Cf. infra, pp. 736 and 738.

[142] PL 67, 1237C.

Surely the individual human nature of the Redeemer, considered purely in itself, that is, apart from his divinity, could appear as a person; however, the true reality does not lead to such a view, but rather to the intellectual defect, namely the forgetting of the union, that is, of divinity and humanity in Christ. But at the moment when the spirit is reminded that that which is Man in the Redeemer did not, so to speak, remain in itself, but through the union became the special property of the subsistence of God the Word, he can no longer be regarded as a person.[144] Here, while Cyril's name does not appear, his doctrine of appropriation is employed. Thus Rusticus can further declare that the humanity of the Redeemer does not belong separately to itself, as is the case with us, but is so united with God the Word that it becomes his own just like garment and tool.[145] Consequently the humanity of the Redeemer is not so much itself a subject as rather in a subject. It thereby becomes clear that for Rusticus subsistence means, beyond substantiality, the being of subject. Thus not only was a step taken beyond Boethius and that which was expressed as still missing in him,[146] but even more that Leonine formula was tacitly corrected in which the Word and the flesh of the Redeemer appear as autonomous subjects and which had aroused such anger among the Cyrillans.[147] Here it is clarified also by a Latin theologian; this clarification being gained precisely in the discussion with Cyrillans that the Redeemer is a single subject and not a composite, but that the divine person is to be regarded as the subject of the human nature. Expressed in Aristotelian terms, this means that the humanity of the Redeemer is, in comparison to God the Word, to be understood not as a subject but as an accident.[148]

The fact that Rusticus described the relation between divinity and the humanity in the Redeemer again in analogy to the relation of soul and body in man,[149] as the theology of the fourth century had already done, does not represent a relapse into pre-Ephesus methods of thought, but shows how consistently Rusticus employed the Aristotelian potency-act and matter-form schema respectively and thus at least for a moment anticipated scholastic theology, which then of course, to its own hurt, was based not so much on Rusticus as rather on the less perfect definition of person of Boethius.

---

[143] Ibid. 1238B.

[144] Ibid. 1239AB.

[145] Ibid. D.

[146] See infra, p. 738.

[147] Agit enim utraque forma . . . quod proprium est: Denzinger–Schönmetzer, 294.

[148] PL 67, 1240C, verbatim.

[149] Ibid. 1239D.

Consequences of the Quarrel over the Three Chapters

The quarrel over the Three Chapters produced for the ecclesiastical organization of North Italy much more decisive and enduring consequences than the exemption of the see of Pavia as a consequence of the Arian controversy.[150] On the invasion of Italy by the Lombards in 568, the Bishop of Milan transferred his seat to Genoa, where he felt safer under Byzantine protection; likewise, the Metropolitan of Aquileia fled to imperial territory, namely to the island of Grado. Both metropolitans rejected the Second Council of Constantinople—they defended the Three Chapters.[151] At first the Byzantines apparently took no offense at this. But the Bishop of Milan, since he was dependent on the Sicilian property of his Church, was very quickly induced by the Roman Bishop to recognize the Second Council of Constantinople and to condemn the Three Chapters. This led the bishopric of Como, which really belonged to the ecclesiastical province of Milan, toward the end of the sixth century, to request from Aquileia the ordination of a bishop who upheld the Three Chapters. Como then remained a suffragan of Aquileia into the thirteenth century.[152] In this it became clear that the question of the Three Chapters agitated not only the episcopate but also the clergy and people, at least those of the clergy and people who came into question as electors of a new bishop.

For the Catholic Queen Theodelinda of the still extensively pagan or, respectively, Arian Lombards, it was a matter of course from her Bavarian homeland to recognize the Three Chapters, so that she refused to accept the communion of the Bishop of Milan when she learned that he recognized the Second Council of Constantinople. Thus Gregory the Great saw himself forced to have an admonition sent to her in which he defended the Second Council of Constantinople.[153] The letter, of course, did not reach the Queen's hands; instead, the Bishop of Milan, Constantius, in whose interest, among other things, it was written, held it back because he knew that the Queen would be only more enraged by this defense of the Second Council of Constantinople. Gregory wrote the Queen another admonition,[154] in which there was no mention of the Second Council of Constantinople, and praised Bishop Constantius of Milan for his prudence.[155] Hence Gregory was prepared to overlook the schismatic agreement of Queen Theodelinda with the Three Chapters because he saw in her a strong ally for the conversion of the Lombards to the Catholic faith.[156] He also decisively defended himself against the reproach of having abandoned Chalcedon; rather, he condemned all those who had been condemned by the four Councils and recognized all who had been recognized by them. But when he declared, vis-à-vis the Bishop of Milan, that the Second Council of Constantinople, which was counted by many as the Fifth Synod, had decided nothing on the faith but only on people, about whom nothing had been said at Chalcedon, this was inexact, for the Second Council of Constantinople had very probably discussions at Chalcedon de personis, namely of Theodoret and Ibas.

---

[150] See supra, p. 716.

[151] See supra, pp. 728ff.

[152] Bognetti, Settimane . . . VII, 429.

[153] Reg. Epp. IV, 4.

Gregory proceeded much more decisively against Bishop Severus of Aquileia, who had been detained for a year at Ravenna by the Byzantine Exarch Smaragdus and during this time had maintained communion with the opponents of the Three Chapters, the adherents of the Second Council of Constantinople.[157] The next year he had returned to Grado, where the patriarchate had taken refuge before the Lombards, and at a synod, yielding to the urging of his suffragans, he had repudiated the Second Council of Constantinople. Gregory now ordered him, with his supporters, the bishops who like him had maintained communion at Ravenna with the adherents of the Second Council of Constantinople, to Rome in order to hold there a synod on this question.[158] From the long petitions of the ten suffragans of Aquileia living under Lombard rule to the Emperor Maurice of Byzantium it became evident that Gregory intended to have the Patriarch of Aquileia brought to Rome by police power, in regard to which he of course relied on a decision of the Emperor from the previous year.[159] It appears from the Emperor's command to Gregory[160] that Severus himself and his suffragans who were in Byzantine territory also wrote in the same sense. In this it is remarkable that these bishops did not intend to justify themselves before a synod directed by Gregory because they saw in him their antagonist, while on the other hand they hoped to gain from the Emperor a nonpartisan verdict. In the event that the Emperor did not intervene in their favor, they called to his attention that future episcopal ordinations in the ecclesiastical province of Aquileia would take place with the aid of the Gallic archbishops who were close by; this would then be to the detriment of the Church of Aquileia and to the harm of the res publica, hence of the Roman Empire, because thus far he ruled also churches in barbarian territory by means of the Church of Aquileia. In a pretty rough tone the Emperor commanded Gregory for the time being to leave matters alone until peace had returned to North Italy, until Byzantium had again won the upper hand. But this never happened: there was no victory of Byzantines over Lombards, but there was a change on the throne at Byzantium. Phocas toppled Maurice and exerted himself to solve the question of Aquileia in the sense of Gregory the Great. When Severus had died at Grado as Patriarch of Aquileia in 607, Phocas had Candidian, loyal to Rome, installed as bishop by the Exarch Smaragdus. The outcome was that the bishops in the area of Lombard rule repudiated this new Patriarch at Grado and in Aquileia itself—old Aquileia, as they said—elected an adherent of the Three Chapters, John, who then took his seat as Bishop of Aquileia at Cormons in Friuli; later the seat was transferred to Cividale.[161]

---

[154] Ibid. IV, 33.

[155] Ibid. IV, 37.

[156] Cf. Bognetti, Settimane . . . VII, 496.

[157] Paul the Deacon, Hist. Langob. II, 26.

[158] Reg. Epp. I, 16.

[159] Ibid. I, 16a.

[160] Ibid. I, 16b.

It seemed for a time that an adherent of the Three Chapters had succeeded to the patriarchal see even in Grado, but Pope Honorius I was able, after John's expulsion by the Exarch of Ravenna, to have the Roman subdeacon Primogenius elected and enthroned at Grado. Honorius's tomb inscription thus extols him for the definitive gaining of Grado for Orthodoxy, not for a union of Grado and Aquileia, which in any event had been only an interlude:[162] the patriarchate of Old Aquileia persisted in schism until the end of the seventh century, that is, until the Synod of Pavia in 698. The two patriarchates long remained separate, at least until that of Grado was transferred in the fifteenth century to Venice, where the patriarch had continuously resided since the twelfth century, and that of Aquileia was abolished in the eighteenth century.[163] In all the rest of the Latin Church the opposition to the Second Council of Constantinople gradually died out without there occurring any too important controversies about it.

---

[161] Paul the Deacon, Hist. Langob. IV, 33.

[162] Gaez, ZKG 70 (1959), 131.

[163] Meyer, 12ff.

CHAPTER 44

The Epilogue of Early Christian Latin Literature

The Golden Age of the Fathers came to an end in the Latin West in the fourth century, but the rich treasures of biblical exegesis and the great accomplishments of the Fathers in speculative theology were transmitted beyond the collapse of the ancient world to the Middle Ages. In the period here studied the ideas of the Fathers were reconstructed and rethought, especially by Fulgentius of Ruspe, and their works were collected and again and again copied and used for the care of souls and preaching, especially by Caesarius of Arles. There were far-seeing men of the ancient world who sought to save from the general decline all that was worthwhile; indeed they probably succeeded also, despite their view of what they believed was the approaching end of history, in preparing a new and permanent synthesis of the traditional treasures of faith and thought. Some Christian writers can be named, poets and authors of saints' vitae, but in this chapter after Fulgentius and Caesarius were treated extensively in the discussion of the controversies with the Arians and the Semipelagians, those four great men together with their theological achievement should be exhaustively presented and evaluated on whom all the intellectuality and piety of the Middle Ages was based as on four pedestals: Boethius, Cassiodorus, Gregory the Great, and Isidore of Seville.

Boethius

Boethius, who sprang from the noble Roman house of the Anicii, was at the beginning of the sixth century in the service of the Ostrogothic King Theodoric for several years. In 523 or 524 he was accused of high treason—for conspiring with East Roman circles—and executed. In prison he wrote for his own solace the De Consolatione Philosophiae, which has a thoroughly religious but not clearly Christian content.[1]

Boethius entered the history of the European mind through his translations of Aristotle's works, especially of the works on logic, and the commentaries he composed on them, as one of the great initiators of medieval philosophizing. Compared to the philosophical works, his theological writings are of clearly negligible importance.[2] Nevertheless, they have acquired an extraordinarily great significance for Church history, especially for the history of theology and dogma. Through them Boethius became the founder of the argument from the ratio theologica, which then, scarcely a half-century later, the Roman deacon Rusticus used so skillfully in his fight against the decisions of the Fifth General Council, in his championing of the Three Chapters.[3] In this connection the four works on the Unity of the Trinity, the Three Divine Persons, How Substances Can Be Good, and On the One Person and the Two Natures (in Christ) are rather occasional writings.[4]

---

[1] Cf. also V. Schurr, Trinitätslehre, 3ff.

[2] Not thirty columns in Migne.

Boethius not only dedicated the first to his father-in-law Symmachus and the latter's other son-in-law Patricius, but he submitted it to their judgment. Because he discovered in all other contemporaries only intellectual sluggishness and subtle envy, he deliberately expressed himself concisely and introduced new words from the philosophical disciplines into theology, so that, besides himself and his two addressees, no one could understand the pamphlets, indeed would be scared off from reading them.[5] Boethius was thoroughly aware of presuming something unprecedented, but he relied on the authority of Augustine and wanted also to be gauged by his works. In seven chapters he explained that the divine substance is pure forma, that it is not subject to computation, that Aristotelian predicaments can be applied to God, that in God there must be talk above all of relations, because the names Father and Son express a reciprocal relationship, that finally the unity of God is based on substance, the Trinity on relations.

The three other pamphlets are dedicated to a Roman deacon John, probably the future Pope John I (523–526). Especially important is the treatise On the One Person and the Two Natures against Nestorius and Eutyches. In the introduction, Boethius reminded John that at a council, in which apparently both took part, a letter was read[6] according to which the Eutychians confessed indeed that Christ is of two, but not in two, natures. Because Boethius did not speak at the meeting itself, he had agreed with John on a discussion which, however, both were then prevented from holding, so that Boethius had to write to John what he really had intended to present orally. To this accident the history of theology owes a definition of person, which in Scholasticism enjoyed the highest repute. Since in the controversy with the Nestorians and the Eutychians there was question of person and nature, Boethius first investigated, in Chapter 1, the concepts of nature and person. Nature is not only statically the manner of being proper to everything, but also dynamically the propelling power of the natural movement, motus principium, whereby, for example, fire presses upward and earth presses down. He tried to establish what a person is by exclusion: person cannot be in the accidents, but only in the substance, but likewise neither in nonliving bodies nor in irrational systems of life; besides, a universal idea cannot be a person. To personality, then, belong substantiality, rationality, individuality.[7] And so there results the following definition: persona est naturae rationalis individua substantia (Chapter 3).

---

[3] Cf. Altaner-Stuiber, 7th ed. (1966), 564, and supra, p. 731.

[4] The authenticity of the brief summary of the Christian faith, Tractatus IV, is not certain.

[5] Prooemium.

[6] According to V. Schurr, Trinitätslehre, 108ff., the letter of the Scythian bishops, which is preserved in Mansi VIII, 221–226.

Boethius at once called attention to the fact that he here indicated not the etymology of person but an objective definition[8] of what was meant by hypostasis to the Greeks. But he did not go on to the property of the person; he did not comprehend the idea of subjective being,[9] because he proceeded from the question which natures really had person, hence which considered person as a characteristic of special natures and understood them himself as something natural.[10]

Boethius's definition exercised, to be sure, a strong influence on all succeeding theology, but it provided no single argument for his own confrontation with Nestorius (Chapters 4–7). There person merely is that whose unity is maintained in the duality of natures of the Redeemer. The Christological speculation was only carried further by the definition of person of Leontius of Byzantium—being of itself—and of the earlier mentioned Roman deacon Rusticus, who wrote at Constantinople—remaining in itself.[11]

Especially noteworthy is Boethius's argument that the subordinate Two-Person-Christology of Nestorius did not do justice to the newness (novum), the greatness (magnum), and the singleness (semel) of the coming of the Redeemer. There was earlier intimate relationship of human persons with God; they were even for that reason called Christ. In this regard, Boethius referred generally to the authority of the Old Testament, but without quoting a single scriptural passage. In this it is made clear how with him the theological process of proof freed itself from individual biblical arguments, but nevertheless remained convinced of being in general scriptural.

---

[7] Cf. Grillmeier, LThK V (2nd ed. 1960), 945.

[8] Of course, he offers in other, especially his philosophical works, other definitions, but they are of no interest here. Cf. M. Nedoncelle, RevSR 29 (1955), 201–238.

[9] Grillmeier, loc. cit., VIII (2nd ed. 1963), 291.

[10] Similarly, for example, also his contemporary Fulgentius; see supra, p. 720.

[11] Cf. supra, p. 732.

Cassiodorus

Cassiodorus, who had served as minister of three Ostrogothic kings in Italy, evidence of which is supplied by the edicts and letters of the rulers, the Variae, that came from him because they were formulated by him, in 535 left the service of the Gothic government that was becoming ever more anti-Roman and withdrew to private life. He had agreed with Pope Agapetus I to establish at Rome a theological academy, in which professional teachers should see to it that "on the one hand souls could receive the preaching necessary for salvation and on the other hand the speech of the faithful should obtain the same care and development" as pagan philologists and poets had bestowed on their language, with the difference, of course, that everything that was presented should be "chaste and pure" and hence should be distinguished clearly from the myths and poetry of the pagans. Cassiodorus had been greatly pained that hitherto there was still no scholarly academy for Christian theology in the West, as one had existed earlier in the East at Alexandria and in his day was flourishing in Syrian Edessa.[12] The Roman Church would share in the financing of the new Roman academy, which Cassiodorus himself intended to help pay for to a great extent; but the war, that is, Justinian's reconquest of Italy that had just begun, which led finally to the annihilation of the Ostrogothic Kingdom, prevented the implementation of the project. After the conclusion of the war, Cassiodorus, who had meanwhile spent several years at Constantinople, returned to Italy. Although Justinian now gave new assurances of support to state professors at Rome in an effort to make good the damage done by the war to education,[13] Cassiodorus did not again take up his earlier plan for an academy.

Instead, on his property in South Italy he founded a monastery which he called Vivarium, the center of whose life was represented by the library systematically established by him at great cost. For the monks he wrote two brief introductions to study or reading plans,[14] by which they were to be introduced into the theological and philosophical literature respectively on hand in the library. He was aware that he thereby, on the one hand, entered of necessity upon the post of professor (ad vicem magistri) and that on the other hand his two introductory works could not replace a live college of teachers. Rather, this should be the task of the writings of the Fathers collected in the library, especially of the scriptural exegetes. Since only Latin works were available to his monks, he had pertinent Greek commentaries, of which no Latin translation yet existed, put into Latin and included them in the great commentary. This consisted of nine codices emended by Cassiodorus himself, which contained commentaries on the following parts of Scripture: 1) the Octateuch, 2) the Books of Kings, 3) the Prophets, 4) the Psalter, 5) Solomon, or the Wisdom Books, 6) the Hagiographers, 7) the Gospels, 8) the Epistles, 9) the Acts of the Apostles, and 10) Revelation.[15]

---

[12] Instit. prooemium. That Cassiodorus mentions the School of Nisibis is, according to G. Ludwig (Cassiodor, p. 101), one of the indications that he intended to put his monastery in the line of the Antiochene exegetical and educational tradition, as this was embodied especially by Theodore of Mopsuestia, and hence he sought a certain aloofness from the new religious policy after Constantinople II. L. Duchesne (op. cit., p. 226) sees in the fact that Cassiodorus does not precisely mention Theodore the proof that he did not intend to intervene in burning questions. Of course, then he would have made clear a like aloofness as regards Origen.

[13] Novellae, App. VII, 22; P. Riché, Éducation, 182.

[14] De institutione divinarum literarum (=Inst.), PL 70, 1105–1150, and De artibus ac disciplinis liberalium litterarum (=Art.), ibid., 1149–1220.

Among the exegetes were represented, besides the great Latin Fathers, also Greeks, such as Clement of Alexandria and Origen. At that time there were still no continuous commentaries on some books of the Bible, but only scattered remarks of the great Fathers. Thus in Volume II, that is, on the Books of Kings, and elsewhere, Cassiodorus collected the six questions and answers to Simplician by Augustine and three questions and answers of Jerome to Abundantius. Despite all his efforts, there remained gaps in the commentary. Cassiodorus sought to close them by, among other means, asking the priest Bellator to compose commentaries on various biblical books. But of all that Bellator contributed to Cassiodorus's work of collection—for example, two books on Ruth and the other outstanding women of the Old Testament[16]—nothing has survived. The nine-volume commentary seems not to have been completely copied, but soon to have been lost. In addition to the commentators, Cassiodorus also collected in a special codex works of some of the Fathers that were introductions to the Bible.

In regard to this whole project, his work consisted not only in collecting the patristic texts that appeared to him to be important and helpful, but also in the preparation of a reliable scriptural text, which represented precisely a presupposition for the salvation of souls. The word of the two or three witnesses, by whom each matter can be decided (Matt. 18:16, Deut. 19:15b), which in Origen served as an exegetical principle—a theological statement is to be proved by two or three biblical quotations[17]—became in Cassiodorus[18] the basis of textual criticism: two or three ancient codices guarantee a text.

---

[15] Inst. 1 and 9.

[16] Ibid. 1.

[17] Matth. Com. 10, 15; GCS Origines 10, 18, 29ff.

[18] Inst. 15.

As regards the text of the commentaries, Cassiodorus in no way felt himself obliged to the true maintaining of what had been transmitted; instead, the orthodoxy and the value for edification of a work is the supreme standard. Thus he took care that on the occasion of the translation of the commentaries of Clement of Alexandria all his imprudent (incaute) expressions were suppressed. Cassiodorus was not impressed by the fact that commentary on Paul was circulating under the name of Pope Gelasius but corrected, at least in the commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, all Pelagian errors which he discovered in it.[19] Some texts with which he was not in agreement he let stand as they were but with a corresponding marginal note, especially, for example, in the commentaries of Origen and Tyconius.[20] Cassiodorus also provided the biblical text with punctuation marks, so that it could better be read aloud. He himself revised the nine codices already referred to, but he left others to the work of notaries busy in the monastery. The mere spelling was to him so important for the understanding of the text that even at the age of ninety-three he composed for his monks a work on orthography, at the beginning of which he enumerated his earlier theological writings. The fact that here he began with the commentary on the psalms makes it obvious that he ascribed his work on the soul to an earlier, closed period of his life, to which also belonged his official letters, the Variae.

Although Cassiodorus found light from above in the entire Bible, nevertheless the psalter, the prophets, and the epistles meant the most to him, and at the same time they represented the deepest abysses and the summit of the whole Scripture.[21] He felt beginners in the study of Holy Scriptures should first take up the fourth codex and so become familiar with the psalter.[22] The monk should first fill himself with the reading of Holy Scripture, then apply himself to the commentators.[23]

Theological knowledge is acquired in various ways: first, one should read the introductores, for example, Tyconius and Augustine, then the expositores, in the third place the Catholic teachers who have left question-and-answer literature. Finally one must carefully investigate the entire corpus of patristic literature that has been handed down. But it is not done with reading alone: there is knowledge which comes to the monk only in discussion with an experienced elder.[24] Cassiodorus, it is true, sketched his reading plan for monks according to objective necessities, but the personal uniqueness of the individual must be respected. Thus he recommended to each of the monks to select one of the great Church Fathers, with whom he could engage in an inner dialogue.[25] Cassiodorus hoped that his monks, through zealous study of the great biblical exegetes, would become capable of composing biblical commentaries themselves, so that the passages not yet treated by the Fathers might find their exegesis.[26] He did not surrender the hope of being able to make scripture scholars of all his monks, but he reckoned that some would be capable of no intellectual work at all. They should devote themselves to horticulture, and for them the monastic library had on hand specialized works on that subject.[27]

---

[19] Ibid. 8.

[20] Ibid. 1 and 9.

[21] Ibid., praef.

[22] Inst. 4, and Psalt., praef. 16.

[23] Inst., praef.

[24] Ibid. 10.

The simple man in the monastery, vir simplex, should, however, also come into the enjoyment of some knowledge of profane science and philosophy (mundanae litterae), because they contributed not a little to the understanding of Scripture; this is explained by the fact that, apart from some additions by learned men,[28] they have their origin in Scripture, indeed they were directly stolen from it.[29] Thus, for example, Abraham was the first to bring arithmetic and astronomy to Egypt.[30] Hence the Fathers had recommended the reading of such works, because through them we are diverted from carnal things and led to things which could be grasped only by the heart. And so, abstraction is a means for the cultivating of spirituality. But for speculative theology Cassiodorus did not care: the Fathers interested him only as exegetes.[31]

Cassiodorus did not devote himself to secular knowledge only because he was convinced that it served for the understanding of Scripture, but also because he found its rules and standards employed in Scripture itself; for example, in the book of Job, all the tricks of dialectics. Thus he felt himself to be justified and obliged to leave to his monks also a complete library of the artes and to introduce them into the study of the three linguistic disciplines—grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic—as well as the four mathematical sciences—arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. This second introductory book actually represents a compendium[32] of the accomplishments of ancient scholarship, and became the foundation for the medieval division of the artes into the trivium and quadrivium. The chapter on rhetoric, for example, would still be useful today as an introduction. Of course, it is surprising when Cassiodorus, who in this second introductory work was still addressing his monks, declared that, within the court speech—judicial trials were the chief field of activity for rhetoric—the narrative must begin with the description of the people involved, in which connection the person who belongs to "our side" must be fittingly praised, whereas a person of the opposite side (aliena) must be disparaged.[33] The aged founder of Vivarium probably did not want to teach his monks such; instead, in these sentences one suspects a verbatim quotation from a work which Cassiodorus had in his library and which he excerpted for the introductory work. He seems on the whole, as must probably be inferred from occasional, unjustified repetitions, not always to have remembered the general view and to have simply followed a codex which he then had at hand.

---

[25] Ibid. 17.

[26] Ibid. 26.

[27] Ibid. 28.

[28] Ibid. 21.

[29] Ibid. 27.

[30] Article 2 with reference to Flavius Josephus, Antiq. 1, 9.

[31] Cf. P. Riché, Éducation, 206f. In his commentary on the psalms Cassiodorus summarizes all of ancient Christian education. For him the psalmist is a model for Cicero's Orator. But only the High Middle Ages understood Cassiodorus's formal scholarship, even though Carolingian exegetes had been happy to use him, as Schlieben, pp. 114f., stresses.

It is surprising that this man, who ranks as a great statesman, to whom the politically successful decisions of the Ostrogothic government in Italy are attributed, and to whom, in contrast to the idealist Boethius, a more balanced realistic sense is adjudged,[34] is said to have given to his monastery no constitution and prescribed no daily routine of life. Hence it is not surprising that in Cassiodorus some have sought to find the author of the Regula Magistri. But the fact that Cassiodorus, at the beginning of his last work, the one on orthography, in which he listed his religious and literary achievements, did not mention a monastic rule does not speak in favor of his being the author.

It must especially be stressed that Cassiodorus, in spite of all his preoccupation with ancient scholarship, still placed great value on emphasizing the differences in content and style between Scripture and profane scholarship. After he had concisely summarized Varro's Cosmology, he concluded his introduction to science with the invitation to be content with what Scripture says about the world and man.[35] Indeed, he even meant that the Semiticisms, anthropomorphisms, and translation errors of the Bible were signs of the divine manner of speaking and therefore must not be subjected to the laws of profane language or literary scholarship.[36] Thus, despite all his scholarly strivings, did Cassiodorus justify a fideist-authoritarian attitude, which long dominated the future.

---

[32] P. Riché calls it a digest.

[33] Art. 2, PL 70, 1158C.

[34] Cf. Schneider, 84 and 88.

[35] Art. 7, PL 70, 1218d.

[36] Inst. 15.

Gregory the Great

Gregory the Great, the last of the four great Doctors of the Latin Church, lived in an age which neither required great intellectual achievements—there were no serious theological controversies—nor permitted them: anxiety over a vestige of calm and order, indeed over daily bread for the poor often monopolized the attention of the Roman Bishop. Gregory had to reorganize the administration of all the patrimonies of the Roman See, since these, for the most part in the hands of the local episcopate, had scarcely yielded any returns. He was concerned for the correct use of money; since the coins customary in southern Gaul were not accepted in Italy—they had a lesser gold content—clothes for the poor at Rome had to be bought on the spot and—even in the hardest times Gregory was never only an almoner—young English slaves purchased to serve God in Italian monasteries.[37] Gregory would have deserved his epithet "the Great" entirely from his ecclesiastical-political and practical pastoral accomplishments, but he was not only a practical man. Even his letters gave, where necessary, not only admonition but also clear replies in theological questions. A chambermaid of the Byzantine Empress was not only urged to penance but also instructed that on earth there can be no guarantee of the obtaining of pardon, indeed of salvation at all.[38] In reply to the question whether all encountered by Christ in limbo were redeemed, Gregory relied not only on Filastrius and Augustine, but himself proved from the Bible that only those were redeemed by Christ who had good works to show.[39] Gregory's letters were clearly an inexhaustible mine for bishops and pastors who sought a model, but Gregory influenced the future more powerfully as the theorist of the pastoral office. Soon after the beginning of his pontificate he composed, as had Gregory Nazianzen, his Regula Pastoralis in an effort to show how justified had been his resistance. In the first part he described the suitable candidate for the episcopacy, in the second the lifestyle which the office requires, in the third the necessary differences in preaching, and closed with a brief admonition to humility. When Gregory (I, 5) interpreted the Levirate Marriage (Deut. 25:5ff.) as the episcopal office and in the glorified Christ the dead oldest brother, but relying on Matthew 28:10, saw in the bishop the youngest brother, who must see to producing offspring or let himself be reviled by the wife (the Church), then this was not exegesis in accord with standards current today, but no doubt a suitable means for stimulating seriousness and zeal for pastoral care. Gregory attested and demanded an awareness of responsibility that is almost Donatist in color, when he asked: How can one request from God pardon for others who does not himself know whether he is reconciled with him? (I, 10). When, on the other hand, in Genesis 9:1f. ("fear and dread of you is on all animals") he found the rejection of any ownership of men over their fellowmen and thereby a limit to the blame and punishment necessary in pastoral care (II, 6), one may indeed agree with him in this matter today.

---

[37] Reg. Epp. V, 10.

[38] Ibid. VII, 22.

[39] Ibid. VII, 15.

True, Gregory clearly saw in the bishop the superior, but he stressed that a candid word of a subject was to be regarded precisely as a sign of humble obedience, in any case by a pastor who is not full of self-love (II, 8). That Gregory equated preaching with admonition was probably solely conditioned by the time, but the third part of the Pastoral Rule offered in the enumeration of thirty-four pairs of opposites met in practice—joyful and sad, bold and shy, obstinate and fickle, sinner in act and sinner in thought, those who do evil secretly and do good publicly, those who do good secretly but publicly have a poor reputation, and so forth—such a differentiated description and introduction to exhortation that even today profit can be drawn from them. In them Gregory's view of the bishop as physician of souls holds good; he would have had him understood only as preacher, if such an extensive listing of characteristics were neither necessary nor possible. Thus it is no wonder that the Pastoral Rule was everywhere enthusiastically received, as in Spain, where Gregory had sent it to his friend Leander of Seville, and even in the East, where the Emperor Maurice had it translated into Greek.[40] In the Empire of Charles the Great several synods demanded the reading of the Pastoral Rule by all bishops. In England King Alfred the Great saw to its translation, together with the Dialogues, into Old English at the end of the ninth century and had a copy given to each bishop.[41] It meant for the diocesan clergy what the Regula Benedicti represented for monks.[42] Gregory formed for centuries the bishops who for their part formed the modern nations,[43] and thus he became the great teacher of the West.

In exegesis Gregory is less original. He collected and passed on to the

---

[40] Cf. ibid. XII, 6.

[41] LThK, 2nd ed., I, 334f. (Brechter).

[42] Altaner–Stuiber, 7th ed. (1966), 468.

[43] F. H. Dudden, op. cit. I, 239f.

Middle Ages what the Fathers provided, without of course really intending it, because he was convinced of the approaching end. In this he is surprisingly nearer to Origen than, for example, Augustine and Ambrose, even nearer than Jerome.[44] In his Moralia in Job, a commentary on the book of Job in thirty-five books, in the foreword[45] the distinction of the three senses of Scripture is theoretically explained, and Gregory set out to demonstrate the threefold exegesis, but he did not stick with the three levels which he had so clearly distinguished in Book I; as early as Book IV the historical sense no longer interested him and from Book V the exegesis was only allegorical and moral,[46] although Gregory was convinced that all meaning was lost if one did not take the historical sense seriously.[47] The distinction of the various senses of Scripture could be found in Gregory by future ages, but their order is disputed. Most of the time, Gregory ranked second the allegorical-typical sense, which in part provides information on Christ and in part on the Church, and thus is twofold, and he ranked third[48] the moral sense, that is, the exhortation to action contained in every scriptural word. Thus he used the deeper meaning only to justify the moral claims of the biblical word.

The ultimate goal in the context was action or, within preaching, admonition respectively. But the Bible was for Gregory not only the foundation of the sermon; it should also be read privately; the reader of the Bible is clearly the good man.[49] In the framework of the sermons on Ezekiel[50] the invitation to action seems not to be the highest and last; instead, the Word of God grows with the reader.[51] The demands are only the external of the Bible; its interior, however, offers promises.[52] Whether a person applies himself to the interior of Scripture is not placed fully in the preference of the interpreter; whoever neglects it deprives himself of the most valuable sense of the Word of God,[53] which he owes to his hearers, because only thus does faith gain its fullness.[54] In this regard Gregory was convinced with Origen that Holy Scripture itself compels appropriated exegesis: he counts all images, comparisons, anthropomorphisms, which would today be regarded as the literal sense, as allegorical statements. Thus he intended only to think more consistently, where today scientific exegesis would see an infringement of limits.[55] Nevertheless, he could be very tolerant in the exegesis of Scripture and concede that the one is satisfied with history, which will conduct him in the long run beyond himself,[56] that another seeks the intelligentia typica, finally the third the intelligentia per typum contemplativa, that is, then, advances by means of typology to contemplation without having placed himself more deeply in the moral sense. But Gregory took into account that the way to contemplation leads by way of historia, moralitas, and the intelligentia allegoriae.[57] This passage, which is probably not taken sufficiently seriously by Dudden and Hofmann, makes known that Gregory's piety is oriented not only to asceticism and moral activity but that his basically world-fleeing outlook revolves around the consideration of the eternal, around the vision of the promised good.[58] Morality as the first step to knowledge was generally an ancient philosophical notion and was self-evident to Origen, for example. If Gregory was really a man of antiquity, perhaps the last who speaks to us,[59] then for him morality could not be the highest and last.[60] On the other hand, through this recognition of contemplation, springing from loyalty to the tradition, as the goal striven for in various ways, he protected the intellectual life of the future from having at once to prove itself by usefulness and thus becoming atrophied in pure expedience.[61]

---

[44] D. Hofmann, op. cit., 12.

[45] Dedication to Bishop Leander of Seville, Reg. Epp. V, 53a.

[46] D. Hofmann, op. cit., 12.

[47] In Ezech. 1–3, hom. 3, 4; Moralia 21, 3.

[48] Reg. Epp. V, 53a, 3; Moralia, passim, especially 1–3 and elsewhere; cf. D. Hofmann, op. cit., 44ff.

[49] Reg. Epp. IX, 15.

[50] Twelve on Chapters 1–4, 3; ten on Chapter 40; in addition, there must be mentioned forty shorter festive sermons on the gospel texts, which, however, in their popular character are closer to the Dialogues than to the sermons on Ezekiel, which were delivered on successive days and directed to a religiously educated audience and hence must probably be more highly valued as testimony for Gregory's own view. Cf. V. Recchia, op. cit., 31.

[51] In Ezech. 1–4, hom. 7, 8.

[52] Ibid. 9, 30.

[53] Moralia 21, 1.

But Gregory exercised the widest influence on the future through his Dialogi de vita et miraculis patrum Italicorum, because they were read not only by clerics and monks, as were the Moralia and the Regula Pastoralis, but found their way to the laity.[62] Gregory showed in these artificially arranged stories in dialogue form in four books that not only the East but also Italy displayed ascetics and wonderworkers. Besides Paulinus of Nola and Benedict of Nursia—the latter's deeds fill all of Book II—the heroes are scarcely familiar; thus the Dialogues must be used only very cautiously as historical sources.[63] But in this is expressed not only an early Italian national pride,[64] but also the insight of the pastor and promoter of the mission among the Lombards and Anglo-Saxons that the Word of God is only there highly esteemed where one is influenced by the life of saints.[65] Thus Gregory sent his Dialogues to the Catholic Lombard Queen Theodelinda, in whom he saw his strongest ally for the gaining of this nation.[66]

---

[54] R. Manselli, Settimane . . . X, 81f.

[55] D. Hofmann, op. cit., 38.

[56] In Ezech. 1–4, hom. 10, 1.

[57] Ibid. 7, 10.

[58] Cf. R. Manselli, Settimane . . . X, 85f.

[59] P. Riché, op. cit., 194: Gregory is an ancient in style, in the form of his thought, and in the preference for moralizing examples.

[60] Cf. Ezech. 1–3, hom. 3, 9; 10. 11. 25. 43.

[61] Isidore of Seville adopted from Gregory the threefold steps of the meaning of Scripture, in which in the third and highest place stands the mystical sense (Sententiae 1, 18; Ord. creatur. 10); cf. R. Wasselynck, RThAM 32 (1965), 158.

[62] Cf. G. Dufner, Die Dialoge Gregors d. Gr. im Wandel der Zeiten und Sprachen (Padua 1968).

But Gregory not only narrated the edifying; he also introduced exegetical-dogmatic discussions, for example, on the question of how the saints, despite Romans 11:33 ("how inscrutable are his ways!"), have the knowledge of the divine decrees and express them (II, 16), or where hell is; whether the souls of the damned can be regarded as immortal (IV, 42–44); whether there is a purification in the next world (IV, 25 and 39); how ecclesiastical burial and prayer are of use to the dead (IV, 51ff. and 55). Of course, such questions were not answered purely theoretically or exegetically, but with the aid of examples, visions, and dreams from the lives of saints. The teachings on purgatory and on the expiatory power of the Mass thus found their securest place in Christian piety and from there in theology. That a priest secured eternal rest for a dead person by a week's penance and daily Mass did not influence the future as much as the thirty-days' celebration of Mass ordered by Gregory himself as abbot, by which a monk, who had sinned against poverty, after dying repentant was received into the company of the blessed (IV, 55); only this last usage continues as Gregorian Masses.

Gregory's teaching on penance and purgatory was based on the principle that no sin is forgiven without atonement,[67] and hence was always in the danger of a certain notion of a balance-sheet, but this would of course be eliminated by the fact that the uselessness of external works without love was frequently emphasized.[68] The basis for a certain intellectual imbalance of these doctrines on the last things lies in this, that on the one hand Gregory did not follow even the deeply revered Augustine in everything, and on the other hand, he first formulated views which up to now had prevailed in the Roman Church and thereby fixed them.[69] Gregory's teaching on original sin was entirely in accord with Augustine's: all mankind is collectively responsible for Adam's sin,[70] and children dying unbaptized go to hell.[71] Sexuality is the refuge of sin, desire is already defilement.[72] But in his doctrine of grace Gregory occupied an approximately middle position between Augustine and Semipelagianism: it is true that the gift of grace is the first beginning of conversion,[73] but free will is not only, as in Augustine, the form of grace realizing itself but an agent which must be added to it. Thus Gregory understood[74] Paul's sayings: "by the grace of God I am what I am" and "I have worked more than all" (1 Cor. 15:10). Hence Gregory tacitly dropped the idea of the irresistible grace and unconditional election and saw a certain merit in the assent of the human will to the prompting of grace. That God crowns his gifts when he crowns our merits means for Gregory that the free will acquires merits and finally God even imputes his gifts to man.[75] Gregory arrived at no doctrine of predestination because the idea of praedestinatio post praevisa merita did not suit him.[76] In him strict Augustinianism is limited by the demands of practical moral instruction; but Augustine himself had not remained entirely consistent in his sermons, and many a defender of Augustinianism at the beginning of the fifth century had also not been able to be so.[77] Gregory thus had the same convictions as the Synod of Orange,[78] which was in fact only the expression of the Roman reception of Augustine. It was not known to the Middle Ages, but these obtained their ideas through Gregory. That he bequeathed to the future, besides important stimuli for spirituality and mysticism, also peripheral Christian subjects, has just been mentioned: an Augustinian-inspired feeling of unworthiness justified an intensive cult of the saints,[79] especially then when Christ was seen as the Judge to come.[80] Of course, Gregory did not go so far as to characterize the cult of the saints as an essential part of Christianity, as his somewhat older contemporary, Gregory of Tours, did.[81] Finally, the Devil of the Middle Ages also appeared in that form in which he molested Dominic or Luther quite frequently in Gregory's Dialogues on the Italian Fathers. Thus Gregory passed on not only content to the theology of the future, but an abundance of ideas to the popular imagination and thereby to the plastic art and poetry, especially Dante.[82]

---

[63] G. Dufner, op. cit., 26ff.

[64] Ibid., 23.

[65] In Ezech. 1–3, hom. 10, 37.

[66] Paul the Deacon, Hist. Langob. 4, 5.

[67] Moralia 9, 54; 16, 82.

[68] F. H. Dudden, op. cit. II, 440, many proofs.

---

[69] Ibid. II, 374.

[70] Moralia 24, 7.

[71] Ibid. 9, 32.

[72] Reg. Epp. XI, 56a; Moralia 26, 44; 32, 39, and passim.

[73] Moralia 22, 13; 33, 38, and passim.

[74] Moralia 16, 30; 24, 24.

[75] Moralia 16, 30; cf. F. H. Dudden, op. cit. II, 338.

[76] F. H. Dudden, op. cit. II, 400.

[77] Cf. supra, p. 726.

[78] Cf. supra, p. 728.

[79] Moralia 16, 64.

[80] Hom. in Evgl. 32, 2.

[81] F. H. Dudden, op. cit. II, 371.

Isidore

In the literary work of Isidore, Bishop of Seville from 600, which was impressive only because of its bulk and the abundance of its information, the question of the Three Chapters occupied only a little space, but it was, so to speak, a test question, with the aid of which Isidore's position is easily determined. In Book VI of his great encyclopedia, which treats of ecclesiastical books and duties, he spoke also of conciliar decrees and especially stressed the four synods worthy of veneration, which chiefly comprise the whole faith, without even mentioning a fifth synod. Of course, it need not have been expressly excluded in this way; Gregory the Great also occasionally kept silent about it. In Book VII of the Etymologiae (7, 12, 5), where Isidore speaks of God, the angels, and the orders of believers, he thus explains the title "patriarch": he is a patriarch who has an apostolic see, for example, the one in Rome or in Antioch or in Alexandria. Hence, Constantinople was not recognized as a patriarchate. In Book VIII of the Etymologiae (8, 5, 66) it is said that the Acephalae got their name from this, that no founder could be determined for them, they were opponents of the Three Chalcedonian Chapters, they denied the uniqueness of the two substances in Christ, and recognized only one nature in him. Isidore most clearly expressed himself in his catalogue of authors,[83] in which he expressly vindicated Theodore of Mopsuestia: true, he was condemned by the bishops of the Acephalae at the instigation of the Princeps Justinian, but he was commended by praiseworthy men.[84] Here, therefore, the Council of Constantinople of 553 is designated as a synod of heretical bishops of the Acephalae, that is, of irreconcilable Cyrillans. Thus any possibility of recognition of this Council was basically excluded.

That Justinian is named, not as king, but as princeps, seems not to be meaningless. For Isidore "king" is an honored name: one keeps the name of king only if one acts rightly; one loses it through sin.[85] True, the title of princeps is also an indication of dignity and rank,[86] but "king" (basileus) means very much more, namely, that kings support the people as a foundation.[87] Hence, to Isidore, Justinian seems not to have been such a foundation. Apparently for Isidore whatever is connected with Constantinople did not rank as typical. Here not only theological evaluation but also the fate of Isidore's family became significant, because it was probably expelled by the Byzantines from Cartagena.[88] However, Isidore seemed quite generally to reject the centralized world-empires, hence also the Roman Empire and a fortiori Justinian's work of restoration, for in his book on grammar[89] he said that every people of whom the Romans had taken possession had brought to Rome, together with its treasures, also the blemishes of its language and of its morals.[90] Hence so much that is wicked could never come together in national states as in a universal state.

---

[82] Ibid., 437.

[83] Vir. illust. 4.

[84] Cf. Facundus, supra, p. 730.

[85] Etym. 9, 3, 4.

[86] Ibid. 9, 3, 21.

In some respects Isidore is to be compared with Cassiodorus; but while the latter after his turning to the religious life attributed value only to Jewish and Christian historiographers,[91] Isidore in his great work set Sallust and Livy on the same plane with Eusebius and Jerome. Thus to a certain extent in Isidore there can be ascertained a liberal assessment of ancient pagan scholarship in conformity with Augustine.[92] Isidore's works were hardly subject to a definite purpose; they were rarely apologetic and polemical and interested chiefly in knowledge as such. He himself had acquired great knowledge and he aspired to pass it on to younger clerics and his colleagues who expressly asked him for it. The most mature fruit of his willing acquiescence in such requests, of course, also of his own encyclopedic inclinations and perhaps also of the collaboration of a whole staff of secretaries, were the twenty books of the Etymologiae, which get their name from the fact that Isidore offers a great many explanations of words—Book X is wholly devoted to explanation of words arranged alphabetically—but also occasionally and perhaps more correctly also called Origines, because Isidore expected to arrive at the basic origin of things through explanation of words. The work, in which all the knowledge available in Isidore's day is assembled,[93] treats in its modern form grammar (I), rhetoric and dialectic (II), the four mathematical disciplines or the later Quadrivium (III), medicine (IV), laws and times with a survey of the six ages (V), ecclesiastical books and activities (VI), God, angels, and the orders of the faithful (VII), the Church and various sects (VIII), languages, peoples, military service, and degrees of kinship (IX), explanations of words (X), man and monsters (XI), living beings (XII), the world and its parts (XIII), the earth and its parts (XIV), architecture and estates (XV), stones and metals (XVI), agriculture (XVII), war and games (XVIII), ships, houses, and clothing (XIX), and finally domestic economy and storage (XX). The two books on the differences of names and things are like a preliminary study to the great encyclopedia. His different works on the Bible offer a number of realia, information on the biblical environment and times, but at the same time an abundance of allegories and possibilities of allegorizing, for example, on the numbers occurring in the Bible, so that the preachers of many centuries could obtain their equipment here.

---

[87] Ibid. 9, 3, 18.

[88] Cf. H. J. Diesner, Isidor, 9f.

[89] Etym. 1, 32, 1.

[90] Cf. A. Borst, DA 22 (1966), 41.

[91] Inst. 1, 17, 1.

[92] Cf. J. Fontaine, op. cit. I, 183.

[93] In Migne (PL 82) the work includes 650 columns. But it was not Isidore's concern to save the legacy of antiquity for itself (cf. Díaz y Díaz, Settimane . . . V, 897), but to put it at the service of the formation of the clergy of his day. Isidore hardly needed to examine theological controversies; the only theological opponents of the Catholics in Spain at the beginning of the seventh century seem to have been the Jews, as must Isidore could express himself quite naïvely on difficult theological questions, when, for example, in his Differentiae rerum, he speaks just as directly and simply about God as about things of daily life. Of course, he then appended a series of questions, such as: "How is the Father unbegotten?" or "Who will understand all this?"[94] Thus he made clear that even in an encyclopedic presentation theology is not simply an exercise ground of the mind, but demands the highest respect and reserve. For the rest, Isidore was not only the expert on the Bible or books, but an observer of reality on earth. In his systematically theological work (Sententiae), derived almost entirely from Augustine, he had to speak of predestination and declared it a judgment of God which lets some people strive for the above and the inner, others for the below and the external; but then he stressed that in this great darkness man was unable to see through to the divine disposition (2, 6). Hence he distinguished between the order of experience and the order of theological statement of faith and thereby separated himself pleasingly from Fulgentius of Ruspe, for whom the Augustinian doctrine of predestination served to prove that clearly the Arian Vandals were not destined for salvation,[95] and from Gregory of Tours, who saw in history the proof that the Catholic Franks were destined to expel the Arian Goths from Gaul. Certainly for Isidore the great experience which the Spanish Church had undergone, namely, the conversion of the ruling Goths to the Catholic faith, played a decisive role for his theological reflection.

---

probably be concluded from Isidore's sole polemical work, On the Faith against the Jews, but this is amazingly dedicated to his sister Florentina.

[94] Diff. II, 3, 10, PL 83, 71C.

[95] See supra, p. 725.

Probably it must also be stated that Isidore was no longer a man of late antiquity, that he displays no longing for the old conditions, no enthusiasm for an empire, no faith in Roma Aeterna, no anxiety before the collapse of the world, as is the case, for example, with Gregory of Tours or, still more clearly, with Gregory the Great.[96]

One understands that Isidore was admired by his contemporaries for his knowledge and that the future world willingly took over these rich treasures without making the effort to go behind Isidore. Thus to Isidore is due principally the break-through of the seven liberal arts in the early Middle Ages.[97] His Chronicle, which was finished c. 615, was used and expanded a century later in Gaul. As early as the seventh century some of his works had spread as far as Ireland.[98] As in the case of Cassiodorus, so too Isidore's Grammar, that is, Book I of his encyclopedia, was by no means a grammar in our sense; rather, it is an introductory treatise to the various activities which pertain to a skill, to writing and expressing oneself.[99] Isidore was the only one in whom in the seventh century almost all the wealth of classical antiquity once more resounds across the very limited period of late antiquity. For him the artes liberales were an express instrument of culture, that is, a tool for the cultivation of thought and word. In this he is distinguished also from his older contemporary, Gregory the Great, who could indeed express himself very properly in practice, for example, in the foreword to the Moralia, but in principle and theory rejected such efforts.[100] Following the example of Augustine,[101] Isidore counted historiography in grammar, because all that is worth remembering was written down.[102] While in the other points he extensively followed the classical models, he showed himself independent in the definition of historiography and stressed that historiography, in contrast to the compiling of annals, was the work of eyewitnesses, who presented everything truthfully. Here the definition of historiography was gained by the aid of the idea of the gospels; hence it was defined in a Christian and theological manner.[103] Even when Isidore emphasized that the ancient historians had written in order to instruct and educate later ages,[104] he was influenced by the New Testament (Rom. 15:4).

---

[96] Cf. A. Borst, op. cit., 59f.

[97] Cf. B. Bischof, Isidoriana, 344.

[98] Ibid., 321.

[99] J. Fontaine, op. cit. I, 206.

[100] Reg. Epp. V, 53a, 5: the words of the heavenly oracle must not be forced into the rules of [the grammarian] Donatus.

[101] Augustine, De ordine 2, 12, 37.

[102] Etym. 1, 42, 2.

[103] J. Fontaine, op. cit. I, 181.

[104] Etym. 1, 43.

In contrast to Cassiodorus, with whom he must be compared again and again, Isidore composed a monastic Rule and thus also showed the way for the practical organization of the life of monks. In this he was concerned for the divisions of the day, for the architectural plan of the monastery, for example, the location of the infirmary, for the publishing of books, and so forth. In Isidore's opinion, the monks should devote themselves completely to the spiritual life; but their life should be characterized chiefly by manual labor, though not by heavy fieldwork, which was left to slaves. If secular laborers sing unseemly songs during their work, then the monks must, a fortiori, praise Christ during their work.[105] Hence, Isidore's monastery was not a monastery of intellectuals, like that of Cassiodorus, even though he was very much concerned for education. But the education of the clergy as a whole was a concern of his. For this reason the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633, inspired by him, complained in canon 25 especially of the ignorance of the clergy and imposed on the bishops the frequent reading of Scripture and the canons. Caesarius of Arles had also recommended the reading of the Bible as the means of education and of personal sanctification. The canonical regulations as obligatory reading were a new element, which was explained by the fact that meanwhile various canonical collections, such as that of Dionysius Exiguus and especially the so-called Hispana, had appeared.

In the Liber Ordinum (no. 43), which probably belongs to Seville, there is a special ordination for the cleric to whom is entrusted the care of the books and copyists. From the verses with which Isidore of Seville himself had embellished his library,[106] it appears that external quiet was demanded in the scriptorium, and uninterrupted work by the writers was presumed. From this it becomes clear that no longer as in antiquity were multiple copies made by dictation, but merely individual copies, probably only on demand and by individual order.

Isidore himself seems to have taught orally also,[107] but especially in his writings he supplied us[108] with all that was then necessary for the education of a cleric, namely, the humaniora in Books I–III and X of the encyclopedia and in the two books of Differences; theology proper in Books VII and VIII of the encyclopedia and in Book I of the Sentences—Books II and III are concerned with morals and the guidance of souls—and furthermore in the book On the Catholic Faith. He passed on biblical knowledge in his work on the Fathers, in the allegories, and in the questions from the Old and the New Testament. If the Collectio

---

[105] Reg. 5, 5, PL 83, 874B.

[106] Nos. 25–27; C. Beeson, Isidorstudien (Munich 1913), p. 166.

[107] Cf. Ildefonse of Toledo, Vir. illustr. 9, PL 87, 28.

[108] Thus Fernández Alonso, op. cit., 85f., and 89ff.

Hispana really came from Isidore,[109] he also took pains with instruction in canon law. Finally, pastoral theology is treated in the book on ecclesiastical duties and in the final chapters of the Sentences.

That Isidore was not an especially speculative thinker can be seen above all in his Christology, which, it is true, is thoroughly orthodox and takes pains to survey and preserve the doctrines of the Fathers, but which did not give attention to the achievements of the recent period, especially those brought forth in the dispute over the Three Chapters. Apparently Isidore knew no difference between substantia and subsistentia; if he says in Book VII of his encyclopedia (7, 4, 11) that in God there are three hypostases, it means in Latin either three persons or three substances, but in Latin substance is not expressed in the real sense of God but only abusive, for in the true sense of the word substance means in Greek person but not nature. It is interesting and, for Isidore, characteristic that in Book VII of his encyclopedia, where he enumerates the various names for the Son of God, he mentions not only the homoousios (7, 2, 14) but also the homoiousios (7, 2, 16); in this also it appears that he is in closer connection with the Christian literature of the fourth and fifth than with that of the sixth century, for Hilary had recognized the Homoiousians as orthodox.

Isidore forbade Christians to read pagan poetry, but he showed himself quite at home in it. Here one must not seek to discover an inconsistency. Perhaps Isidore was convinced of having provided for this work of reading and selecting once for all time for Christian education. In any case, he seems to have assumed that clerics must make the content of his works entirely their own. Thus he recommends the occasional reading and reflecting on brief sections.[110] In this regard, one should read quietly because one can thus better grasp what has been read, and because the voice is spared. Of course, even better than the reading is the repeated discussion in common of what was read, because in this way what is obscure or doubtful becomes clear.[111] Such discussion (collatio) was a custom in monasteries since the fifth century and in Isidore presupposes the community of monks or clerics. But Isidore definitely rejects the debate. Just as the collatio builds, so the contentio destroys. It loses the feeling for the truth, produces quarrels, even leads to blasphemy; for the sake of one's own glory the truth is often sacrificed; therefore sophistries must unconditionally be avoided.[112] Hence even though Isidore transmitted to the Middle Ages a good part of his knowledge, he could not become the father of scholastic theology, for characteristic of it is the methodical new start of confrontation with opposing authors and even the debate.

---

[109] Ibid., 92, with some reservations.

[110] Sent. 3, 14, 8–9.

[111] Ibid. 3, 14, 1–2.

[112] Ibid. 3, 14, 4–5.

If one surveys the work of the four Christian writers of late antiquity here presented—especially Fulgentius[113] and Caesarius should also be reckoned with them—then one understands that they prepared the riches of the faith and of thought of Christian and pagan antiquity for a new unity to be created by the Middle Ages. In this connection it has already been said also that they were not yet able themselves to create such a unity. This literature is vastly inferior to the great accomplishments of the fourth and fifth centuries, not only in linguistic style but also in theological content. The reason for this must not be sought only in the general cultural decline, in the chaos of war, the destructions and daily miseries, but probably especially in the isolation in which these men existed. Cassiodorus and Boethius expressed it in saying that they found no debating partners; Isidore was admired by his contemporaries and was asked for new works and new instruction, but he was unable to obtain help and encouragement from them. But this situation is presented clearest in the Dialogues of Gregory the Great: true, there was a partner in conversation, but he really knew how to say nothing, and scarcely to pose real questions; Gregory himself alone had to see even to the progress of the discussion. Great new theological literature could not appear again until a new intellectually formed community had been born.

---

[113] In this regard Fulgentius must still be emphasized in regard to form and systematization. His De fide ad Petrum already presents such a systematization in the sense of later scholasticism that A. Grillmeier (Fulgentius von Ruspe: Scholastik 34 (1959) 526–565) speaks of "Primitive Sentences."

LIST OF POPES, COUNCILS, AND RULERS

Popes

Melchiades	311–314
Silvester I	314–335
Mark	336
Julius I	337–352
Liberius	352–366
Felix II*	355–365
Damasus I	366–384
Ursinus*	366–367
Siricius	384–399
Anastasius I	399–401
Innocent I	401–417
Zosimus	417–418
Boniface I	418–422
Eulalius*	418–19
Celestine I	422–432
Sixtus III	432–440
Leo I	440–461
Hilary	461–468
Simplicius	468–483
Felix II	483–492
Gelasius I	492–496
Anastasius II	496–498
Symmachus	498–514
Lawrence*	498–505
Hormisdas	514–523
John I	523–526
Felix III	526–530
Boniface II	530–532
Dioscorus*	530
John II	533–535
Agapetus I	535–536
Silverius	536–537
Vigilius	537–555
Pelagius I	556–561
John III	561–574
Benedict I	575–579
Pelagius II	579–590
Gregory I	590–604
Sabinian	604–606
Boniface III	607
Boniface IV	608–615
Deusdedit	615–618
Boniface V	619–625
Honorius I	625–638
Severinus	640
John IV	640–642
Theodore I	642–649
Martin I	649–653
Eugene I	654–657
Vitalian	657–672
Adeodatus	672–676
Donus	676–678
Agatho	678–681
Leo II	682–683
Benedict II	684–685
John V	685–686
Conon	686–687
Theodore*	687
Paschal*	687–692
Sergius I	687–701
John VI	701–705
John VII	705–707
Sisinnius	708
Constantine*	708–715

* Anti-Popes.

Councils

General Councils

I Nicaea	325
I Constantinople	381
Ephesus	431
Chalcedon	451
II Constantinople	553
III Constantinople	681

Other Important Councils

Elvira	c. 306
Arles	314
Ancyra	314
Tyre	335
Gangra	c. 340
Antioch	341
Serdica	342 or 343
Carthage	345 or 348
Sirmium	351 or 352
Arles	353
Milan	355
Seleucia–Rimini	359
Alexandria	362
Valence	374
Zaragoza	380
Constantinople	382
Carthage	397
Turin	398
I Toledo	397 or 400
Carthage	401
Riez	439
I Orange	441
I Vaison	442
Ephesus	449

IN ROME:

462
487 or 488
495
504
601
649
680

IN THE FRANKISH KINGDOM:

Tours	461
Arles	473
Agde	506
I Orléans	511
Epaon	517
Carpentras	527
II Orange	529
II Vaison	529
II Orléans	533
III Orléans	538
IV Orléans	541
V Orléans	549
Tours	567
I Mâcon	581/583
II Mâcon	585
Narbonne	589
Auxerre	561/605
Paris	614
Clichy	626
Chalon	647/653
St. Jean de Losne	673/675

IN SPAIN:

Tarragona	516
Gerona	517
II Toledo	527
Lérida	546
I Braga	561
II Braga	572
III Toledo	589
II Seville	619
IV Toledo	633
V Toledo	636
VI Toledo	638
VII Toledo	646
VIII Toledo	653
IX Toledo	655
X Toledo	656
Mérida	666
XI Toledo	675
XII Toledo	681
XIII Toledo	683
XIV Toledo	684
XV Toledo	688
XVI Toledo	693
XVII Toledo	694

IN AFRICA:

Carthage	484
Junca and Sufes	523
Carthage	525
Carthage	534
Carthage	550
Carthage	594
Carthage	645

IN ENGLAND:

Augustine's Oak	600/605
Whitby	664
Hertford	672
Hatfield	680
Burford	680
Twyford	684
Bapchild	698

Rulers

Roman Byzantine Emperors

Constantine I	306–337
Constantine II	337–340
Constans I	337–350
Constantius II	337–361
Julian	361–363
Jovian	363–364
Valentinian I	364–375
Valens	364–378
Gratian	375–383
Valentinian II	383–392
Theodosius I	379–395
Honorius	395–423
Arcadius	395–408
Theodosius II	408–450
John	423–425
Valentinian III	425–455
Marcian	450–457
Leo I	457–474

Zeno	474–491
Basiliscus	475–476
Anastasius I	491–518
Justin I	518–527
Justinian I	527–565
Justin II	565–578
Tiberius II	578–582
Maurice	582–602
Phocas	602–610
Heraclius	610–641
Constantine III	641
Constans II	641–668
Constantine IV	668–685
Justinian II	685–695
Leontius	695–698
Tiberius III	698–705
Justinian II	705–711

Merovingian Frankish Kings

Childeric I	457–481
Clovis I	481–511
Reims:
Theodoric I	511–534
Theodebert I	534–548
Theodebald	548–555
Orléans:
Chlodomir	511–524
Paris:
Childebert I	511–558
Soissons:
Chlotar I	511–561
Burgundy:
Guntram	561–593

Austrasia:
Sigebert I	561–575
Childebert II	575–596
Theodobert II	596–612
Theoderic II	596–612
Sigebert III	639–656
Childeric II	662–675
Paris:
Charibert I	561–567
Neustria:
Chilperic I	561–584
Chlotar II	584–629
Dagobert I	629–639
Clovis II	640–657
Chlotar III	657–673
Theodoric III	673–690
Clovis III	690–694
Childebert III	697–711

Visigothic Kings

Alaric I	395–410	Liuwa II	601–603
Ataulfq	410–415	Witteric	603–610
Sigeric	415	Gundemar	610–612
Wallia	415–419	Sisebut	612–621
Theodoric I	419–451	Swinthila	621–632
Thorismund	451–453	Sisenand	632–636
Theodoric II	453–466	Chintila	636–639
Euric	466–484	Tulga	639–642
Alaric II	484–507	Chindaswinth	642–652
Amalaric	507–531	Recceswinth	652–672
Theudis	531–548	Wamba	672–680
Theudegisel	548–549	Erwig	680–687
Agila	549–554	Egica	687–701
Athanagild	554–567	Witiza	701–709
Liuwa I	567–572	Achila	709–710
Leovigild	568–586	Roderic	710–711
Recared	586–601

Ostrogothic Kings

Theodoric	493–526	Witigis	536–540
Athalaric	526–534	Totila	541–552
Amalasuntha	534	Teias	552–553
Theodahad	534–536

Vandal Kings

Gaiseric	428–477	Thrasamund	496–523
Hunneric	477–484	Hilderic	523–530
Gunthamund	484–496	Gelimer	530–534

Lombard Kings

Alboin	568–573	Godepert	661–662
Clephq	573–575	Grimoald	662–671
Authari	584–590	Perctarit	671–688
Agilulf	590–615	Cunincpert	688–700
Adaloald	615–625	Luitpert	700–701
Arioald	625–636	Aripert II	701–712
Rothari	636–652	Liutprand	712–744
Aripert	653–661

BIBLIOGRAPHY

GENERAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Bibliography in Volume I, pages 435–458, is presupposed. Here are given only source collections thus far not mentioned, as well as new works and new editions, for the period treated here. The titles are listed according to the two principal divisions of the period.

A.D. 324–451

I. SOURCE COLLECTIONS

The Supplement to Volumes 1–96 of Migne's Latin Patrology, edited by A. Hamman, is complete in four volumes (=PL Suppl.); still to follow are addenda and general tables. For the Corpus Christianorum (CChr) appeared J.-M. Clément, Initia Patrum latinorum (Turnhout 1971). Patristic sources are published in the following new series: Patristische Texte und Studien (=PTS), edited by K. Aland and W. Schneemelcher (Berlin 1946ff.). Texts on Church history and the history of theology, edited by G. Ruhbach et al. (Gütersloh 1966ff). Traditio Christiana (TradChr), text and commentary on patristic theology, edited by A. Benoit et al. (Zurich 1969ff).

EDITIONS OF LITURGICAL TEXTS: P. E. Brigthman–C. E. Hammond, Liturgies Eastern and Western, I: Eastern Liturgies (Oxford, 2nd ed. 1965); Textus patristici et liturgici (Tpatrlit), ed. Institutum Liturgicum Ratisbonense (Regensburg 1964ff.); Kl. Gamber, Codices liturgici antiquiores (Fribourg, 2nd ed. 1968).

CONCILIAR CANONS: P. P. Joannou, Les canons des conciles oecuméniques; Les canons des synodes particuliers: Pubbl. della Pontificia commissione per la redazione del codice di diritto canonico orientale. Fonti, fasc. IX: Discipline générale antique (II^e–IX^e siècles). Tom. 1 (Grottaferrata 1962); Id., Les canons des Pères grecs: ibid., Tom. 2 with Index analytique (ibid. 1963–64); J. Vives–T. M. Martinez–G. M. Diez, Concilios Visigóticos e Hispano-Romanos (Barcelona–Madrid 1963); Concilia Galliae A. 314–A. 506, ed. C. Munier: CChr 148 (Turnhout 1963).

EARLY CHRISTIAN INSCRIPTIONS: Inscriptiones christianae urbis Romae, new series by A. Silvagni, has been enlarged by A. Ferrua with vols. IV and V (Vatican City 1964–1971); A collection of the inscriptions of the Vatican Museum was published by H. Ziliacus, Sylloge inscriptionum christianarum veterum Musei Vaticani, 2 vols. (Helsinki 1963); E. Diehl, Inscriptiones Latinae Christianae Veteres, appeared in a second edition by J.

Moreau; see vol. IV: Suppl., ed., J. Moreau–H.-I. Marrou (Berlin–Zurich 1967); J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la España Romano y Visigoda (Barcelona, 2nd. ed. 1969); W. Boppert, Die frühchristlichen Inschriften des Mittelrheingebietes (Mainz 1971); See E. Meyer, Einführung in die lateinische Epigraphik (Darmstadt 1973, Lit.); For the Greek and Latin inscriptions of Syria vols. V, VI, and VII must be added (to 1970); A. C. Bandy, The Greek Inscriptions of Crete (Athens 1970).

NUMISMATICS: K. Christ, Antike Numismatik: Einführung und Bibliographie (Darmstadt 1967); H. Mattingly–E. A. Sydenham, The Roman Imperial Coinage, VI: From Diocletian to Maximianus (294–313), by C. H. Sutherland; VII, Constantine and Licinius (313 to 337), by P. M. Bruun (London 1966–67).

COLLECTIONS OF STATE LAWS: Theodosiani libri XVI cum constitutionibus Sirmondianis et leges et novellae ad Theodosianum pertinentes, rec. Th. Mommsen–P. M. Meyer, 2 vols. (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1954); Corpus Iuris Civilis, rec. P. Krueger–Th. Mommsen–R. Schoell–G. Kroll, I: Institutiones et Digesta (Berlin, 16th ed. 1954), II: Codex Justinianus (ibid., 12th ed. 1959), III: Novellae (ibid., 7th ed. 1959); C. Pharr, The Theodosian Code. A Translation with Commentary, Glossary and Bibliography (Princeton 1952); P. R. Coleman-Norton, Roman State and Christian Church. A Collection of Legal Documents to A.D. 535, 3 vols. (London 1966).

II. PRESENTATIONS

1. GENERAL CHURCH HISTORY

J. Danielou and H. I. Marrou, The First Six Hundred Years, Vol. 1 of The Christian Centuries (New York 1964); A. Mandouze, ed., 2000 Ans de Christianisme (Paris 1975); B. Llorca, Historia de la Iglesia Católica, I: Edad Antigua (Madrid, 4th ed. 1964); K. D. Schmidt–E. Wolf, Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte, C 1: R. Lorenz, Das vierte bis sechste Jahrhundert (Westen) (Göttingen 1970); R. Kottje–B. Moeller, Ökumenische Kirchengeschichte, I: Alte Kirche und Ostkirche (Munich 1970); C. Andresen, Die Kirche der alten Christenheit (Stuttgart 1971); J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition I: The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600) (Chicago 1971).

2. CHURCH HISTORY OF INDIVIDUAL COUNTRIES

Chr. Papadopoulos, Ἱστορία τῆς ἐκκλησίας Ἱεροσολύμων (Jerusalem 1910); id., Ἱστορία τῆς ἐκκλησίας Ἀλεξανδρείας (Alexandria 1935); id., Ἱστορία τῆς ἐκκλησίας Ἀντιοχείας (Alexandria 1951); G. I. Konïdaris, Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία τῆς Ἑλλάδος (Athens 1954); R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'église jusqu'à la conquête arabe (Paris 1945); E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine I^2 II^2 III (Paris 1964/66); E. de Moreau, Histoire de l'église en Belgique I (Brussels, 2nd ed. 1945); Z. Garcia Villada, Historia eclesiástica de Espāna I (Madrid 1929); Q. Aldea Vaquero et al., Diccionario de historia eclesiástica de España (Madrid 1972ff.); I. H. Deanesley, The Pre-Conquest Church in England (London 1953); M. W. Barley–R. P. C. Hanson (eds.), Christianity in Britain (Lester 1968); L. Gougaud, Christianity in Celtic Lands (London 1932); A. R. MacEwen, History of the Church in Scotland I (London 1913); H. M. Chadwick, Early Scotland (Cambridge 1949); W. Delius, Geschichte der irischen Kirche (Munich–Basel 1954); P. J. Corish (ed.), A History of Irish Catholicism I (Dublin 1967ff.); E. Tomek, Kirchengeschichte Österreichs I (Innsbruck–Vienna 1935); J. Wodka, Kirchengeschichte Österreichs (Vienna 1959); Th. Schwegler, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in der Schweiz (Stans, 2nd ed. 1943); R. Pfister, Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz I (Zurich 1964); B. Bauerreiss, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns I (St. Ottilien, 2nd ed. 1958).

3. HISTORY OF EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE

B. Altaner–A. Stuiber, Patrology (New York 1960); P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne IV–VII (Paris 1912–1923); P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident. De Macrobe à Cassiodore (Paris, 2nd ed. 1948); A. Siegmund, Die Überlieferung der griechischen christlichen Literatur in der lateinischen Kirche bis zum 12. Jh. (Munich 1949); N. K. Chadwick, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul (London 1955); I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia syriaca (Rome, 2nd ed. 1965).

4. HISTORY OF DOGMA

R. P. C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church (London 1962); B. Lohse, Epochen der Dogmengeschichte (Stuttgart 1963); A. Dempf, Geistesgeschichte der altchristlichen Kultur (Stuttgart 1964); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 3rd ed. 1965); A. Adam, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte I: Die Zeit der Alten Kirche (Gütersloh 1965); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition (London 1965); M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident 335–430 (Paris 1967); K. F. Morrison, Tradition and Authority in the Western Church 300–1140 (Princeton 1969); H. A. Wolfson, The Philosophy of the Church Father I (Cambridge, Mass., 3rd ed. 1970); E. Boularand, L'hérésie d'Arius et "La Foi" de Nicée (Paris 1972).

5. HISTORY OF THE COUNCILS

Le Concile et les Conciles (Paris 1960); A. Grillmeier–H. Bacht (eds.), Das Konzil von Chalkedon (Würzburg, 2nd ed. 1962); G. Dumeige–H. Bacht, Geschichte der ökumenischen Konzilien, I: I. Ortiz de Urbina, Nizäa und Konstantinopel (Mainz 1964), II: P. Th. Camelot, Ephesus und Chalcedon (Mainz 1963); A. M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein symbol (Göttingen 1965).

6. HISTORY OF LITURGY

J. A. Jungmann, The Mass of the Roman Rite, Its Origins and Development (New York, rev. & abridged ed. 1959); A. G. Martimort, Handbuch der Liturgiewissenschaft, 2 vols. (Freiburg 1963–65); M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia Liturgica, I–IV (Milan, 3rd ed. 1964–69); H. A. Schmidt, Introductio in liturgiam occidentalem (Rome, 2nd ed. 1965); Th. Klauser, Kleine abendländische Liturgiegeschichte (Bonn 1965); J. A. Jungmann, Liturgie der christlichen Frühzeit (Friburg, 1967); E. Cattaneo, Introduzione alla storia liturgica occidentale (Rome, 2nd ed. 1969); W. Nagel, Geschichte des christlichen Gottesdienstes (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1970); J. Daniélou, La catéchèse aux premiers siècles (Paris 1968); J. B. Schnyder, Geschichte der katholischen Predigt (Freiburg 1969); W. Schütz, Geschichte der christlichen Predigt (Berlin 1972).

7. HISTORY OF DEVOTION

H. Delehaye, Sanctus (Brussels 1927); Id., Les origines du culte des martyrs (Brussels, 2nd ed. 1933); A. Grabar, Martyrium, 3 vols. (Paris 1946); B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa (Münster 1950); R. Aigrain, L'hagiographie (Paris 1953); H. Delehaye, Les légendes hagiographiques (Brussels, 4th ed. 1954); Th. Klauser, Christlicher Martyrerkult, heidnischer Heroenkult und spätjüdische Heiligenverehrung (Cologne 1960); J. A. Jungmann, Christliches Beten im Wandel und Bestand (Munich 1969).

8. MONASTICISM

K. Heussi, Ursprung des christlichen Mönchtums (Tübingen 1936); G. Turbessi, Ascetismo e monachesimo prebenedettino (Rome 1961); Théologie de la vie monastique. Etudes sur la doctrine patristique (Paris 1961); Los monjes y los estudios (Poblet 1963); S. Frank, ΑΓΓΕΙΚΟΣ ΒΙΟΣ (Münster 1964); U. Ranke-Heinemann, Das frühe Mönchtum. Seine Motive nach den Selbstzeugnissen (Essen 1964); B. Lohse, Askese und Mönchtum in der Antike und in der alten Kirche (Münster 1969); St. Schiewietz, Das morgenländische Mönchtum, I/III (Vienna 1904–38); Il monachesimo orientale (Rome 1958); D. J. Chitty, The Desert a City (London 1965); W. Schatz, Studien zur Geschichte und Vorstellungswelt des frühen abendländischen Mönchtums (Diss. Freiburg 1957); O. Chadwick, Western Asceticism (London 1958); J. Décarreaux, Die Mönche und die abendländische Zivilisation (Wiesbaden 1965).

9. HISTORY OF CANON LAW AND OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANIZATION

J. Gaudemet, La formation du droit séculier et du droit de l'église au IV^e et V^e siècles (Paris 1957); P. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte, I: Die katholische Kirche (Weimar, 4th ed. 1964); W. M. Plöchl, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts I (Vienna, 2nd ed. 1960).

10. CHURCH AND STATE

K. M. Setton, Christian Attitude towards the Emperor in the Fourth Century (New York 1941); A. A. Ehrhardt, Politische Metaphysick von Solon bis Augustin II (Tübingen 1959); H. Rahner, Kirche und Staat im frühen Christentum (Munich 1961); A. W. Ziegler, Religion, Kirche und Staat in Geschichte und Gegenwart, I: Geschichte (Munich 1969); R. Klein (ed.), Das frühe Christentum im römischen Staat (Darmstadt 1971); P. Charanis, Church and State in the Later Roman Empire (Madison 1939).

11. CHURCH AND CULTURE

G. Schnürer, Kirche und Kultur im Mittelalter I (Paderborn, 3rd ed. 1936); H.-I. Marrou, St. Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (Paris, 4th ed. 1958); H. Hagendahl, Latin Fathers and the Classics (Göteborg 1958); O. Gigon, Die antike Kultur und das Christentum (Gütersloh 1966); A. Wifstrand, Die alte Kirche und die griechische Bildung (Bern 1967); M. Simon, La civilisation de l'antiquité et le christianisme (Paris 1972).

12. CHRISTIAN ARCHEOLOGY—EARLY CHRISTIAN ART

C. Andresen, Einführung in die christliche Archäologie = Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte I B 1 (Göttingen 1971); A. Grabar, The Great Centuries of Byzantine Art (Geneva 1953); F. Gerke, Spätantike und frühes Christentum = Kunst der Welt (Baden-Baden 1967); R. Krautheimer, Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture (Harmsworth 1965); A. Khatchatrian, Les Baptistères paléochrétiens (Paris 1962); H. Kähler, Die frühe Kirche. Kult and Kulturraum (Berlin 1972); P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani in Roma (Bologna 1966); Th. Klauser, Frühchristliche Sarkophage in Wort und Bild (Olten 1966); F. W. Deichmann, (ed.) Repertorium der altchristlichen Sarkophage, I: revised by G. Bovini–H. Brandenburg (Wiesbaden 1966ff.); H. Karpp, Die Mosaiken in S. Maria Maggiore zu Rom (Baden-Baden 1966); E. Sauser, Frühchristliche Kunst. Sinnbild und Glaubensaussage (Innsbruck 1966); G. Schiller, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst (Berlin 1966ff.); E. Kirschbaum, Lexikon der christlichen Ikonographie (Freiburg 1968ff.); A. Grabar, Christian Iconography: A Study of Its Origins (Princeton 1968).

III. THE BACKGROUND OF SECULAR HISTORY

1. History of the Late Roman Empire

K. Christ, Römische Geschichte. Einführung, Quellenkunde, Bibliographie (Darmstadt 1973); O. Seeck, Geschichte des Untergangs der antiken Welt V–VI (reprint, Darmstadt 1966); F. W. Walbank, The Decline of the Roman Empire in the West (London 1946); E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire I² II (Paris 1949–59); S. Mezzarino, Trattato di Storia Romana II (Rome 1956); H. Dannenbauer, Die Entstehung Europas I (Stuttgart 1959); L. Musset, Les Invasions. Les Vagues Germaniques (Paris 1965); F. Lot, The End of the Ancient World and the Beginnings of the Middle Ages (London 1966); R. Rémondon, La Crise de l'empire Romain (Paris, 2nd ed. 1970); P. Brown, The World of Late Antiquity (London 1971); R. Folz–A. Guillou–L. Musset–D. Sourdel, De l'antiquité au Monde Médiéval-Peuples et Civiliasations V (Paris 1972); A. Pignaniol, L'empire Chrétien 325–395 (Paris, 3rd ed. 1972); A. H. M. Jones–J. R. Martindale–J. Morris, The Prosopography of the Later Roman Empire, I: A.D. 260–395 (London 1971).

2. History of Religion and Culture

J. Geffcken, Der Ausgang des griechisch-römischen Heidentums (Heidelberg, 2nd ed. 1929); P. de Labriolle, La réaction paienne (Paris 1936); H.-I. Marrou, A History of Education in Antiquity, (London–N.Y. 1956); H. Mattingly, Roman Civilization (London 1959); K. Büchner, Römische Literaturgeschichte (Stuttgart, 3rd ed. 1962); A. Lesky, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur (Bern–Munich, 2nd ed. 1963); J. Straub, Heidnische Geschichtsapologetik in der christlichen Spätantike (Bonn 1963); A. Momogliano (ed.), The Conflict between Paganism and Christianity in the 4th Century (Oxford 1963); J. Vogt, Der Niedergang Roms. Metamorphose der antiken Kultur (Zurich 1965); J. Straub, Regeneratio imperii (Darmstadt 1972).

3. Legal, Economic, and Social History

S. Mazzarino, Aspetti sociali del quarto secolo (Rome 1951); M. Rostovtzeff, The Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire I/II (London, 2nd ed. 1957); S. Dill, Roman Society in the Last Century of the Roman Empire (New York, 2nd ed. 1958); W. Seyfarth, Soziale Fragen der spätrömischen Kaiserzeit im Spiegel des Theodosianus (Berlin 1963); F. Wieacker, Recht und Gesellschaft in der Spätantike (Stuttgart 1964); A. H. M. Jones, The Later Roman Empire 284–602. A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey I–IV (Oxford 1964); F. de Martino, Le istituzioni politiche e la società del tardo Impero fino alla caduta della parte di Occidente (Naples 1967); J. Gaudemet, Les institutions de l'antiquité (Paris 1967); J. Gagé, Les classes sociales dans l'empire romain (Paris, 2nd ed. 1971); N. Brockmeyer, Sozialgeschichte der Antike (Stuttgart 1972).

4. AUXILIARIES

H. Jedin–K. S. Latourette–J. Martin, Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte (Freiburg 1970); F. Littell, The Macmillan Atlas History of Christianity (New York 1976); Grosser Historischer Weltatlas, Part I: Vorgeschichte und Altertum, ed. H. Bengtson and Vl. Milojcic (Munich, 5th ed. 1972); Der Kleine Pauly. Lexikon der Antike, auf der Grundlage von Pauly-Wissowa, ed. K. Ziegler and W. Sontheimer, (Stuttgart 1964ff.); Lexikon der antiken Welt, ed. G. Andresen–H. Erbse–O. Gigon et al. (Zurich 1965); A. Blaise–H. Chirat, Dictionnaire Latin-Français des auteurs chrétiens (Turnhout, 3rd ed. 1967).

A.D. 451–711

A. THE EARLY BYZANTINE CHURCH

A comprehensive survey of the sources and presentations on the history of the Eastern Church is given in Volume III, pages 487–495. The following titles bring it up to date.

1. ANCILLARY SCIENCES: F. Dölger–J. Karayannopulos, Byzantinische Urkundenlehre, 1: Die Kaiserurkunden (Munich 1967).

2. SOURCES: In the framework of the Corpus Christianorum appeared a Clavis Patrum Graecorum in three volumes, which includes Greek patristic literature to the eighth century. Already published are vol. II: Scriptores ab Athanasio ad Chrysostomum, ed. M. Geerard (Turnhout 1974), and vol. III: Scriptores saec. V–VIII, Concilia, Catenae (1976); I. E. Karagiannopulos, Πηγαὶ τῆς βυζαντινῆς ἱστορίας (Thessalonica 1970).

3. GENERAL COLLECTIONS OF SOURCES: Corpus Fontium Historiae Byzantinae, Series Berolinensis, ed. H.-G. Beck–A. Kambylis–R. Keydell (Berlin 1967ff.); a second series appears in Washington (1967ff.); J. Meyerdorff, Byzantian Theology, (New York 1976).

4. COUNCILS: Acta Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Tom. IV vol. 1: Concilium Universale Constantinopolitanum sub Justiniano Habitum, ed. J. Straub (Berlin 1971); besides Tom. IV vol. III: Index Generalis Tom. I–IV. Pars 1^a: Index Codicum et Auctorum, by R. Schieffer (Berlin 1973).

5. STATE DECREES: P. R. Coleman-Norton, Roman State and Christian Church. A Collection of Legal Documents, vol. 3: 453–534 (London 1966); C. de Clercq, Fontes Iuridici Ecclesiarum Orientalium (Rome 1967).

6. HISTORICAL STATISTICAL WORKS: V. Grumel, Les Regestes des Actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, fasc. 1 (Paris, 2nd ed. 1972), fasc. 4 (Paris 1971); R. Janin, Géographie Ecclésiastique de l'Empire Byzantin, vol. III: Les Églises et les Monastères de Constantinople (Paris, 2nd ed. 1969); vol. II: Les Églises et les Monastères des Grands Centres Byzantins (Bithynia, Hellespont, Latros, etc.) (Paris 1975).

7. MONASTICISM: Les Moines d'Orient II–IV (Paris 1961–64), A.-J. Festugière.

8. LITURGY: Sancti Romani Melodi Cantica: Cantica Dubia, ed. P. Maas–C. A. Trypanis (Berlin 1970); Romanos le mélode, Hymnes, ed. J. Grosdider de Matons, vols. I–IV: SChr

99, 110, 114, 128 (Paris 1964–67); C. A. Trypanis, Fourteen Early Byzantine Cantica (Vienna–Cologne 1968); F. Halkin, Auctarium Bibliothecae Hagiographicae Graecae (Brussels 1969).

Materials on Eastern History

1. POLITICAL HISTORY: R. H. Jenkins, Byzantium. The Imperial Centuries A. D. 610–1071 (London 1966); J. M. Hussey (ed.), The Byzantine Empire, I: Byzantium and its Neighbours, II: Government, Church and Civilisation = The Cambridge Medieval History, vol. 1–2 (Cambridge 1966–67); L. Bréhier, Le monde Byzantin, 3 vols. (Paris, 2nd ed. 1968–70); P. N. Ure, Justinian and His Age (Harmondsworth 1951); D. Obolensky, The Byzantine Commonwealth (History of Civilisation) (London 1971); A. N. Stratos, Byzantium in the 7th Century (Amsterdam 1972ff.); C. D. Gordon, The Age of Attila. Fifth Century Byzantium and the Barbarians (Ann Arbor 1960); B. Rubin, Das Zeitalter Justinians I. vol. 1 (Berlin 1960); J. W. Barker, Justinian and the Later Roman Empire (Madison 1966); P. Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam, VI^e–VII^e siècle, 4 vols. (Paris 1951–65); St. Runciman, Byzanz = Kindlers Kulturgeschichte (Munich 1970); K. Wessel, Die Kultur von Byzanz (Frankfurt a. M. 1970); Byzantinische Forschungen (Amsterdam 1966ff.); Travaux et Mémoires. Centre de Recherche d'histoire et civilisation byzantine (Paris 1956ff.); Collection "Le monde byzantin" (Paris 1966ff.).

2. CHURCH HISTORY: A. S. Hernándex, Iglesias de Oriente, I–II (Santander 1963); F. Heiler, Die Ostkirchen (Munich 1971); E. v. Ivanka, J. Tyciak, et al., Hdb. der Ostkirchenkunde (Düsseldorf 1971); J. L. van Dieten–C. Mango–P. Wirth, Geschichte der Patriarchen Sergios I bis Johannes VI (610–715) = Enzyklopädie der Byzantinistik vol. 24 (Amsterdam 1972); C. Diehl, Byzantium (New Brunswick, N.J., 1960).

3. THE PAPACY AND THE EASTERN CHURCH: F. Dvornik, Byzantium and The Papacy (New York 1966); L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli Imperatori e Patriarchi Byzantini, VI–VII sec. (Rome–Louvain 1972).

4. HISTORY OF THE INDIVIDUAL EASTERN CHURCHES: J. Ch. and M. Sournia, l'Orient des Premiers Chrétiens. Histoire et Archéologie de la Syrie Byzantine (Paris 1966).

5. LEGAL HISTORY: R. Guilland, Recherches sur les Institutions Byzantines 2 vols. (Berlin–Amsterdam 1967).

6. SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC HISTORY: D. Claude, Die Byzantinische Stadt im 6. Jh. (Munich 1969); G. Downey, A History of Antioch in Syria from Seleucus to the Arab Conquest (Princeton 1961); D. J. Constantelos, Byzantine Philanthropy and Social Welfare (New Brunswick, N.J. 1968).

7. POLITICAL THOUGHT–CHURCH AND STATE: F. Dvornik, Early Christian and Byzantine Political Philosophy, 2 vols. (Washington 1966); P. Charanis, Church and State in the Later Roman Empire. The Religious Policy of Anastasius the First (Thessalonica, 2nd ed. 1974); A. Riou, Le Monde et l'Énglise selon Maxime le Confesseur (Paris 1973).

8. MONASTICISM: A. -J. Festugière, Ursprünge christlicher Frömmigkeit. Bildung oder Heiligkeit im Mönchtum des altchristlichen Orient (Basel 1963).

9. LITURGY: H. -J. Schulz, Die byzantinische Liturgie. Vom Wesen ihrer Symbolgestalt (Freiburg 1964); J. Darrouzès, Recherches sur les Offikia de l'église byzantine (Paris 1970); E. Wellesz, A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography (Oxford, 2nd ed. 1961); E.

Wellesz–M. Velimitovii, Studies in Eastern Chant (London 1966ff.); J. Grosdidier de Matons, Romanos le Mélode et les origines de la poésie religieuse à Byzance (Paris 1975).

10. (a) LITERARY HISTORY: P. Lemerle, Le premier humanisme byzantin. Notes et remarques sur enseignement et culture a Byzance des origines au X^e siècle (Paris 1971).

10. (c) HISTORY OF ART: K. Wessel, Reallexikon der byzantinischen Kunst (Stuttgart 1963ff.); D. T. Rice, Art of the Byzantine Era (London 1960); J. Beckwith, The Art of Constaninople (London 1961); Ch. Delvoye, L'art byzantin (Paris 1967); A. Grabar, Great Centuries of Byzantine Painting (Geneva 1953).

11. THEOLOGY AND SPIRITUALITY: W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement (Cambridge 1972); L. Bouyer, La spiritualité orthodoxe (Paris 1965); W. Völker, Maximus Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens (Wiesbaden 1965); I. Hausherr, Études de spiritualité orientale (Rome 1969).

B. THE LATIN CHURCH

1. SOURCES

The Manuals of Patrology by Altaner–Stuiber[7] and Bardenhewer vol. V; M. Manitius, Geschichte der Lateinischen Lit. des Mittelalters I (Munich 1911); G. de Ghellinck, La Littérature Latine au Moyen Age I (Paris 1939); P. Courcelle, Histoire Littéraire des Grandes Invasions (Paris, 3rd ed. 1964); Wattenbach-Levison, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter, Heft 1 (Weimar 1952); Gebhardt, Hdb. der Deutschen Geschichte, I[9], ed. H. Grundmann (Stuttgart 1970); J. F. Kenney, The Sources of the Early History of Ireland I: Ecclesiastical (New York 1929; reprint with supplements: Dublin 1966); K. Hughes, Early Christian Ireland: Introduction to the Sources (London 1972).

2. GENERAL PRESENTATIONS

H. v. Schubert, Geschichte der christlichen Kirche im Frühmittelalter (Tubingen 1921, reprint ed. Hildesheim 1962); L. Duchesne, Early History of the Christian Church from Its Foundation to the End of the Fifth Century, 3 vols. (London, 1950–57); Daniel-Rops, The Church in the Dark Ages (Garden City, N.Y. 1962); Le Chiese nei regni dell'Europa occidentale e i loro rapporti con Roma sino all' 800 = Settimane di studio del centro italiano di studi sull'Alto Medioevo VII (Spoleto 1960); R. Lorentz, Das vierte bis sechste Jh.; G. Haendler, Geschichte des Frühmittelalters und der Germanenmission = Die Kirche in inhrer Geschichte, Part C 1 and E (Göttingen 1970 and 1961); M. Adriani, L'Europa cristiana. Dal declino della romanità alle soglie dell'anno mille (Storia del Cristianesimo, Rome 1971).

3. THE PAPACY

E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums II (Tübingen 1933); J. Haller, Das Papsttum I (Stuttgart, 2nd ed. 1953); F. X. Seppelt, Geschichte der Päpste II (Munich, 2nd ed. 1955); W. Ullmann, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (London, 3rd ed. 1970); P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei Papi del secolo VII (Milan 1971); L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini, VI–VII sec.

(Rome–Louvain 1972); O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte al Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Rome 1941).

4. CONVERSION OF THE GERMANS AND HISTORY OF THE CHURCH IN INDIVIDUAL COUNTRIES

W. Lange, Texte zur germanischen Bekehrungsgeschichte (Tübingen 1962); K. D. Schmidt, Die Bekehrung der Germanen zum Christentum I–II (Göttingen 1939–42); La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa del Alto Medioevo = Settimane di studio . . . XIV (Spoleto 1967); A. Hauck, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands I (Leipzig 1922; reprint, Berlin 1954); E. Mâle, La fin du paganisme en Gaule et les plus anciennes basiliques chrétiennes (Paris 1950); E. de Moreau, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique I (Brussels 2nd ed. 1945); R. Bauerreiss, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns (St. Ottilien, 2nd ed. 1958); R. Pfister, Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz (Zurich 1964); Z. Garcia Villada, Historia eclesiástica de España II: 409–711 (Madrid 1932); A. K. Ziegler, Church and State in Visigothic Spain (Washington 1930); K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Sueben bis zur Errichtung der katholischen Staatskirche (Berlin 1967); D. Claude, Adel, Kirche und Königtum im Westgotenreich (Sigmaringen 1971); K. Hughes, The Church in Early Irish Society (London 1966); L. Hardinge, The Celtic Church in Britain (London 1972); J. T. McNeill, The Celtic Churches. A History, A. D. 200–1200 (Chicago–London 1974); H. Mayr-Harting, The Coming of Christianity to Anglo-Saxon England (London 1972); C. J. Godfrey, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge 1962).

5. MONASTICISM

Il Monachesimo nell'Alto Medioevo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale = Settimane di studio . . . IV (Spoleto 1957); J. Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God (New York 1963); G. Penco, Storia del monachesimo in Italia I (Rome 1961); Ph. Schmitz, Histoire de l'ordre de Saint Benoit I–II (Maredsous, 2nd ed. 1948–49); F. Prinz; Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich (4.–8. Jn.; Munich–Vienna 1965); J. Ryan, Early Irish Monasticism (Dublin 1931).

6. SPIRITUALITY

J. Leclercq et al., Spirituality of the Middle Ages (London 1968) J. Leclercq, Aux sources de la spiritualité occidentale (Paris 1964); La Bibbia nell'Alto Medioevo = Settimane di studio . . . X (Spoleto 1963); F. Graus, Volk, Herrscher und Heilige im Reich der Merowinger (Prague 1965).

7. CANON LAW

C. de Clercq, La législation religieuse franque de Clovis à Charlemagne, 507–814, 2 vols. (Louvain 1936–58); H. E. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte, I: Die Katholische Kirche (Weimar, 5th ed. 1972); A. W. Ziegler, Religion, Kirche und Staat in Geschichte und Gegenwart, I: Geschichte (Munich 1969); E. Lesne, La propriété ecclésiastique en France aux époques romaine et mérovingienne (Paris 1910); S. Mochi Onory, Vescovi e città (sec. IV–VI; Bologna 1933); G. Vismara, Audientia episcopalis (Milan 1937); F. Lot–R. Fawtier, Histoire des institutions françaises au Moyen Age, III: Institutions ecclésiastiques (Paris 1962).

8. SPECIAL PERIODICALS

Frühmittelalterliche Forschungen (Berlin 1967ff.); Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France (Paris 1910ff.); Revista di storia della Chiesa in Italia (Rome 1947ff.); Hispania Sacra (Madrid 1948ff.); Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge 1972ff.).

The Background of Secular History

1. GENERAL PRESENTATIONS

M. Deanesly, A History of Early Medieval Europe (London 1956); J. M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Barbarian West (London, 2nd ed. 1957); Caratteri del secolo VII in occidente = Settimane di studio . . . V (Spoleto 1958); R. S. Lopez, The Birth of Europe, (London 1966); Il passaggio dall'antichità al Medioevo = Settimane di studio . . . IX (Spoleto 1962); H. Dannenbauer, Die Entstehung Europas, II: Die Anfänge der abendländischen Welt (Stuttgart 1962); Propyläen-Weltgeschichte, V: Islam; Die Entstehung Europas (Frankfurt–Vienna 1963); K. F. Stroheker, Germanentum und Spätantike (Zurich–Stuttgart 1965); P. E. Hübinger, Kulturbruch oder Kulturkontinuität im Übergang von der Antike zum Mittelalter = Wege der Forschung 201 (Darmstadt 1968); F. G. Maier, Die Verwandlung der Mittelmeerwelt = Fischers Weltgeschichte 9 (Hamburg 1968); J. Dhondt (ed.), Das frühe Mittelalter = Fischers Weltgeschichte 10 (Hamburg 1968); K. Bosl–A. Gieysztor et al., Eastern and Western Europe in the Middle Ages (London 1970); R. Folz, A. Guillou et al., De l'antiquité au monde médiéval (Paris 1972); Th. Schieder (ed.), Hdb. der Europäischen Geschichte, I: Europa im Wandel von der Antike zum Mittelalter (Stuttgart 1975).

2. WANDERING OF THE PEOPLES

J. Fischer, Die Völkerwanderung im Urteil der zeitgenössischen kirchlichen Schriftsteller (Heidelberg 1948); F. Behn, Römertum und Völkerwanderung (Stuttgart 1963); L. Musset, Les Invasions. Les vagues germanizues: Nouvelle Clio 12 (Paris 1965); O. Bertolini, I Germani-Migrazioni e regni nell'Occidente già romano (Milan 1965); L. Schmidt, Die Ostgermanen (Munich 1941, reprint 1969); L. Schmidt, Geschichte der Vandalen (Munich 1942); C. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique (Paris 1955); H. J. Diesner, Das Vandalenreich (Stuttgart 1966); E. Pontieri, Le invasioni barbariche e l'Italia del V e VI secolo (Naples 1960); I Goti in Occidente = Settimane di Studio III (Spoleto 1956); P. Scardiglia, Die Goten. Sprache und Kultur (Munich 1973); G. Pepe, Il medioevo bararico d'Italia (Turin 1963); G. P. Bognetti, Italia Langobarda I-IV (Milan 1966/68); Atti del Convegno internazionale sul tema: La civiltà dei Longobardi in Europa (Rome 1974); O. Perrin, Les Burgondes. Leur Histoire des origines à la fin du premier Royaume, 534 (Neuenburg 1968); Études mérovingiennes (Paris 1953); J. M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Longhaired Kings (London 1962); G. Tessier, Le Baptême de Clovis (Paris 1964); F. Lot, Naissance de la France (Paris 1970); G. Duby et al., Histoire de la France, I: Naissance d'une Nation (Paris 1970); E. Zollner, Geschichte der Franken (Munich 1970); G. Faider–Feytmans, La Belgique à l'époque mérovingienne (Brussels 1964); R. Menendez-Pidal, ed., Historia de España III (Madrid 1939, reprint 1957); D. Claude, Geschichte der Westgoten (Stuttgart 1970); M. Dillon-N. K. Chadwick, The Celtic Realms (London 1957); E. A. Thompson, A History of Attila and the Huns, (Oxford 1948.); id. The Early Germans (Oxford 1965); F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England (Oxford, 3rd ed. 1971); J. Morris, The Age of Arthur. A History of the British Isles from 350–650 (London 1973).

3. CULTURAL AND INTELLECTUAL HISTORY

M. L. W. Laistner, Thought and Letters in Western Europe A.D. 500–900 (London, 2nd ed. 1957); P. Brezzi, L'urto delle civiltà nell'alto medioevo (Rome 1971); P. Riché, Education and Culture in the Barbarian West, 6th–8th Centuries (Columbia, S.C., 1975); E. I. Raby, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages, 2 vols. (Oxford, 2nd ed. 1957); J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique, 2 vols. (Paris 1959); E. Salin, La civilisation mérovingienne, 4 vols. (Paris 1949–59); La Scuola nell'Occidente latino dell'Alto Medioevo = Settimane di Studio . . . XIX (Spoleto 1972); J. Paul, Histoire intellectuelle de l'Occident médiéval (Paris 1973).

4. HISTORY OF ART

A. Grabar–C. Nordenfolk, Le haut Moyen-Age du IV^{e} au XI^{e} siècle (Geneva 1957); J. Hubert–J. Porcher–W. F. Vollbach, L'Europe des Invasions (Paris 1967); P. Verzone, Werdendes Abendland, 425–800 = Kunst der Welt (Baden-Baden 1967); J. Beckwith, Early Medieval Art (New York 1974).

5. ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL HISTORY

R. Doehard, Le Haut Moyen-Age occidental. Économies et sociétés: Nouvelle Clio 14 (Paris 1971); A. Dopsch, The Economic and Social Foundations of European Civilization (New York 1937); S. Dill, Roman Society in Gaul in the Merovingian Age (London 1926; reprint 1967); E. Ennen, Frühgeschichte der europäischen Stadt (Bonn 1953); J. P. Bodmer, Der Krieger der Merowingerzeit und seine Welt (Zurich 1957); R. Latouche, The Birth of the Western Economy (London 1961); Moneta e Scambi nell'Alto Medioevo = Settimane di Studio . . . VIII (Spoleto 1961); R. Fossier, Histoire sociale de l'Occident médiéval (Paris 1970); F. Fourquin, Histoire économique de l'Occident médiéval (Paris, 2nd ed. 1971); C. M. Cipolla, The Fontana Economic History, I: The Middle Ages (London 1972); C. Verlinden, L'Esclavage dans l'Europe médiévale I (Bruges 1955); L. White, Medieval Technology and Social Change (New York 1966); G. Duby, Rural Economy and Country Life in the Medieval West (London 1966).

BIBLIOGRAPHY TO INDIVIDUAL CHAPTERS

Part One

The Development of the Church of the Empire within the Framework of the Imperial Religious Policy

1. From Christianity's Position of Equality to One of Privilege by the Favor of the Emperor Constantine I

SOURCES

First must be named those given in Vol. I, chaps. 29 and 30. A new edition of the Vita Constantini for the GCS is being prepared by F. Winkelmann; cf. id., Die Textbezeugung der Vita Constantini des Eusebius von Caesarea (Berlin 1962, TU 84); id., "Zur Geschichte des Authentizitätsproblems der Vita Constantini," Klio 40 (1962), 187–243. Constantine's letters and decrees are treated in Vol. I, chap. 30, of the work, already cited, by H. Dörries, 55–226, and H. Kraft, 207–270. Important now are Vol. I, pp. 58f., with the editions of the cited works of the Christian Church historians and chroniclers, and the works of the secular historians, especially Zosimus Historia nova, ed. L. Mendelssohn (Leipzig 1887, reprint ed. Hildesheim 1963); the Chronographia of Johannes Malalas, ed. J. Dindorf, CSHB 15 (Bonn 1831); the Chronicle of Theophanes Confessor, ed. C. de Boor (Leipzig 1883–5, reprint ed. Hildesheim 1963); the Chronicon Paschale, ed. Th. Mommsen: Chronica Minora I, 203ff. On the Latin side: Ammianus Marcellinus, Res gestae, ed. C. U. Clark (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1962) or J. C. Rolfe (latest edition London 1950–52); the Anonymus Valesianus, ed. Th. Mommsen: Chronica Minora I, 259ff. or L. A. Muratori, Rerum Italicarum scriptores 24, 4 (Milan 1913). A survey of the lesser sources of the fourth century is given by A. Piganiol, L'Empire Chrétien (325–395) (Paris, 2nd ed. 1972), 467–473.—Coinage: The Roman Imperial Coinage, VII: Constantine and Licinius, A.D. 313–337, by P. M. Bruun (London 1966).

LITERATURE

Besides the works cited in Vol. I: G. Bardy, "La politique religieuse de Constantin après le concile de Nicée," RevSR 8 (1928), 516–551; I. Karayannopoulos, "Konstantin der Grosse und der Kaiserkult," Historia 5 (1956), 341–357; K. Aland, "Der Abbau des Herrscherkultes im Zeitalter Konstantins," Kirchengesch. Entwürfe (Gütersloh 1960), 240–256; H. Dörries, "Konstantinische Wende und Glaubensfreiheit," Wort und Stunde I (Göttingen 1966), 1–117; C. Dupont, "Les privilèges des clercs sous Constantin," RHE 62 (1967), 729–752; R. MacMullen, Constantine (New York 1969); J. H. Smith, Constantine the Great (London 1971).

ON CONSTANTINE'S BUILDING ACTIVITY: General: L. Voelkl, "Die Konstantinischen Kirchenbauten nach Eusebius," RivAC 29 (1953), 49–66, 187–206; J. B. Ward Perkins, "Constantine and the Origins of the Christian Basilica," Papers of the British School at Rome 22 (1954), 69–90; R. Krautheimer, "The Constantinian Basilica," DOP 21 (1967), 115–140.—Palestine: C. Kopp, Palästina-Hefte des Dt. Vereins vom Heiligen Land 21–23 (1939), 117ff.; J. W. Crowfoot, Early Churches of Palestine (London 1941); E. Wifstrand, Göteborgs Högskola Årskrift 58 (1952), 1ff.—Rome: R. Vielliard, Recherches sur les origines de la Rome chrétienne (Mâcon 1941); F. W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Kirchen in Rom (Basel 1948); R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum christianarum Romae III (Rome 1967).—For Trier the reports of the excavation in the cathedral area by K. Th. Kempf: Neue Ausgrabungen in Deutschland (Berlin 1958), 368–379, and "Untersuchungen und Beobachtungen am Trierer Dom," Germania 42 (1964), 126–141.—Constantinople: H. Leclercq, "Byzance," DACL II/1, 1375–1388; A. Heisenberg, Grabeskirche und Apostelkirche, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1908); V. Schultze, Altchristliche Städte und Landschaften I (Leipzig 1913); E. Gerland, "Byzanz und die Gründung der Stadt Konstantinopel," BNJ 10 (1933), 93–105; R. Janin, Constantinople byzantine (Paris 1950); id., La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin I/3: Les églises et les monastères (Paris 1953); G. Downey, "The Builder of the Original Church of the Apostles at Constantinople," DOP 6 (1951), 53–80; Ph. Grierson, "The Tombs of the Byzantine Emperors," DOP 16 (1961), I–63; G. Bovini, "Le tombe degli imperatori d'Oriente dei secoli IV, V, VI," IX° Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina (Ravenna 1962), 155–178.

ON CONSTANTINE'S BAPTISM AND BURIAL: F. J. Dölger, "Die Taufe Konstantins und ihre religiösen Probleme," Konstantin d. Gr. und seine Zeit, 19. Suppl. Heft of the RQ (Freiburg 1913), 377–477; H. Kraft, "Zur Taufe Kaiser Konstantins," Stpatr I (TU 63, Berlin 1957), 642–648. —A. Kaniuth, Die Beisetzung Konstantins d. Gr. (Breslau 1941, Breslauer Hist. Forschungen 18); A. Grabar, Martyrium 1 (Paris 1946), 227–234.

2. Origin and Course of the Arian Controversy to the Death of Constantine (337)

SOURCES

Besides the works of the Church historians, Eusebius, Philostorgius, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret: G. H. Opitz, Urkunden zur Geschichte des arianischen Streites (318–328) = Athanasius, Werke III 1 (Berlin 1934). The extant fragments from Arius's writings in G. Bardy, Recherches sur Lucien d'Antioche et son école (Paris 1936), 216–278. The other writings of Athanasius in the Berlin edition, continued by W. Schneemelcher and M. Tetz, otherwise still PG 25–28. Important for this are F. L. Cross, The Study of St. Athanasius (Oxford 1945); G. Müller, Lexicon Athanasianum (Berlin 1944–52); other literature in Altaner–Stuiber (^{7}1966), 271–279. Creed and canons of Nicaea: DThC 11, 339–416; J. Alberigo, Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta (Freiburg–Rome 1962), 1–15; new critical edition by G. L. Dossetti, Il simbolo di Nicea e Costantinopoli (Rome 1967).—On the text of the creed: I. Órtiz de Urbina, El símbolo niceno (Madrid 1947); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (London, 2nd. ed. 1960), 205–262.—On the lists of conciliar participants: E. Schwartz, Über die Bischofslisten der Synoden von Chalkedon, Nikaia und Konstantinopel (Munich 1937); E. Honigmann: Byz(B) 11 (1936), 429–449, 14 (1939), 65–76, 16 (1942–43), 22–28, 20 (1950), 63–71.

LITERATURE

I. Órtiz de Urbina, "La politica de Costantino nella controversia ariana," Studi bizantini e neoellenici V (Rome 1939), 284–298; G. Bardy, "L'Occident et les documents de la controverse arienne," RSR 20 (1940), 28–63; J. de Ghellinck, "En marge des controverses ariennes," Misc. hist. A. De Meyer I (Louvain 1946), 159–180; W. Schneemelcher, "Zur Chronologie des arianischen Streites," ThLZ 79 (1954), 393–400; V. C. de Clercq, Ossius of Cordoba (Washington 1954); E. Boularand, "Les débuts d'Arius," BLE 65 (1964), 175–203.

ON THE COUNCIL OF NICAEA: M. Goemans, Het algemeen Concilie in de vierde eeuw (Nijmegen 1945); Le Concile et les Conciles (Paris 1960), with the essays by H. Marot, P.-Th. Camelot, Y. M.-J. Congar; I. Órtiz de Urbina, Nicée et Constantinople (Paris 1963). —On Athanasius: G. Bardy, S. Athanase (Paris 1925); E. Schwartz, Zur Geschichte des Athanasius = Ges. Schr. III (Berlin 1959); id., Zur Kirchengeschichte des 4. Jahrhunderts = Ges. Schr. IV (Berlin 1960), 1–110; D. Ritschl, Athanasius, Versuch einer Interpretation (Zurich 1964).

ON THE THEOLOGICAL QUESTION: W. Elliger, "Bemerkungen zur Theologie des Arius," ThStK 103 (1931), 224–251; H. Berkhof, Die Theologie des Eusebius von Caesarea (Amsterdam 1939); W. Schneemelcher, "Athanasius von Al. als Theologe und Kirchenpolitiker," ZNW, 43 (1950), 242–256; H. Kraft, "Ὁμοούσιος," ZKG 66 (1954), 1–24; G. Kretschmar, Studien zur frühchristlichen Trinitätstheologie (Tübingen 1956); C. Andresen, "Zur Entstehung des trinitarischen Personbegriffes," ZNW 52 (1961), 1–39; W. Marcus, Der Subordinationismus als historiologisches Problem (Munich 1963); P. Gerlitz, Ausserchristliche Einflüsse auf die Entwicklung des christlichen Trinitätsdogmas, zugleich ein religions-und dogmengeschichtlicher Versuch zur Erklärung der Herkunft des Homousios (Leiden 1963); H. Vogel, Das nikänische Glaubensbekenntnis. Eine Doxologie (Berlin 1963); A. Weber, 'Αρχή. Ein Beitrag zur Christologie des Eusebios von Cäsarea (Rome 1964); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition. From the Apostolic Age to Chalcedon (451) (London 1965), enlarged new edition of: Die theologische und sprachliche Vorbereitung der christologischen Formel von Chalkedon = Chalkedon I (Würzburg 1951), 5–202; E. Boularand, L'hérésie d'Arius et la "foi" de Nicée (Paris 1972).

3. The Struggle over the Council of Nicaea under the Sons of Constantine

SOURCES

As above for chap. 2; for the Arian Controversy add the Historia acephala in C. H. Turner, Ecclesiae occidentalis monumenta juris antiquissima I 2, 663–671; the collection of documents of Hilary of Poitiers in the Opus historicum, CSEL 65, and his other anti-Arian writings: PL 10. The canons and creeds of synods in E. J. Jonkers, Acta et symbola Conciliorum, quae saeculo IV habita sunt (Leiden 1954). H. Hess, The Canons of the Council of Sardica A. D. 343 (Oxford 1958, with bibliog.). Commentary on the most important documents by P.-P. Joannou, Die Ostkirche und die Cathedra Petri im 4. Jahrhundert (Stuttgart 1972). Decrees of the Emperors in the Codex Theodosianus, ed. Th. Mommsen–P. M. Meyer (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1954); also C. Pharr, The Theodosian Code (Princeton 1952), and P. R. Coleman-Norton, Roman State and Christian Church I (London 1966). For the history of the Emperors: Ammianus Marcellinus, Res gestae, ed. C. U. Clark (Berlin 1910–15).

LITERATURE

J. Moreau, "Constantinus II, Constantius II, Constans," JbAC 2 (1959), 160–184; F. Martroye, "La répression de la magie et le culte des gentils au IV^{e} siècle," RevueHistDroit 4 (1930), 669–701; G. Gigli, L'ortodossia, l'arianesimo e la politica di Costanzo II (Rome 1950); W. Telfer, "Paul of Constantinople," HThR 43 (1950), 31–92; G. H. Williams, "Christology and Church–State Relations in the fourth Century," CH 20 (Chicago 1951) no. 3, 3–33; no. 4, 3–26; J. Fleming, Commentary on the so-called Opus Historicum of Hilary of Poitiers (Diss. Durham 1951); W. Schneemelcher, "Serdica 342," EvTh, Sonderheft 1952, 83–104; M. Fortina, La legislazione dell'imperatore Costante (Novara 1955); K. Kraft, "Die Taten der Kaiser Constans und Constantius II," JbNumismatik und Geldgeschichte 9 (1958), 141–186; P. Galtier, S. Hilaire de Poitiers (Paris 1960); M. Simonetti, Studi sull'Arianesimo (Rome 1965); C. F. A. Borchardt, Hilary of Poitiers' Role in the Arian Struggle ('s-Gravenhage 1966); G. Folliet, "L'épiscopat africain et la crise arienne au IV^{e} siècle," RÉB 24 (1966), 196–223; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident 335–430 (Paris 1967); Hilaire et son temps. Actes du Colloque de Poitiers 1968 (Paris 1969); J. Doignon, Hilaire de Poitiers avant l'exil (Paris 1971).

4. The Attempted Restoration of Paganism by the Emperor Julian (361–363)

SOURCES

Iuliani imperatoris opera, ed. F. C. Hertlein, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1875–76); Iuliani imperatoris librorum Contra Christianos quae supersunt, ed. C. J. Neumann (Leipzig 1880); Iuliani imp. Epistulae, leges, poemata, fragmenta, ed. J. Bidez–F. Cumont (Paris 1922). Julian's works with English translation by W. C. Wright, 3 vols. (London 1913–23). New edition with French translation by J. Bidez–G. Rochefort–Chr. Lacombrade, I/II (Paris 1924–64). Julian's letters, Greek-German, ed. B. Weis (Munich 1973). Ammianus Marcellinus, Res gestae, ed. C. U. Clark (Leipzig 1910–15, reprint ed. 1963). Zosimus, Historia nova, ed. L. Mendelssohn (Leipzig 1887, reprint ed. 1963).

LITERATURE

Surveys in Pauly-Wissowa 10, 26–91, and DACL 8, 305–399. Also: J. Bidez, La vie de l'empereur Julien (Paris 1930); P. de Labriolle, La réaction païenne (Paris 1934), 369–436; R. Andreotti, Il regno dell'imperatore Giuliano (Bologna 1936); J. Vogt, Kaiser Julian und das Judentum (Leipzig 1939); H. Janssen, Kaiser Julians Herrscherideal (Diss. Kiel 1953); G. Ricciotti, L'imperatore Giuliano secondo i documenti (Milan 1956); G. Gigli, Giuliano l'apostata (Rome 1960); J. Leipoldt, Der römische Kaiser Julian in der Religionsgeschichte (Berlin 1964); P.-M. Camus, Ammien Marcellin (Paris 1967); H. Gärtner, Einige Überlegungen zur kaiserzeitlichen Panegyrik und zu Ammians Charakteristik des Kaisers Julian (Mainz 1968); Benoist-Méchin, L'empereur Julien ou le rêve calciné (Paris 1969).

5. Collapse of Arianism and Definitive Recovery of the Nicene Theology at the Council of Constantinople (381)

SOURCES

As for chaps. 3 and 4. To the writings of Athanasius and Hilary, add those of the Young Nicenes: Basil of Caesarea in PG 29–32; De Spiritu Sancto, trans. B. Pruche, SChr 17 (Paris 1947); In Hexaemeron, ed. S. Giet, SChr 26 (Paris 1949); Epistulae, ed. Y. Courtonne, I–III (Paris 1957–67). Gregory Nazianzen in PG 35–38; the five theological discourses, with translation and commentary by J. Barbel (Düsseldorf 1963); Epistulae, ed. P. Gallay, I–II (Paris 1964–1967). Gregory of Nyssa in PG 44–46, superseded by the edition of W. Jaeger–H. Langerbeck et al., vol. I–IX (Leiden 1921–67). Didymus the Blind, De Spiritu Sancto, in the translation by Jerome, PG 39. Epiphanius von Salamis, ed. K. Holl, GCS 25, 31, 37 (Leipzig 1915–33). On the Latin side: Ambrose, De fide ad Gratianum, De Spiritu Sancto, De incarnationis dominicae sacramento, ed. O. Faller, CSEL 78–79 (Vienna 1962–64); the letters in PL 16: discourses ibid. and in part in CSEL 73, ed. O. Faller (Vienna 1955). Acts of the Synod of Aquileia in PL 16, 916–955. The creed of Constantinople in G. L. Dossetti, Il simbolo di Nicea e di Costantinopoli (Rome 1967), 243–251.

LITERATURE

For the political history of the time, O. Seeck, Geschichte des Untergangs der antiken Welt 5 (Stuttgart, 2nd ed. 1920); E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire I (Paris 1959); G. Gigli, Il regno dell'Imperatore Graziano (Rome 1963).—F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche (Paris 1905); S. González, La fórmula μία οὐσία—τρεῖς ὑποτάσεις en S. Gregorio de Nisa (Rome 1939); B. Schewe, Basilius d. Gr. als Theologe (Diss. Nijmegen 1943); W. Ensslin, Die Religionspolitik des Kaisers Theodosius d. Gr. (Munich 1953); J. Plagnieux, S. Grégoire de Nazianze, théologien (Paris 1951); J. Lebon, "Le sort du 'consubstantiel' nicéen," RHE 47 (1952), 485–529, 48 (1953), 632–682 (Athanasius and Basil); G. L. Prestige, St. Basil the Great and Apollinaris of Laodicaea (London 1956); H. Dörries, De Spiritu Sancto. Der Beitrag des Basilius zum Abschluss des trinitarischen Dogmas (Göttingen 1956); L. Hermann, "Ambrosius als Trinitätstheologe," ZKG 69 (1958), 195–218; W. Seibel, Fleisch und Geist beim hl. Ambrosius (Munich 1958); E. Staimer, Die Schrift "De Spiritu Sancto" von Didymus dem Blinden von Alexandrien (Diss. Munich 1960); L. Béranger, Études sur la christologie du "De trinitate" attribué à Didyme l'Aveugle (Diss. Lyon 1960); N. Q. King, The Emperor Theodosius and the Establishment of Christianity (London 1961); I. Órtiz de Urbina, Nizäa and Konstantinopel (Mainz 1964); A.-M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol (Göttingen 1965); C. F. A. Borchardt, Hilary of Poitiers' Role in the Arian Struggle ('s-Gravenhage 1966); W. Jaeger, Gregor von Nyssas Lehre vom Heiligen Geist (Leiden 1966); J. Coman, "La démonstration dans le traité Sur le Saint Esprit de s. Basile le Grand," Stpatr 9 (Berlin 1966), 172–209.

6. Development of the Relationship of Church and State in the Fourth Century: The "Church of the Empire"

SOURCES

The most important texts on the Church's side in H. Rahner, Kirche und Staat im frühen Christentum (Munich 1961), 75–201 (with translation and introduction); the decrees of the Emperors in P. R. Coleman-Norton, Roman State and Christian Church I (London 1966). The original texts in the Codex Theodosianus and Justinianus.

LITERATURE

Besides the works cited in Vol. I, chap. 31, by Voigt, Berkof, Greenslade, Brisson, and Aland: H. v. Campenhausen, Ambrosius von Mailand als Kirchenpolitiker (Berlin 1929); M. Vogelstein, Kaiseridee–Romidee. Das Verhältnis von Kirche und Staat seit Konstantin (Breslau 1930); K. F. Hagel, Kirche und Kaisertum in Leben und Lehre des Athanasius (Diss. Tübingen 1933); I. -R. Palanque, S. Ambroise et l'empire Romain (Paris 1933); E. Peterson, "Der Monotheismus als politisches Problem," Theologische Traktate (Munich 1951), 45–147; H. Lietzmann, Das Problem Staat und Kirche im weströmischen Reich (Berlin 1940); K. M. Setton, Christian Attitude towards the Emperor in the Fourth Century (New York 1941); G. F. Reilly, Imperium and Sacerdotium according to St. Basil (Washington 1945); J. Stratmann, Die Heiligen und der Staat (Frankfurt 1950); W. Ensslin, Die Religionspolitik Theodosius' d. Gr. (Munich 1953); A. Strobel, Schriftverständnis und Obrigkeitsdenken in der ältesten Kirche (Diss. Erlangen 1956); A. A. Ehrhardt, Politische Metaphysik von Solon bis Augustin II (Tübingen 1959); K. Aland, "Kaiser und Kirche von Konstantin bis Byzanz," Kirchengeschichtliche Entwürfe (Gütersloh 1960), 257–279; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'empire Romain, IV^e^–V^e^ siècles (Paris 1959); D. S. Wallace-Hadrill, Eusebius of Caesarea (London 1960); N. G. King, The Emperor Theodosius and the Establishment of Christianity (London 1961); G. Pilati, Chiesa e Stato nei primi quindici secoli (Rome 1961); C. Morino, Chiesa e Stato nella dottrina di s. Ambrogio (Rome 1963); H. -J. Diesner, Kirche und Staat im spätrömischen Reich (Berlin 1963); R. Hernegger, Macht ohne Auftrag. Die Entstehung der Staats-und Volkskirche (Freiburg 1963); H. Nordberg, Athanasius and the Emperor (Helsinki 1963); E. L. Grasmück, Coercitio. Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit (Bonn 1964); K. F. Morrison, Rome and the City of God. An Essay on the Constitutional Relationships of Empire and Church in the Fourth Century (Philadelphia 1964); R. Farina, L'impero e l'imperatore cristiano in Eusebio di Cesarea. La prima teologia politica del cristianesimo (Zurich 1966, with bibliog., 329–347); A. Lippold, Theodosius der Gr. und seine Zeit (Stuttgart 1968); A. W. Ziegler, Religion, Kirche und Staat in Geschichte und Gegenwart I (Munich 1969), 124–162; F. Winkelmann, "Probleme der Herausbildung der Staatskirche im römischen Reich des IV. Jahrhunderts," Klio 53 (1971), 281–299; M. Azkoul, "Sacerdotium and Imperium," ThSt 32 (1971), 431–464.

Part Two
The Theological Disputes in East and West to the Middle of the Fifth Century

7. Christology to the Council of Ephesus (431)

SOURCES

The Church historians Socrates and Evagrius; F. Diekamp, Doctrina patrum de incarnatione Verbi (Münster 1907); H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea und seine Schule (Tübingen 1904), 167–270, 273–322; J. Flemming–H. Lietzmann, Apollinaristische Schriften (Syriac) = AGG 7, 4 (Berlin 1904). —Diodorus of Tarsus: R. Abramowski: ZNW 42 (1949), 19–49; M. Brière, "Fragments syriaques de Diodore de Tarse," ROC 10 (1946), 231–282. —Theodore of Mopsuestia: commentary on the Psalms, ed. R. Devreesse: SteT 93 (Rome 1939); commentary on John (a) Syriac, ed. I. M. Vosté: CSCO 115–116 (Louvain 1940); (b) Greek, ed. R. Devreese, "Essai sur Théodore de Mopsueste," SteT 141 (Rome 1948), 305–419; fragments of the commentary on the great Pauline Epistles in K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griech. Kirche (Münster 1933), 113–212; the catechetical homiles, ed. R. Tonneau: SteT 145 (Rome 1948). —Cyril of Alexandria: the dogmatic works in PG 75–76 and P. B. Pusey, S. Cyrilli Alex. Epist. oecum. contra Nestorium; De recta fide, 2 vols (Oxford 1875–77); letters in E. Schwartz: ACO I, 1–5 (Berlin 1927–30); De incarnatione Unigeniti; Quod unus sit Christus, ed. G. M. de Durand, SChr 97 (Paris 1964). —Nestorius: fragments in F. Loofs, Nestoriana (Halle 1905), in part also in E. Schwartz: ACO; P. Bedjan, Le livre d'Héraclide de Damas (Paris 1910); also L. Abramowski, "Untersuchungen zum Liber Heraclidis des Nestorius," CSCO 242, Subsidia 22 (Louvain 1963). —Acts of the Council of Ephesus, ed. E. Schwartz: ACO I, 1–2 (Strasbourg 1914ff.); also R. Devreesse: RSPhTh 18 (1929), 223–242, 408–431.

LITERATURE

The textbooks of the history of dogma: Harnack, DG II; Seeberg, II; Tixeront, II–III; Adam, I (Gütersloh 1965); HDG III 1a (Freiburg 1965). —R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies (London 1940); A. Gilg, Weg und Bedeutung der altkirchlichen Christologie (Munich 2nd ed. 1955); A. Gesché, "L'âme humaine de Jésus dans la christologie du IV^{e} siècle," RHE 54 (1959), 385–425; G. L. Prestige, Fathers and Heretics (London 5th ed. 1960); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 2nd ed. 1960); H. M. Diepen, Douze dialogues de christologie ancienne (Rome 1960); V. Monachino, "Il ruolo dei papi nelle grandi controversie cristologiche (399–555)," I papi nella storia (Rome 1961), 57–170; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition (London 1965). —On Apollinaris: C. A. Raven, Apollinarianism (Cambridge 1923); H. de Riedmatten, "La christologie d'Apoll. de L.," Stpatr 2 (TU 64, Berlin 1957), 208–234; H. A. Wolfson, "Philosophical Implications of Arianism and Apollinarianism," DOP 12 (1958), 3–28. —On Diodorus of Tarsus: G. Bardy: DSp 3, 986–994; L. Abramowski: DHGE 14, 495–504; R. A. Greer, "The Antiochene Christology of Diodor of T.," JThS 17 (1966), 327–341. —On Theodore of Mopsuestia: E. Amann: DThC 15, 235–279; F. A. Sullivan, The Christology of Th. of M. (Rome 1956); L. Abramowski, "Zur Theologie Th.s v. M.," ZKG 72 (1961), 262–293; R. A. Greer, Th. of M. Exegete and Theologian (London 1961); U. Wickert, Studien zu den Pauluskommentaren Th.s v. M. als Beitrag zum Verständnis der Antiochenischen Theologie (Berlin 1962); R. A. Norris, Manhood and Christ. A Study in the Christology of Th. of M. (London 1963). —On Nestorius: E. Amann: DThC 11, 76–157; A. Grillmeier: ThPh 41 (1966), 401–410; F. Loofs, Nestorius and His Place in the History of Christian Doctrine (Cambridge 1914); I. Rucker, Das Dogma von der Persönlichkeit Christi und das Problem der Häresie des Nestorius (Oxenbrunn 1934); E. Amann, "L'affaire de Nestorius vue de Rome," RevSR 23 (1949), 5–37, 207–244; 24 (1950), 28–52, 235–265; L. I. Scipioni, Ricerche sulla cristologia del Libro di Eraclide di Nestorio (Fribourg 1956); A. Grillmeier, "Das scandalum oecumenicum des Nestorius," Scholastik 36 (1961), 321–356; M. V. Anastos, "Nestorius Was Orthodox," DOP 16 (1962), 117–140. —On Cyril of Alexandria: J. van den Dries, The Formula of St. Cyril of Al. Μια φύσις τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγου σεσαρϰωμένη (Rome 1939); H. du Manoir, Dogme et spiritualité chez s. Cyrille d'Alexandrie (Paris 1944); J. Liébaert, La doctrine christologique de s. Cyrille d'Alexandrie avant la querelle néstorienne (Lille 1951); L. M. Armendariz, El nuevo Moisés. Dinámica cristocéntrica en la tipología de Cirilo de Al. (Madrid 1962); P. Galtier, Chalkedon I 345–387; G. M. de Durand: SChr 97 (Paris 1964), 81–150. —On the Council of Ephesus: A. d'Alès, Le dogme d'Éphèse (Paris 1931); P. -Th. Camelot, Ephesus und Chalkedon (Mainz 1963).

8. From Ephesus to Chalcedon

SOURCES

As for chap. 7; also: J. Flemming, Die Akten des Ephesinischen Konzils vom Jahre 449 (Göttingen 1917); acts of the Council of Chalcedon in ACO II/1–6 (Berlin 1933–38), in them (II/5) Liberatus, Breviarium causae Nestorianorum et Eutychianistarum; Gesta de nomine Acacii vel Breviculum historiae Eutychianistarum in CSEL 35, 440–453. The works of Theodoret of Cyrrhue in PG, 75–76; 83; the Expositio fidei in J. C. Otto, Corpus apologetarum 4 (Jena 3rd ed. 1880, reprint ed. Wiesbaden 1969); letters of Theodoret, ed. Y. Azéma: SChr 44, 98, 111 (Paris 1955–65). Separate edition of the pertinent letters of Leo the Great, Tomus ad Flavianum; Contra Eutychis haeresim, ed. C. Silva-Tarouca, Textus et Docum. 9, 15, 20 (Rome 1932, 1934, 1935), otherwise, ACO II 1–4 (Liste II 4, 170f.).

LITERATURE

As for chap. 7; also: M. Richard, "Notes sur l'évolution doctrinale de Théodoret," RSPhTh 25 (1936), 459–481; C. da Mazzarino, La dottrina di Teodoreto di Ciro sull'unione ipostatica (Rome 1941); H. Dörries, "Hypostasis. Wort- und Bedeutungsgeschichte," NAG phil. -hist. Kl. 3 (1955), 35–92; L. Abramowski, "Der Streit um Diodor und Theodor zwischen den beiden ephesinischen Konzilien," ZKG 67 (1955–56), 252–287—M. Jugie, "Eutychès et Eutychianisme," DThC 5, 1582–1609; id., "Monophysisme," ibid., 10, 2217–2306; E. Schwartz, Der Prozess des Eutyches (SAM 5, Munich 1929); R. Draguet, "La christologie d'Eutychès d'après les actes du synode de Flavien (448)," Byz(B) 6 (1931), 441–457; M. J. Nicolas, "La doctrine christologique de saint Léon le Grand," RThom 51 (1951), 609–660; Th. Sagi-Bunić, Deus perfectus et homo perfectus, a concilio Ephesino (a. 431) ad Chalcedonense (a. 451) (Rome 1965). —R. Sellers, The Council of Chalcedon (London 1953); A. Grillmeier–H. Bacht, Das Konzil von Chalkedon I–III (Würzburg 2nd ed. 1960), here III, 828–865 bibliog. by A. Schönmetzer; K. Sarkissian, The Council of Chalcedon and the Armenian Church (London 1965); W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement (Cambridge 1972).

9. The Origenist Controversy at the Turn of the Fourth and Fifth Centuries

SOURCES

Epiphanius Salam., Ancoratus 13; Panarion 63, 1–72, 9; Ep. ad Joh. Hierosol. = Jerome, Ep. 51. Rufinus, De adulteratione librorum Origenis; Apologia ad Anastasium; Apologia contra Hieronymum; the prologues to his translations of Origen in CChr 20 (1961), ed. M. Simonetti; the Apologia also separately (Alba 1957). Jerome, Apologia adversus libros Rufini; Contra Joh. Hierosolymitanum in PL 23, 371–514; the letters, CSEL 54–56. Anastasius papa, Ep. ad Joh. Hieros; Ep. ad Simplicianum in PL 20, 68–76.

LITERATURE

G. Fritz: DThC 11, 1565–1588; A. d'Alès: DAp 3, 1228–1258; G. Grützmacher, Hieronymus 3 (Berlin 1908) 1–94; K. Holl–A. Jülicher, "Die Zeitfolge des ersten origenistischen Streites," in K. Holl, Ges. Aufs. 2 (Tübingen 1928), 310–350; F. Cavallera, Saint Jérôme I (Paris 1922), 193–288; II, 31–46, 115–126; M. Villain, "Rufin d'Aquilée. La querelle autour d'Origène," RSR 27 (1937), 5–37, 165–197; F. X. Murphy, Rufinus of Aquileia (Washington 1945); B. Th. Stauridis, "Αἱ 'Ωριγενιστικαὶ ἔριδες," Θεολογία 28 (1957), 550–577.

10. The Priscillianist Movement

SOURCES

Survey in B. Vollmann, Studien zum Priszillianismus (St. Ottilien 1965), 52–83. The most important: Priscilliani quae supersunt, ed. G. Schepss, CSEL 18 (Vienna 1889); also G. Morin, "Pro Instantio," RBén 30 (1930), 153–173; and J. Martin: HJ 47 (1927), 237–251. Orosius, Commonitorium de errore Priscillianistarum = CSEL 18, 151–157. Sulpicius Severus, Chronica 2, 46–51; Dialogus 3, 11–13 (CSEL 1, 99–105, 208–211). Canons of the Spanish synods in J. Vives, Concilios Visigóticos y Hispano-Romanos (Barcelona–Madrid 1963).

LITERATURE

Comprehensive listing to 1965 in B. Vollmann, op. cit., xii–xxiv. G. Bardy: DThC 13, 391–400; E. Ch. Babut, Priscillien et le Priscillianisme (Paris 1909); J. A. Davids, De Orosio et s. Augustino Priscillianistarum adversariis commentatio historica et philologica

(Hagae Comitis 1930); A. d'Alès, Priscillien et l'Espagne chretiénne (Paris 1936); M. Martin, Correntes da Filosofia religiosa em Braga des IV a VIs. (Porto 1950); J. M. Ramos y Losertales, Prisciliano. Gesta rerum (Salamanca 1952); J. Madoz, "Arrianismo y Priscilianismo en Galicia," Bracara Augusta 8 (1957), 68–87; W. Schatz, Studien zur Geschichte und Vorstellungswelt des frühen abendländischen Mönchtums (typed diss. Freiburg i. Br. 1957), 98–259; A. Barbero de Aguilera, "El priscilianismo; ¿herejía o movimiento social?," Cuadernos de historia de España 37–8 (1963), 5–41; P. Stockmeier, "Das Schwert im Dienst der Kirche. Zur Hinrichtung Priszillians in Trier," Festschr. Al. Thomas (Trier 1967), 415–428; J. L. Orella, "La penitencia en Prisciliano (340–385)," HS 21 (1968), 21–56.

11. The Struggle with Donatism

SOURCES

H. v. Soden, Urkunden zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Donatismus, KlT 122 (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1950). For the rest of the Donatist literature: P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne V (Paris 1920). Optatus of Mileve, De schismate Donatistarum, ed. C. Ziwsa: CSEL 26 (Vienna 1893). The anti-Donatist works of Augustine, ed. M. Petschenig: CSEL 51–53 (Vienna 1908–10), and in the Bibliothèque Augustinienne, vols. 28, 29, 32 (Paris 1963–66). On the chronology of these works and of the pertinent letters and sermons of Augustine: P. Monceaux, op. cit., 7 (1923), 275–292. Gesta collationis Carthaginiensis in PL 11, 1231–1418, Mansi IV, 19–245, ed. S. Lancel, Schr. 194–197 (Paris 1972ff.). Archeological material in H. Leclercq, "Donatisme," DACL 4, 1457–1505; P. Courcelle: MAH 53 (1936), 166–197; and A. Berthier et al., Les vestiges du christianisme antique dans la Numidie centrale (Algiers 1942).

LITERATURE

A) ON DONATISM IN GENERAL: E. Altendorf, Einheit und Heiligkeit der Kirche (Berlin 1932); W. H. C. Frend, The Donatist Church (London, 2nd ed. 1971); S. L. Greenslade, Schism in the Early Church (London 1953); Ch. Courtois, Les Vandales d'Afrique (Paris 1955); J. B. Brisson, Autonomisme et christianisme dans l'Afrique romaine (Paris 1958); also important A. Mandouze, "Encore le Donatisme," Antiquité classique 29 (1960), 61–107; Th. Büttner–E. Werner, Circumcellionen und Adamiten (Berlin 1959); H. -J. Diesner, Kirche und Staat im spätrömischen Reich (Berlin 1963); E. Tengström, Donatisten und Katholiken (Stockholm 1964); E. Grasmück, Coercitio. Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit (Bonn 1965).

B) ON AUGUSTINE AND THE DONATISTS: Surveys in C. Andresen, Bibliographia Augustiniana (Darmstadt 1962); T. van Bavel, Répertoire bibliographique de saint Augustin 1950–1960 (Steenbrugge 1963); E. Lamirande, "Un siècle et demi d'études sur l'ecclésiologie de saint Augustin. Essai bibliographique," RevÉAug 8 (1962), 1–125.—Basic are: P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne IV–VII (Paris 1920–23); P. Batiffol, Le catholicisme de saint Augustin (Paris, 4th ed. 1929); G. G. Willis, S. Augustine and the Donatist Controversy (London 1950); J. Ratzinger, Volk und Haus Gottes in Augustins Lehre von der Kirche (Munich 1954); the essays in Augustinus Magister II (Paris 1954), 835–914; St. J. Grabowsky, The Church. An Introduction to the Theology of Saint Augustine (St. Louis 1957); E. Lamirande, L'église céleste selon saint Augustin (Paris 1963); G. Bonner, St. Augustine of Hippo (London 1963), 237–311; R.

Crespin, Ministère et sainteté. Pastorale du clergé et solution de la crise donatiste dans la vie et la doctrine de saint Augustin (Paris 1965); H. B. Weijland, Augustinus en de kerkelijke tucht (Kampen 1965); P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo (London 1967), 212–243; A. Mandouze, Saint Augustin (Paris 1968), 331–411; O. Perler, Les voyages de s. Augustin (Paris 1969); E. Lamirande, La situation ecclésiologique des Donatistes d'après s. Augustin (Ottawa 1972); on the conference of 411: S. Lancel: Schr. 194, 9–287.

12. Pelagius and the Aftermath

SOURCES

A. Bruckner, Quellen zur Gesch. des pelagianischen Streites (Tübingen 1906). Survey of the extant Pelagian literature by J. Morris: JThS n.s. 16 (1965), 26–60. Catalogue of the genuine and disputed writings of Pelagius by A. Hamman: PL Suppl. 1, 1101–1109.—Pelagius, Expositiones in epistulas Sancti Pauli, ed. A. Souter, TSt 9, 1–3 (Cambridge 1922, 1926, 1931); its text: PL Suppl. 1, 1110–1374; Libellus fidei ad Innoc. in PL 45, 1716–1718; Epistula ad Demetriadem, ibid., 30, 15–46. Basic for the question of authenticity, G. de Plinval, Pélage, ses écrits, sa vie et sa réforme (Lausanne 1943); id., Essai sur le style et la langue de Pélage (Fribourg 1947); id., RÉL 29 (1951), 284–294; R. F. Evans, Four Letters of Pelagius (London 1968).—Julian of Aeclanum, Commentarius in prophetas minores tres: PL 21, 950–1104; Expositio libri Job: PL Suppl. I, 1573–1679.

THE ANTI-PELAGIAN AUTHORS: Jerome, Dialogi contra Pelagianos: PL 23, 495–590; Ep. 133: CSEL 56, 241–260; Orosius, Liber apologeticus contra Pelagianos: CSEL 5, 603–664; Marius Mercator, Commonitorium and Super nomine Caelestii: ACO I 5, 5–23, 65–70; Augustine: CSEL 42 and 60, rec. C. F. Vrba and I. Zycha (Vienna 1902, 1912); PL 44–45; S. Kopp–A. Zumkeller, Aurel. Augustinus, Schriften gegen die Semipelagianer (Würzburg 1955); A. Zumkeller, Augustinus, Schriften gegen die Pelagianer I–II (Würzburg 1964–71). In the Bibliothèque Augustinienne there has so far appeared Vol. 24 (Paris 1962: writings against the Semipelagians) by J. Chéné and J. Pintard; and Vol. 21 (Paris 1966: De natura et gratia; De perf. justit. hom.; De gestis Pelagii) by G. de Plinval and J. de la Tullaye. A useful compendium of Augustinian texts (with French translation) on the doctrine of grace by J. Chéné, La theologie de s. Augustin. Grace et predestination (Le Puy–Lyon 1962).

LITERATURE:

ON PELAGIUS: A.-J. Gaudel: DThC 12, 382–406; R. Hedde–E. Amann, "Pélagianisme," ibid., 12, 675–715; E. Dinkler: Pauly-Wissowa 19, 226–242; G. de Plinval (see supra, under Sources); J. Rivière, "Hétérodoxie des Pélagiens en fait de rédemption," RHE 41 (1946), 5–43; J. Ferguson, Pelagius (Cambridge 1956); T. Bohlin, Die Theologie des Pelagius (Uppsala 1957); S. Prete, Pelagio e il Pelagianismo (Brescia 1961); R. F. Evans, Pelagius (London 1968); P. Brown, Religion and Society in the Age of St. Augustine (London 1972), 183–226.

ON JULIAN OF AECLANUM: A. Hamman: PL Suppl. 1, 1571–1572; G. Bouwman, Des Julian von Aeclanum Kommentar zu den Propheten Osee, Joel und Amos (Rome 1958); R. Refoulé, "Julien d'Éclane, théologien et philosophe," RSR 52 (1964), 42–84, 233–247.

ON AUGUSTINE: The sections in the Augustine bibliography of C. Anderson and T. Bavel (see chap. 11) and in Bibliothèque August. 24 (1962), 29–38; 21 (1966) 19–23; N.

Merlin, S. Augustin et les dogmes du péché originel et de la grâce (Paris 1931); Y. de Montcheuil, "La polémique de s. Augustin contre Julien d'Éclane," RSR 44 (1956), 191–218; A. Guzzo, Agostino contro Pelagio (Turin 1958); H. Ulbrich, "Augustins Briefe zum pelagianischen Streit" (typed diss., Göttingen 1958), partial printing: RevÉAug 9 (1963), 51–75, 235–258; J. Gross, Entstehungsgeschichte des Erbsündendogmas I (Basel 1960); J. Chéné, "Les origines de la controverse semi-pélagienne," ATh 13 (1953), 56–109; RSR 43 (1955), 321–341; N. K. Chadwick, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul (London 1955), 170–239; F. J. Thonnard, "La prédestination augustinienne et l'interprétation de O. Rottmanner," RevÉAug 9 (1963), 259–287; id., "La prédestination augustinienne, sa place en philosophie augustinienne," ibid., 10 (1964), 97–239; M. Huftier, Le tragique de la condition chrétienne chez s. Augustin (Paris 1964); id., Libre arbitre, liberté et péché chez s. Augustin (Louvain 1968); J. M. List, "Augustine on Free Will and Predestination," JThS NS 20 (1969), 420–447. The corresponding chapters in the books on Augustine (see chap. 7) by G. Bonner (317–393), P. Brown (340–407), and A. Mandouze (391–453); E. TeSelle, Augustine the Theologian (London 1970); G. Bonner, Augustine and Modern Research on Pelagianism (Villanova 1972).

Part Three
Inner Life of the Church Between Nicaea and Chalcedon

13. Missionary Activity of the Church

Sections One and Two

LITERATURE

Most important bibliog. in A. Seumois, "La mission chez les Pères," Spiritus 5 (1964), 215–219, and in K. Baus, "Erwägungen zu einer künftigen 'Geschichte der christlichen Mission in der Spätantike' (4.–6. Jh.)," Reformata Reformanda, Festgabe f. H. Jedin (Münster 1965), 22–38. There is no reliable complete presentation of the history of the missions in this period, even in the special works by J. Schmidlin (Steyl 1925); S. Delacroix, Histoire des Missions catholiques I (Paris 1956); A. Mulders, Missiegeschiedenis (Bussum 1957). W. H. C. Frend, "The Missions of the Early Church 180–700 A.D.," MiscHistEccl III (Louvain 1970), 3–23, takes up only individual questions. First sketch by B. Kötting, "Christentum" in RAC II (1954) 1138–1159. Important are the respective articles on various countries in RAC. Also K. S. Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity I (New York 1937), 171–369, and the pertinent sections in Fliche-Martin III (1926), 216–224, 489–504; IV (1937) 321–336, 497–534 (hitherto the most reliable presentation). The literature on the evangelization of individual provinces and countries is mentioned in the notes.

ON THE QUESTION OF MISSIONARY METHOD: A. D. Nock, Conversion (Oxford 1933); G. Bardy, La conversion au christianisme durant les premiers siècles (Paris 1949); K. Aland, Über den Glaubenswechsel in der Geschichte des Christentums (Berlin 1961); Chr. Mohrmann, "Das Sprachproblem in der frühchristlichen Mission," ZMR 38 (1954), 103–111; J. Lecuyer, "Aspects missionnaires de l'initiation selon les Pères de l'église," NZM 15 (1959), 1–13; E. Lamirande, Pentecôte et mission chez les Pères de l'église (Paris 1964); P. P. Joannou, La législation impériale et la christianisation de l'empire, 311–476 (Rome 1972).

Section Three

LITERATURE

GENERAL HISTORY: E. Stein, Gesch. des spätrömischen Reiches I (Vienna 1928, Paris 2nd ed. 1959); id., Histoire du Bas Empire II (Paris–Brussels 1949); L. Schmidt, Gesch. der deutschen Stämme bis zum Ausgang der Völkerwanderungszeit, I: Die Ostgermanen (Munich, 2nd ed. 1941); id., Gesch. der Wandalen (Munich 1942); Ch. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique (Paris 1955); Chr. Sevin, Die Gepiden (Munich 1955); "I Goti in Occidente," Settimane di studio . . . III (Spoleto 1956); H. Rosenfeld, Ostgoten und Westgoten: Die Welt als Geschichte 17 (1957), 245–258.

GERMANIC RELIGION: W. Baetke, Art und Glaube der Germanen (Hamburg, 2nd ed. 1934); V. Grunbech, Kultur und Religion der Germanen, 2 vols. (Hamburg, 5th ed. 1954); J. de Vries, Altgermanische Religionsgeschichte, 2 vols. (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1956–57).

GENERAL HISTORY OF CONVERSION AND OF THE CHURCH: H. v. Schubert, Gesch. der christlichen Kirche im Frühmittelalter (Tübingen 1921); K. D. Schmidt, Die Bekehrung der Germanen zum Christentum, I: Der ostgermanische Arianismus (Göttingen 1939); II: Die katholische Mission bei den Westgermanen (Göttingen n.d. [1942]); G. Haendler, Gesch. des Frühmittelalters und der Germanenmission: Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte. Ein Hdb., ed. K. D. Schmidt and E. Wolf, II (Göttingen 1961). Especially to be consulted is the detailed criticism of the literature appearing up to 1959 by G. Haendler, op. cit.—J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'empire (Paris 1918); A. D. Momigliano, Paganism and Christianity in the 4th Century (Oxford 1963); in it, E. A. Thompson, "Christianity and the Northern Barbarians"; "La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'Alto Medio Evo," Settimane di studio del Centr XIV (Spoleto 1967); in it, inter alia, R. Manselli, "La conversione dei popoli germanici al cristianesimo. La discussione storiografica."

BASIC IDEAS OF THE MISSION: S. Delacroix, Histoire universelle des missions catholiques I (Paris 1956); A. V. Seumois, La papauté et les missions au cours des six premiers siècles (Paris–Louvain 1951); F. Paschoud, Roma aeterna. Études sur le patriotisme romain dans l'Occident latin à l'époque des grandes invasions (Zurich 1967); W. H. Fritze, "Universalis gentium confessio," Frühmittelalterliche Studien 3 (1969), 78–130; there also other literature.

CONVERSION OF THE GOTHS: P. G. Scardigli, "La conversione dei Goti al cristianesimo," Settimane di studio . . . XIV (Spoleto 1967), 47–86; E. A. Thompson, "The Date of the Conversion of the Visigoths," JEH 7 (1956), 1–11; id., "Early Visigothic Christianity," Latomus 21 (1962); id., The Visigoths in the Time of Ulfila (Oxford 1966). Thompson's theses are controverted.

GOTHIC BIBLE: Edition: W. Streitberg (Germanische Bibliothek II Bd 3, 1, Heidelberg 1919); F. Kaufmann, "Der Stil der gotischen Bibel," Zs. f. Deutsche Philologie 48 (1920), 7–80, 165–235, 349–388; 49 (1923), 11–57; H. Steubing, "Miscellen zur gotischen Bibelübersetzung des Ulfilas," ZKG 64 (1952–53), 137–165; K. Weinhold, Die gotische Sprache im Dienst des Christentums (Halle 1870); P. G. Scardigli, Lingua e storia dei Goti (Florence 1964); A. Mentz," Schrift und Sprache der Burgunder," ZdAdL 85 (1954), 1–17.

GERMAN CULTURE AND ARIANISM: O. Dibelius, Die Germanisierung des Christentums (Berlin 1934); H. E. Giesecke, Die Ostgermanen und der Arianismus (Leipzig–Berlin 1939). For the current state of the discussion cf. G. Haendler, op. cit.

ARIAN CHURCH ORGANIZATION: H. v. Schubert, Staat und Kirche in den arianischen Königreichen und im Reiche Chlodwigs (Munich–Berlin 1912); U. Stutz, Die Eigenkirche als Element des mittelalterlich-germanischen Kirchenrechts (1895; reprinted 1957). Other literature in Feine, RG I. Most recent opinion: R. Höslinger: ÖAKR 3 (1952), 267ff.

For a discussion of the Gothic Arian influence on the Bavarians and Thuringians, cf. G. Haendler, op. cit., 9ff.

14. The Building of the Organization of the Church of the Empire

LITERATURE

1. GENERAL: J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'empire romain (Paris 1959); Plöchl I; Feine, RG: in these three works are also surveys of the corresponding canonical sources.—W. de Vries, "Die Struktur der Kirche gemäss dem Konzil von Chalkedon," OrChrP 35 (1968), 63–122; id., "Die Struktur . . . von Ephesos," AHC 2 (1970), 22–25; id., "Die Struktur der Kirche gemäss dem 1. Konzil von Nidaia," Wegzeichen. Festgabe H. Biedermann (Würzburg 1971), 55–81.

2. SPECIAL: A. Scheuermann, "Diözese," RAC III 1053–1063; P. de Labriolle, "Paroecia," BullDuCange 3 (1927), 196–205; id., RSR 18 (1928), 60–72; K. Müller, "Parochie und Diözese," ZNW 32 (1933), 149–185; S. Mochi Onory, Vescovi e città (Bologna 1933); H. Leclercq, "Métropole," DACL XL, 786–790; DDC I, 927–934; VI, 872–877; F. Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium (Cambridge, Mass. 1958); H. Chadwick; The Circle and the Ellipse. Rival Concepts of Authority in the Early Church (Oxford 1959); E. Lanne, "Églises locales et patriarcats à l'époque des grands conciles," Irénikon 34 (1961), 292–321; W. de Vries, "Die Entstebung der Patriarchate des Ostens und ihr Verhältnis zur päpstlichen Vollgewalt," Scholastik 37 (1962), 341–369; id., "Antiochien und Seleukia-Ktesiphon," Mél. Tisserant (Rome 1964), 429–450; H. Grotz, Die Hauptkirchen des Ostens von den Anfängen bis zum Konzil von Nikaia 325 (Rome 1964); Y. Congar–B. D. Dupuy, Das Bischofsamt und die Weltkirche (Stuttgart 1964); I Patriarcati orientali nel primo millennio (Rome 1968).—N. Jung, "Concile," DDC III 1268–1280; G. Roethe, Zur Geschichte der römischen Synoden im 3. und 4. Jahrhundert (Stuttgart 1937); M. Goemans, Het algemeene concilie in de vierde eeuw (Nijmegen 1945); G. Kretschmar, "Die Konzile der alten Kirche" in H. J. Margull, Die ökumenischen Konzile der Christenheit (Stuttgart 1961), 75–200; J. Hajjar, Le synode permanent dans l'église byzantine des origines au XI^e^ siècle (Rome 1962).

15. The Further Development of the Roman Primacy from Melchiades to Leo I

SOURCES

Papal Letters: PL 13, 20, 50, 54; most of the letters of Celestine I, Boniface I, Sixtus III, and Leo I in a new edition by E. Schwartz: ACO. Die Briefe über das Vikariat Thessalonike, ed. C. Silva-Tarouca, Collectio Thessalonicensis (Rome 1937). L. Duchesne, LP. C. H. Turner, Ecclesiae occidentalis monumenta Iuris antiquissima I, II 3 (Oxford 1930).

LITERATURE

H. Grisar, Geschichte Roms und der Päpste im Mittelalter I (Freiburg 1900), 1–79; J. Chapman, Studies on the Early Papacy (London 1928); P. Batiffol, La paix constantinienne (Paris, 4th ed. 1929); id., Le siège apostolique 359–451 (Paris, 3rd ed. 1924); id., Cathedra Petri (Paris 1938); E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums I (Tübingen 1930); J. Haller, Das

Papsttum I (Stuttgart, 2nd ed. 1950); F. X. Seppelt, Geschichte der Päpste I (Munich, 2nd ed. 1954); M. Maccarrone, Vicarius Christi. Storia del titolo papale (Rome 1952); H. Marot, "Les conciles romains des IV et V siècles et le développement de la primauté," Istina 4 (1957), 435–462; J. Meyendorff, "La primauté romaine dans la tradition canonique jusqu'au concile de Chalcédoine," ibid., 463–482; G. Jouassard, "Sur les décisions des conciles généraux des IV et V siècles dans leur rapport avec la primauté," ibid., 485–496; A. Rimoldi, L'apostolo San Pietro fondamento della chiesa, principe degli apostoli ed ostiario celeste nella Chiesa primitiva dalle origini al concilio di Calcedonia (Rome 1958); M. Maccarrone, La dottrina del primato papale dal IV all' VIII secolo nelle relazioni con le chiese occidentali (Spoleto 1960); V. Monachino, "Il primato nella controversia ariana," Saggi storici intorno al papato (Rome 1959); id., Il ruolo dei papi nelle grandi controversi cristologiche; Il papato tra Bizantini e Langobardi," I papi nella storia I (Rome 1961), 57–254; id., "Il primato nello scisma donatista," AHPont 2 (1964), 7–44; C. Falconi, Storia dei papi e del papato I: La nascita del papato nel declino del impero (Rome 1967); M. Maccarrone, San Pietro in rapporto a Cristo nelle piu àntiche testimonianze (Rome 1968); W. Marschall, Karthago und Rom. Die Stellung der nordafrikanischen Kirchen zum apostolischen Stuhl in Rom (Stuttgart 1971); P.-P. Joannou, Die Ostkirche und die Cathedra Petri im 4. Jahrhundert (Stuttgart 1972).

16. The Clergy of the Church of the Empire

LITERATURE

1. GENERAL: Surveys in J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain, IV–V siècles (Paris 1958), 98–185; Plöchl I (Vienna, 2nd. ed. 1960), 176–189; Feine, RG, 125–145 (lit.); D. Zähringer, Das kirchliche Priestertum nach dem hl. Augustinus (Paderborn 1931); G. Bardy (ed.), Prêtres d'hier et d'aujourd'hui (Paris 1954); Études sur le sacrement de l'ordre = Lex orandi 22 (Paris 1957); G. Pintard, Le sacerdoce selon s. Augustin (Paris 1960); R. Crespin, Ministerè et sainteté. Pastorale du clergé et solution de la crise donastiste dans la vie et la doctrine de s. Augustin (Paris 1965); R. Gryson, Le prêtre selon s. Ambroise (Louvain 1968); L. Ott, "Das Weihesakrament. Die nachnizänische Patristik," HDG IV 5 (Freiburg 1969), 19–39.

2. INDIVIDUAL QUESTIONS: M. Andrieu, Les ordres mineurs (Paris 1925); W. Croce, "Die niederen Weihen und ihre hierarchische Wertung," ZKTh 70 (1948), 257–315; "Diakonat," DACL IV, 738–746; RAC III, 888–909; DSAM III, 799–817; J. Blockscha, "Die Altersvorschriften für die höheren Weihen im ersten Jahrtausend," AkathKR 111 (1931), 31–83; P.-H. Lafontaine, Les conditions positives de l'accession aux ordres dans la première législation ecclésiastique (Ottawa 1963), 300–492; R. Gryson, Le ministère des femmes dans l'eglise ancienne (Gembloux 1972). Celibacy:—DACL II, 2802–2832; DSAM II, 385–386; B. Kötting, Der Zölibat in der alten Kirche (Münster, 2nd ed. 1970); R. Gryson, Les origines du célibat ecclésiastique (Gembloux 1970); P. Pampaloni, "Continenza e celibato del clero. Legge e motivi nelle fonti canonistiche dei sec. IV e V," Studia Patavina 17 (1970), 5–59; H. Crouzel, "Le célibat dans l'église primitive," Sacerdoce et célibat, publ. by J. Coppens et al. (Gembloux 1971), 333–371.—G. Hörle, Frühmittelalterliche Mönchs- und Klerikerbildung in Italien (Freiburg 1914); W. Wühr, Das abendländische Bildungswesen im Mittelalter (Munich 1950), 17–45; La formación sacerdotal en la Iglesia (Barcelona 1966).—H. Leclercq, "Immunité," DACL VII, 323–390; C. Dupont, "Les privilegès des clercs sous Constantin,"

RHE 62 (1967), 729–752; G. Vismara, Episcopalis audientia (Milan 1937); W. Selb, "Episcopalis audientia von der Zeit Konstantins bis zur Nov. XXXV Valentianians III," ZSavRGrom 84 (1967), 162–217; Th. Klauser, Der Ursprung der bischöflichen Insignien und Ehrenrechte (Krefeld, 2nd ed. 1953); E. Jerg, Vir venerabilis. Untersuchungen zur Titulatur der Bischöfe in den ausserkirchlichen Texten der Spätantike als Beitrag zur Deutung ihrer öffentlichen Stellung (Vienna 1970).—Y. Congar (ed.), Das Bischofsamt und die Weltkirche (Stuttgart 1964); J. Lécuyer, Études sur la collégialité épiscopale (Le Puy-Lyon 1964); La collégialité épiscopale. Histoire et théologie = Unam sanctam 52 (Paris 1965); L. Mortari, Consacrazione episcopale e collegialità (Florence 1969).

17. The Liturgy

SOURCES

The most important: F. E. Brightman–C. E. Hammond, Liturgies Eastern and Western I (London 1966, reprint); Monumenta eucharistica et liturgica vetustissima, ed. J. Quasten, FlorPatr VII (Bonn 1935); Cyril of Jerusalem, Catecheses mystagogicae, ed. A. Piédagnol–P. Paris, SChr 126 (Paris 1966); Theodore of Mopsuestia, Homiliae 12–16, ed. R. Tonneau, SteT 145 (Vatican City 1949); John Chrysostom, Huit Catéchèses baptismales, SChr 50 (Paris, 2nd ed. 1970); Ambrose, De mysteriis, De sacramentis, ed. Botte, SChr 25 (Paris, 2nd ed. 1961); Niceta of Remesiana, Instructio ad competentes, ed. Kl. Gamber, Tpatrlit 1 (Regensburg 1964); Kl. Gamber, Weitere Sermonen ad competentes I und II, Tpatrlit 2 and 5 (Regensburg 1065–66). Itinerarium Egeriae, ed. A. Franceschini–R. Weber, CChr 175 (Turnhout 1958); A. Adam, Zur Geschichte der orientalischen Taufe und Messe im 2. u. 4. Jh., KIT 5 (3rd ed. 1960); J. C. Didier, Le baptême des enfants dans la tradition de l'Église ancienne in Monumenta christiana selecta (Tournai 1960); Ambrose, "De paenitentia," CSEL 73; Pacian, Epistulae et Paraenesis, PL 13; Augustine, Textus selecti de paenitentia, coll. B. Poschmann, FlorPatr 38 (Bonn 1934); Augustine, Sermons pour la Pâque, ed. S. Poque, SChr 116 (Paris 1966); Leo I, Sermones de quadragesima; de passione Domini, ed. R. Dolle, SChr 49 and 74 (Paris 1957 and 1961).

LITERATURE

See Vol. I, chap. 23; also: J. A. Jungmann, Gewordene Liturgie (Innsbruck 1941); A. G. Martimort, L'Église en prière. Introduction à la liturgie (Paris, 3rd ed. 1965); H. A. Schmidt, Introductio in liturgiam occidentalem (Rome, 2nd ed. 1965); Th. Klauser, Kleine abendländische Liturgiegeschichte (Bonn 1965); J. A. Jungmann, Liturgie der christlichen Frühzeit (Fribourg 1967); E. Cattaneo, Introduzione alla storia liturgica occidentale (Rome 2nd ed. 1969); W. Nagel, Geschichte des christlichen Gottesdienstes (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1970).—S. Salaville, Liturgies orientales (Paris 1932); J. M. Hanssens, Institutiones liturgicae de ritibus orientalibus, vol. II–III (Rome 1932); A. Raes, Introductio in liturgiam orientalem (Rome 1947); A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée (Chevtogne, 2nd ed. 1953); H. J. Schulz, Die byzantinische Liturgie (Freiburg 1964).

BAPTISM: P. de Puniet, "Baptême," DACL 2 (1914), 251–346; J. Jeremias, Die Kindertaufe in den ersten vier Jahrhunderten (Göttingen 1958); A. Stenzel, Die Taufe (Innsbruck 1958): J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology, Graecitas christ. primaeva 1 (Nijmegen 1962); Th. M. Finn, The Liturgy of Baptism in the Baptismal Instructions of St. John Chrysostom (Washington 1967); G. Kretschmar, "Die Geschichte des Taufgottesdienstes in der alten Kirche," Leiturgia V (Kassel 1970), 145–273.

EUCHARIST: J. A. Jungmann, Missarum sollemnia (Vienna, 5th ed. 1962); M. Righetti, La Messa. Commento storico-liturgico (Milan, 3rd ed. 1966); W. Gessel, Eucharistische Gemeinschaft bei Augustinus (Würzburg 1966); B. Botte et al., Eucharisties d'Orient et d'Occident, Lex orandi 46–47 (Paris 1970).

PENANCE: J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten (Innsbruck 1932); B. Poschmann, Busse = HDF IV 3 (Freiburg 1951); C. Vogel, La discipline pénitentielle en Gaule des origines à la fin du VII^{e} siècle (Paris 1952); P. Galtier, De poenitentia (Rome, 3rd ed. 1956); P. Anciaux, Histoire de la discipline pénitentielle (Paris 1963).

THE LITURGICAL YEAR: N. M. Denis-Boulet, Le calendrier chrétien (Paris 1959); J. Pascher, Das liturgische Jahr (Munich 1963); M. Righetti, L'anno liturgico (Milan, 3rd ed. 1969); Paschatis Sollemnia, Festschr. J. A. Jungmann (Freiburg 1959); M. Merendino, Paschale Sacramentum (Münster 1965); W. Huber, Passa und Ostern. Untersuchungen zur Osterfeier der alten Kirche (Berlin 1969); V. Peri, "La durata e struttura della Quaresima nell'antico uso ecclesiastico gerosolimitano," Aevum 37 (1963), 31–62; G. Kretschman, "Himmelfahrt und Pfingsten," ZKG 66 (1954–55), 209–253; R. Cabié, La Pentecôte. L'évolution de la Cinquantaine pascale au cours des cinq premiers siècles (Tournai 1965); B. Botte, Les origines de la Nöel et de l'Epiphanie (Louvain 1932); J. Mossy, Les fêtes de Noël et de l'Epiphanie d'apreès les sources littéraires cappadociennes du IV^{e} siècle (Louvain 1965); F. Nikolasch, "Zum Ursprung des Epiphaniefestes," ELit 82 (1968), 393–429.

18. Preaching and Piety

LITERATURE

CARE OF SOULS IN GENERAL: G. Dix, "The Ministry in the Early Church" in K. E. Kirk, The Apostolic Ministry (London, 2nd ed. 1947), 183–303; V. Monachino, La cura pastorale a Milano, Cartagine e Roma nel secolo IV (Rome 1947); A. Mandouze, "Notes sur l'organisation de la vie chrétienne en Afrique à l'époque de s. Augustin," ATh 13 (1953), 151–171, 201–231; J. Fernández Alonso, La cura pastoral en la España romano-visigoda (Rome 1955); P. Rentinck, La cura pastoral in Antiochia nel IV^{e} secolo (Rome 1970).—F. Meyer, Die Seelsorge des hl. Ambrosius (Diss. Rome 1941); F. Van der Meer, Augustinus der Seelsorger (Cologne 1951); E. Bellini, "La figura del pastore d'anime in Gregorio Nazianzeno," SC 99 (1971), 269–296.

CATECHESIS AND PREACHING: M. Sauvage, Catéchèse et laïcat (Paris 1962); J. Daniélou, La catéchèse aux premiers siècles (Paris 1968).—B. Paredi, La catechesi di Sant' Ambrogio (Genoa 1957); A. Paulin, S. Cyrille de Jérusalem catéchète (Paris 1959).—F. Stingeder, Gesch. der Schriftpredigt (Paderborn 1920); H. Kerr, The Preaching in the Early Church (New York 1942); A. Niebergall, "Die Gesch. der christlichen Predigt," Leiturgia II (Kassel 1955), 182–353; St. Czerwik, Homilia paschalis apud Patres usque ad saec. V (Rome 1961); J. B. Schnyder, Gesch. der katholischen Predigt (Freiburg 1969); W. Schütz, Gesch. der christlichen Predigt (Berlin 1972); A. Olívar, "La duración de la predicación antiqua," Liturgica 3 (1966), 143–184; id., "Preparación e improvicasión en la prédica patrística," Kyriakon II (Festschr. J. Quasten, Münster 1970), 736–767; D. Attwater, St. John Chrysostom, Pastor and Preacher (London 1959); B. H. Vandenberghe St. Jean Chrysostome et la parole de Dieu (Paris 1961); J. Bernardi, La prédication des Perès

Cappadociens (Paris 1968); R. R. Ruether, Gregory of Nazianzen, Rhetor and Philosopher (Oxford 1969).

AUGUSTINE: M. Pontet, "Le prédicateur et son public," L'exégèse de s. Augustin prédicateur (Paris 1945), 35–110; H.-I. Marrou, "L'éloquence chrétienne," S. Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (Paris, 2nd ed. 1947), 505–545; J. Pépin, "S. Augustin et la fonction de l'allégorie," RechAug 1 (1958), 243–286; J. Oroz Reta, La retórica en los sermones de s. Agustín (Madrid 1963); F. Schnitzler, Zur Theologie der Verkündigung in den Predigten des hl. Augustinus (Freiburg 1968); P. Christophe, Cassien et Césaire prédicateurs de la morale monastique (Gembloux 1969).

PIETY AND ASCETICISM: M. Viller–K. Rahner, Aszese und Mystik der Väterzeit (Freiburg 1939); A. Hamman, Prières des premiers chretiens (Paris 1952); L. Bouyer, The Spirituality of the New Testament and the Fathers (London/New York, 1963); E. Dassmann, Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius von Mailand (Münster 1965); J. A. Jungmann, Christliches Beten im Wandel und Bestand (Munich 1969); E. von Severus–O. Michel–Th. Klauser, "Gebet I/II," RAC 8, 1134–1258; 9, 1–36; J. A. Lamb, The Psalms in Christian Worship (London 1962); J. Schümmer, Die altchristliche Fastenpraxis (Münster 1933); A. Guillaume, Jeûne et charité dans l'Église latine (Paris 1954); Th. Pichler, Das Fasten bei Basileios und im antiken Heidentum (Innsbruck 1955); Th. Camelot, Virgines Christi (Paris 1944); F. de B. Vizmanos, Las vírgenes cristianas en la Iglesia primitiva (Madrid 1949).

CULT OF MARTYRS, THE SAINTS, AND THE DEAD: H. Delehaye, Sanctus (Brussels 1927); id., Les origines du culte des martyrs (Brussels, 2nd ed. 1933); A. Grabar, Martyrium, 3 vols. (Paris 1946); Th. Klauser, Christlicher Martyrerkult, heidnischer Heroenkult, spätjüdische Heiligenverehrung (Cologne 1960); A. Frolow, La relique de la vraie Croix (Paris 1961); B. Kötting, Der frühchristliche Reliquienkult und die Bestattung im Kirchengebäude (Cologne 1965); W. Delius, Texte zur Gesch. der Marienverehrung und Marienverkündigung in der alten Kirche, KIT 178 (Berlin 1956); F. Spedalieri, Maria nella Scrittura e nella tradizione della Chiesa primitiva (Messina 1961); D. M. Montagna, La lode alla theotokos nei testi greci dei secoli IV–VII (Rome 1963); B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa (Münster 1950); A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim (Bonn 1957); C. G. Rodríguez, El culto de los santos en la España romana y visigoda (Madrid 1966); Th. Klauser, Die Cathedra im Totenkult der heidnischen und christlichen Antike (Münster, 2nd ed. 1971); J. Zellinger, Augustinus und die Volksfrömmigkeit (Munich 1933); St. McKenna, Paganism and Pagan Survivals in Spain up to the Fall of the Visigothic Kingdom (Washington 1938); M. Striedl, Antiker Volksglaube bei Johannes Chrysostomos (Diss. Würzburg 1948).

19. Early Christian Monasticism: Development and Expansion in the East

I. The Religious and Historical Background

SMALLER SOURCE COLLECTIONS

J. de Guibert, Documenta ecclesiastica ad christianae perfectionis studium spectantia (Rome 1932); K. Koch, Quellen zur Geschichte der Askese und des Mönchtums (Tübingen 1936); Enchiridion de statibus perfectionis (Rome 1949); H. U. v. Balthasar, Die grossen Ordensregeln (Cologne, 2nd ed. 1961); M.-J. Rouet de Journal–J. Dutilleul, Enchiridion asceticum (Freiburg, 6th ed. 1965).

GENERAL LITERATURE

Dictionnaire de Spiritualité (=DSp), ed. by Ch. Baumgarten–M. Olphe-Galliard (Paris 1932ff.); Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums und des Benediktinerordens (Münster 1911ff.). Works on special periods: Studia Monastica (Montserrat 1959ff.); Yermo (Madrid 1963ff.). Surveys in the lexica: H. Leclercq, "Cénobitisme," DACL II, 3047–3248; id., "Monachisme," ibid., IX, 1774–1974; J. Olphe-Galliard, "Cénobitisme," DSp II, 405–416; A. Adam, "Mönchtum," RGG^{3} IV, 1072–1081; I. Auf der Maur, "Mönchtum," LThK^{2} VII, 545–548; Th. Spidlik–J. Sainsaulieu, "Ermites," DHGE XV, 776–787. Also: D. Gorce, La lectio divina des origines à S. Benôit et Cassiodore I (Paris 1925); J. Wagemann, Entwicklungsstufen des ältesten Mönchtums (Tübingen 1929); H. v. Campenhausen, Die asketische Heimatlosigkeit im altkirchlichen und frühmittelalterlichen Mönchtum (Tübingen 1930); Ph. Oppenheim, Das Mönchskleid im Altertum (Münster 1931); K. Heussi, Der Ursprung des christlichen Mönchtums (Tübingen 1936), also Th. Lefort: RHE 33 (1937), 341–348; M. Marx, Incessant Prayer in Ancient Monastic Literature (Vatican City 1947); E. E. Malone, *The Monk and the Martyr (Washington 1950); Ph. Hofmeiser, "*Mönchtum und Seelsorge bis zum 13. Jh.," SM 65 (1953–54), 209–273; A. Adam, "Grundbegriffe des Mönchtums in sprachlicher Sicht," ZKG 65 (1953–54), 209–239; I. Auf der Maur, Mönchtum und Glaubensverkündigung (Fribourg 1959); L. Bouyer. The Spirituality of the New Testament and the Fathers (London/New York, 1963); G. Turbessi, Ascetismo e Monachesimo prebenedettino (Rome 1961); Théologie de la vie monastique. Études sur la doctrine patristique (Paris 1961); I. Hausherr, "Vocation chrétienne et vocation monastique selon les Perès," Laïcat et sainteté I (Rome 1963), 33–115; Los monjes y los estudios (Poblet 1963); S. Frank, ΑΓΓΕΛΙΚΟϹ ΒΙΟϹ (Münster 1964); U. Ranke-Heinemann, Das frühe Mönchtum. Seine Motive nach den Selbstzeugnissen (Essen 1964); P. Nagel, Die Motive der Askese in der alten Kirche und der Ursprung des Mönchtums (Berlin 1966); D. Knowles, From Pachomius to Ignatius. A Study in the Constitutional History of the Religious Orders (Oxford 1966); F. S. Pericoli Ridolfini, Alle origini del monachesimo. Le convergenze esseniche (Rome 1966); B. Lohse, Askese und Mönchtum in der Antike und in der alten Kirche (Munich 1969); S. Frank, "Die Erforschung der Anfänge des Mönchtums und die Frage der Hermeneutik," FStud 53 (1971), 28–44.

II. Development and Expansion in the East

LITERATURE

J. M. Besse, Les moines d'Orient antérieurs au concile de Chalcédoine (Paris 1900); St. Schiwietz, Das morgenländische Mönchtum I–II (Mödling 1904, 1913), III (Vienna 1938); N. R. Nugent, Portrait of the Consecrated Woman in Greek Literature in the First Four Centuries (Washington 1941); I. Hauscherr, Penthos. La doctrine de la componction dans l'Orient chrétien (Rome 1944); Il Monachesimo Orientale (Rome 1958); Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris 1961); A.-J. Festugierè, Les moines d'Orient I (Paris 1961); J. Décarraux, "Du monachisme primitif au monachisme athonite," Le Millénaire du Mont Athos I (Chevetogne 1963), 19–57; Cl. Lialine, "Érémitisme en Orient," DSAM IV, 936–953; J. Leclerq, "Problèmes de l'érémitisme," StudMon 5 (1963), 197–212; D. J. Chitty, The Desert a City (London 1965).

1. Egyptian Anchoritism. The Pachomians. The Monasticism of the Deserts of Nitria and Scete

SOURCES

ANTONY AND AMMONAS: Athanasius, Vita s. Antonii, PG 26, 835–976. The two Latin translations of the fourth century: 1. ed. G. Garitte (Brussels 1939, also H. Hoppenbrouwers: Latinitas Christianorum primaeva 14, Nijmegen 1960); 2. the translation of Evagrius: PG 26, 835–976 and PL 73, 125–170, also L. Th. Lorié: Latin. Christ. prim. 11 (Nijmegen 1955); The Coptic translation, ed. G. Garitte: CSCO 117–118 (Louvain 1949). Studies on the life of Antony: K. Holl: GA II (Tübingen 1928), 249–269; J. List, Das Antoniusleben des hl. Athanasius (Athens 1931); H. Dörries, "Die Vita Antonii als Geschichtsquelle," Wort und Stunde, Ges. Studien zur Kirchengeschichte des 4. Jh. (Göttingen 1966), 145–224. English translation of the Vita with commentary by R. T. Meyer: ACW 10 (1950). Antony's letters: Latin: PG 40, 977–1019; 1065; Georgian, ed. G. Garitte: CSCO 148–149 (Louvain 1955); on the authenticity: F. Klejna: ZKTh 62 (1938), 309–348. The Ammonas letters: Syria translation, ed. M. Kmosko: POr 10 (1915); Greek, ed. F. Nau: POr 11 (1916); Latin: PG 40, 1019–1060, also again F. Klejna, op. cit.

THE PACHOMIANS: F. Kozman, Textes législatifs touchant le cénobitisme égyptien (Rome 1935); rule and letters of Pachomius, ed. A. Boon–Th. Lefort, Pachomiana latina (Louvain 1932; Contents: "Rule" = Praecepta; letters [11]; Liber Horsiesii); Th. Lefort, "OEuvres de s. Pachôme et de ses disciples," CSCO 159/160 (Louvain 1956); lives of Pachomius: 1. Coptic, ed. Th. Lefort: CSCO 89 and 107 (Louvain 1925); CSCO 99/100 (Louvain 1933/34). Th. Lefort, Les vies coptes de s. Pachôme et de ses premiers disciples (Louvain 1943). 2. Greek, ed. F. Halkin, S. Pachomii Vitae graecae (Brussels 1932), also R. Draguet: Muséon 70 (1957), 257–306; the Vita graeca I in French translation by A. -J. Festugière: Les moines d'Orient IV 2 (Paris (1965); on the whole matter, A. Veilleux (see under Lit.), 1–137; also A. de Vogué: RHE 67 (1972), 26–27.—The Liber Orsiesii is edited by A. Boon, op. cit., 109–147; Coptic fragments: CSCO 159 (Louvain 1956), 63–99, by H. Bacht, Das Vermächtnis des Ursprungs. Studien zum frühen Mönchtum I (Würzburg 1972), 57–189.—Life and works of Shenoute of Athribis (Coptic), ed. J. Leipoldt and W. E. Crum: CSCO 41, 42, 73 (Louvain 1906–13), the Latin translation by H. Wiesmann: CSCO 96, 108, 129 (Louvain 1931, 1936, 1951). A life of Schenute by his pupil Besa, ed. J. Leipoldt: CSCO 41.

PALLADIUS: Historia Lausiaca, ed. C. Butler: Texts and Studies 6, 1–2 (Cambridge 1904); ed. A. Lucot (Paris 1912); on the history of the text, R. Draguet: Muséon 57 (1944), 53–146; 58 (1945), 15–96; 60 (1947), 227–255; 63 (1950), 205–230; RHE 41 (1946), 321–364: 42 (1947), 5–49.—The Historia monachorum, ed. A.-J. Festugière (Brussels 1971), with French translation and commentary.

THE APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM: (a) Greek collection (alphabetically): PG 65, 71–440, supplements by F. Nau: ROC 10–18 (1905–13); also W. Bousset, Apophthegmata (Tübingen 1923) and J. -Cl. Guy, Recherches sur la tradition grecque des Apophthegmata Patrum (Brussels 1962). (b) Latin collection (thematic): Verba Seniorum: PL 73, 381–1062, supplemented by A. Wilmart: RBén 34 (1922), 185–198; on the transmission of the text, A. H. Salonius, Vitae Patrum (Lund 1920); on the planned new edition see C. M. Battle: StudMon I (1959), 115–120. W. Gemoll, Das Apophthegma (Vienna 1926). (c) Syriac collections: ed. P. Bedjan, Acta Martyrum et Sanctorum VIII (Paris 1897); F. A.

W. Budge, The Wit and Wisdom of the Christian Fathers of Egypt. The Syrian Version of the Apophth. Patrum (Oxford 1934). (d) Cassian, Collationes patrum, ed. M. Petschenig: CSEL 13 (Vienna 1886) and E. Pichéry: SChr 42, 54, 64 (Paris 1955–59, with French translation). Translations of the Apophth.: R. Draguet, Les Pères du désert (Paris 1949, with important introduction); B. Miller, Weisung der Väter (Freiburg 1965, complete following the Greek text, in selections from the Latin collection, with bibliog. pp. 497–516); L. Regnault, Les sentences des Pères du desert. Nouveau recueil (Solemes 1970).

LITERATURE:

ANTONY: L. Hertling, Antonius der Einsiedler (Innsbruck 1929); L. Bouyer, La vie de s. Antoine (St. Wandrille 1950); B. Steidle, "Homo Dei Antonius," SA 38 (Rome 1956), 148–200; F. Giardini, La dottrina spirituale de s. Antonio abate e di Ammonio nelle loro lettere (Florence 1957).

PACHOMIANS: P. Ladeuze, Étude sur le cénobitisme pakhômien pendant le IV^{e} siècle et la I^{ière} moitié du V^{e} (Paris 1898, reprinted. Frankfurt 1961); Th. Lefort "Les premiers monastères pachômiens" (topographical exploration), Muséon 52 (1939), 379–407; H. Bacht, "Antonius und Pachomius. Von der Anachorese zum Cönobitentum," SA 38 (Rome 1956), 66–107; id., "Mönchtum und Kirche. Eine Studie zur Spiritualität des Pachomius," Sentire Ecclesiam (Freiburg 1961), 113–133; id., "Horsiesius," Das Vermächtnis des Ursprungs; 9–55; A. Veilleux, "La liturgie dans le cénobitisme pachômien au quatrième siècle," SA 57 (Rome 1968); F. Ruppert, Das pachomianische Mönchtum und die Anfänge des klösterlichen Gehorsams (Münsterschwarzach 1971).—J. Leipoldt, "Schenute von Atripe und die Entstehung des national-ägyptischen Mönchtums," TU 25, I (Leipzig 1903); D. G. Müller, Die alte koptische Predigt (Diss. Heidelberg 1954).

MONASTICISM OF THE DESERTS OF NITRIA AND SCETE: A. L. Schmitz, "Die Welt der ägyptischen Einsiedler und Mönche," RQ 37 (1929), 189–244; P. Pesch, La doctrine ascétique des premiers maîtres égyptiens du IV^{e} siècle (Paris 1931); H. -G. E. White, The Monasteries of the Wadi n'Natrûn II (New York 1932); N. Schedl, Jesus Christus. Sein Bild bei den Mönchen der Sketis (Vienna 1942); H. O. Weber, Die Stellung des Joh. Cassians zur ausserpachomianischen Mönchstradition (Münster 1960); O. F. A. Meinardus, Monks and Monasteries of the Egyptian Deserts (Cairo 1961).

2. Monasticism in Palestine and Syria

SOURCES

Jerome, Vita Hilarionis, PL 23, 29–54; Anonymus, Vita Charitonis, ed. G. Garitte, BullInstBelge de Rome 21 (1941), 16–146; Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita s. Euthymii, ed. E. Schwartz, TU 49, 2 (Berlin 1939), 3–85; French translation of this vita with commentary by A. -J. Festugière, Les Moines d'Orient III 1 (Paris 1962); Itinerarium Egeriae, ed. W. Heraeus (Heidelberg, 2nd ed. 1921); ed. H Pétré, SChr 21 (Paris 1948); ed. Aet. Franceschini–R. Weber (Turnhout 1958); ed. H. Pétré–K. Vretska (Klosterneuburg 1958, with translation and commentary); E. Löfstedt, Philologischer Kommentar zur Peregrinatio Aetheriae (Upsala 1911, reprinted. Darmstadt 1962); Jerome, Epistulae, ed. I. Hilberg, CSEL, 54–56; Gerontius, Vita S. Melaniae junioris, ed. D. Gorce, SChr, 90 (Paris 1962 with French translation and commentary).—Theodoret, Historia religiosa, PG 82, 1284–1496; chap. 26 ed. H. Lietzmann, "Das Leben des heiligen Symeon Stylites," TU 32, 4 (Berlin 1908), 1–18. "Antonius mon., Vita Symeonis styl.," ed. H. Lietzmann, ibid., 20–78. The Syriac vita of Simeon in Bedjan IV, 507–644.—Socrates, HE.—Afrahat, "Sermo de monachis," ed. I. Parisot, PS I, 239–312. Ephraem, Hymni de Abraham Qidunaja, ed. Th. Lamy, S. Ephraemi Hymni et sermones III (Mecheln 1889), 749–863; Hymni de Iuliano SABA, ibid., 837–936. A Vööbus, Syriac and Arabic Documents regarding Legislation relative to Syrian Asceticism (Stockholm 1960).

LITERATURE

St. Schiwietz, Das morgenländische Mönchtum II (Mainz 1913); H. Leclercq, "Laures palestiniennes," DACL VIII (1928), 1961–88; E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skythopolis (Leipzig 1939); G. D. Gordini, "Il monachesimo Romano in Palestina nel IV secolo," Saint Martin et son temps (Rome 1961), 85–107. St. Schiwietz, Das Mönchtum in Syrien und Mesopotamien und das Aszetentum in Persien (Mödling 1938); J. van der Ploeg, Oudsyrisch Monniksleven (Leyden 1942); A. Adam, "Grundbegriffe des Mönchtums in sprachlicher Sicht," ZKG 65 (1953–54), 209–239; also E. Beck, "Ein Beitrag zur Terminologie des ältesten syrichen Mönchtums," SA 39 (Rome 1956), 254–267; id., "Asketentum und Mönchtum bei Ephräm," Il monachesimo orientale (Rome 1958), 341–362; O. Hendriks, "La vie cotidienne du moine syrien orientale," OrSyr 5 (1960), 293–330, 401–432; A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, I: The Origin of Asceticism. Early Monasticism in Persia = CSCO 184 (Louvain 1960); A. -J. Festugière, "Les moines de Syrie," Antioche païenne et chrétienne (Paris 1959), 245–406; P. Canivet, "Théodoret et le monachisme syrien avant le concile de Chalcédoine," Theologie de la Vie monastique (Paris 1961), 241–282; L. Leloir, "La pensé monastique d'Ephrem," Mémorial de l'école des Langues Orientales Anciennes (Paris 1964).

3. The Monasticism of Asia Minor and Constantinople

SOURCES

Canons and letters of the Synod of Gangra: Mansi II, 1095–1122, also Hefele-Leclerq I/2, 1029–1045.—Basil's Asketikon: PG 31, 889–1305; Rufinus's Latin version: PL 103, 485–554. On the history of the text of Basil's Rules: F. Laun: ZKG 44 (1925), 1–61; Gribomont, Histoire du texte des Ascetiques de saint Basile (Louvain 1953); English translation with commentary by W. K. L. Clarke, The Ascetic Works of Saint Basil (London 1925). Basil's letters: new critical edition by Y. Courtonne, 3 vols. (Paris 1957–66).—The poems of Gregory Nazianzen on Monasticism: PG 37.—The ascetical works of Gregory of Nyssa: Greg. Nyss. Opera, ed. W. Jaeger et al., VIII, 1 (Leyden 1952); De virginitate, with French translation and commentary, ed. M. Aubineau: SChr 119 (Paris 1966).—Callinicus, Vita s. Hypatii, ed. G. J. M. Bartelink: SChr 177 (Paris 1971); French translation with commentary by A. -J. Festugière, Les Moines d'Orient II (Paris 1961), 13–86.

ON MESSALIANISM: PS I/3 (Paris 1926), cxl–cclxi; G. L. Marriott, Macarii anecdota (Cambridge, Mass. 1918); H. Dörries, "Symeon von Mesopotamien. Die Überlieferung der Messalianischen 'Makarios' Schriften," TU 55, 1(Leipzig 1941); W. Jaeger, Two Rediscovered Works of Ancient Christian Literature: Gregory of Nyssa and Macarius (Leiden 1954); E. Klostermann–H. Berthold, "Neue Homilien des Makarius (Symeon I: Aus Typus III)," TU 72 (Berlin 1961); Macarius's fifty spiritual homilies, ed. by H. Dörries–E. Klostermann–M. Kroeger: PTS 4 (Berlin 1964).

LITERATURE

J. Gribonmont, "Eustathe de Sébaste," DSp 4, 1708–1712 and DHGE 16, 26–33; id., "Le monachisme au IV^e^ siècle en Asie Mineure: de Gangres au Messalianisme," Stpatr II (TU 64, Berlin 1957), 400–415; id., "Le monachisme au sein de l'Église en Syrie et en Cappadoce," StudMon 7 (1956), 7–24.—J. Pargoire, "Basile," DACL 2, 1, 501–510; G. Bardy, "Basile," DSAM 1, 1273–1283; M. G. Murphy, St. Basil and Monasticism (Washington 1930); P. Humbertelaude, La doctrine ascétique de s. Basile de Césarée (Paris 1932); E. Amand, L'ascèse monastique de saint Basile (Paris 1949); id., "Le système cénobitique basilien comparé au système cénobitique pachômien," RHR 152 (1957), 31–80; J. Gribomont, "Le renoncement au monde dans l'idéal ascétique de s. Basile," Irénikon 31 (1958), 282–307, 460–475; id., "Saint Basile," Théologie de la Vie monastique (Paris 1961), 99–113; J. Plagnieux, "S. Grégoire de Nazianze," ibid., 115–130; J. Daniélou, "S. Grégoire de Nysse dans l'histoire du monachisme," ibid., 131–141.—R. Janin, "La banlieue de Constantinople," series of articles in ÉO 21–23 and 26 (1922–24, 1927); id., Constantinople. Les églises et les monastères (Paris, 2nd ed. 1968 = La Géographie de l'Orient byzantin I, III); G. Dagron, "Les moines et la ville. Le monachisme à Constantinople jusqu'au concile de Chalcédoine," Travaux et Mémoires 4 (1970), 229–276; J. Pargoire, "Acémètes," DHGE 1, 307–321; V. Grumel, "Acémètes," DSAM 1, 169–175.

ON MESSALIANISM: I. Hausherr, "L'erreur fondamentale et la logique du messalianisme," OrChrP 1 (1935), 328–360; A. Kemmer, Charisma maximum (Louvain 1938); H. Dörries, "Christlicher Humanismus und mönchische Geist-Ethik," ThLZ 79 (1954), 643–656; A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient II (Louvain 1960), 127–139; J. Daniélou, "Grégoire de Nysse et le Messalianisme," RSR 48 (1960), 119–134; H. Dörries, "Urteil and Verurteilung. Kirche und Messalianer," ZNW 55 (1964), 78–94 = Wort und Stunde (Gottingen 1966), 334–351; id., "Diadochus und Symeon," ibid., 352–422; R. Staats, "Gregor von Nyssa und die Messaliner," PTS 8 (Berlin 1968); J. Gribomont, "Le dossier des origines du messalianisme," Epektasis, Mélanges J. Daniélou (Paris 1972), 611–25.

20. The Monasticism of the Latin West

LITERATURE

GENERAL: See above chap. 19; also; G. Bardy, "Les origines des écoles monastiques en Occident," SE 5 (1953), 86–104; W. Schatz, Studien zur Geschichte und Vorstellungswelt des frühen abendländischen Mönchtums (typed diss. Freiburg 1957); O. Chadwick, Western Asceticism (London 1958: trans. of the Verba seniorum, Cassian, and the Benedictine Rule, with introductions); H. U. von Balthasar, Die grossen Ordensregeln (Einsiedeln, 2nd ed. 1961); J. Décarreaux, Les moines et la civilisation en Occident. Des invasions à Charlemagne (Paris 1964); R. Lorentz, "Die Anfänge des abendländischen Mönchtums im 4. Jh.," ZKG 77 (1966), 1–61.

ITALY: G. D. Gordini, Forme di vita ascetica a Roma nel IV secolo (Alba 1952); id., "Origine e sviluppo del monachesimo a Roma," Gr. 37 (1956), 220–260 (lit.); G. Ferrari, Early Roman Monasteries, V–X cent. (Vatican City 1957); G. Pence, Storia del monachesimo in Italia I (Rome 1961).—Milan: A Roberti, "S. Ambrogio e il monachesimo," SC 68 (1940), 140–159, 236–253; R. de Izary, La virginité selon s.

Ambroise, 2 vols. (Diss. Lyon 1952); G. Penco. "Le origini del monachesimo in Liguria," Benedictina 9 (1956), 15–30.

GAUL: C. Courtois, "L'évolution du monachisme en Gaule de s. Martin à s. Colomban," Il monachesimo nell'alto medioevo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale (Spoleto 1957), 47–72; R. Metz, "Les vierges chrétiennes en Gaul au IV^{e} siècle," SA 46 (Rome 1961), 109–132; E. Griffe, "Moines et monastères," La Gaul chrétienne à l'époque romaine 3 (Paris 1965), 299–352; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich (Munich 1965).—Martin of Tours: The most important source is the works on Martin by Sulpicius Severus: ed. C. Halm, CSEL 1 (Vienna 1866); new edition by B. Peebles–P. Hylton in CChr in preparation; the "Vita s. Martini" alone now in SChr 133–135 (Paris 1967–68), ed. J. Fontaine, with an important introduction in SChr 133, 17–210; Monographs on Martin: E. Ch. Babut (Paris 1912); A. Requier (Paris, 7th ed. 1929); J. Van den Bosch, Capa, basilica, monasterium et le culte de s. Martin de Tours (Nijmegen 1959); Saint Martin et son temps =SA 46 (Rome 1961), in it 3–24: E. Griffe, "Saint Martin et le monachisme gaulois."—Lérins: Sources: Hilarius Arelat., Sermo de vita s. Honorati, PL 50, 1249–1279; S. Cavallin, Vitae ss. Honorati et Hilarii (Lund 1952), 49–78; Eucherius, De laude eremi, CSEL 31, 179–194; H. Leclercq, "Lérins," DACL 8, 2596–2627; L. Cristiani, Lérins et ses fondateurs (St-Wandrille 1946); N. K. Chadwick, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul (London 1955), 142–169. —John Cassian: a) Instituta Coenobiorum, ed. M. Petschenig: CSEL 13 (Vienna 1886); ed. J.-Cl. Guy; SChr 109 (Paris 1965); b) Collationes patrum, ed. M. Petschenig: CSEL 17 (Vienna 1888); ed. E. Pichery: SChr 42, 54 (Paris 1955, 1958, 1959).—M. Olphe-Galliard, "Cassien," DSAM 2, 214–276; M. Cappuyns, "Cassien," DHGE 11, 1319–1348; H. Leclercq, "Saint-Victor," DACL 15, 545–557: F. Benoît, L'Abbaye de s. Victor et l'église de la Major (Paris 1936); L. Cristiani, Jean Cassien (Paris 1946); H.-O. Weber, Die Stellung des Johannes Cassianus zur ausserpachomianischen Mönchstradition (Münster 1961); J. -Cl. Guy, Jean Cassien, vie et doctrine (Paris 1961); O. Chadwick, John Cassian (Cambridge, 2nd. ed. 1967).—The Jura Monasteries: Vitae patrum Jurensium, ed. B. Krusch: MGSS rer. Mer. III, 131–166; ed. F. Martine: SChr 142 (Paris 1968, Lit.), also J. Doignon: RAM 46 (1970), 377–386; H. Leclercq: DACL 8, 430–438.

SPAIN: J. Pérez de Urbel, Los monjes españoles de la edad media I (Madrid, 2nd. ed. 1945); id., "Le monachisme en Espagne au temps de s. Martin," SA (Rome 1961), 45–65; A. Mundó, "Il monachesimo nella penisola Iberica," Il monachesimo nell'alto medievo (Spoleto 1957), 73–108; G. M. Gilbert, "El eremitismo en la Hispania romana," España eremítica (Pamplona 1970), 41–47.

NORTH AFRICA: J. M. Besse, Les moines de l'Afrique romaine, 2 vols. (Paris 1903); J.-M. Destal, "¿Un cenobitismo preagustiniano en Africa?" in Ciudad de Dios 168 (1956), 375–405, 171 (1958), 161–195; G. Folliet, "Aux origines de l'ascétisme et du cénobitisme africain," SA 46 (1961), 25–44; J.-J. Gavigan, De vita monastica in Africa septentrionali inde a temporibus s. Augustini usque ad invasiones Arabum (Turin 1962, lit. IX–XXIV).—Augustine: M. Mellet, L'itinéraire et l'idéal monastique de s. Augustin (Paris 1934); Sanctus Augustinus, vitae spiritualis magister, 2 vols. (Rome 1959); A. Manrique, La vida monástica en San Agustín (Salamanca 1959); D. Riccardi, La verginità nella vita religiosa secondo la dottrina di s. Agostino (Turin 1961); A. Sage, La règle de s. Augustin commentée par ses écrits (Paris 1961); E. Boularand, "Expérience et conception de la vie monastique chez s. Augustin," BLE 64 (1963), 81–116, 172–194; A. Manrique, Teología Agustiniana de la vida religiosa (El Escorial 1964); L. Cilleruelo, El monacato de San Agustín (Valladolid 1966); L. Verheijen, La règle de s. Augustin, I: Tradition manuscrite; II: Recherches historiques, comprehensive bibliog. pp. 221–239

(Paris 1967); A. Zumkeller, Das Mönchtum des heiligen Augustinus (Würzburg, 2nd ed. 1968, with lit. 17–31, 323–332).

CRITICISM OF MONASTICISM: John Chrysostom, Adv. oppugnatores vita monasticae: PG 47, 319–386; Jerome, Contra Vigilantium and Adversus Jovinianum: PL 23; Augustine, De opere monachorum: CSEL 41 (Vienna 1900). —P. de Labriolle, "Rutilius Namatianus et les moines," RÉL 6 (1928), 30–41; L. Gougaud, "Les critiques formulées contre les premiers moines d'Occident," RMab 24 (1939), 145–163; P. Antin, "Le monachisme selon s. Jérôme," MélBénédictins (St-Wandrille 1947), 69–113; A.-J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne (Paris 1959), 192–210.

21. Church and Society

LITERATURE

GENERAL: S. Mazzarino, Aspetti sociali del quarto secolo (Rome 1951); M. Rostovtzeff, Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire, revised ed. by P. M. Fraser, 2 vols. (London 1957); W. Seyfarth, Soziale Fragen der spätrömischen Kaiserzeit im Spiegel des Theodosianus (Berlin 1963); A. H. M. Jones, The Later Roman Empire 284–602. A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey I–IV (Oxford 1964); J. Vogt, Der Niedergang Roms. Metamorphose der antiken Kultur von 200–500 (Zurich 1965); id., Kulturwelt und Barbaren. Zum Menschenbild der späntiken Gesellschaft (Wiesbaden 1967); J. Gaudemet, Les Institutiones de l'Antiquité (Paris 1967); J. Gagé, Les classes sociales dans l'empire romain (Paris, 2nd ed. 1971). —N. Baynes, The Early Church and Social Life. A Selected Bibliography (London 1927); L. Polverini, "Società antica e cristianesimo," Problemi di storia della Chiesa, sec. II–IV (Milan 1970), 13–31 (report on research); E. Troeltsch, Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (Tübingen 1912); J. Mausbach, Die Ethik des heiligen Augustinus (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1929); H.-J. Diesner, Studien zur Gesellschaftslehre und sozialen Haltung Augustins (Halle 1954); J. Gaudemet, L'église dans l'empire Romain, IV^e–V^e siecles (Paris 1958); R. Sierro Bravo, Doctrina social y económica de los Padres de la Iglesia (Madrid 1967; extensive collection of texts); P. Brown, Religion and Society in the Age of Saint Augustine (London 1972).

MARRIAGE AND FAMILY: L. Godefroy, "Marriage," DThC IX, 2077–2113; H. Leclercq, "Marriage," DACL X, 1899–1982 (monuments); id., "Femme," ibid., V, 1300–1353; id., "Alumni," ibid., I, 1288–1306 (exposing of children); A. Oepke, "Ehe (Institution)," RAC IV, 651–666; G. Delling, "Ehebruch, Eheleben, Ehescheidung," ibid., IV, 666–719; H. Karpp, "Eltern," ibid., IV, 1206–1219; J. Gaudemet, "Familie," ibid., VII, 336–357; N. Ladomierszky, S. Augustin, docteur du marriage chrétien (Rome 1942); W. J. Dooley, Marriage according to St. Ambrose (Washington 1948); B. Biondi, Diritto romano cristiano III (Milan 1954); F. Delpini, Divorzio e separazione dei conjugi nel diritto romano e nella dottrina della Chiesa fino al secolo V (Turin 1956); J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (Paris 1958), 514–569; id., "Les transformations de la vie familiale au Bas-Empire et l'influence du cristianisme," Romanitas 4 (1962), 58–85; V. J. Pospishil, Divorce and Remarriage (New York 1967); H. Crouzel, L'église primitive face au divorce (Paris 1971).

THE SOCIAL SPHERE

A) CHURCH AND SLAVERY: H. Leclercq, "Esclaves," DACL V, 387–398; A. G. Kies, Gedanken des hl. Augustinus über die Sklaverei (Vienna 1942); B. Biondi, Diritto romano cristiano II (Rome 1952), 373–447; W. L. Westermann, The Slave Systems of Greek and Roman Antiquity (Philadelphia 1955); F. Michelini, Schiavitù, religioni antiche e cristianesimo primitivo (Bari 1963); M. I. Finley (ed.), Slavery in Classical Antiquity (Cambridge, 2nd ed. 1968; bibliog.); W. W. Buckland, Roman Laws of Slavery (London 1970); H. Bellen, Studien zur Sklavenflucht im römischen Kaiserreich (Wiesbaden 1971); J. Vogt, Sklaverei und Humanität. Studien zur antiken Slaverei und iher Erforschung (Wiesbaden, 2nd ed. 1972); J. Vogt–N. Brockmeyer, Bibliogr. zur antiken Sklaverei (Bochum 1971); J. Schmidt, Vie et mort des esclaves dans la Rome antique (Paris 1973).

B) WEALTH AND POVERTY: R. Pöhlmann, Gesch. der sozialen Frage und des Sozialismus in der antiken Welt, 2 vols, (Munich, 3rd ed. 1925); H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege im vorchristlichen Altertum (Utrecht 1939); H. P. Kohns, Versorgungskrisen und Hungerrevolten im spätantiken Rom (Bonn 1961); A. R. Hands, Charities and Social Aid in Greece and Rome (London 1968; to A. D. 250). —The articles "Almosen," "Armenpflege," "Armut," "Barmherzigkeit" in RAC I; "Gastfreundschaft," ibid., VIII, 1110–1123; "Charité," DACL III, 598–653; "Hôpitaux," "Hospices," "Hotelleries," ibid., VI, 2748–2770, "Liberalité des fidèles," ibid., IX, 489–497; "Hospitalité," DSAM VII, 815–819; G. Uhlhorn, Die christliche Liebestätigkeit (Darmstadt, reprint ed. 1959), 130–236; O. Schilling, Reichtum und Eigentum in der altchristlichen Lit. (Freiburg 1908); W. Liese, Gesch. der Caritas (Freiburg 1922); M. Pellegrino, Salviano di Massiglia (Rome 1942); S. Giet, Les idées et l'action sociales de s. Basil (Paris 1941); A. T. Geoghegan, The Attitude towards Labor in Early Christian and Ancient Culture (Washington 1945); J. Huhn, Ambrosius von Mailand, ein sozialer Bischof (Fulda 1946); M. Pellegrino, S. Giovanni Crisostomo. Richezza e poverta (Rome 1947); K. Farner, Christentum und Eigentum bis auf Thomas von Aquin (Bern 1947); E. F. Bruck, Kirchenväter und soziales Erbrecht (Berlin–Heidelberg 1956); A. Hamman, Riches et pauvres dans l'église ancienne (Paris 1962, Texts); P. Christophe, L'usage chrétien du droit de propriéte dans l'Écriture et la tradition patristique (Paris 1964); W. Schneemelcher, "Der diakonische Dienst in der alten Kirche," Das diakonische Amt der Kirche, ed. H. Krimm (Stuttgart, 2nd ed. 1965), 61–105; A. Hamman, Vie liturgique et vie sociale . . . dans l'antiquité chrétienne (Paris 1968).

THE CULTURAL SPHERE: P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore (Paris, 2nd ed. 1948); H.-I. Marrou, S. Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (Paris, 2nd ed. 1949); R. Eiswirth, Hieronymus' Stellung zu Lit. und Kunst (Wiesbaden 1955); C. N. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture (New York, 2nd ed. 1957); O. Gigon, Die antike Kultur und das Christentum (Gütersloh 1966); A. Wifstrand, Die alte Kirche und die griechische Bildung (Bern 1967); Écriture et culture philosophique dans la pensée de Grégoire de Nysse (Leyden 1971; lectures); H. Jürgen, Pompa diaboli. Die lateinischen Kirchenväter und das antike Theater (Stuttgart 1972); W. Weismann, Kirche und Schauspiele. Die Schauspiele im Urteil der lateinischen Kirchenväter unter besonderer Berücksichtigung von Augustin (Würtzburg 1972).

Part Four
The Early Byzantine Church

22. The Henoticon and the Acacian Schism

SOURCES

Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum, ed. E. Schwartz, II, 5 Collectio Sangermanensis 1936; E. Schwartz, "Publizistische Sammlungen zum akakianischen Schisma," AAM n.s. 10 (1934); id., "Der Codex Vaticanus graecus 1431, eine antichalkedonische Sammlung aus der Zeit Kaiser Zenos," AAM 32, 6 (1927); Collectio Avellana =Epistulae Imperatorum, Pontificum, aliorum inde ab anno 367 usque ad annum 553 datae (Avellana Collectio), ed. O. Günther (Vienna 1895–98).

LITERATURE

F. Hofmann, "Der Kampf der Päpste um Konzil und Dogma von Chalkedon von Leo dem Grossen bis Hormisdas (451–519)," Chalkedon II (1953), 13–94; R. Haacke, "Die kaiserliche Politik in den Auseinandersetzungen im Chalkedon (451–553)," ibid., 95–177; S. Helmer, Der Neuchalkedonismus (Bonn 1962); I. E. Anastasiou, "Relation of Popes and Patriarchs of Constantinople in Frame of Imperial Policy from the Time of the Acacian Schism to the Death of Justinian," I patriarcati orientali nel primo millennio (Rome 1968), 55–69; P. Charanis, Church and State in the Later Roman Empire. The religious policy of Anastasius the First (Thessalonica 1974).

23. The Elaboration of the Church of the Byzantine Empire in the Age of the Emperor Justinian I

SOURCES

Collectio Avellana (see p. 3); Acta Conciliorum oecumenicorum, ed. E. Schwartz, II (Berlin 1940); E. Schwartz, "Drei dogmatische Schriften Justinians," AAM n.s. 18 (1939) (Milan, reprint ed. 1973); Corpus Juris Civilis, ed. stereot. II; Codex Justinianus, ed. P. Krüger (1906); Novellae, ed. Schöll-Kroll (1912); The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius, ed. J. Bidez–L. Parmentier (London 1898); Procopii Caesariensis opera omnia, ed. Haury-Wirth (Leipzig 1963–1964).

LITERATURE

A. A. Vasiliev, Justin the First (Cambridge, Mass. 1950); W. Schubart, Justinian und Theodora (Munich 1943); B. Rubin, Das Zeitalter Justinians (Berlin 1960); R. Browning, Justinian and Theodora (London 1971); A. Knecht, Die Religionspolitik Kaiser Justinians I. (Würzburg 1896); E. Schwartz, "Vigilius Briefe—Zur Kirchenpolitik Justinians," SAM 1940, 4(1940); id., Kyrillos von Skythopolis (Leipzig 1939); H. S. Alivisatos, Die kirchliche Gesetzgebung des Kaisers Justinian I. (Berlin 1913); J. Meyendorff, "Justinian, the Empire and the Church," DOP 22 (1968), 43–60; E. Hardy, "The Egyptian Policy of Justinian," DOP 22 (1968), 21–41.

24. Justinian's Zigzag Course: The Origenist Troubles

25. The Controversy over the Three Chapters and the Fifth General Council. End of the Age of Justinian

SOURCES

Mansi IX, 171–657; ACO IV, Concilium universale Constantinopolitanum, ed. J. Straub (Berlin 1971); E. Schwartz, "Drei dogmatische Schriften Justinians," AAM n.s. 18 (Munich 1939).

LITERATURE

E. Amann, "Trois Chapitres," DThC XV, 1868–1924; Hefele-Leclercq III 1, 1–132; R. Devreesse, "Le cinquième concile et l'oecuménicité byzantine," MiscMercati III (Rome 1946), 1–15; Ch. Moeller, "Le cinquième concile oecuménique et le magistère ordinaire," RSPhTh 35 (1951), 413–423; E. Chrysos, Die Bischofslisten des V. ökumenischen Konzils (553) (Bonn 1966); E. Schwartz, "Vigiliusbriefe. Zur Kirchenpolitik Justinians," SAM 1940, 2 (Munich 1940); F. Diekamp, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im sechsten Jh. und das fünfte allgemeine Concil (Münster 1899); E. K. Chrysos, ʽΗ ἐκκλησιαστικὴ πολιτικὴ τοῦ ʼΙουστινιανοῦ κατὰ τὴν ἔριν περὶ τὰ τρία κεφάλαια καὶ τὴν ε΄ οἰκουμενικὴν σύνοδον (Thessalonica 1969); id., "Τμήματα τῶν Πρακτικῶν τῆς ε΄ οἰκουμενικῆς συνόδου παρὰ βυζαντινοῖς χρονογράφοις," Κληρονομία 2 (1970), 376–401; J. Straub, "Die Verurteilung der drei Kapitel durch Vigilius," Κληρονομία 2 (1970), 347–375; W. de Vries, "Das zweite Konzil von Konstantinopel (553) und das Lehramt von Papst und Kirche" in OrChrP 38 (1972), 331–366.

26. Justinian's Successors: Monoenergism and Monothelitism

SOURCES

"Akten der römischen Synode von 649 and Akten des ökum. Konzils von 680–81": Mansi XI, 190–922 (preparation of the new critical edition of both synods by the Bayer. Akademie der Wissenschaften); Theophanes Confessor, ed. C. de Boor (Leipzig 1883–85); Nicephorus Patriarche, ed. C. de Boor (Leipzig 1880).

LITERATURE

P. Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam sous les successeurs de Justinien I^{er} (Paris 1951); id., "Les successeurs de Justinien et le monophysisme," Chalkedon II, 179–192; M. Jugie,

"Monothélisme," DThC X 2, 2307–23; V. Grumel, "Recherches sur l'histoire du monothélisme," ÉO 27 (1928), 6–16, 257–277; 28 (1929) 19–34, 158–166, 272–282; 29 (1930), 16–28; P. Verghese, "The Monothelite Controversy—a Historical Survey," Greek Orth. Theol. Review 13 (1968), 196–211.

27. The Rise of National Churches on the Frontiers of the Byzantine Empire

LITERATURE

L. Duchesne, Les églises separées (Paris 1896); K. Lübeck, Die christliche Kirche des Orients (Kempten 1911); A. Fortescue, The Lesser Eastern Churches (London 1913); J. B. Kidd, The Church of Eastern Christendom from 451 to the Present Time (London 1927); F. Heiler, Urkirche und Ostkirche (Munich 1937); D. Attwater, The Christian Churches of the East II (Milwaukee 1946); W. de Vries, Der christliche Osten in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951); R. Janin, Les églises orientales et les rites orientaux (Paris, 5th ed. 1956); W. de Vries, Die orientalischen Kirchen (Würzburg 1960); B. Spuler, "Die morgenländischen Kirchen," Hdb. der Orientalistik I/8, 2 (Leiden 1961) 120–324; I patriarcati orientali nel primo millennio, Orientalia christiana analecta 181 (Rome 1968).

THE CHURCH OF THE NESTORIANS: G. P. Badger, The Nestorians and their Rituals, 2 vols. (London 1852); J. Labourt, Le christianisme dans l'empire Perse sous la dynastie sassanide (224–632) (Paris 1904); W. A. Wigram, An Introduction to the History of the Assyrian Church (London 1910); E. Amann–E. Tisserant, "L'église nestorienne," DThC XI 1, 157–223; A. Christensen, L'Iran sous les Sassanides (Copenhagen 1936); A. K. Arbanites, Ἱστορία τῆς ἀσσυριακῆς νεστοριανικῆς ἐκκλησίας (Athens 1968).

THE COPTIC CHURCH: J. Leipoldt, Schenute von Atripe und die Entstehung des nationalägyptischen Christentums (Leipzig 1903); J. Maspéro, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie depuis la mort de l'empereur Anastase jusqu'à la réconciliation des églises jacobites (518–616) (Paris 1923); A. Vlieger, The Origin and Early History of the Coptic Church (Lausanne 1900); M. Jugie, "Monophysisme (église copte)," DThC X, 2251–2306; Chr. Papadopulos, Ἱστορία τῆς ἐκκλησίας Ἀλεξανδρείας (Alexandria 1934); A Böhlig, Ägypten und Byzanz bis zur arabischen Zeit (Munich 1953); C. D. G. Müller, "Die koptische Kirche zwischen Chalkedon und dem Arabereinmarsch," ZKG 75 (1964), 271–308; E. L. Butcher, The Story of the Church of Egypt (London 1897); D. Müller, "Aufbau und Entwicklung der koptischen Kirche nach Chalkedon," Kyrios 10 (1970), 202–210.

THE JACOBITE CHURCH: W. A. Wigram, The Separation of the Monophysites (London 1923); M. Jugie, "Église syrienne monophysite," DThC X 2216–2251; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e^ siècle (Louvain 1951); A. van Roey, "Les débuts de l'église jacobite," Chalkedon II, 339–360; W. Hage, Die syrisch-Jakobitische Kirche in frühislamischer Zeit nach orientalischen Quellen (Wiesbaden 1966); A. Vööbus, "The Origin of the Monophysite Church in Syria," CH 42 (1973), 17–26; W. H. C. Frend, "Severus of Antioch and the Origins of the Monophysite Hierarchy," The Heritage of the Early Church. Essays in Honor of G. V. Florovsky (Rome 1973), 261–275.

THE CHURCH OF THE ARMENIANS: F. Tournebize, Histoire politique et religieuse de l'Arménie (Paris 1900); id., "Arménie," DHGE IV (1925), 290–391; R. Grousset, Histoire de l'Arménie des origines à 1071 (Paris 1947); A. Ter-Mikelian, Die armenische Kirche in ihren Beziehungen zur byzantinischen vom IV. bis zum XIII. Jh. (Leipzig 1892); E.

Ter-Minassiantz, Die armenische Kirche in ihren Beziehungen zu den syrischen Kirchen bis zum Ende des 13. Jh. (Leipzig 1904); M. Ormanian–T. Poladian, The Church of Armenia (London 1955).

28. Early Byzantine Monasticism

LITERATURE

St. Schiwietz, Das morgenländische Mönchtum, 3 vols. (Mainz and Mödling 1904–38); J. Bremond, Les pères du désert (Paris 1927); K. Holl, Enthusiasmus und Bussgewalt (Leipzig 1898); P. van Cauwenbergh, Études sur les moines d'Égypte depuis le concile de Chalcédoine jusqu'à l'invasion arabe (Paris 1914); R. Draguet, Les pères du désert (Paris 1949); A.-J. Festugière, Les moines d'Orient (Paris 1961ff.); H. Bacht, "DieRolle des Mönchtums in den kirchenpolitischen Auseinandersetzungen um Chalkedon," Chalkedon II, 193–304; D. J. Chitty, The Desert a City (Oxford 1966); R. Janin, Les églises et les monastères de Constantinople (Paris 1953).

29. Theological and Religious Literature

LITERATURE

M. Richard, "Le néo-chalcédonisme," MSR 3 (1946), 156–161; Ch. Moeller, "Le chalcédonisme et le néo-chalcédonisme en Orient de 451 à la fin du VI^{e} siècle," Chalkedon I, 637–720; W. Elert, Der Ausgang der altchristlichen Christologie (Berlin 1957); S. Helmer, Der Neuchalkedonismus (Bonn 1962); M. Jugie, "Monothélisme," DThC X 2, 2307–2323; M. Viller–K. Rahner, Aszese und Mystik in der Väterzeit (Freiburg 1939); R. Devreese, "Chaînes exégétiques" in DBS I, 1084–1233.

30. Organization and Life of the Eastern Imperial Church

LITERATURE

F. Dvornik, Byzance et la primauté Romaine (Paris 1964; English trans. 1966); A. Michel, "Der Kampf um das politische oder petrinische Prinzip der Kirchenführung," Chalkedon II, 491–562; E. Herman, "Chalkedon und die Augestaltung des konstantinopolitanischen Primats," ibid., II, 459–490; Feine, RG; L. Wenger, Die quellen des römischen Rechts (Vienna 1953); J.-M. Hanssens, Institutiones liturgicae ritibus orientalibus II–III (Rome 1930–32); S. Salaville, Liturgies orientales (Paris 1942); N. Liesel, Die Liturgien der Ostkirche (Freiburg 1960); H. J. Schulz, Die byzantinische Liturgie (Freiburg 1964). —On Iconology: Reallexikon zur byzantinischen Kunst I, 616–662 (K. Wessel); D. Talbot Rice, Art of the Byzantine Era (London 1963); O. Demus, "Die Rolle der byzantinischen Kunst in Europa," in JÖByzG 14 (1965), 139–155.

31. Missionary Activity of the Early Byzantine Imperial Church

32. The Assault of Islam

Part Five
The Latin Church in the Transition to the Early Middle Ages

SECTION ONE
The Missionary Work of the Latin Church

33. The Origins of Christianity in Ireland and Scotland

SOURCES

Libri s. Patricii, ed. N. J. D. White (minor edition, London 1918); Libri epistolarum s. Patricii episcopi, ed. L. Bieler; L. Bieler, The Works of St. Patrick (London 1953; English translation with commentary); Liber Ardmachanus in The Book of Armagh, ed. J. Gwynn (Dublin 1913); The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick in Rer. Brit. medii aevi scriptores 89, 2 vols., ed. Whitley Stokes (London 1887); Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae, ed. C. Plummer (Oxford 1910); Adamnani Vita Columbae, ed. I. T. Towler (Oxford 1920); Adamnan's Life of Columba, ed. A. O. and M. O. Anderson (London 1961); G. S. M. Walker, S. Columbani opera (Dublin 1957); Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, ed. A. W. Haddan and W. Stubbs I (Oxford 1869). —Other sources (annals, vitae, inscriptions, etc.): J. F. Kenney, Sources for the Early History of Ireland I (New York 1929), as well as the bibliog. in R. P. C. Hanson, Saint Patrick (Oxford 1968). —K. Hughes, "Early Christian Ireland, Introduction to the Sources," in The Sources of History. Studies in the Uses of Historical Evidence, ed. G. R. Elton, 1972.

LITERATURE

PROFANE HISTORY: E. Curtis, A History of Ireland (London 6th ed. 1952). To be corrected by: T. F. O'Rahilly, Early Irish History and Mythology (Dublin 1946); D. A. Binchy, "The Fair of Tailtiu and the Feast of Tara," Eriu 18 (1958), 113–138; J. V. Kelleher, "Early Irish History and Pseudo-History," Studia Hibernica 3 (1963), 113–127; N. Chadwick, Celtic Britain (London 1963); H. M. Chadwick, Early Scotland (Cambridge 1949). —Other literature in R. P. C. Hanson, op. cit.

HISTORY OF THE MISSION AND THE CHURCH: L. Gougaud, Christianity in Celtic Lands (London 1932); W. A. Phillips, History of the Church of Ireland I (Oxford 1933);

K. Hughes, The Church in Early Irish Society (London 1966); W. Delius, Gesch. der irischen Kirch von ihren Anfängen bis zum 12. Jh. (Munich–Basel 1954); H. Williams, Christianity in Early Britain (Oxford 1912); J. Bulloch, The Life of the Celtic Church (Edinburgh 1963); N. Chadwick, Studies in the Early British Church (Cambridge 1958); id., The Age of Saints in the Early Celtic Church (Oxford 1961); J. Mac Queen, St. Nynia (Edinburgh 1961); W. D. Simpson, St. Ninian and the Origin of the Christian Church in Scotland (Edinburgh 1940); L. Bieler, The Life and Legend of St. Patrick (Dublin 1949); id., "La conversione al cristianesimo dei Celti insulari e le sue ripercussioni nel continente," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al cristianesimo . . . (Spoleto 1967), 559–580; J. Carney, The Problem of St. Patrick (Dublin 1961); R. P. C. Hanson, St. Patrick a British Missionary Bishop (Nottingham 1965); id., St. Patrick (Oxford 1968); J. Ryan, "The Early Irish Church and the See of St. Peter," Settimane di studio . . . VII. Le chiese nei regni dell'Europa occidentale . . . II (Spoleto 1960), 549–574; id., Irish Monasticism (Dublin 1931); J. A. Duke, The Columban Church (Edinburgh 1932); M. M. Dubois, St. Colomban (Paris 1950); Mélanges colombaniens (Paris 1950); G. Schreiber, Irland im deutschen und abendländischen Sakralraum (Cologne–Opladen 1956).

HISTORY OF EDUCATION AND CULTURE: Chr. Mohrmann, The Latin of St. Patrick (Dublin 1961); K. Meyer, Learning in Ireland in the Fifth Century (Dublin 1913); A. Lorcin, "La vie scolaire dans les monastères d'Irlande aux 5e–7e siècles," Le Moyen Age Latin 1 (1945), 221–236; B. Bischoff, "Il monachesimo irlandese nei suoi rapporti col continente," Settimane di studio . . . IV. Il monachesimo nell'alto medio evo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale (Spoleto 1957), 121–138.

34. The Conversion of the Franks and Burgundians. Origin and Organization of the Merovingian National Church

SOURCES

MG Scriptores. Auctores antiquissimi IV (Venantius Fortunatus) and VI, 2 (Avitus of Vienne); Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum I–VII (chronicles and vitae of the Merovingian period, including Gregory of Tours). —MG Leges. Leges nationum germanicarum (Lex Salica, Ribuaria, Alamannorum, Baiuvariorum); Capitularia regum Francorum I; Concilia I (Synods of the Merovingian Kingdom). Other editions of tribal laws: K. A. Eckhardt, Germanenrechte resp. Germanenrechte n.s. —MG Diplomata imperii I, ed. Pertz (Merovingian royal charters and charters of the Carolingian mayors). New partial edition: Lauer-Samaran, Diplômes originaux des Mérovingiens (Paris 1908); older edition, including private charters: Bréquigny-Pardessus, Diplomata, chartae, leges . . . ad res franco-gallicas spectantia I and II (Paris 1843–49; reprint ed. Aalen 1969). —MG Epistolae I and II (Register of Gregory the Great), III (collections of letters and letters of the Merovingian period, including Columban's). —Introduction to the sources: A. Molinier, Les sources de l'histoire de France I (Paris 1901); Wattenbach-Levison, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger I (Weimar 1952) and supplement: R. Buchner, Die Rechtsquellen (Weimar 1953).

HISTORIES OF THE FRANKS: E. Zöllner, Gesch. der Franken bis zur Mitte des 6. Jh. (Munich 1970); F. Lot, Naissance de la France (Paris, 2nd ed. 1970); F. Steinbach, Das Frankenreich: Hdb. der dt. Gesch. I^2, ed. O. Brandt–A. O. Meyer–L. Just, 9. Lf. (n.d.); H. Loewe, Deutschland im fränkischen Reich: B. Gebhardt, Hdb. d. dt. Gesch. I^8, ed. H. Grundmann (1954); G. Tessier, Le baptême de Clovis (Paris 1964), excellent presentation, in which, despite the title, all of Merovingian history is treated; A. Lippold, "Chlodovechus," RE Suppl. (1974), 139–174.

ORGANIZATION OF THE FRANKISH KINGDOM: E. Ewig, "Die fränkischen Teilungen und Teilreiche 511–613," AAMz 1952 no. 9; id., "Die fränkischen Teilreiche im 7. Jh.," in Trierer Zschr. 22 (1954), 85–144; id., Descriptio Franciae: Karl der Grosse. Lebenswerk und Nachleben I, ed. W. Braunfels—W. Beumann (Düsseldorf 1965), 143–177.

TRIBAL LAW: F. Beyerle, "Die Lex Ribuaria," ZSavRGgerm. 48 (1928) 348ff.; id., "Das Gesetzbuch Ribuariens," ibid., 55 (1935) 10ff.; id. in the introduction to the edition of the MG Leges I/3, 2; K. A. Eckhardt, Lex Ribuaria I (Göttingen 1959); F. Beyerle, "Die süddeutschen Leges und die merowingische Gesetzgebung," ZSavRGgerm. 49 (1929), 264–432; id., "Die beiden süddeutschen Stammescrechte," ibid., 73 (1956), 24–140; K. A. Eckhardt, "Leges Alamannorum," Germanenrechte m.s. (Göttingen 1958).

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH AND MISSION OF THE FRANKISH KINGDOM AND ITS PARTS: A. Hauck, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands I (Berlin 8th ed., reprint ed. 1954); K. D. Schmidt, Die Bekehrung der Germanen zum Christentum, II: Die katholische Mission bei den Westgermanen (Göttingen n.d. [1942]), 1–105 (Franks), 174–192 (Alemanni); Hoops, Reallexikon der germ. Altertumskunde II^2 (1974), "Bekehrung und Bekehrungsgeschichte," 177 (O. Gschwantler, Burgundians), and 180–188 (K. Schäferdiek, Germany and neighboring lands); E. Ewig, "Die christliche Mission bei den Franken und im Merowingerreich," MiscHist Eccl 3 (1970), 24–52; G. Tessier, "La conversione de Clovis et la christianisation des Francs," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'Alto Medioevo (Spoleto 1967), 149–189; E. Mâle, La fin du paganisme en Gaule et les plus anciennes basiliques chrétiennes (Paris 1950); H. Büttner, "Die Franken und die Ausbreitung des Christentums bis zu den Tagen des Bonifatius," Hess. Jb. für Landesgesch. 1 (1951), 8–24; id., "Mission und Kirchenorganisation des Frankenreiches bis zum Tode Karls des Grossen," Karl der Grosse. Lebenswerk und Nachleben I, ed. W. Braunfels–H. Beumann (Düsseldorf 1965), 454–487; E. de Moreau, Histoire de l'église en Belgique I (Brussels 2nd ed. 1945); R. Bauerreiss, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns I (St. Ottilien, 2nd ed. 1958); K. Tüchle, Kirchengeschichte Schwabens I (Stuttgart 1950); P. Paulsen, "Die Anfänge des Christentums bei den Alemannen," Zschr. für württ. Landesgesch. 15 (1956), 1–24; H. Büttner–I. Müller, Frühes Christentum im schweizerischen Alpenraum (Einsiedeln 1957); W. Neuss–F. W. Oediger, Gesch. des Erzbistums Köln I (Cologne 1964); H. Patze–W. Schlesinger, Geschichte Thüringens I (Cologne–Graz 1968); pertinent remarks, especially on the literature, in F. Delbono, "La letteratura catechetica di lingua tedesca," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al cristianesimo . . . (Spoleto 1967), 697ff.

NOTION OF UNIVERSAL MISSION: W. H. Fritze, "Universalis gentium confessio," Frühma. Studien 3 (1969), 78–130.

MISSION AND MONASTICISM: F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich (Munich–Vienna 1965).

CANON LAW AND CONSTITUTION: K. Voigt, Staat und Kirche von Constantin d. Gr. bis zur Karolingerzeit (Stuttgart 1936); Carlo de Clercq, La législation religieuse franque de Clovis à Charlemagne, Univ. de. Louvain. Recueil de travaux publiés par les membres des Conférences d'Histoire et de Philologie, 2^e série, 38^e fasc. (Louvain–Paris 1936); H. Barion, "Das fränkisch-deutsche Synodalrecht des Frühmittelalters," KStuT 5/6 (Bonn–Cologne 1931; reprint ed. Amsterdam 1963); E. Lesne, Histoire de la propriété ecclésiastique, 6 vols. in 8 parts (Lille 1910–43).

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM: H.-I. Marrou, Histoire de l'éducation dans l'antiquité (Paris 1949); R. Riché, "L'instruction des laïcs en Gaul mérovingienne au 7^e siècle," Settimane di studio . . . V. Caratteri del seculo VII in Occidente II (Spoleto 1958), 873–888; id., Éducation et culture dans l'Occident barbare aux 6^e–8^e siècles (Paris 1962).

35. The East Germans and Catholicism: The Conversion of the Sueves and Visigoths of Spain to Catholicism and the Second Flowering of Christian Antiquity in the Spanish Visigothic National Church

The most important pertinent literature on the Kingdoms of the Vandals and the Ostrogoths is listed in notes 1 and 3. Only the sources and literature for the history of the Visigoths and Sueves in Spain are included in the survey.

SOURCES

Introductory presentation and lists of sources: B. Sánchez Alonso, Fuentes de la historia española e hispano-americana, 2 vols. (Madrid, 3rd ed. 1952); id., Historia de la historiografía española I (Madrid, 2nd ed. 1947); R. Grosse, Las fuentes de la época visigoda y byzantina: Fontes Hispaniae antiquae IX (Barcelona 1927); M. C. Díaz y Díaz, Index scriptorum latinorum medii aevi hispanorum (Salamanca 1958–59).—Comprehensive publication of sources for Spanish history: H. Flórez, España sagrada, 52 vols. (Madrid 1747–1918); MGAuct.ant. XI (Spanish chronicles of the 5th to 7th centuries, including those of Hydatius, John of Biclar, Isidore), VI (poems of Martin of Dumio), XIV (poems and letters of Eugene II of Toledo); MGSS rer. Mer. V (Historia Wambae regis des Julian von Toledo); MGLL I (Lex Visigothorum); MGEp III (Epistolae Visigothicae); Mansi VII–XII and PL, 84 (Spanish councils); J. N. Garvin, The Vitae ss. patrum Emeritensium. Text and translation with an introduction and commentary. The Catholic Univ. of America. Studies in Medieval and Renaissance Latin Language and Literature 19 (Washington 1946); also: Acta Sanctorum. November 1. The works of the Spanish Church Fathers are in PL 37 (Valerius of Bierzo), 80 (Braulio von of Zaragoza, Taio of Zaragoza), 81–84 (Isidore of Seville, according to the edition of Arévalo), 87 (Fructuosus of Braga), 96 (Ildefonse and Julian of Toledo). More recent editions to be cited are; J. Madoz, Epistolario de S. Braulio de Zaragoza, edición crítica. Biblioteca de antiguos escritores cristianos españoles I (Madrid 1941); Claude W. Barlow, Martini ep. Bracarensis opera omnia, Papers and Monographs of the American Academy in Rome, 12 (New Haven 1950); Isidore, Etymologiarum sive originum libri XX, ed. W. M. Lindsay, 2 vols. (Oxford 1911). Inscriptions: J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la Espáña romana y visigoda (Barcelona 1941); id., "Características hispanas de las inscripciones visigodas," Arbor 1 (1944), 185–199.

LITERATURE

HANDBOOKS AND CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE HISTORY OF THE VISIGOTHIC KINGDOM: R. Menéndez Pidal, Historia de España III. España visigoda (Madrid 1940); S. A. Thompson, The Goths in Spain (Oxford 1969); R. d'Abadal y de Vinyals, "A propos du leges visigothique en Espagne," Settimane di studio . . . V. Caratteri del secolo VII in Occidente II (Spoleto 1958), 541–585; id., Del reino de Tolosa al reino de Toledo (Madrid 1960); P. Goubert, "Byzance et l'Espagne visigothique," Études byzantines 2 (1944), 5–78; id., "Influences byzantines sur l'Espagne visigothique," RÉB 4 (1946), 111–133; H. Messmer, Hispania-Idee und Gotenmythos (Zurich 1960); C. Sánchez Albornoz, "Otra vez Guadalete y Cavadonga," Cuadernos de Historia de España 1/2 (1944), 11–114; id., "Donde y cuando murió Don Rodrigo, último rey de los Godos," ibid., 3 (1945), 5–105; K. F. Stroheker, Eurich König der Westgoten (Stuttgart 1937); id., Germanentum und Spätantike (Zurich–Stuttgart 1965). This volume contains the following basic essays by Stroheker: "Die geschichtliche Stellung der ostgermanischen Staaten am Mittelmeer," "Leowigild," "Spanische Senatoren der spätrömischen und westgotischen Zeit." "Das spanische Westgotenreich und Byzanz;" D. Claude, Geschichte der Westgoten (1970); id., "Adel, Kirche und Königtum im Westgotenreich," in Vorträge und Forschungen, Sonderband 8 (1971); id., "Gentile und territoriale Staatsideen im Westgotenreich," Frühmittelalterliche Studien 6 (1972), 1–38.

LAW AND INSTITUTIONS: K. Zeumer, "Gesch. der westgotischen Gesetzgebung," NA 23 (1898), 39–112 and 571–630; 26 (1901) 91–149; Th. Melicher, Der Kampf zwischen Gesetzes-und Gewohnheitsrecht im Westgotenreich (Weimar 1930); F. S. Lear, "The Public Law in the Visigothic Code," Speculum 26 (1951), 1–23; C. Sánchez Albornoz, "Pervivencia y crisis de la tradición juríidica romana en la España goda," Settimane di studio . . . IX. Il passaggio dall'Antichita àl Medio Evo in Occidente (Spoleto 1962), 128–199 (with bibliog; including the works of García Gallo and Alvaro d'Ors); id., "El gobierno de las ciudades en Espana del siglo V al X," Settimane di studio . . . VI. La città nell'alto medio evo (Spoleto 1959), 359–391; J. M. Lacarra, "Panorama de la historia urbana en la peninsula ibérica desde el siglo V al X," ibid., 319–358; J. Orlandis, "El poder real y la sucesión al trono en la monarquía visigoda," Estudios visigóticos 3 (Rome–Madrid 1962); C. Sánchez Albornoz, "El aula regia y las asambleas políticas de los Godos," Cuadernos de Historia de España 5 (1946) 5–110; id., "El senatus visigodo," ibid., 6 (1946), 5–97; P. D. King, Law and Society in the Visigothic Kingdom (Cambridge 1972).

ARCHEOLOGY AND HISTORY OF ART: H. Zeiss, Die Grabfunde aus dem spanischen Westgotenreich (1934); W. Reinhart, "La tradición visigoda en la nacimiento de Castilla," Estudios dedicados a Menéndez Pidal I. (Madrid 1950), 535–554 (collection of older studies by the same author); J. Werner, "Die archäologischen Zeugnisse der Goten in Südrussland, Ungarn, Italien und Spanien," Settimane di studio . . . III. I Goti in Occidente (Spoleto 1956), 127–130; P. Palol de Salellas, "Esencia del arte hispánico visigodo; romanismo y germanismo," ibid., 65–126.

CHURCH HISTORY: P. B. Gams, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 3 vols. (Regensburg 1862–79, reprint ed. Graz 1956); Z. García Villada, Historia eclesiástica de España, 3 vols. (Madrid 1929–36); P. David, Études historiques sur la Galice et le Portugal du 6^e^ au 12^e^ siècle (Lisbon–Paris 1947); K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Suewen bis zur Errichtung der westgotischen katholischen Staatskirche (Berlin 1967); J. Vives, Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos (Barcelona–Madrid 1963); J. Orlandis, "El cristianismo en la España visigoda," Estudios visigóticos 1 (Rome–Madrid 1956), 1–14; id., "La Iglesia visigoda y los problemas de la sucesión al trono," Settimane di studio . . . VII. Le chiese nei regni dell'Europa occidentale e i loro rapporti con Roma I (Spoleto 1960), 333–351; J. Lacarra, La iglesia visigoda en el siglo VII y sus relaciones con Roma; ibid., 353–384; H. v. Schubert, Staat und Kirche in den arianischen Königreichen und im Reiche Chlodwigs (Munich–Berlin 1912); A. K. Ziegler, Church and State in Visigothic Spain (Washington 1930); H. H. Anton, "Der König und die Reichskonzilien im westgotischen Spanien," HJ 92 (1972), 257–281.

CONVERSION OF THE GOTHS AND PAGAN SURVIVALS: E. A. Thompson, "The Conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism," Nottingham Medieval Studies 4 (1960), 4–35; J. N. Hillgarth, "La conversión de los visigodos, notas críticas," Analecta sacra Tarraconensia

34 (1961), 21–46; J. Fontaine, "Conversion et culture chez les Visigoths d'Espagne," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'alto Medio Evo (Spoleto 1967), 87–147; S. MacKenna, Paganism and Pagan Survivals in Spain up to the Fall of the Visigothic Kingdom (Washington 1938).

CARE OF SOULS: E. Göller, "Das spanisch-westgotische Busswesen vom 6. bis 8. Jh.," RQ 37 (1929), 245–313; J. Fernández Alonso, La cura pastoral en la España visigoda (Rom 1955).

CHURCH PROPERTY: G. Martínez Díez, El patrimonio eclesiástico en la España visigoda (Comillas 1959).

LITURGY: (Editions and literature): H. Gilson, The Mozarabic Psalter (H. Bradshaw Society 30, London 1905) (hymnarium); Dom Férotin, "Liber ordinum," Monumenta ecclesiae liturgica 5 (Paris 1904) (rituals); "Liber Commicus, ed. por los padres de Silos," Analecta Maredsolana I (1893) (epistles and gospels); Antiphonarium Mozarabicum, ed. por los padres de Silos (León 1928); Dom Férotin, "Liber sacramentorum," Monumenta ecclesiae liturgica 6 (1912) (sacramentary); G. Prado, Manual de liturgia hispanovisigótica o mozárabe (Madrid 1927); J. Pérez de Urbel, Orígen de los himnos mozárabos (Bordeaux 1926); C. Rojo y G. Prado, El canto mozárabe (Barcelona 1929).

CANON LAW: P. Fournier–G. Le Bras, Histoire des collections canoniques en Occident I (Paris 1931); G. Martínez Díez, La colección canónica hispana I (Madrid–Barcelona 1966).

MONASTICISM: I. Herwegen, Das Pactum des hl. Fructuosus von Braga (Stuttgart 1907); J. Pérez de Urbel, Los monjes españoles en la edad media (Madrid 1934); A. Mundò, "Il monachesimo nell peninsula ibérica fino al secolo VII," Settimane di studio . . . IV. Il monachesimo nell'alto Medio Evo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale (Spoleto 1957), 73–108.

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM: E. Bagué, Historia de la cultura española (Barcelona 1953); M. Díaz y Díaz, "La cultura de la España visigotica del siglo VII," Settimane di studio . . . V. Caratteri del secolo VII in Occidente II (Spoleto 1958), 818–844; id., Anecdota visigótica (Salamanca 1959).

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE: J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne visigothique (Paris 1959) (authoritative monograph with detailed bibliog. on Isidore and Spain in Isidore's time); Ch. H. Beeson, Isidor-Studien. Quellen und Untersuchungen zur lat. Philologie des Mittelalters IV, 2 (Munich 1913); J. L. Romero, "San Isidoro de Sevilla. Su pensamiento histórico-político y sus relaciones con la historia visigoda," Cuadernos de Historia de España 8 (1947), 5–71; A. Borst, "Das Bild der Gesch. in der Enzyklopädie Isidors von Sevilla," DA 22 (1966), 1–62; J. Madoz, "El primado romano en España en el cielo isidoriano," RET 2 (1942), 229–255; id., "El concilio de Calcedonia en S. Isidoro de Sevilla," ibid., 12 (1952), 189–204; P. Séjourné, Le dernier père de l'Église. St. Isidore de Séville, son rôle dans l'histoire du droit canonique (Paris 1929); G. Le Bras, "Sur la part d'Isidore de Séville et des Espagnols dans l'histoire des collections canoniques," RevSR 10 (1930), 218–257; Miscellanea Isidoriana (Rome 1936); in it especially P. Séjourné, "St. Isidore et la liturgie visigothique," 221–251 and A. E. Anspach, "Das Fortleben Isidors im 7. bis 9. Jh.," 323–356; J. Fontaine, "La diffusion de l'œuvre d'Isidore de Séville dans les scriptoria helvétiques du haut moyen âge," Schweizerische Zchr. für Gesch. 12 (1962), 305–327; J. N. Hillgarth, "The East, Visigothic Spain, and the Irish," Studia Patristica 4 (Berlin 1961), 422–456; id., "Visigothic Spain and Early Christian Ireland," Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy 62, sec. C, nr. 6 (Dublin 1962), 167–194.

OTHER MONOGRAPHS: F. Görres, "Leander Bischof von Sevilla und Metropolit der Kirchenprovinz Baetica," ZWTh 29 (1886), 36–50; id., "Mausona Bischof von Mérida und Metropolit der Kirchenprovinz Lusitanien," ibid., 28 (1885), 326–332; Juan de Biclaro, obispo de Gerona, su vida y su obra. Introducción, texto crítico y comentarios por J. Campos (Madrid 1960); J. Madoz, "Martín de Braga; el XIV° centenario de su llegada en la península ibérica," EE 25 (1951), 219–242; C. H. Lynch, St. Braulio Bishop of Saragossa 631–651. His life and writings (Washington 1938); Sister Athanasius Braegelmann, The Life and Writings of St. Ildefons of Toldeo, The Catholic Univ. of America Studies in Medieval History 4 (Washington 1942); F. X. Murphy, "Julian of Toledo and the Condemnation of Monothelitism in Spain," Mélanges J. de Gellinck (Gembloux 1951), 361–373.

36. The Lombards and Italy

SOURCES

Paulus Diaconus, Historia Longobardorum; Vita s. Barbati: MGSS rer. Lang. et Italicarum (1878). MGSS rer. Mer. II (Frankish sources with incidental but often important accounts for Lombard history); Poetae Latini, especially I (Tituli saec. VIII) and IV (Rhythmi aevi merovingici et carolini); C. Troya, Storia d'Italia del medio evo IV (Codice diplomatico longobardo))1852–59); L. Schiaparelli, Codice diplomatico longobardo: Fonti per la storia d'Italia 62–63, 2 vols. (Rome 1929–33); Edictus Rothari, ed. F. Beyerle (Weimar 1947) (including the capitularies of the Lombard Kings); Jaffé; P. J. Kehr, Italia pontitificia, 7 vols. (1906ff.); F. Schneider, Die Epitaphien der Päpste (Texte zur KG des MA 6, 1933); Mansi X–XII; PL 75–79 (works of Gregory the Great); MGEp I (Register of Gregory the Great).

LITERATURE

HISTORY OF THE LOMBARDS AND OF LOMBARD ITALY: L. Schmidt, Die Ostgermanen (Munich, 2nd ed. 1941); Problemi della civiltà e dell'economia longobarda: Scritti in memoria di G. P. Bognetti (Milan 1964); Atti del I congresso internazionale di studi longobardi (Spoleto 1952); C. G. Mor, Lo Stato longobardo nel VII secolo: G. Pocchettino, I Longobardi nell'Italia meridionale (Caserta 1930); G. P. Bognetti, Chierici, A. de Capitani d'Arzago, Santa Maria di Castelseprio (Milan 1948); id., Milano longobardo: Storio di Milano II (Milan 1954); O. Bertolini, I Germani. Migrazioni e regni nell'Occidente già romano: Storia universale, dir. da E. Pontieri III 1 (Milan 1965); G. Fasoli, I Longobardi in Italia (Bologna 1965).

LOMBARD MISSION, LOMBARD CHURCH HISTORY, ROME AND THE LOMBARDS: Cf. the works, cited above, by Bognetti, Bertolini and Fasoli. Also: G. P. Bognetti, "La rinascita cattolica dell'Occidente di fronte all'arianesimo e allo scisma," Settimane di studio . . . VII. Le chiese nei regni dell'Europa occidentale e i loro rapporti con Roma sino all'800 (Spoleto 1960), 15–41; id., "La continuità delle sedi episcopali e l'azione di Roma nel regno longobardo," ibid., 415–454; P. M. Conti, "Il 'monasterium,' sacello di fondazione privata e le missioni cattoliche nell Tuscia del secolo VIII," Studi storici, Miscellanea in onore di M. Giuliana (Parma 1965), 81–102; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio ed ai Longobardi (1941); id., "I papi e le relazioni politiche di Roma con i ducati longobardi di Spoleto e di Benevento," RSTI 6 (1952), 1–46; id., "Riflessi politichi delle controversie religiose con Bisanzio nelle vicende del secolo VII in Italia," Settimane di studio . . . V. Caratteri del secolo VII in Occidnete II (Spoleto 1957), 733–790; id., "Le chiese longobarde dopo la conversione al cattolicesimo ed i loro rapporti con il papato," Settimane de studio . . . VII. Le Chiese nei regni dell'Europa occidentale I (Spoleto 1960), 455–492.—Id., "I papi e le missioni fino alla metà del secolo VIII," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al critianesimo nell'Europa dell'Alta Medio Evo (Spoleto 1967), 327–363; P. M. Conti, "Aquileian, Eastern and Roman Missions in the Lombard Kingdom," Misc.HistEccl III (Louvain 1970), 62–70.

37. The Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons and the Beginnings of the Anglo-Saxon Church

SOURCES

MGAuct. ant. XIII 1 (Gildas and Nennius); MGSS rer. Mer. VI (life of Wilfrid of York); MGEp I and II (Registrum Gregorii). Jaffé I^2 (1885); Duchesne, LP (Paris, 2nd ed. 1907; reprint ed. 1955); Ch. Plummer, Venerabilis Bedae opera historica, 2 vols. (Oxford 1896; reprint ed. 1966); P. F. Jones, A Concordance to the Historia eccl. of Bede (Cambridge, Mass. 1929); Bedae opera de temporibus, ed. Ch. W. Jones (Cambridge, Mass. 1943); W. Jaager, Vita metrica s. Cuthberti (Leipzig 1935); B. Colgrave, Two Lives of St. Cuthbert (Cambridge 1940); F. A. Gasquet, A Life of Pope Gregory the Great (Westminster 1904); B. Thorpe, The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 2 vols., Rolls Series (1861); J. Earl–Ch. Plummer, Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, . . . 2 vols. (Oxford 1892, 1899); A. W. Haddan–W. Stubbs, Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland III (Oxford 1871); F. Liebermann, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen, 3 vols. (Halle 1903–16; reprint ed. Aalen 1960); F. L. Attenborough, The Laws of the Earliest English Kings (Cambridge 1922); J. M. Kemble, Codex diplomaticus aevi saxonici, 6 vols. (London 1839–48); W. de Gray Birch, Cartularium saxonicum, 3 vols. (London 1885–93; reprint ed. 1964).

FOR THE CHRONOLOGY: R. L. Poole, Studies in Chronology and History (Oxford 1934).

LITERATURE

F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England (Oxford, 2nd ed. 1950), there, pp. 679–699, a general survey of the sources; R. H. Hodgkin, History of the Anglo-Saxons, 2 vols. (Oxford, 3rd ed. 1952); P. Clemoes, The Anglo-Saxons. Studies presented to Bruce Dickins (London 1960); W. Levison, England and the Continent in the Eighth Century (Oxford 1946); M. Deanesly, The Pre-Conquest Church in England (London 1961); id., Side-Lights on the Anglo-Saxon Church (London 1962); J. Godfrey, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge 1962); The English Church and the Papacy in the Middle-Ages, ed. C. H. Lawrence (London 1965); cf. Th. Schieffer, Winfrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Freiburg 1954), with an excellent chapter on the origin and development of the Anglo-Saxon Church to the eighth century; K. Schäferdiek, "Bekehrung und Bekehrungsgeschichte III. England und Schottland," Hoops, Reallexikon der germanischen Altertumskunde II^2 (1974), 188–193.

ON BEDE: his sources and the related questions on the Roman beginnings of the mission: Bede, his Life, Time and Writings, ed. A. H. Thompson (Oxford 1935); S. Brechter, "Die Quellen zur Angelsachsenmission Gregors d. Gr.," Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums und des Benediktinerordens 21 (Münster 1941); id., "Das Apostolat des hl. Bonifatius und Gregors Missionsinstruktionen für England," St. Bonifatius, Gedenkgabe zum 1200. Todestag (Fulda 1954), 22–33; id., "Zur Bekehrungesgeschichte der Angelsachsen," Settimane di studio . . . XIV. La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'alto medio evo (Spoleto 1967), 191–215.—Opposite views: M. Deanesly–P. Grosjean, "The Canterbury Edition of the Answers of Pope Gregory I to St. Augustine," JEH 10 (1959), 1–49; P. Meyvaert, "Les Responsiones de St. Grégoire à St. Augustin de Canterbéry," RHE 54 (1959), 879–894; M. Deanesly, "The Capitulare Text of the Responsiones of Pope Gregory I to St. Augustine," JEH 12 (1961), 231–234.—Comprehensive: J. M. Wallace-Hadrill, "Rome and the Early English Church. Some questions of transmission," Settimane di studio . . . VII. Le chiese nei regni dell'Europa occidentale e i loro rapporti con Roma sino all'800, II (Spoleto 1960), 519–548.

SECTION TWO

Inner Life of the Church to the End of the Seventh Century

38. North African Christianity from the Beginning of Vandal Rule to the Muslim Invasion

SOURCES

Victor Vitensis, Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae, rec. M. Petschenig: CSEL 7 (Vienna 1881); Quodvultdeus Carthag., Sermones: C1P, no. 401–412; PL Suppl. 3, 261–298; Fulgentius Ruspensis, Opera, ed. J. Fraipont: CChr 91–91A (Turnhout 1968); Ferrandus diac., Epistulae: PL 67, 887–950; Breviatio canonum: ibid., 949–962; Vita s. Fulgentii, ed. G. -G. Lapeyre (Paris 1929); Facundus Hermian., Opera: PL 67; Victor Tunnunensis, Chronicon, ed. Th. Mommsen: MGAuctant 11, 2 (Berlin 1894); Procopius, Bellum Vandalicum, ed. J. Haury (Leipzig 1905); ed. O. Veh (Munich 1971); Concilia Africae. A. 345–A. 525 cura et studio C. Munier: CChr 149 (Turnhout 1974).

LITERATURE

A. Audollent, "Afrique," DACL 1, 810–861; J. Mesnage, Le christianisme en Afrique. Déclin et extinction (Algiers 1915); J. Ferron–G. -G. Lapeyre, "Carthage chrétienne," DHGE 11 (1948), 1149–1159; A. Berthier ed al., Les vestiges du christianisme antique dans la Numidie centrale (Paris 1951).—L. Schmidt, Geschichte der Vandalen (Munich, 2nd ed. 1942); Ch. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique (Paris 1955); P. Courcelle, Histoire littéraire des grandes invasions germaniques (Paris, 4th ed. 1964); H. -J. Diesner, Das Vandalenreich (Stuttgart 1966).—G. -G Lapeyre, Saint Fulgence de Ruspe (Paris 1929); H. -J. Diesner, Fulgentius von Ruspe als Theologe und Kirchenpolitiker (Stuttgart 1966).—Ch. Diehl, L'Afrique byzantine 533–709 (Paris 1896; reprint ed. New York 1964); Ch. -A. Julien, Histoire de l'Afrique du Nord I (Paris, 2nd ed. 1968).—M. Dall'Arche, Scomparsa del cristianesimo ed espansione dell'Islam nell'Africa settentrionale (Rome 1967).

39. The Papacy between Byzantium and the German Kingdoms from Hilary (461–68) to Sergius I (687–701)

SOURCES

Duchesne, LP; Jaffé, I–II; The papal letters in PL 59, 65–67, 69, 72, 80, 87, 89, 96. A. Thiel, Epistolae Romanorum Pontificum I (from Hilary to Hormisdas, Braunsberg 1867);

Collectio Avellana, ed. O. Guenther; CSEL 35 (Vienna 1895–98). Partial editions: 18 letters of Felix II and 8 of Gelasius I in E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma=AAM 1934, 10; Gelasius, Brief gegen die Lupercalien und 18 Messliturgien aus dem Sacramentarium Leonianum, ed. G. Pomarès: SChr 65 (Paris 1959); 4 letters of Vigilius, ed. E. Schwartz: SAM 1940, 2; P. M. Gassó—C. M. Batlle, Pelagii I epistulae quae supersunt (Montserrat 1956).—The works of Gregory the Great: PL 75–79; Registrum epistularum, ed. P. Ewald–L. M. Hartmann: MGEp. 1–2 (1891/99); G. Corti, Le lettere di Greg. M. L. I 1–50 (Milan 1972); Dialogi, ed. U. Moricca (Rome 1924); Moralia in Job, 11. 1–2, ed. R. Gillet–A. de Gaudemaris: SChr 32 (Paris 1950: New edition in preparation); 11, 11–14, ed. A. Bogognano: SChr 212 (Paris 1974); Kommentar zum Hohenlied und Buch I der Könige, ed. P. Verbraken: CChr L 144 (1963).

LITERATURE

See chap. 15, above; also: E. Caspar, Vol. II: Das Papsttum unter byzantinischer Herrschaft (Tübingen 1933); F. X. Seppelt, Vol. II: Von Gregor d. Gr. bis zur Mitte des 11. Jh. (Munich, 2nd ed. 1955); V. Monachino, I papi nella storia I (Rome 1961); W. Ullmann, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (London, 3rd ed. 1970); W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement (Cambridge 1972).—W. Kissling, Das Verhältnis zwischen Sacerdotium und Imperium von Leo I. bis Gelasius I. (Paderborn 1921); L. Knabe, Die gelasianische Zweigewaltentheorie bis zum Ende des Investiturstreites (Berlin 1936); A. K. Ziegler, "Pope Gelasius I and His Teaching on the Relation of Church and State," The Catholic Historical Review, XXVII 4, 412–437. P. Charanis, Church and State in the Later Roman Empire (491–518) (Madison 1939); W. Haacke, Die Glaubensformel des Papstes Hormisdas im acacianischen Schisma (Rome 1939), also "S. Martin," RET 1 (1941), 767–812; G. Westenburger, Der Symmachusprozess von 501 (Diss. Tübingen 1940); O Bertolini, "Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Langobardi," Storia di Roma IX (Bologna 1941); Chalkedon II, 13–192, 491–562; E. Pontieri, Le invasioni barbariche e l'Italia del V e VI secolo (Naples 1960); H. Rahner, Kirche und Staat im frühen Christentum (Munich 1961); G. Pepe, Il medio evo barbarico d'Italia (Turin 1963); F. Dvornik, Das Papsttum und der römische Primat (Stuttgart 1966); A. St. McGrade, "Two fifth-century Conceptions of Papal Primacy," Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 7 (1970), 3–45; J. Gaudemet, "Aspects de la primauté romaine du V^{e} au XV^{e} siècle," Jus Can. 11 (1971), 92–134; P. Conti, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei papi del secolo VII (Milan 1971); L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini, VI–VII sec. (Louvain 1972).—F. X. Dudden, Gregory the Great, 2 vols. (London 1950); H. Grisar, San Gregorio Magno (Rome 2nd ed. 1928); P. Batiffol, Saint Grégoire le Grand (Paris 1928); R. Gillet, "Grég. le Grand," DSp 6 (1967), 872–910; L. Weber, Hauptfragen der Moraltheologie Gregors d. Gr. (Fribourg 1947, 259–268 the earlier literature); D. Hofmann, Die geistige Auslegung der Schrift bei Gregor d. Gr. (Münsterschwarzach 1968); O. Giordano, L'invasione longobarda e Gregorio Magno (Bari 1970).—Gregory the Great and Byzantium: E. H. Fischer: ZSKA 67 (1950), 15–144; P. Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam II 2 (Paris 1965), 129–177.

40. The Ecclesiastical Organization and the Clergy

SOURCES

Gregory the Great, Registrum Epistolarum: MGEp, Tome 1 and 2 (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1957). Epistolae Arelatenses genuinae: MGEp III, 1–83 (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1957). H. T. Bruns, Canones apostolorum et conciliorum saeculorum IV, V, VI, VII, 2 vols. (Berlin 1839). Gallic councils: CChr, Series Latina, vols. 148 and 148a, ed. C. Munier–C. de Clercq (Turnhout 1963). Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos, ed. J. Vives (Barcelona–Madrid 1963). Gregorii episcopi Turonensis libri historiarum: MGSS rer. Mer. I, 1 (Hannover 1951).

LITERATURE

E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums II (Tübingen 1933); G. Langgärtner, Die Gallienpolitik der Päpste im 5. u. 6. Jh.=Theophaneia 16 (Bonn 1964); H. G. J. Beck, The Pastoral Care of Souls in South-East France during the Sixth Century=AnGr 51 (Rome 1950); J. Fernández Alonso, La cura pastoral en la España romanovisigoda=Publicaciones del Inst. Esp. de. Est. Ecles. A 2 (Rome 1955); W. Seston, "Note sur les origines religieuses des paroisses rurales," RHPhR 35 (1935), 241–254; E. Griffe, "Les paroisses rurales de la Gaule," MD 36 (1953), 33–62; id., La Gaule chrétienne a l'époque romaine, Vol. 3: La cité chrétienne (Paris 1965); M. J. Delage. Introduction to: Césaire d'Arles, Sermons au peuple, Tome 1 (SChr 175) (Paris 1971), 11–216; J. M. Lacarra, "La Iglesia visigoda en el siglo VII y sus relaciones con Roma," Settimane di studi . . . VII (Spoleto 1960), 353–384: J. M. Wallace-Hadrill, "Rome and the Early English Church: some questions of transmission," ibid., 519–548; G. le Bras, "Sociologie de l'église dans le Haut Moyen-Age," ibid., 595–611; P. Riché, Education et culture dans l'occident barbare. VI^e^–VIII^e^ siècles (Paris, 3rd ed. 1973); R. Gryson, Les origines du célibat ecclésiastique du premier au septième siècle, Recherches et Synthèses, Histoire II (Gembloux 1970); H. F. Muller, L'époque mérovingienne. Essai de synthèse de philologie et d'histoire (New York 1945); O. Giordano, L'invasione longobarda e Gregorio Magno (Bari 1970); J. B. Sägmüller, Die Entwicklung des Archipresbyterats und Dekanats bis zum Ende der Karolingerzeit (Tübingen 1898); P. Conte, Chiesa e Primato nelle lettere dei Papi del secolo VII (Milan 1971).

41. Liturgy, Care of Souls, Piety

SOURCES

Sacramentarium Veronense, ed. L. C. Mohlberg et al.=Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, Series Maior, Fontes I (Rome 1956); Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Aeclesiae Ordinis Anni Circuli (Sacramentarium Gelasianum), ed. L. C. Mohlberg et al. =Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, Series Maior, Fontes IV (Rome 1960); J. Deshusses, "Le Sacramentaire Grégorien. Ses principales formes d'après les plus anciens manuscrits," Spicilegium Friburgense 16 (Fribourg 1971); M. Andrieu, "Les Ordines Romani du Haut Moyen-Age," SSL, Études et Documents, Fasc. 11, 23, 24, 28 (Louvain 1931–56); J. Beckmann, Quellen zur Geschichte des christlichen Gottesdienstes (Gütersloh 1956); Concilia Galliae, see chap. 40, supra; Concilios Visigóticos, see chap. 40, supra; Gregor. M. Reg. Epp., see chap. 40, supra; id., "Homiliae in Hiezechihelem Prophetam," CChr, Series Latina 142, ed. M. Adriaen (Turnhout 1971); Gregory of Tours, see chap. 40, supra; "Sancti Caesarii Arelatensis Sermones," ed. G. Morin: CChr, Series Latina 103 and 104 (Turnhout 1953); Martini Episcopi Bracarensis, Opera Omnia, ed. C. W. Barlow (New Haven 1950).

LITERATURE

A. Stuiber, Libelli Sacramentorum Romani = Theophaneia VI (Bonn 1950); A. Chavasse, Le Sacramentaire Gélasien (Vaticanus Reginensis 316) "Sacramentaire Presbytéral en usage dans les titres romains au VII^{e} siècle," Bibliothèque de Théologie, Series IV. Histoire de la Théologie, vol. I (Desclée 1958); id., "Messes du Pape Vigile (537–555) dans le Sacramentaire Léonien," ELit 64 (1950), 161–213, 66 (1952) 145–219; C. Coebergh, "Le Sacramentaire Gélasien Ancien, une compilation de clercs romanisants du VII^{e} siècle," ALW VII, 1 (1961), 45–88; K. Gamber, "Das kampanische Messbuch als Vorläufer des Gelasianum. Ist der hl. Paulinus von Nola der Verfasser?," SE 12 (1961), 5–111; id., Sakramentartypen. Versuch einer Gruppierung der Handschriften und Fragmente bis zur Jahrtausendwende. Texte und Arbeiten, Heft 49–50 (Beuron 1958); S. J. P. van Dijk, "The Urban and Papal Rites in the Seventh and Eighth-Century Rome," SE 12 (1961), 411–487; id., "Gregory the Great, Founder of the urban schola cantorum," ELit 77 (1963), 335–356; M. Vos, "A la recherche de normes pour les textes liturgiques de la messe (V^{e}–VII^{e} siècles)," RHE 69 (1974) 5–37; C. Vogel, "Les èchanges liturgiques entre Rome et les pays francs jusqu'à l'époque de Charlemagne," Settimane di studio . . . VII (Spoleto 1960), 185–295; id., "Le pèlerinage pénitentiel," Pellegrinaggi e culto dei santi in Europa fino alla Ia Crociata. Convegni del centro di studi sulla spiritualità medievale IV" (Todi 1963), 39–92; B. de Gaiffier, "Pellegrinaggi e culto dei santi," ibid., 9–35; A. Petrucci, "Aspetti del culto e del pellegrinaggio di S. Michele Arcangelo sul monte Gargano," ibid., 145–180; E. Delaruelle, "La spiritualité des pèlerinages a Saint-Martin de Tours du V^{e} au X^{e} siècle," ibid., 199–244; A. Prandi, "La tomba di S. Pietro nei pellegrinaggi dell'età medievale," ibid., 283–447; Beck, Fernández Alonso, Delage, and Muller, see supra, chap. 40; E. Griffe, "A travers les paroisses rurales de la Gaule au VI^{e} siècle," BLE 76 (1975), 3–26; B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa. Wallfahrten in der Antike und das Pilgerwesen in der alten Kirche = Forschungen zur Volkskunde Heft 33–34–35 (Münster 1950); id., "Reliquienverehrung, ihre Entstehung und ihre Formen," TThZ 67 (1958), 321–334; E. Ewig, "Der Petrus- und Apostelkult im spätrömischen Gallien," ZKG 71 (1960), 215–251; L. J. van der Lof, "De san Agustín a san Gregorio de Tours. Sobre la intervención de los mártires," Augustinus XIX (1974), 35–43.

42. Latin Monasticism from the Mid-Fifth Century to the End of the Seventh Century

SOURCES

1. The rules for monks and nuns of the period, first collected by Benedict von Aniane (†821) in his Codex Regularum, edited by L. Holste (†1661) in Rome 1661, in a new version edited by M. Brockie (Augsburg 1759, reprint ed. PL 103, 393–664), reprint Graz 1957; cf. J. Neufville, "Les éditeurs des regulae Patrum, S. Benôit d'Aniane et Lukas Holste," RBén 76 (1966), 327–343. New edition in the Corpus Consuetudinum Monasticarum in preparation. Survey of the monastic rules by A. Mundó in LThK^{2} VII, 540–542 and CIP nos. 1838–1876. 2. Separate editions of particular rules: Regula Magistri (= RM), Éd. diplomatique par H. Vandenhoven–F. Masai–P. B. Corbett (Brussels 1953); ed. A. de Vogüé, SChr 105–107 (Paris 1964–65, bibliog. pp. 15–25); The Rule of the Master, trans. Luke Eberle (Kalamazoo 1977). Regula Benedicti (=RB): ed. C. Butler (Freiburg, 3rd ed. 1935); G. Penco (Florence 1958, with Italian trans.); R. Hanslik, CSEL 75 (Vienna 1960); Ph. Schmitz (Maredsous, 2nd ed. 1962); G. M. Colombás–L. M. Sansegundo–O. M. Cunill, BAC 115 (Madrid, 2nd ed. 1968, with Gregory the Great's Dialogi lib. II); A. de Vogüé–J. Neufville, SChr 181–186 (Paris 1971–72, with important introduction, vol. I, 13–410). Since 1972 there appears an annual volume: Regulae Benedicti Studia (Hildesheim), edited by B. Jaspert and E. Manning, from 2 (1973) with international bibliog. on the RB. Caesarius Arel., Regula ss. virginum, ed. G. Morin, Florpatr 34 (Bonn 1933); Reglas monásticas de la España visigoda (Leander, Fructuosus, Isidor) ed. J. Campos–I. Roca, BAC 321 (Madrid 1971, with Spanish trans.).

LITERATURE

GENERAL: See supra, chaps. 19–20; also: T. P. McLaughlin, Le très ancien droit monastique de l'Occident (Poitiers 1935), id., Il monachesimo nell'alto medio evo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale (Spoleto 1957); G. Penco, "Il concetto di monaco e di vita monastica in Occidente nel secolo VI," StMon (1959), 7–50; J. Leclercq, "Érémitisme en Occident," Le Millénaire du Mont Athos I (1963), 161–180; Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris 1961), 323–383; Los monjes y los estudios (Poblet 1963), 41–103; B. Steidle, "Die Einsetzung des Abtes im alten Mönchtum," Erbe und Auftrag 40 (1964), 179–196; F. Weissengruber, "Weltliche Bildung der Mönche (5./6. Jh.);" Röm HM 8–9 (1964–65), 13–28, 10 (1966–67), 12–42; A. Mundó, "Las reglas monásticas del siglo VI y la 'lectio divina'," StMon 9 (1967), 229–255; K. S. Frank, Frühes Mönchtum im Abendland I: Lebensnormen (Munich 1975).

ITALY: G. Ferrari; G. Penco (supra, chap. 20); Monographs on Benedict of Nursia: J. Chapman (London 1929); L. Salvatorelli (Hamburg 1937); J. McCann (London 1937); S. Brechter (ed.), Benedikt, Vater des Abendlandes (St. Ottilien 1947); R. Molitor (ed.), Vir Dei Benedictus (Münster 1947); I. Herwegen (Düsseldorf, 4th ed. 1951); I. Schuster (Viboldone 3rd ed. 1953); Cl. -J. Nesmy (Paris 1958); I. Herwegen, Sinn und Geist der Benediktinerregel (Einsiedeln 1944); E. v. Hippel, Die Krieger Gottes. Die Regel Benedikts als Ausdruck frühchristlicher Gemeinschaftsbildung (Paderborn, 2nd ed. 1953); Fr. A. Blazovich, Soziologie des Mönchtums und der Benediktinerregel (Vienna 1954); A. de Vogüé, La communauté et l'abbé dans la Règle de s. Benôit (Paris 1960); S. Pawlowsky, Die biblischen Grundlagen der Regula Benedicti (Vienna 1965); H. Schlögl, Der hl. Benedikt als Pädagoge und Psychologe (Diss. Vienna 1966).—Benedictines to 700: C. Butler, Benedictine Monachism (London 1919); St. Hilpisch, Benediktin. Mönchtum (Freiburg 1929); Ph. Schmitz, Histoire de l'ordre de Saint Benoît, 7 vols. (Maredseus 1942–1956).—D. Cappuyns, "Cassiodore," DHGE 11, 1349–1408; A. van de Vyver, "Les Institutions de Cassiodore et sa fondation à Vivarium," RBén 53 (1941), 59–88; G. Ludwig, Cassiodor. Über den Ursprung der abendländischen Schule (Frankfurt 1967, Bibliog. 169ff.); R. Schlieben, Christliche Theologie und Philologie in der Spatäntike. Die schulwissenschaftlichen Methoden der Psalmenexegese Cassiodors (Berlin 1974).—O. Porcel, La doctrina monástica de san Gregorio Magno y la 'Regula monachorum' (Madrid 1950); P. Rudmann, Mönchtum und kirchlicher Dienst in den Schriften Gregors d. Gr. (St. Ottilien 1956).

GAUL: L. Ueding, Geschichte der Klostergründungen der frühen Merowingerzeit (Berlin 1935); F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich (Munich 1965); G. Holzherr, Regula Ferioli (Einsiedeln 1961); G. Moyse, "Les Origines du monachisme dans le diocèse de Besançon (V–Xs.)," BEC 131 (1973), 21–104; F. Villegas, "La 'Regula monasterii Tarnatensis.' Texte, sources et datation," RBén 84 (1974), 7–65.

IRISH-FRANKISH MONASTICISM: H. Leclercq, "Luxeuil," DACL 9 (1930), 2722–2787; S. Columbani opera ed. G. S. M. Walker (Dublin 1957, with bibliog. pp. LXXXII–XCII); Mélanges Colombaniens (Luxeuil–Paris 1951); J. O. Caroll, "The Chronology of St. Columban," IThQ 24 (1957), 76–95; F. MacManus, Saint Columban (New York 1962).

SPAIN: Perez de Urbel I (supra, chap. 20), 165–528; J. F. Alonso, La cura pastoral en la España romano-visigoda (Rome 1955), 463–507; A. Mundó, "Monachesimo nella penisola iberica fino al secolo VII," Il monachesimo nell'alto medio evo (Spoleto 1957), 73–108; P. J. Mullins, The Spiritual Life According to St. Isidore (Washington 1940); C. M. Aherne, Valerio of Bierzo (Diss. Washington 1949); M. Martins, O monacato de s. Fructuoso de Braga (Coimbra 1950); J. Campos, Juan de Biclaro (Madrid 1960); A. Viñayo Gonzales, San Fructuoso de Braga (León 1966); M. C. Díaz y Díaz, "La vida eremítica en el reino visigodo," España eremítica, Analecta Legerensia I (Pamplona 1970), 49–62; A. Linage Conde, "Los orígenes del monacato benedictino en la peninsula ibérica, T. I.," El monacato hispano prebenedicto (León 1973).

NORTH AFRICA: J. J. Gavigan (supra, chap. 20); J. Diesner, "Das Mönchtum der Vandalenzeit in Afrika," Kirche und Staat im spätrömischen Reich (Berlin, 2nd ed. 1964), 140–148.

43. Theological Discussions

SOURCES

Victor episcop. Vitensis, Historia persecutionis Africae provinciae, ed. M. Petschenig: CSEL 7 (1881); Fulgentius Ruspensis, Opera, ed. J. Fraipont: CChr 91 and 91 a (Turnhout 1968); "La Crónica de Juan Biclarense," ed. P. Álvarez Rubiano: AST 16 (1943), 16–42; Vitae Patrum Emeritensium: ActaSS Novembris I, 316–339 (Paris 1887) and J. N. Garvin (Washington 1946); Caesarius Arelatensis, Sermones, ed. G. Morin: CChr 103 and 104 (2nd ed. 1953); Paulus Diaconus. Historia Langobardorum: MGSS rer. Lang. 45–187; Facundi episcopi ecclesiae Hermianensis opera omnia, ed. J. M. Clement–R. van der Plaetse: CChr 90A (1974); Rustici contra Acephalos disputatio: PL 67, 1167–1254.

LITERATURE

Hefele-Leclercq (Paris 1907ff., Hildesheim–New York, 2nd ed. 1973); H. J. Diesner, "Fulgentius von Ruspe als Theologe und Kirchenpolitiker," Arbeiten zur Theologie I, 26 (Stuttgart 1966); id., "Die Auswirkungen der Religionspolitik Thrasamunds und Hilderichs auf Ostgoten und Byzantiner," Sitzungsber. der sächs. Akademie d. Wiss. Phil. -hist. Kl. 113, 3, Berlin (1967); M. C. Díaz y Díaz, "La cultura de la España visigótica del siglo VII," Settimane di Studio . . . V (Spoleto 1958), 813–844; E. E. Sestan, "La composizione etnica della società in rapporto allo svolgimento della civiltà in Italia nel secolo VII," ibid., 649–677; O. Bertolini, "Le chiese Longobarde dopo la conversione al Cattolicesimo ed i loro rapporti con il papato," ibid., VII (1960), 455–492; G. P. Bognetti, "La continuità delle sedi episcopali e l'azione di Roma nel regno Longobardo," ibid., VII (1960), 415–454; F. J. Dölger, "Die Ehrfurchtsbezeigung beim Durchgang zwischen heidnischem Altar und christlicher Kirche. Arianische Gewissensbetäubung in der Spätantike," AuC 6 (1940–50), 69f.; K. F. Stroheker, Germanentum und Spätantike (Zürich–Stuttgart 1965); F. Kauffmann, Aus der Schule des Wulfila (Strasbourg 1899); M. Schanz–C. Hosius–G. Krüger, Geschichte der römischen Literatur IV, 2: Die Literatur des 5. u. 6. Jh. (Munich, 2nd ed. 1959); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition (London 1965); J. A. Jungmann, Liturgisches Erbe und pastorale Gegenwart (Innsbruck 1960); G. G. Lapeyre, St. Fulgence de Ruspe (Paris 1929); M. J. Delage, see chapter 40; L. Duchesne, L'Église au 6e siècle (Paris 1925); K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Suewen bis zur Errichtung der westgotischen katholischen Staatskirche = Ar- beiten zur Kirchengeschichte 39 (Berlin 1967); W. Goez, "Bemerkungen zu einem Bischofsgrab im Dom von Grado," ZKG 70 (1959), 121–140; W. Meyer, Die Spaltung des Patriarchats Aquieleia. Abhdl. Ges. Wiss. Göttingen, Phil. -Hist. Kl. n.s. 2, 6 (1898).

44. The Epilogue of Early Christian Latin Literature

SOURCES

Boethius, The Theological Tractates, with an English translation, ed. H. F. Stewart–E. K. Rand (London–New York 8th ed. 1968). —Cassiodorus, De institutione divinarum literarum: PL 70, 1105–1150. De artibus ac disciplinis liberalium litterarum: PL 70, 1149–1220; Variae and De Anima: CChr 96. Expositio Psalmorum: CChr 97 and 98. —Gregory the Great, Epistulae: MGEp I and II, cf. supra, chap. 40; Moralia in Job: PL 75, 510–76, 782. Bocks I–II, ed. R. Gillet–A. de Gaudemaris: SChr 32 (1950); In Ezechielem: CChr 142, ed. M. Adriaen (Turnhout 1971); Dialogi, ed. U. Moricca =Fonti per la storia d'Italia 57 (Rome 1924); Isidori Hispalensis episcopi opera omnia: PL 81–84.

LITERATURE

V. Schurr, Die Trinitätslehre des Boethius im Lichte der skythischen Kontroversen = Forschungen zur christlichen Literatur-und Dogmengeschichte 18, 1 (Paderborn 1935); M. Nedoncelle, "Les variations de Boèce sur la Personne," RevSR 29 (1955), 201–238; P. Riché, Éducation et Culture dans l'Occident Barbare, 6ᵉ–8ᵉ siècles (Paris 1962, 3rd ed. 1973); G. Ludwig, Cassiodor über den Ursprung der abendländischen Schule (Frankfurt a. M. 1967); A. Momigliano, "Cassiodorus and Italian Culture of His Time," Proceedings of the British Academy XLI, 207–245 (London 1955); R. Schlieben, Christliche Theologie und Philosophie in der Spätantike. Die schulwissenschaftlichen Methoden der Psalmenexegese Cassiodors = Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte 46 (Berlin 1974); F. Schneider, Rom und Romgedanke im Mittelalter (Munich 1926); F. H. Dudden, Gregory the Great. His place in History and Thought, 2 vols. (London 1905, 2nd ed. 1967); D. Hofmann, Die geistige Auslegung der Schrift bei Gregor dem Grossen = Münsterschwartzacher Studien 6 (1968); V. Recchia, Le Omelie di Gregorio Magno su Ezechiele (1–5) = Quaderni di "Vetera Christianorum" 8 (Bari 1974); R. Manselli, "Gregorio Magno e la Bibbia," Settimane di Studio X (Spoleto 1963), 67–101; R. Wasselynck, "L'influence de l'exégèse de S. Grégoire le Grand sur les commentaires bibliques médievaux (VIIᵉ–XIIᵉ s.)," RThAM 32 (1965), 157–204; G. Dufner, Die Dialoge Gregors d. Gr. im Wandel der Zeiten und Sprachen = Miscellanea Erudita XIX (Padua 1968); Cl. Dagens, "La fin des temps et l'Église selon S. Grégoire le Grand," RSR 68 (1970), 273–288; H. Hürten, "Gregor d. Gr. und der mittelalterliche Episkopat," ZKG 73 (1963), 16–42; V. Monachino, "Gregorio I," Bibliotheca Sanctorum 7 (Rome 1966) col. 222–278 (bibliog.); H. J. Diesner, Isidor von Sevilla und seine Zeit = Arbeiten zur Theologie 52 (Stuttgart 1973). Diesner has announced an "exhaustive study on Isidore"; A. Borst, "Das Bild der Geschichte in der Enzyklopadie Isidors von Sevilla," DA 22 (1966), 1–62 (bibliog.); J. Fontaine, Isidore de Sevilla et la culture classique dans l'Espagne visigothique, 2 vols. (Paris 1959); M. C. Díaz y Díaz, see supra, chap. 43; Isidoriana. Estudios sobre San Isidoro de Sevilla, en el XIV Centenario de su nacimiento (León 1961); Fernández Alonso, see supra, chap. 40; Duchesne, see supra, chap. 40.

INDEX

Aba Mar I, Catholicus of Persia 465–466
Abasgi 507
Abd-al Malik, Caliph 514
Abraam, Bishop of Karai 188, 366
Abraham, monk 366
Abraham of Kashkar 468
Acacian Schism 429–433, 434–436, 497, 616–624
Acacius, Bishop of Beroea 108–109
Acacius, Bishop of Caesarea in Palestine 37, 49–50
—and the Homoians (Acacians) 49, 227
Acacius, Bishop of Melitene 109–110
Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople 425–430, 433, 435–436, 615–617, 620, 622–623, 636; see also Acacian Schism
Acemetae monks 366, 370, 428–429, 435, 444, 486, 615, 731
Acephalae 731, 750
Achilleus, priest 19
Acholius, Bishop of Thessalonica 69–70, 252
Adalwald, Lombard King 578–580
Adrianople 48, 193
—battle of (378) 67, 227
adultery 394–395, 397
Advent 306–307, 671–672, 685
Aedesius, brother of Frumentius 183–184
Aedesius, philosopher 52
Aegean Islands, evangelization of 193
Aemilius, Bishop of Benevento 171
Aerius of Sebaste 272
Aethelbert, King of Kent 586, 588–590, 598, 601
Aëtius, Count 266, 525
Aëtius, deacon 45
Africa, North 507, 644, 707–711, 714, 725
—evangelization of 204–207
—Church in 602–614
—monasticism in 389, 691, 705–707
—under the Vandals 602–608
—in the Byzantine reconquest 609–612
—evangelization of pagans 611
—Muslim conquest of 612–614
Agape 130
Agapitus, Abbot of the New Laura 448
Agapitus I, Pope 445–446, 627–629, 639, 642, 739
Agathangelus, historian 482
Agatho, Pope 462, 581, 635, 665
Agaunum, Saint-Maurice d' 199
Agde, Synod of (506) 560, 645, 648–649, 666, 683
Agila 712
Agila, Visigothic King 561
Agilbert, Bishop of Dorchester 593, 595
Agilulf, Lombard King 575, 578–579, 583–584, 633
Agilus 547, 549
Agnellus, Bishop of Ravenna 716
Agrestius, monk of Luxeuil 547
Agrippinus, Bishop of Como 578
Aidan, Abbot-Bishop of Lindisfarne 594
Aistulf, Lombard King 585
Alahis, Duke of Trent 582–583
Alans 210, 229
Alaric I, Visigothic King 195, 356, 361, 390
Alaric II, Visigothic King 525, 529, 560
Albinus, patrician 625
Alboin, Lombard King 574–577
Alcuin of York 599
Aldhelm of Malmesbury 598–599
Alemanni 225, 525–527, 536, 539, 541–544, 549, 551–552, 554
Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria 17–20, 22
Alexander, Bishop of Antioch 239, 258
Alexander, Bishop of Hierapolis 109–110
Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem 122, 329
Alexander, Bishop of Thessalonica 19
Alexander, founder of the Acemetae 366, 370, 486
Alexandria 16–22, 27–28, 30, 34–36, 38, 40, 44, 50, 54, 57, 60, 62, 64, 66–67, 71, 75–76, 97, 101, 105–114, 118, 121–122, 124–129, 182, 184, 220, 232, 234, 240, 242–243, 247, 251–253, 257–258, 262–263, 266–267, 291, 302, 337, 345, 350, 358, 360, 374, 384, 391, 421–422, 425, 426, 433, 437, 442, 445, 452, 459, 469–474, 477, 491, 496–498, 513–514, 588, 615, 623, 644, 731, 739, 750

—patriarchate of 236, 291, 442
—Synod of (319) 18
—Synod of (338) 35
—Synod of (362) 60, 62, 95
—Synod of (400) 126
—Synod of (430) 103
—Synod of (c. 458) 422
Al-Mundir, Ghassanid Phylarch 458, 512
Amalaric, Visigothic King 560
Amalasuntha, Ostrogothic Queen 445
Amandus, Bishop, Apostle of the Flemings 530, 539–541, 544, 547
Ambrose, Bishop of Milan 86–89, 123, 132, 134–135, 197–199, 214, 218, 222–223, 243, 254–255, 270, 273, 282, 293–294, 302, 304–305, 311, 313, 315–316, 323–325, 327–328, 333, 375, 377–378, 392–393, 396, 399, 408, 412, 414, 616, 672, 715, 746
—and Valentinian II 86–87
—and Theodosius I 86–89, 711
—missionary activity of 197–198
Ambrosiaster 272, 302, 336
Ammianus Marcellinus 56–57, 201, 249–250
Ammonas 215
Ammun, hermit 343, 355
Amphilochius, Bishop of Iconium 66, 70, 74, 372
Amphilochius, Bishop of Side 372
anaphora (canon) 291–293, 297
Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles 291–292
Anastasius, Bishop of Areopolis 185
Anastasius, Bishop of Pavia 581
Anastasius I, Emperor 399, 429–435, 444–445, 465–466, 481, 617, 621–623
Anastasius I, Pope 126–128, 256
Anastasius II, Pope 430, 433, 620
Anastasius of Sinai 492, 495
Anatolius, Bishop of Constantinople 115–118, 121, 268, 421–422
Anatolius, Comes Orientis 505
anchorites 337–338, 343–346, 348–349, 354–355, 357, 360, 363–364, 383, 442, 484, 693, 697 —communities of 343–345, 349, 354–357, 364, 380, 382
Ancyra 62
—Synod of (314) 193, 233, 278
Andrew, Apostle 241, 502, 685
Andrew of Samosata 110
Anglo-Saxons 521, 530, 579, 582, 585–601, 632–634, 665, 673, 685, 692, 698, 748
—schools 599–600
—culture 600–601
—vernacular literature 601
Annegray, monastery 534, 701
Annesi in Pontus 368
anointing 677, 682–683
—in baptism 677, 682
—of the sick 682–683
Anomoios 45, 49
—Anomoians 45–46, 61
Anthimus, Patriarch of Constantinople 444–446, 469, 627
Antiencyclion 425
Antinoe 183, 731
Antioch 17, 20, 34–36, 50, 53, 55, 60, 65–67, 75–76, 94, 103, 106, 108–111, 187, 189–190, 214, 232, 240, 243, 253, 258, 262–263, 275, 291–292, 298, 305, 308, 311, 314–315, 322, 325, 330, 360, 364, 383, 391–392, 408–410, 416, 421–423, 427, 430, 436, 442, 445, 465, 476, 485, 494, 498–499, 514, 615, 623, 750
—patriarchate of 187–188, 236, 239, 258, 291, 297, 442, 464–465, 476
—Schism of 60, 65, 68–69, 243, 251
—school of 17, 20, 97, 107
—Synod of (c. 268) 21
—Synod of (c, 331) 30
—Synod of (341) 36, 49, 227–228, 234
—Synod of (363) 189
—Synod of (379) 68, 96
—Synod of (c. 418) 170
Antoninus, Emperor 400
Antoninus, Neoplatonic philosopher 182
Antoninus, subdeacon 643
Antony, monk 327, 337–338, 341, 343, 344–345 358, 360, 363, 374, 380, 385
Anysius, Bishop of Thessalonica 255, 257
Aphthartodocetists 446, 455, 490
Apiarius, priest 260–261
Aosta 199
apocrisiarius, papal 446–449, 452, 628, 630, 635
apocrypha 131, 135–136, 694
Apollinaris the Elder, Bishop of Laodicea 56
Apollinaris the Younger, Bishop of Laodicea 56, 65, 67
—Christology of 94–103, 109, 716, 729–730
Apollinarius, Patriarch of Alexandria 469
apophthegmata 344, 355–356, 485, 487, 693
Apostles' Liturgy of the East Syrians 291
Apostolic Constitutions 271, 278, 283, 335
Aqaba 185
Aquileia 41, 127, 165, 196–197, 200–201, 235, 238, 243, 248, 257, 265, 316, 360, 374, 379, 545–547, 549, 574–579, 582, 584, 628–629, 633, 733–735
—Synod of (381) 199–201, 715
Arabia 478–479, 506, 509, 513, 581, 613
—evangelization of 186–187, 189, 214, 479, 505–506, 510
Arbogast 543
Arbogast, Comes 225
Arabs 509–514
—Monophysite 458, 478–479, 506
—see also Arabia
Arcadius, Emperor 89, 194, 220, 257–258, 405 archdeacon 271, 648, 657–658, 662–664
archpriest 651, 655, 656–658
Arethas, martyr 187
Arethas, Saint 479, 502, 506

Ariadne, Augusta 424
Arianism and Arians 16–32, 34–37, 45, 47–48, 74, 79–80, 86–87, 93, 98, 101, 195, 246, 251, 293, 327, 365, 374, 377, 417, 437, 496, 525, 527–528, 559, 562, 564–565, 573–574, 578–582, 602–609, 614, 622, 625, 655, 705, 707–722, 725, 733, 736, 752
—collapse of 59–61
—temporary recovery 61–63
—end of within Empire 74, 218, 251
—and the Germans 74, 226, 229–230, 527, 559
—and Christology 93–95, 100
—Visigothic Synod of (580) 713
Aripert I, Lombard King 580–581
Aristolaus 108
Arius 16–23, 25–26, 28–32, 80, 100–102, 123, 709
—doctrine of 16–23; see also Arianism and Arians
—Thalia 19, 25
—death 32, 625, 712
Ariwald, Lombard King 579–580
Arles 41, 235, 260, 266, 646, 653, 670, 687, 699
—vicariate of 238, 530, 561, 588–589, 622, 637–641, 644
—Synod of (314) 22, 79, 197, 207, 209, 211, 244, 246
—Synod of (353) 41, 82, 244, 248
—Synod of (524) 651
Armagh 520, 522
Armenia 238, 257, 475, 479–481, 513
—evangelization of 192, 366, 480, 482
—Monophysite Church of 479–483
-literature 480, 482
Arnobius 336
Arsenius, Bishop 30
Arsenius, monk 356
art, Byzantine 504
Arzuges 206
Ascension 303–304, 648, 667
Asceterium 275
asceticism 322–323, 337–342, 362, 374–376, 386, 392–393
—intermediate stage 343, 376, 386
Asclepas, Bishop of Gaza 37, 185
Asella 375
Asia Minor 193–194, 228, 458, 475, 496
—evangelization of 191–193, 228, 508
—role of Cappadocia in 192, 480, 517
—monasticism in 367–369
Asketikon, Messalian writing 372
asketikon of Basil 368–369, 379
Aspar 423–424
Asterius, Bishop of Amaseia 312
Asterius, Bishop of Milan 593
Asterius the Sophist 312 asylum, right of 405
Atarbius 123
Athalaric, Ostrogothic King 626
Athanagild, Visigothic King 561, 577
Athanarich, Visigothic Prince 227
Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria 22–24, 30–31, 34–38, 40–46, 49, 57, 60, 62, 64, 82–85, 94, 99, 122, 196, 203–204, 207, 243–244, 247–249, 281, 303, 312, 323, 327, 338, 344, 349, 374, 385
—writings 44, 62, 338, 344, 360, 363, 374
—and the freedom of the Church 84
—and evangelization 182–184, 214
Athens 52, 56, 64, 194–195, 220, 438, 491
Atripe, White Monastery of 353, 470
Attala, Abbot of Bobbio 579
Attila, King of the Huns 230, 269, 576
Audaeus and the Audians 226–227
Audebert, Bishop of Cambrai 540
Audofleda 525
Audoin, Bishop of Rouen 540
Audoin, Lombard King 574
Audomar, Bishop of Thérouanne 539
Augsburg 200, 536, 544–547
Augustine, Archbishop of Canterbury 588–590, 596, 598
Augustine, Bishop of Hippo 102–103, 128, 138–139, 142, 144, 148, 164–166, 171, 204–205, 213, 216, 223, 231, 258–259, 275, 280–281, 285, 296, 299, 301, 303, 306, 307–310, 313, 316–320, 323, 326, 328, 331–333, 336, 360, 362, 376–378, 392, 395–396, 398–400, 403, 406, 409, 411–415, 571, 587, 602–603, 608, 614, 630, 632, 697, 700, 705, 716–717, 719, 721, 723–728, 731, 737, 740–741, 744, 746, 748–749, 751–753
—and Donatism 148–161, 602
—and recourse to the secular power 153–155
—ecclesiology of 160–161
—and Pelagianism 162, 164–169, 171–174
—and grace 174–178, 383, 723, 725–726
—and paganism 204–205
—preaching of 317–319
—and monasticism 386–390, 705
—Rule of 387–390, 691, 695–696, 699, 703–704, 707
—and pagan literature 413
—educational program of 413–414
Aurelian, Bishop of Arles 640, 691, 699
Aurelian, Emperor 304
Aurelius, Bishop of Arles 350
Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage 149–150, 153, 165, 205, 260, 333
auricular confession 523, 596, 689, 702
Ausonius, poet 220
Auspicius of Toul 225
Austrasia 531, 537, 542, 553, 701
Authari, Lombard King 575, 577–579, 584
Autun 40, 588, 684, 699
Auvergne, Synod of (535) 649
Auxanius, Bishop of Arles 640
Auxentius, Bishop of Milan 42, 48, 59, 87
Auxentius, hermit 486
Auxerre, parishes in 645

Auxerre, synods of 650–651, 658
Avars 196
Avenches 199
Avitus, Bishop of Vienne 526–527, 558, 621, 624, 638, 674, 676, 679, 711
Axum 183–184, 479

Babai II, Catholicus of Persia 465–466
Babai the Great, Abbot 466–467
Babgen, Catholicus of Armenia 481
Babylas, Saint 34, 55, 187, 325, 330
Bachiarius, monk 385
Bagai, Synod of (394) 146
Bajuwares (Bavarians) 545–549
Balearic Isles 210
baptism 14, 160, 162, 164–165, 175, 213, 272, 277, 279, 281, 293–296, 303, 305, 310, 319, 331, 335, 362, 372, 393, 415, 504, 507, 524, 667, 676–677, 723
—Donatist idea of 154
—deferment of 294, 301
—preparatory catechesis 294–295, 308–311
—infant 164–165, 296, 308, 676–677
Bar Harith bar Gabala, Ghassanid King 475
Barnabas, Apostle 240
Barsanuphius, monk 487, 493
Bar-Sauma, Bishop of Nisibis 464
Barsumas, archimandrite 113–114
Basiliscus, usurper, 424–425, 615
—Encyclion 424–425, 615
Basil, Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia 64–68, 70, 73, 85–86, 94, 122, 192, 194, 214, 251, 294, 312–313, 316, 327, 339, 341, 350, 383, 399, 405, 407–408, 410, 412–414, 484, 491
—on Church and state 85
—Liturgy of 292, 499
—and monasticism 367–369, 487, 695
Basilias 410
Basiliscus, usurper 388, 424–425, 615
—Encyclion 424–425, 615
—Antiencyclion 425
Bassula, deacon 104
Bathildis, Frankish Queen 556
Bavaria 577, 660, 733
—evangelization of 230, 544–549, 552, 554
—parish in 648
Bavo 539
Bede 587–588, 590, 599–601
Bedouins 478, 505, 510
Beirut 188, 236, 252
Belisarius, general 445–446, 452–453, 608–609, 627, 707
Bellator, priest 740
Benedict I, Pope 588, 629
Benedict II, Pope 570
Benedict Biscop, Abbot 598–600, 665
Benedict of Aniane, Abbot 350, 369, 696
Benedict of Nursia, Abbot 202, 350, 389, 671, 748
—Rule of 350, 355, 369, 535, 598, 600, 631 691, 694–696, 698–700, 702–704, 745
Benevento 203, 575–576, 581, 582, 584–585
Benignus 542
Benjamin, Patriarch of Alexandria 472
Berbers 608, 613–614
Beroea 249
Bertha, Queen of Kent 586
Beryllos, Bishop of Bostra 21
Bethlehem 9, 123, 125–127, 306, 317, 358, 361, 412, 484
Beziers, Synod of (356) 42, 83
Biclar 704
Bilichild 552
Birinus, Bishop of Dorchester 593
bishopric 230–233
—terminology 231
—erecting of 231
—duty of residence 232
—additional churches in 232 bishop 270–273, 275–276, 278–289, 297, 299–301, 308, 312
—right of appeal to Rome 38–39, 232
—responsible for evangelization 213–214
—duty of residence 232
—transfer to 232
—election of 36, 281–284, 335, 441, 532, 619
—judicial functions of 6, 284–285, 440
—titles 286
—insignia 286
—charitable activities of 287
—collegiality 287–289
—and Justinian I 439–442
—qualifications of 744–745
Blesilla 392
Blitmund 539
Bobbio 523, 535, 579–580, 582, 633, 692, 698, 702
Boethius 437, 625, 731–733, 736–738, 743, 756
—writings of 736–738
Bologna 197
Boniface, Apostle of Germany 552, 648, 660, 666
Boniface, Bishop of Carthage 608
Boniface I, Pope 240, 260–262
Boniface II, Pope 626, 639, 728
Boniface IV, Pope 579, 633, 641
Boniface V, Pope 591–592
Bonosus 377
Bonosus, Bishop of Naïssus 256
Bordeaux 329, 379
—Synod of (c. 384) 133–134, 243
—Synod of (662) 652
Bosra 479
Bostra 186
—Synod of 21
Braga 136, 667
—Synod of (561) 667–668, 731
—Synod of (563) 657, 672
—Synod of (565) 136
—Synod of (572) 648, 650
—Synod of (576) 688

Braulio, Bishop of Zaragoza 569, 673, 682, 704, 722
Brendan 522
Brescia 197, 578, 583
Bretwalda 586, 588
Brier Monastery (St. Catherine) 485
Britain 517–521, 523, 530, 585–601, 644, 686
—evangelization of 211–212
British Christians 517–520, 521, 585–601
Brunhildis, Frankish Queen 588, 641, 699, 713
Bulgars 508
Burgundians 209, 226, 229–230, 405, 524–525, 527–528, 622, 638, 686
Burgundy, Kingdom of 531, 535, 541–542, 544, 547, 552, 556, 559, 649, 652, 657, 701, 711
Burgundofaro, Bishop of Meaux 540
Byzacena 603, 605, 607–608, 610–611, 613, 706
—Synod of (541) 610
Byzantine Liturgy 292–293, 499–500
Byzantium 12, 15, 75, 80, 147, 240–241, 456, 463, 465, 467, 469, 471–472, 479–483, 487–488, 492, 503, 506–507, 509–511, 514, 583, 614, 616, 618, 620–621, 626, 628, 635, 664, 715, 734

Caecilian, Bishop of Carthage 24, 137, 157, 245
Caedmon 601
Caedwalla, King of Gwynedd 591
Caedwalla, King of Wessex 597
Caelestius 162, 164–170, 174, 259
Caesarea in Cappadocia 34, 57, 62, 191–192, 238, 292, 313, 367–368, 410, 480
Caesarea in Palestine 50, 185, 236, 239, 439
Caesarius, Bishop of Arles 223, 350, 383, 389, 555, 560, 568, 622, 624, 626, 638–639, 646–647, 651, 666, 669–671, 673–680, 683, 691, 695, 699, 704, 710, 725–727, 736, 754, 756
—Rule for Virgins 680, 699
—Rule for Monks 699–700
—doctrine of grace 725–728
Cagliari 201, 203, 607, 693
Calandion, Patriarch of Antioch 427
Callinicum 87–88, 223, 391, 457
Candidian, Bishop of Aquileia 735
Candidian, Count 104, 336
Candidus, priest 641
canon law, Byzantine 498–499
Canterbury 586, 588–589, 592–593, 595–596, 598–599, 634
Cappadocia 64, 304, 322, 408, 480, 484, 497, 513
—role in evangelization 192, 480, 517
Caprasius of Lerins 381
Capreolus, Bishop of Carthage 104, 603
Capraria 377
Capua 202
—Synod of (391) 256
Carcassonne 209
Care of souls 673–683
—preaching 673–676
—Sunday rest 675
—superstition and magic 675
—concubinage 676
Carloman, Mayor 552
Carpentras, Synod of (527) 646
Carthage 136–138, 140–141, 152–154, 165, 204–205, 232, 234, 238, 242–243, 258, 308–309, 330, 386, 392, 603–607, 609–611, 644, 708–709, 711
—Religious Discussion of (411) 156–158, 206, 336
—Synod of (c. 335) 137
—Synod of (c. 348) 141
—Synod of (390) 280
—Synod of (397) 285
—Synod of (401) 150, 205, 280, 408
—Synod of (403) 151
—Synod of (404) 152
—Synod of (411) 165, 168
—Synod of (416) 169, 245, 395
—Synod of (418) 170, 259
—Synod of (525) 706
—Synod of (534) 609
—Synod of (536) 706
—Synod of (550) 610
—Synod of (594) 611
Cassian, John 101–102, 177, 350, 369, 382–384, 522, 690, 695, 703–705, 723
—writings 383
Cassiciacum 412
Cassiodorus 572, 697, 736, 739–744, 751, 753–754, 756
—Variae 739, 741
—writings 739–743
—see also Vivarium
Castellum Tingitanum 137
catechesis 294–295, 298, 307–311
catechist 307–310
catechumen 213, 271, 297, 299, 303, 308–309, 335, 361, 667, 669, 685, 710 catechumenate 290, 293–297, 299, 308, 311, 362, 676
Catholic Church, privileged position of 4–14, 89
—laws favourable to 4–6
—official religion 68, 89
Catholicus of Armenia 238, 480–482
Catholicus of the Iberians 481
Catholicus of Persia 465–469
Cato, priest of Clermont 651
Cedd, missionary in Essex 594
Celestine I, Pope 101–106, 108, 174, 177, 215, 243, 260, 262–263, 268, 279, 288, 518, 646 celibacy, clerical 278–281, 653–656
Celtic monasticism 521–523, 535, 690, 692, 698
Celts, mission to the 517–523

cenobites 338, 345–354, 358–359, 364–368, 374, 382, 388, 442, 478, 484, 493, 690, 693–694, 702
—community of Tabennisi 345
—superiors 346–347
—size of communities 347
—separation from world 346
—poverty and obedience 349, 352
—"order" 351–353
Chalcedon 106, 116, 330, 453
—Council of (451) 72, 77, 98, 106–107, 114–121, 185–186, 188, 190, 231, 236–237, 239–240, 268–269, 290, 307, 351, 359, 363, 369 371, 391, 406, 417, 421–427, 429–433, 435–437, 443–444, 447, 450–452, 454–455, 457–459, 461, 463–464, 466, 468–469, 471–472, 475, 477, 480–481, 483–484, 486–490, 495, 497, 501, 506, 579, 615–618, 622, 624, 629 691, 709, 719–720, 729–730, 734
—Creed of 118–121, 425, 615, 617
—Canon 28 of 119, 121, 237, 268, 421, 423, 429, 433, 472, 496–497, 641
Chaldaeans, Uniate 291
Chalon, Synod of (650) 641, 681–682
Chararic, King of the Sueves 562
Charibert I, King of Paris 586
Chariton, Saint 357–358
Childebert I, Frankish King 538, 557, 629, 699
Childebert II, Frankish King 557, 639–640
Chilperic I, Frankish King 537, 714
Chindaswinth, Visigothic King 566
Chintila, Visigothic King 569, 685
Chlodomer 525
Chlotar I, Frankish King 699
Chlotar II, Frankish King 531–532, 539, 557–558
Chnodomar, King of the Alemanni 225
chorepiscopus 191, 233, 359
Chosroes I, King of Persia 438, 466
Chosroes II, King of Persia 466, 467, 476, 512
Christmas 304–307, 385, 416, 526, 648–649, 659–661, 672, 676
—Christmas Cycle 306–307
Christology 755
—of Arius, 17, 19
—in the fourth century 93–97
—in the fifth century 98–121
—and Priscillianism 135
—from 451 to 680 421–463
Chromatius, Bishop of Aquileia 222, 304–305
Chronographus of 354, 304
Chrysaphius 111–112, 115, 336
Chur 199, 536, 541–544
Church of the Empire 78, 89–90, 245
—organization of 230–245, 496–499
—clergy 269–289
—liturgy 282–307, 499–500
—preaching and catechesis 307–319
—pagan survivals 331–334
—piety 319–321
—asceticism 322–323
—cult of saints 323–328, 500–502, 749
—pilgrimage 328–331
—laity 334–337
—eastern monasticism 337–373, 483–488
—western monasticism 374–393
—and society 393–417
—intolerance 417
—age of Justinian I 433–456
—literature 488–495
—antocephalous archbishops 498
—canon law collections 498–499
—Byzantine discipline 502
—Byzantine art 504
—Byzantine Missionary activity 504–509
—and Islam 509–514
Church, local; see bishopric
Church-state relations
—in the fourth century 78–90
—Emperor's position 80–81
—imperial despotism 83–85
—subservience of bishops 83
—Church of the Empire 89–90
—dangers 90
Cilicia, evangelization of 190
Circumcellions 138–140, 144, 146–147, 158–159
Clarus, monk 381
Claudian, Donatist Bishop 145
Claudian, poet 220
Clement of Alexandria 278, 740
Clementine Liturgy 291
Cleph, Lombard King 575
clergy, Christian 449–289, 619, 651–658
—Orders 270–273
—admission to 273–277, 281–282
—restricted to males 273
—age requirements 273
—moral fitness 274, 652–653
—knowledge 275, 651–652
—slaves and coloni 276
—state officials 276–277
—marriage of 277–280
—celibacy of 277–281, 653–656
—ordination 282–284
—privileges of 284–287
—titles 286
—insignia 286
—collegiality of bishops 287–289
—and Justinian I 441–443
—Byzantine 502–503
Clermont, Synod of (535) 531
Clichy, Synod of (627) 641, 657
Clodoswintha, Lombard Queen 574
Clotilda, Frankish Queen 525, 527
Clovis, Frankish King 230, 524–528, 532, 536–537, 556–558, 566, 622, 676, 710–711
Codex Argenteus 715
collegiality, episcopal 287–289
Cologne 225, 549–550, 554

Comasius, priest 135
Colchester 211
Colman, Abbot of Lindisfarne 594, 595
coloni 401, 406, 606
Columba the Older (Columcille) 522–523, 595–596
Columban (Columba the Younger) 523, 534, 539, 542–543, 547, 553, 555, 578–579, 633, 679, 698, 700–702
—Rule of 535, 691, 696, 698, 700–702
Comgall 522, 701
communicatio idiomatum 102, 106, 444, 489
Como 733
confirmation 677, 682
Conon, Abbot of the Great Laura 454
Conon, Saint 501
Constance 541–544, 553–554
Constans I, Emperor 32–33, 37, 39–41, 82, 138, 152, 247
Constans II, Emperor 461–462, 482, 612, 635
Constantina 137
Constantine I, Emperor 3–32, 59, 78–81, 87, 89, 136, 184–187, 189, 203, 209, 212–213, 216–217, 219, 221, 226–227, 244–247, 277, 283–286, 294, 304, 306, 323, 328–329, 334, 336, 362–363, 374, 385, 395–397, 399, 401–402, 404, 415, 442, 486, 526, 565
—position in the Church 4, 13–14, 81
—favouring of the Church 4–16, 80–81
—and heretics 6–7
—and pagans 7–9, 11, 53, 79, 190
—building activity 9–11, 184, 187
—idea of the Church 11, 20, 78–81
—and Christian morality 12
—and the imperial cult 13–14
—baptism and death 14–16, 22
—legacy of 15–16
—and Arianism 16, 19, 79
—and Nicaea I 22–28, 79
—and the aftermath of Nicaea I 29–32
—and Athanasius 31
—and Donatism 79, 136–137
—"Donation" of 247
Constantine II, Emperor 32–33, 35, 40
Constantine IV, Emperor 462, 581, 635
Constantine, Pope 503
Constantinople 8, 11–12, 32, 49–51, 55, 63, 68, 100–101, 103, 105, 107, 111–112, 116–117, 128, 165, 192, 194, 219, 221, 227, 240, 245, 252, 257–258, 261–263, 292, 299, 304, 314–315, 322, 328, 330, 362, 366, 383, 410, 416, 422–423, 424–426, 428–433, 435–438, 441–446, 448–449, 452–455, 457–459, 461, 469–471, 475–477, 480, 484–486, 488, 496–497, 499, 501–502, 514, 529, 566, 608–610, 615, 618, 622–624, 626–630, 635, 642–643, 708, 711, 724, 731, 738, 750–751
—special rank of 75–76, 119, 240, 268
—patriarchate of 237, 268, 291, 442, 496–498
—monasticism at 370–371
—Synod of (360) 49
—Synod of (382) 74, 76–77
—Synod of (426) 372
—Synod of (448) 112–114, 120
—Synod of (536) 469
—Synod of (587) 629
—Synod of (590) 481
Constantinople, First Council of (381) 23, 67–77, 94, 96, 237, 252, 421, 424, 427, 433, 472
—canons of 75–77, 252
—creed of 71–76, 118, 120
—special rank of Constantinople 75–76, 237, 252, 257, 421, 472, 496
—as ecumenical 76–77
Constantinople, Second Council of (553) 98, 129, 454–455, 463, 529, 568, 577, 579, 610 628, 639, 730–731, 733–735, 737, 750
—condemnation of the Three Chapters 454, 463
—condemnation of Origenism 129, 455
Constantinople, Third Council of (680) 22, 462–463, 569, 581, 634–635
Constantius, Bishop 198
Constantius, Bishop of Milan 578, 733
Constantius II, Emperor 15, 32–33, 37–44, 47–51, 55, 57, 59–61, 81–85, 141–142, 184, 186, 194, 227, 244, 248–249, 284, 416, 486
—and paganism 33–34, 217
—and Athanasius 35–44, 247
—and Arianism 32, 34–50
—and Pope Liberius 43, 46, 247–250
—position in the Church 81–85
Constitutum, First 454
Constitutum, Second 455
Contumeliosus, Bishop of Riez 639
Coptic Church 469–475, 483
—ecclesiastical literature of 472
—monasticism 473
—missionary work of 473–475
Corbinian 548
Córdoba 564, 573
Cormons 578, 735
Cosmas Indicopleustes 468, 491
Council in Trullo (Quinisext) of (692) 271, 278, 502–503, 635 councils, ecclesiastical 241–245, 441–442, 528
—provincial synod 241–242
—interprovincial synod 242–243
—emperor's role in 243–244, 441–442 councils, "national" 528–532, 558, 565, 567–568, 596
Cresconius 336
Crete 222
Crispus, son of Constantine I 12–13
cult of martyrs and saints 323–329, 556–557
—grave and relics 324–331
—cult buildings 324, 327
—translatio 324–326

culture, late Roman, and Christianity 411–417
—dilemma presented 411–414
—Christian educational program 413–414
—Christians in Pagan schools 413
—Golden Age of the Fathers 414
—entertainment 414–416
—entertainers 415
—festivals 415–416
Cuthbert of Lindisfarne 598
Cunctos Populos 68–69
Curubis 141
Cynegils, King of Wessex 593
Cynegius, Prefect 218
Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage 143, 160–161, 330, 385–386, 614, 683, 695, 716, 721
Cyprus 239–240, 359, 498
—evangelization of 190
Cyriacus, Abbot 641
Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria 97–112, 114, 118, 120, 183, 223, 262–263, 405, 421, 423, 427, 450–451, 459, 472, 490, 501, 720, 728–730 732, 750
—and Nestorius 100–171
—the Twelve Anathemas of 103, 105, 108–110, 112, 427, 444, 450, 489, 615
—and the Council of Ephesus 104–107
—and John of Antioch 108–110
—Liturgy of 291
Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem 72, 74, 222, 239, 291, 298, 302, 310–311
Cyril of Scythopolis 485, 505
Cyrila, Vandal Patriarch 605–606
Cyrus of Batna 477
Cyrus of Phasis, Patriarch of Alexandria 459, 461–462

Dacia, evangelization of 195–196
Dagobert, I, Frankish King 531, 539–542, 544, 549, 553, 557–558
Dalmatia, evangelization of 195–196
Dalmatus, Abbot 370, 486
Damascus 188, 509, 526
Damasus I, Pope 64, 66–69, 96, 99, 131–132, 162, 201, 240, 243, 250–255, 279, 375–376, 379, 653
—and the Roman Primacy 250–253
—poetry of 254
Damian, Bishop of Pavia 582
Damian, Patriarch of Alexandria 471
David of Menevia 521 deacon 270–273, 276, 278–280, 283, 286, 297–298, 308, 408, 646, 652–654 deaconess 273, 408
decretals, papal 253, 255–256, 279, 299, 530, 569, 619
Decretum Gelasianum 253, 694
Demetrias 162, 164, 167
Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria 122
Demetrius, Saint 330, 502
Demophilus, Arian Bishop of Constantinople 63, 69
Deogratias, Bishop of Carthage 604
Deogratias, deacon 309
Desiderius, Bishop of Vienne 681
Desiderius, Lombard King 585
Deusdedit, Archbishop of Canterbury 593
Deusdedit, Bishop of Milan 578
Dhu Nuwas, Himyarite King 506
Diadochus of Photice 373, 493
Dictinius, Bishop 135
Didymus the Blind 99, 122
diocesis 650
Diocletian, Emperor 187, 195–196, 235, 237, 246, 312, 340, 345, 401, 589
Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus 74, 97–98, 188, 275
Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria 21, 122
Dionysius, Bishop of Milan 32, 197, 327
Dionysius, Pope 21
Dionysius Exiguus 600, 754
Dionysius the pseudo-Areopagite 459, 489, 491–492, 495
Dioscorus, antipope 626
Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria 111–117, 121, 266–268, 421–423, 497
Discipline of the Secret 296
Diospolis, Synod of (415) 168–169, 258
diptychs 258, 429, 454, 616, 620
divorce 5, 395
Docetism 372
Dometian, Bishop of Ancyra 448–449,
Dominic, Bishop of Carthage 611
Domnus, Bishop of Antioch 111–112, 114, 359
Donatism 79, 136–161, 204, 206, 232, 242–243, 245–246, 273–274, 301, 311, 336, 405, 417, 602–603, 609–611, 614, 709, 721, 745
—and the Circumcellions 138–140
—forced union of 347–361, 140–141, 152
—Golden Age 142–148
—attempted suppression of 373–377, 145
—decline 147–148
—and Augustine 148–161, 296, 301
—forced union of 405, 152
—toleration of 410, 153
—Religious Discussion of 411, 156–158
—suppression of 412, 158
—persistence 159
Donatus, Abbot of Servitanum 703, 705
Donatus, Bishop of Bagai 138, 140
Donatus, Bishop of Besançon 700
Donatus, Bishop of Carthage 136–138, 140–142
Donatus, Proconsul 153
Dorotheus, Abbot 487, 493
Dorotheus, Bishop of Thessalonica 624
Dracontius, Bishop of Hermopolis Parva 182
Drosis, martyr 187
Diuma, missionary in Mercia 594
Dunwich 592, 595
Dvin, Synod of (506) 481
—Synod of (554) 481
—Synod of (648/649) 482

Earconbert, King of Kent 598
East Anglia Kingdom of 589–590, 592–593, 598
Easter 302, 310, 312, 351, 416, 577, 588, 590 625, 648–649, 661, 667, 676–677, 683
—Triduum 302
—Season 303
—date of 22, 27, 522, 591, 594, 596, 599, 621
—letters of Jerome 126; of Cyril 183
Eastern illyricum 257, 262, 264, 496, 642
economus 351, 502
Ecthesis 460–461
Ecumenical Patriarch 497, 629–630
Edessa 57, 188–189, 330, 337, 364–366, 410, 430, 463–464, 475–476, 514, 739
Edwin, King of Northumbria 590–591, 594
Egbert, Archbishop of York 599
Egeria 306, 329, 357
Egypt 16–18, 27–28, 31, 35, 49–50, 64, 75, 110, 126, 221, 225, 234, 236–237, 242, 281, 305, 330, 337–338, 341–343, 353–356, 358–362, 368 374, 377, 421–426, 436–437, 446, 456, 458, 466, 470–471, 473, 478, 495–497, 508, 513–514, 624, 707, 742
—and evangelization 181–183, 189
—monasticism 343–360, 382, 384, 483, 485
—and Chalcedon 421–424
—Coptic Church 469–474, 484
Eleusius, Bishop of Cyzicus 57, 63, 70–71
Elias, Patriarch of Jerusalem 431–432
Eligius, Bishop of Noyon 540
Elpidius 113
Elvira, Synod of (306/314) 209, 235, 276, 279 385, 398, 653
Emesa 57, 188
Emmeram 547–548
Enaton, monastery of 471
Encratites 362
Encyclion 424–425
England, parish in 648
Ennodius, Bishop of Pavia 621–622
entertainment, late Roman 414–416
Epaon, Synod of (517) 560, 645, 652, 682, 710
eparchia 233
Ephesus 52, 105–106, 165, 191–193, 237, 241, 330, 425–426, 436, 508
—Council of (431) 77, 103–108, 111–112, 114, 120, 174, 185, 190, 239, 263–264, 267–268, 288, 290–291, 328, 353, 370, 372–373, 422, 424, 426–427, 450, 463, 480, 603, 615, 731, 732
—Council of (449) 113–115, 121, 185, 243–244, 267, 421, 426, 450, 464, 614
Ephrem the Syrian 189, 342, 366, 371, 373, 410
Ephrem, Patriarch of Antioch 445–446, 449, 452, 489
Epiphania 188
Epiphanius, Bishop of Pavia 273
Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis 19, 72, 95, 123–126, 252, 272, 305, 328, 358, 371, 373
Epiphanius, Patriarch of Constantinople 444
Epiphany 304–306, 385, 416 648, 667
Epistula Tractoria 170, 172, 174
Erhard, Bishop 548
Essex, Kingdom of 589–590, 594
Ethiopia 183–184, 366, 474, 506
—Liturgy of 291
Eucharist 129, 142, 160, 272, 278–280, 283, 296–298, 311, 319–322, 324, 366–367, 628, 645, 648–649, 663–664, 670, 680, 683, 723
—Liturgy of the Word 296–297, 299, 631
—nuptial Mass 302
—in honour of martyrs 324
—see also Liturgy
Eucherius, Bishop of Lyon 382
Eudocia, Augusta 362, 423, 484
Eudocia, Vandal Queen 608
Eudoxius, Bishop of Antioch 49
Eudoxius, Bishop of Constantinople 61–63, 93
Eugene, Bishop of Carthage 204, 605–606
Eugene, Bishop of Toledo 573, 682
Eugene I, Pope 635
Eugene, usurper 202, 218, 220
Eugendus, Abbot of Condat 383
Eugippius, Abbot of Lucullanum 693–694
Eulalia of Mérida, Saint 331, 570
Eulalius, antipope 261
Eulogius, Bishop of Caesarea 167
Eulogius, priest 183
Eunapius of Sardes 220, 390
Eunomians 46, 74
Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicus 45, 252
Euphemia, Saint 330, 453, 578
Euphemius, Patriarch of Constantinople 429–430
Euphratas, Bishop of Cologne 40
Euric, Visigothic King 528, 559–560, 563
Eusebius Gallicanus 726
Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea 3–16, 18, 23–27, 29–31, 80–81, 85–87, 89, 122, 125, 193, 222, 302, 414, 505, 526, 751
Eusebius, Bishop of Dorylaeum 112–115, 267
Eusebius, Bishop of Emesa 323
Eusebius, Bishop of Vercelli 42, 123, 275, 281, 377–378
—vita communis 377–378
—monasterium clericorum 377–378
Eusebius of Cremona 126
Eusebius of Nicomedia, Bishop of Constantinople 18, 23, 26, 29–31, 35, 37, 51, 227
—Eusebians 35–36, 247
Eustasius, Abbot of Luxeuil 543, 547–548
Eustathius, Bishop of Antioch 23, 30, 60, 94, 122, 188
Eustathius, Bishop of Sebaste 63, 65, 67, 278, 367, 370, 405
Eustochium 361, 703
Eustorgius, Bishop of Milan 197

Euthymius, monk 185, 359, 483–485, 505, 511, 725
Eutropius 89, 336
Eutropius, Bishop of Valencia 703
Eutyches, Abbot, and Euthchians 111–115, 117, 120, 267, 370, 425, 432, 435, 622, 728–729, 737
Eutyches, missionary in the Crimea 193
Eutychian, anchorite 343
Eutychius, Patriarch of Constantinople 453, 456–457, 488
Euzoius, Bishop of Antioch 60, 62–63
Euzoius, Bishop of Tarsus 50
Evagrius, Bishop of Constantinople 63
Evagrius Ponticus 167, 215, 341, 356, 384, 447, 455, 492–493 evangelization of Western nations 517–601
—Irish 518–523
—Picts 519, 521, 523
—Scots of Caledonia 523
—Franks 524–558
—Burgundians 524–558
—Alemanni 541–543, 549, 551–552, 554
—Bavarians 544–549
—Main-Thuringia 550–552
—Visigoths 565–573
—Sueves 562–564
—Lombards 574–585
—Anglo-Saxons 585–601
—charitable activities 555–556, 558
—and the saints 556
—christianization of state and society 557–558
Evodius, Bishop 152
Evodius, Prefect 133
Exsuperius, Bishop of Toulouse 256, 384
Ezana, Ethiopian King 184
Eznik of Kolb 482

Fabian 717–718
Fabiola 411
Facundus of Hermiane 610, 728–731
Family, see marriage and family
Farfa, monastery 693
Fastidiosus, priest 719
Fausta, Augusta 12–13
Faustus, Bishop of Riez 382, 723, 726
Felix (II), antipope 43, 46, 249–250
Felix, Bishop, Apostle of East Anglia 592
Felix, Bishop of Aptonga 157
Felix, Bishop of Bologna 198
Felix, Bishop of Trier 134
—Felician Schism 134
Felix, monk 707
Felix, Numidian Bishop 706
Felix II, Pope 428–430, 433, 615–616, 636, 709
Felix III, Pope 626, 629, 639
Felix, Saint 330
Ferrandus, deacon of Carthage 610, 707
Filastrius, Bishop of Brescia 304, 744
Finnan, Abbot of Lindisfarne 594
Finnian, Saint 522
Firmicus Maternus 33, 216, 336
Firmilian, Bishop of Caesarea 122
Firmus, rebel 145, 147
Flavian, Bishop of Antioch 188, 372
Flavian, Bishop of Constantinople 107, 111–115, 117, 120, 267
—Epistula Dogmatica ad Flavianum, see Leo I, Pope
Flavian, Patriarch of Antioch 432
Flavian, Vicar 145
Florentina, nun 703
Florian, Bishop of Arles 641
foederati 226, 432, 512, 559, 574, 603
Fontaine, monastery 534, 701
Franks 226, 524–528, 554, 559, 561, 563, 574–575, 577, 584–585, 622, 630, 638, 662, 671–672, 686, 714, 725, 752
—national church of 528, 530–558, 597, 630
—proprietary church 533
—monasticism 534–535
—mission work 535–558
—ecclesiastical organization 541–542
—Salian 536–537
Fravitas, Patriarch of Constantinople 429, 617
Freising 548
Fridolin 543, 548
Frisians 540, 549, 551
Frithona, see Deusdedit, Archbishop of Canterbury
Fritigern, Visigothic Prince 227
Fritigil, Marcomannic Princess 198
Fructuosus, Bishop of Braga 573, 691, 704
—Pactum 570, 704
—Regula Monachorum 704
Frumentius, Bishop of Axum 183–184
Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspe 607, 647, 679, 693, 706–707, 709, 711, 716–721, 722–726, 728, 736, 752, 756
—doctrine of grace 723–725, 728
Furseus, Abbot of Cnobheresburg 592

Gadabitini 206
Gainas 89
Gainas, Patriarch of Alexandria 446, 456
—Gaianites 456, 470
Gaiseric, Vandal King 206, 269, 559, 602, 603–605, 608, 706, 708
Gall, monk 542–543
Galla Placidia, Augusta 115, 267
Gallinara 377, 380
Gallus, Caesar 33–34, 51–52, 55, 325
Galswintha, Frankish Queen 713
Gangra 117
—Synod of (340/341) 193, 278, 367
Garamantes 206, 611
Garmul, King 611
Gaudentius, Bishop of Brescia 198–199, 212, 332
Gaudentius, monk 693
Gaul 59, 519, 523, 524–525, 529, 535, 553, 559, 561, 568, 584, 585–587, 592, 594,

613, 622, 628, 639, 641, 644–645, 647, 649, 652–654, 656–657, 659, 663, 666–670, 672–673, 676–679, 682–684, 688–689, 691–692, 710, 723, 725, 744, 752–753
—evangelization of 207–209, 381, 535–541
—monasticism in 379–384, 523, 534–535, 598–599, 699–703
Gaza 57, 185, 358–359, 431, 448–449, 484–485
—Synod of, and Origenism 448–449
—Synod of (542) 469
Gelasius, Abbot of the New Laura 448–449
Gelasius I, Pope 88, 203, 240, 270, 272, 276, 283, 289, 430, 433, 616–622, 741
—pastoral activity of 619–620
—liturgical activity of 619–620, 658–659, 670
Gelimer, Vandal King 608
Genethlius, Bishop of Carthage 145
Gennadius, Bishop of Constantinople 729
Gennadius of Marseille 204, 348, 385, 693
Genoa 575–577, 580, 733
George, Exarch of Carthage 612
George of Cappadocia, Bishop of Alexandria 33, 44, 49, 51–52, 184
Georgians, evangelization of 190
Gepids 229–230, 574
Gerasa, monastery 357
Gerasimus, Abbot 359
Germain, Bishop of Auxerre 211, 518–519, 524, 556
Germanic peoples 225–230, 524–612
—national churches 229, 528–558, 564–573, 583–585, 597
—conversion to Arianism 230, 614
—Conversion to Catholicism 524–598
—laws of 556–557
Germanius, Bishop of Sirmium 45
Gerona, Synod of (517) 655, 678
Gerontius, monk 362
Ghassanid Arabs 458, 475, 478–479, 510, 512–513
Gildas 521–522
Gildo, usurper 147
Godepert, Lombard 581
Golinduch, Saint 501
Goswintha, Visigothic Queen 563
Goths 226, 229–230, 437, 520, 524–526, 556, 558–559, 561–564, 566, 568, 573, 583, 597, 725
—evangelization of the 193–194, 214, 225–230, 517
Gozbert, Duke of the Main Area 551
Grado 576, 578–579, 583, 585, 634, 733–735
Gratian, Emperor 67–68, 86, 132, 415
Gratus, Bishop of Carthage 137–138, 140–141
Gregory, Bishop of Elvira 223, 316
Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa 66, 74, 86, 96, 122, 310, 313–314, 323, 371, 373, 414, 417
Gregory, Bishop of Tours 209, 524–526, 528, 536, 686–688, 700, 710, 712–714, 725, 749–750, 752–753
Gregory, Exarch of Carthage 464, 612–613
Gregory I, Pope 77, 203–204, 215, 223, 307, 497, 530, 569, 571–572, 577, 579, 586–589, 591, 596–597, 611, 629–633, 637, 640–641, 643–644, 650, 653–654, 656, 660–661, 664, 673–674, 680–681, 684, 689, 710, 713, 722, 725, 728, 733–735, 736, 744–750, 750, 753, 756
—pastoral activity 631–633
—writings 631, 654, 744–750
—and monasticism 632, 692, 693–694, 695–696, 698
—and evangelization 632, 747–748
—and the liturgy 658–660
—exegesis 745–747
Gregory II, Pope 660, 663, 665
Gregory, Prefect 137
Gregory Nazianzen, Bishop of Sasima and of Constantinople 64–67, 69–73, 86, 96, 122, 194, 294, 296, 313, 341, 368, 370, 412, 414, 730, 744
Gregory of Cappadocia, Bishop of Alexandria 36, 40
Gregory Thaumaturgus 122
Gregory the Illuminator 192, 238, 480
Grimoald, Lombard King 581
Gundeperga, Lombard Queen 579–580
Gundobad, Burgundian King 527, 711
Gunthamund, Vandal King 606, 706
Guntram, Burgundian King 531, 557, 641

Hadrian I, Pope 659
Hadrian of Naples 582, 595, 599
Hadrianum 659–660, 665, 670
Hadrumetum, monastery 175
Hagia Sophia 503
handwriting, insular 600
Hatfield, Synod of (679) 597
Heden II, Duke of the Main Area 551–552
Helena, mother of Constantine I 9–10, 30, 329
Heliandlied 722
Helladius, Bishop of Caesarea 74
Helvidius 130, 336, 392
Henoticon (of 482) 426–437, 445–446, 480–481, 615
(of 567) 457
Heraclius, Emperor 458–461, 461, 468, 471, 476, 481–482, 498–500, 512–513, 661
Hereford 596
Hermenegild, Visigothic Prince 563–564, 713–714
hermits 338, 343–345, 362–366, 368, 374, 377, 380, 390, 478, 493, 538, 690, 693, 702
—communities of 343–345, 364, 380, 486
—island hermits 377–378, 693, 702
Hermogenes Neoplatonist philosopher 7
Heros, Bishop of Arles 167
Heruli 229–230, 507, 574

Hesse 552
—parish in 648
Hexham 596
Hilarion, monk 185, 327, 358
Hilary 175
Hilary, Bishop of Arles 265, 382
Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers 42, 46, 59, 83–84, 94, 123, 212, 273, 285, 306, 380, 528, 556, 755
Hilary, papal legate 611
Hilary, Pope 113–114, 281, 614, 637–638
Hilda, Abbess of Whitby 596
Hilderic, Vandal King 608, 625
Himerius 219
Himerius, Bishop of Tarrangona 254, 385, 682
Himyarites 186, 506
Hippo 103, 148–150, 174, 275, 281, 331, 333, 378, 387–389, 411, 603
—Synod of (393) 150, 353
Hippolytus 93, 330
—Canons of 278, 677
—Traditio Apostolica 283, 320
Hira 189, 510
Hispana collection 572–573, 754–755
Historia Lausiaca 344, 355
Historia Monachroum 344, 354, 363, 695
Hlothere, Bishop of Winchester 593
Holy Spirit, divinity of the 62–63, 66–74
homoios 47, 716
—Homoians 49, 61, 63, 65, 85–86, 227–228, 708
homoiousios 46, 61, 85, 755
—Homoiousians 49, 61–63, 65, 71, 85, 249, 755
homoousios 21, 25–26, 36–37, 45, 62, 67, 73–74, 83, 249, 708–709, 755
Honoratus, Archdeacon of Salona 643
Honoratus, Bishop of Arles 381–382
Honorius, Emperor 152–153, 158, 170, 202, 205, 222, 258–259, 261–262, 399, 405, 411, 415, 496
—Edict of Union 152–153
Honorius I, Pope 458–462, 503, 569, 580, 591, 593, 633–634, 660, 692, 735
Hormisdas, Pope 432, 435–437, 444, 561, 622–625, 627, 636–637
—Formula Hormisdae (Regula Fidei Hormisdae) 435, 445, 622, 627
Horsiesi, Abbot 347–348, 351–353
Hosius, Bishop of Córdoba 20, 22, 24, 26, 29, 37–38, 43, 45, 84, 246, 374, 385 hospitals 409–411
Hubert 540
Huneric, Vandal King 571, 605–606, 706, 708
Huns 227, 576
Hyginus, Bishop of Córdoba 131–132
Hymns in the liturgy 499–500, 672
Hypatia, philosopher 182, 220
Hypatius, Bishop of Ephesus 443
Hypatius, monk 192, 369
Ibas, Bishop of Edessa 110, 114, 119, 431, 444, 450–451, 454, 463–464, 728–731, 734
Iberians 209, 481, 484
icon 500–501, 504, 508
Idacius, Bishop of Mérida 131–135
Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch 287, 340
Ildefonse, Bishop of Toledo 573, 677, 685
Illtud, Abbot of Calday 521
Illus 426–427
Illyricum, evangelization of 195 imposition of hands 676–677, 682–683
India, Thomas Tradition of 189
Ine, King of Wessex 597, 598
Ingundis, wife of Hermenegild 563, 713–714
Innocent I, Pope 135, 162, 169–170, 174, 210, 235, 239, 243, 255–259, 261–262, 270, 272, 279, 306, 376, 653
—and disciplinary problems 256–257
—and causae maiores 257
—and John Chrysostom 257–258
—and Pelagianism 258–259
Instantius, Bishop 130, 132–134
Iona 523, 594
Ireland, conversion of 517–523, 524, 591–596, 598, 600–601, 644, 753
—monastic character of Church 521–523
—schools 522–523, 600–601
Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyon 225, 287
Irene 375
Isaac, Accuser of Pope Damasus I 250
Isaac, Bishop of Geneva 199
Isaac, Bishop of Seleucia-Ctesiphon 238
Isaac, monk 370
Isauria, evangelization of 190
Ishar Yahb, Catholicus of Persia 467
Isidore, Bishop of Pelusium 729
Isidore, Bishop of Seville 272, 568–569, 571–573, 584, 600, 645, 655, 669–672, 682–683, 689, 691, 693, 736, 750–756
—writings of 571–573, 750–755
—Regula Monachorum 703–704, 754
—Etymologiae 751–752
Isidore, priest of Alexandria 124
Islam 462, 467, 469, 471–472, 476, 478–479, 482, 488, 495, 496, 508, 509, 509–514, 611–612, 612–614, 707
—condition of Christians under 513–514
Italy 507, 519, 543–544, 559–561, 572–573, 582–585, 604, 613, 618–619, 625, 627, 629–632, 635, 640, 647, 650, 661, 673, 684, 711, 714–716, 733, 735, 739, 743–744, 748
—monasticism in 374–379, 388, 691, 693–698, 702
—Lombards in 574–585
Italy, central and southern (Italia Suburbicaria) 201–203, 215, 234, 243
Italy, upper, and Raetia (Italia Annonaria) 197–201, 234–235
Ithacius, Bishop of Ossonuba 132–134

Jacob Baradai, Bishop of Edessa 457, 470–471, 475
Jacobite Church 470, 475–479, 483, 511–512
—Syriac ecclesiastical literature 477–478
—monasticism 478
Jacobus 166
James, Bishop of Edessa 477
James of Sarug 477
Jarrow, monastery 599, 665
Jerome 50, 58, 90, 123–128, 131, 162, 164, 167, 171, 212–213, 228, 249, 253–254, 272, 291, 312, 316, 323, 329, 336, 350, 353, 358, 360–362, 375, 377, 384–385, 392, 400, 405, 407, 412, 414, 572, 672, 703–705, 740, 746, 751
Jerusalem 9, 123–125, 127, 167, 184–185, 222, 239, 291, 297, 303, 305–306, 320, 324, 329, 339, 354, 358, 359, 361–362, 410, 423, 425, 427, 442, 445, 483–484, 498, 500, 513, 514, 659, 661
—patriarchate of 185, 236, 239, 442, 498
—Synod of (331) 193
—Synod of (518) 186
—Synod of (536) 186
John, Abbot of the Acemetae 370
John, Apostle 241, 330
John, archcantor at St. Peter's 665
John, Bishop of Antioch 104–105, 107–111, 239, 263
—and Cyril of Alexandria 108–112
John, Bishop of Aquileia 735
John, Bishop of Ilici 624, 636–637
John, Bishop of Jerusalem 123–124, 127, 167–168, 239
John, Bishop of Justiniana Prima 642–643, 680
John, Bishop of Scythopolis 489
John, Count 105–106, 336
John II, Patriarch of Alexandria 469
John II, Patriarch of Constantinople 435, 623
John, Patriarch of Jerusalem 432
John I, Pope 437, 625, 627, 737
John II, Pope 433, 444–445, 626, 629, 639
John III, Pope 629, 693
John Chrysostom, Bishop of Constantinople 89, 97–98, 128, 187–189, 193–194, 212, 214, 223, 228, 243, 257–258, 272, 294, 296, 308, 310, 314–315, 317–319, 322–323, 332–333, 337, 363, 366–367, 370, 383, 392, 396, 401, 404, 408, 413–415, 496, 508, 730
—Liturgy of 291, 499
—as preacher 314–315
John Climacus 487, 494
John Damascene 372
John Kolobus 356
John Mandakuni 482
John Moschus 485
John Philoponus, philosopher 470, 490–491, 508
John Talaia 426–429
John of Asia, missionary 438, 477, 508
John of Biclar, Bishop of Gerona 206, 564, 571, 704
John of Cappadocia 438
John of Ephesus 192
John III the Almoner, Patriarch of Alexandria 471, 495
John the Faster, Patriarch of Constantinople 497, 630
John the Grammarian 489
John the Scholastic, Patriarch of Constantinople 457, 498–499
Jonas, Abbot of Halmyrissus 194
Jovian, Emperor 60, 218
Jovinian 167, 255, 323, 392–393
Judaism 5, 27, 89, 181, 185–187, 197, 311, 327–328, 396, 458, 511, 677
—and Christian evangelization 221–224, 508
—and Justinian I 439, 508, 609
Judicatum of Sergius 459
Judicatum of Pope Vigilius 452, 454, 610
Julian, Bishop of Aeclanum 171–174
Julian, Bishop of Toledo 569–570, 573, 669
Julian, Emperor 33–34, 50–59, 60, 62, 97, 141, 157, 185–188, 212, 214, 217, 219–220, 222, 390
—education of 51–52
—adherence to paganism 52–54
—character 52
—attempted restoration of paganism 34, 54–59, 191
—reform of paganism 54–56
—and the teaching profession 55–56
—resistance of pagans to reform 56
—removal of Christians from official posts 56–57
—and the bishops 57–58
—and Donatism 141–142
—writings 58
—death of 58–59
Julian of Halicarnassus 446, 455, 469–470, 490
Julianus Pomerius 695
Julius, Bishop of Puteoli 113
Julius I, Pope 35–38, 40–41, 84, 201, 247–248
Junca, Synod of (523) 608
Justin I, Emperor 433–437, 506, 608, 623–625
Justin II, Emperor 457, 477, 499, 508, 610
—and the Monophysites 457
Justinian I, Emperor 77, 89, 192, 195, 270, 278, 357, 399, 433–456, 457, 467, 469, 475, 477, 481, 485, 487–489, 496, 498–499, 503–504, 506–508, 558, 561, 566, 568, 571, 574, 576, 608–611, 623, 626–628, 640, 642, 711, 715, 739, 750–751
—and unity 437–438
—and pagans 438–439, 474
—and Jews 439
—and Samaritans 439

—and heretics 439
—position in the Church 439–443, 451–452, 456, 628
—and negotiations with the Monophysites 443–447
—reconquest of Italy 445–446
—and Origen 448–449
—and the Three Chapters 450–456, 610, 728–729
—and Aphthartodocetism 455–456
Justinian II, Emperor 503, 635
Justiniana Prima 498, 642–643
Justus, Bishop of Rochester 592
Justus, Vicar 191
Juvenal, Bishop of Jerusalem 117, 185, 214, 239, 359, 423, 483–484, 505

Kairawan 613
Kellia 354–355
Kent, Kingdom of 588–592, 594–595, 598
Kilian 540, 551
Kiurion, Catholicus of the Iberians 481
Korium 482
Kunincpert, Lombard King 581, 583–584

La Cisa Pass 575
Lactantius 216, 336
laity in the Church 334–337
—growing separation from clergy 334–335
—and election of bishop 335
—end of lay preaching 335
—lay theologians 335–336
—administration of Church property 336
—lay apostolate 336–337
Lakhmids 189, 510, 512
Lambert 540
Lampsacus, Synod of (c. 364) 61–62
Lantechild 525
Laodicea, "Synod" of 233, 332, 335
Lateran basilica 10, 22, 589, 658
—palace 246, 621, 661
—baptistery 264
—schola of 664
—Synod of (649) 461, 580, 612, 635, 707
—Synod of (680) 462, 635
laura 358–359, 432, 447, 449, 483–484, 511, 707
Latin liturgies 292, 361, 585
—Gallican 292–293, 666–670, 722
—Romano-African 292
—Celtic 292
—Spanish 292–293, 666–668, 670, 722
—Ambrosian 292
—Roman 292–293, 297–298
Laurentian Schism 430, 620
Lawrence, antipope 620–621
Lawrence, Bishop of Milan 577
Lawrence, Saint 330, 556, 570
Lazarus, Bishop of Aix 167
Lazica 506–507
—conversion of 506–507
Lea 375
Leander, Bishop of Seville 564, 566, 569, 571, 637, 691, 703, 705, 713, 745
—"Rule" of 703
Lent 302–303, 309–310, 409, 660, 665, 670–672, 674, 676
Leo I, Emperor 410, 422–424, 615
Leo II, Emperor 424
Leo I, Pope 88, 101, 107, 112–121, 174, 188, 203, 223, 239–240, 243–245, 264–269, 272, 276, 279–280, 283, 289, 303, 319, 335, 376, 383, 409, 421–422, 424, 442, 497, 517–518, 586, 604, 614, 618, 622, 624, 629, 637, 653 658, 681, 730, 732
—Epistula Dogmatica ad Flavianum 107, 113, 115–116, 118–120, 268, 422, 424, 427, 432, 435, 480, 488, 615
—and the liturgy 658–659
Leo II, Pope 569, 634
Leontius, Bishop of Antioch 45
Leontius, Bishop of Neapolis 495, 508
Leontius, Emperor 613
Leontius, monk of the New Laura 448
Leontius of Byzantium 489, 738
Leontius of Jerusalem (or of Byzantium) 495
Leovigild, Visigothic King 561, 563–564, 710–715
Leporius 102
Lérida, Council of (523) 709
Lérins 265, 275, 381–382, 588, 600, 690, 699, 726
Letoius, Bishop of Mytilene 372
Lex Alemannorum 557
Lex Baiuvariorum 557
Lex Ribuaria, 557
Lex Romana Visigothorum 560, 566, 572–573
Lex Salica 557
Libanius, rhetor 52, 187, 218–219, 390, 414
Liber Heraclidis 107
Liber Ordinum 669–670, 754
Liber Pontificalis 660
Liberatus, Primate of Byzacena 706
Liberian basilica 264, 306, 660–662, 684
Liberius, Pope 41–43, 45–46, 48, 61–63, 82–83, 201, 248–250, 252
Libya 16, 18, 28, 49, 225, 234, 236, 243, 497, 611
—Libyan desert 338, 354
Lichfield 595–596, 599
Licinius, Emperor 3–4, 6, 16, 187, 195
Ligugé 380
Lincoln 211
Lindisfarne 594–596
Lindsey 596
Literature, Byzantine (451–700), 488–495
—character 488–489
—theologians 489–492
—other writers 493–495
—homiletics 494–495
—lack of creativity 495
liturgical year 302–307, 671–672
Liturgy 289–307, 307–319, 499–500, 658–672

—relationship to evangelization 289–290, 293–297
—differentiation between eastern and western 290–293
—characteristics of Oriental liturgies 291–292
—baptism 293–296
—Eucharist 296–298
—penance 299–301
—matrimony 301–302
—liturgical year 302–307, 499–500
—catechesis 307–312
—homily 310–319
—hours of prayer 320–321
—Byzantine 292–293, 499–500
—dress 666
Liturgy, Roman 658–668, 670, 672
Liturgy, West Syrian 291
Liturgy of James 291
Liturgy of Mark 291
Liturgy of the Hours 670–672
—double vigil at Rome 671
Liuthard, Bishop 586
Liutprand, Lombard King 583–584
Livania 168
Lombards 229–230, 526, 543, 574–585, 597, 629–630, 632–633, 691, 698, 715–716, 733–735, 748
—conversion to Catholicism 715
—national church 583–585
London 211, 521, 585, 589, 592, 595–596
Lorch 196, 536, 545
Lucian of Antioch 17, 312
Lucifer, Bishop of Cagliari 42, 44, 60, 84–85
Lucius, Bishop of Alexandria 64, 391
Lupus, Bishop of Troyes 382, 525, 556
Luxeuil, monastery 523, 534–535, 539, 540–544, 547, 549, 552, 554, 556, 558, 592, 701–702
Lyon 199, 207, 382–383, 531, 600, 641, 656
—Council of (583) 649

Macarius, Bishop of Jerusalem 23
Macarius, imperial agent 138, 140
Macarius, monk of Scete 356, 373, 704
Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch 462
Maccurites 206
Macedonia, evangelization of 194
Macedonians 71, 73–74, 252, 417
Macedonius, Bishop of Constantinople 49, 370
Macedonius, Bishop of Philai 182
Macedonius, magister officiorum 132
Macedonius, Patriarch of Constantinople 430–432, 435
Macellum in Cappadocia 51–52
Mâcon, Synod of (581) 652
Mâcon, Synod of (585) 641, 652, 656, 675–676
Macrobius, Bishop 141
Macrobius, Proconsul 153
Magnentius, usurper 40–41, 212
Magnus, Bishop 133
Magusaeans 192
Mainz 225, 550, 552
Maiuma 57, 185, 358
Malabar Christians 291, 468
Malmesbury 601
Malta 203
Manichaeans 130, 132, 135, 172–173, 207, 265, 338, 342, 362, 368, 443, 621, 726
Mansuetus, Bishop of Milan 581
Marathonius, Bishop of Nicomedia 63
Marathonius, monk 370
Marcella 126–127
Marcellina 375
Marcellinus, Count 165, 336
Marcellinus, Senator 153, 156–158
Marcellus, Abbot of the Acemetae 370
Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra 23, 37–38, 67, 94
Marcian, Emperor 115–118, 268, 422, 442, 565
Marcomanni 198
Marculus, Bishop 140–141
Marcus, Bishop of Arethusa 33
Marcus, Egyptian 130
Marcus, priest 151
Mardonius, teacher 51–52
Marius Mercator 162
Marius Victorinus 56, 336
Mark, Evangelist 267
Mark, Pope 201, 247
Marmoutier 380–381
marriage, clerical 277–280, 302, 367, 503
marriage and family 5, 394–401
—Christian understanding of 394–396
—impediments 396
—of slaves 396–397
—rights of father 396–400
—equality of spouses 397–398
—parents and children 652, 398–400 —exposure of children 398–399
—orphanages 399
—adoption 399–400
—abortion 400
—illegitimate children 400
Marseille 175–176, 383–384, 587
Martin, Bishop of Braga 211, 562, 571, 644, 674–675, 677, 703
Martin, Bishop of Tours 133–134, 194, 208–209, 214, 327, 331, 377, 380–382, 384, 524, 528, 556, 562, 571, 586, 645, 687, 700, 703
Martin I, Pope 461, 530, 612, 635–636
Martyrius, Abbot of Phbow 353
Martyrius, Bishop of Jerusalem 359
Marutha, Bishop of Maipherkat 325
Mary, Blessed Virgin 99–101, 106–107, 328–329, 392, 398, 444, 500–501, 556, 570, 573, 684–685, 729
Mascazel 147
Masona, Bishop of Mérida 564
Masruq, Sabaean King 187
Master, Rule of the 691, 694–696, 743

Masuna, Berber King 611
matrimony 394–401
Mauretania 604, 613
Maurice, Emperor 458, 466, 481, 497, 500, 512, 577–578, 611, 630, 734–735, 745
Maximian, Bishop of Bagai 151–152
Mawia, Princess 186
Maxentius, Scythian monk 436
Maximian, Bishop of Constantinople 106, 108
Maximian, Bishop of Ravenna 661
Maximian, Donatist Bishop 146
—Maximianists 146–147, 150–151, 157
Maximian, Donatist martyr 140
Maximin, monk of Chinon 381
Maximinus, Arian writer 715
Maximinus, Bishop of Trier 38
Maximinus Daia, Emperor 345
Maximus, Bishop of Emona 201
Maximus, Bishop of Trier 198
Maximus, Bishop of Turin 212, 306–307, 316, 332
Maximus, philosopher 51–52, 58
Maximus, uncanonical Bishop of Constantinople 71, 75–76, 252
Maximus, usurper 132–134
Maximus Confessor 460–462, 487, 492–493, 612, 707
Maximus of Lérins, Bishop of Riez 382
Maziken tribe 356
Mecca 509, 511
Medina 511
Melania the Elder 360–361, 375
—double monastery on Mount Olivet 360
Melania the Younger 361–362, 375, 379, 404
Melchiades, Pope 246
Meletius, Bishop of Antioch 60, 62–63, 65, 67–68, 70–71, 76, 96, 188
Meletius, Bishop of Lycopolis 27
Melkites 470, 472, 476, 514
Mellitus, Bishop of London 592, 633
Memnon, Bishop of Ephesus 105–106
Memor, Bishop 171
Menas, Patriarch of Constantinople 445–446, 449, 452–453, 627
Menas, Saint 330, 370, 410, 473
Menuthis 182, 501
Mérida 711
—Synod of (666) 647, 657
Merobaudes, patricius 225
Merovingian Monarchy 224, 525, 527–533, 535–537, 549, 553, 555–556, 558, 568, 588, 593, 599, 630, 640–641, 647, 650, 657–658, 659, 661, 711
—national Church 528, 530–558, 586, 592, 631, 641, 657
—proprietary church 533
—monasticism 533–535, 690–691, 696–697, 699–702
—missionary work 535–558
—ecclesiastical organization 541–542
Mesrop 480, 482
Messalianism 365, 371–373, 387, 464, 493
Metanoia, monastery 350, 353
Methodius 122
metropolitan organization 207, 232–236, 241–243
—provincial synod 241–242
—interprovincial synod 242–243
Michael Caerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople 497
Michael the Syrian 458
Milan 50, 86–88, 197, 199, 202, 232, 234–235, 238, 243, 249, 257, 270, 333, 377–378, 380, 393, 517, 575–578, 580–582, 584, 597, 628–629, 633, 715, 733.
—evangelizing activity of 197–198, 200
—liturgy of 293
—Synod of (355) 42, 82–84, 244, 248
—Synod of (392–393) 199
—Synod of (451) 199
Mileve 258
—Synod of (416) 169
—Synod of (417) 245
Mirian, King of the Georgians 190
Mirocles, Bishop of Milan 197
missionary activity 181–230
—dangers in the fourth century 181
—irregular progress 212
—method 213–224
—lay cooperation 213–214
—role of the state 217–221
—pagan reaction 219–221
—quality of results 221
—and Judaism 221–224
—and the Germans 225–230
Monarchianism 21
monasteries, double 360, 599
monasterium clericorum 385
Monasterium Servitanum 571, 703, 705
monasticism 410, 447, 692–694
—background 337–342, 375
—motives 339–341
—Christian ideal of perfection 342
—and evangelization 183, 188, 215
—anti-monastic currents 390–393
—and the hierarchy 391, 691–692
—and lay circles 391–393
—Nestorian 468
monasticism, eastern 343–360, 362–368, 374, 470, 473, 478, 483–488, 510
—Egyptian anchorites 343–345, 354–355, 362–363
—Egyptian cenobites 338–339, 345–354, 359
—Nitria and Scete 354–357
—Palestine 357–360
—Latin monasteries in Palestine 360–362, 374
—Syria 362–367, 478
—Greek 367–371, 486
—Messalianism 365, 371–373
—dangers in 486–487
monasticism, Greek 367–371, 442, 486
—and Chalcedon 371, 486–487
—and Justinian I 487–488

monasticism, western 374–393, 690–707
—Latin monasteries in Palestine, 360–362, 374
—Rome and Italy 375–379
—Gaul 379–384, 534–535, 540–541, 551, 691
—Spain 385–386, 691, 702–705
—North Africa 386–390, 705–707
—Celtic 521–523, 535, 690–692, 698
—Germany 551, 554
—England 597–598
—missionary activity 692
—schools 692
Monoenergism 121, 459–460, 471, 476, 482, 489, 492
Monophysitism and Monophysites 109, 111–114, 184, 186, 216, 290, 359, 417, 427, 430–432, 434, 438, 442–446, 451, 455, 457–460, 462–463, 464–467, 469–472, 474–477, 479, 481, 484–485, 490–492, 496, 501, 504, 506, 508, 510–511, 514, 615–617, 622, 627
Monothelitism 121, 460–463, 530, 569, 580–582, 597, 612, 633–635, 664, 707, 715
Montanists 273, 443
Montanus, Bishop of Toledo 136
Monte Gargano 581, 687
Montecassino 202, 694
Moses, Arabian Bishop 186
Moses II, Catholicus of Armenia 481
Mount Auxentius 369
Mount Sinai 357, 483, 485
Muhammad 187, 511–513
Muslims, see Islam

Naples 201–203, 604, 693
Narbonne 235, 561
—Synod of (589) 651–652
Narcissus, Bishop of Jerusalem 343
Narsai of Edessa 365
Narses, general 577–578
Narses, head of school of Edessa 464
Nazianzus 62
Nectarius, Bishop of Constantinople 74
Negran 186, 189
Neocaesarea, Synod of (314/315) 193, 233
Nephalius 431
Nepos, Bishop of Arsinoe 122
Nerses III, Catholicus of Armenia 482
Nerses the Great 479
Nestorian Church 463–469, 473, 476, 480–481, 504
—in Persia 464–469, 481
—missionary activity 468–469
Nestorianism 120, 186, 189, 216, 290–291, 383, 431, 436–437, 444, 465, 467–469, 481, 510–511, 514, 624, 716, 728–730, 738
Nestorius, Bishop of Constantinople 98, 100–110, 112, 118, 120, 174, 243, 262–263, 288–289, 292, 370, 425, 432, 435, 437, 450–451, 463, 622
—and Cyril of Alexandria 100–110
Netras, Bishop of Pharan 357
Neustria 531, 556, 701
New Laura, monastery 448, 455, 484
Nicaea 116
—First Council of (325) 6–7, 11, 22–29, 65–66, 70–71, 74–75, 77, 79, 85, 94, 99, 100, 106, 116, 183, 185–186, 189–191, 193–194, 226, 233, 236–237, 239, 241, 246, 248, 258, 260, 269, 274, 278, 288, 302, 307, 312, 320, 417, 427, 716–719, 721
Nicaea-Constantinople, Creed of; see Constantinople, Creed of Nicasius, Bishop of Reims 685
Nicene Creed 25–29, 34, 37–38, 42, 44, 48–49, 59–61, 65, 67, 69, 71–73, 78, 82–83, 94, 104–105, 111, 118, 120, 246, 251, 377, 424, 711, 713
Nicetas, Bishop of Remesiana 194–195, 695
Nicetius, Bishop of Trier 527, 574
Nicomedia 16, 18, 22, 29, 52
Nika Riot of 532–443
Nikagoras, Neoplatonist philosopher 7
Ninian, Apostle of the Picts 211, 519, 523
Nino 190
Nisibis 57, 468
—school of 464, 466
Nitria, Desert of 126, 337, 343–344, 354–356, 361, 380, 391
Noman, Ghassanid Prince 512
Noman, Lakhmid Sheik 512
Nomocanones 499
Nonnus, monk of the New Laura 448
Noricum, evangelization of 196–197, 201
North African Episcopal Synod 150, 234, 238, 242, 608
Northumbria, Kingdom of 587, 590–591, 593–596, 599, 601
Notitia Antiochena 498
Notitiae Episcopatuum 498
Novatian 93, 163, 343
Novatians 6, 274, 443
Nubia 473–474
Numidia 604, 610–611

Oceanus 126
Odoacer, King of Italy 618
Olympus in Bithynia 343
Omar II, Caliph 613
Oppila 712
Optatus, Bishop of Mileve 143, 414
Optatus, Bishop of Thamugadi 146–148
Orange, Synod of (441) 243, 280, 405, 647, 654
—Synod of (529) 626, 727–728, 749
Orders, clerical 270–273
Orders, lesser 270, 302, 647
—subdeacon 270–272, 279, 283, 651
—acolyte 270–272, 283

—exorcist 270–271
—porter 270
—lector 270, 283, 297, 646, 651
ordination 281–289
Ordines Romani 661
—Ordo I 661–664, 666
— XI 661
— XII 671
— XIV 671
— XV 664
— XVI 671
— XXVII 661
— XXXIV 661, 666
Origen 21, 78, 93, 167, 277, 316, 320, 329, 341, 356, 361, 447–449, 451, 454–455, 492–493, 740–741, 746–747
—on the Trinity 21
—and Christology 93, 96
—orthodoxy of 121–129, 256, 447–449
—Peri Archon 125, 127–128, 449
—condemned at Alexandria 126
—new controversy of sixth century 447–449, 451, 454–455, 484
—condemned in 553 129, 455
Orléans 531, 536
—Synod of (511) 528, 533, 560, 648, 700, 710
—Synod of (533) 651, 653
—Synod of (538) 679
—Synod of (541) 647, 649
—Synod of (583) 652
Orosius 162, 167, 226, 414
Ostia 201–202
